Chapter 01 A Peculiar Place

Narrator: Linda. Newsagent (Ash Wednesday 6th March 2019)

Newsagents and ministers of religion both make judgements about others.

In the Serninsea High Street, inside the newsagent's there, a Mrs. Gertrude Carter, one of the parish congregation, said, "Hello Curate, again, have you seen what's in The National Lens this morning? I don't know if you ought to look at it. Page three. See you later I'm sure."

"Thanks Gert," I said, calling her like her friends did, but I felt like I should call her 'Mrs. Carter' instead. She was solid, dignified, upright, and knew me locally when I was a girl.

The mark she had on her head had worn away somewhat. Mine I'd seen intact in the vestry mirror before leaving the church. This shopkeeper, Jagjit Kapoor, laughed whilst his head-covered wife shook her head - not from any marks we displayed but because of the tabloid content. He opened the front cover of the said tabloid on its pile, and, on page three, was a picture of a young brunette woman with a trowel. Below was written:

Today's topless find is holding up her trowel as she continues to celebrate getting an archaeology degree.

When this discovered twenty-two years old digger bends and scrapes in her low-cut trench she gives her one-time rusty old professor above a treasure-chest of her own.

"Oh crumbs," I said. "Hmm. When I was her age..."

Kath Wickenby, a graduate of Cambridge, likes nothing better than to dig herself deep into the wet, sticky mud in her local area of Serninsea on the east Foss coast.

"We've only ever found evidence of old postholes," says Kath. "Roman stuff often rubs out the Saxon."

To celebrate her learning, she will return to Cambridge to view the cleaned-up and now glittering Anglo-Saxon Serninsea Cross brooch found by a lucky metal detectorist two years back.

"That was one exciting unlikely fluke," said Kath. "I wish I'd been on top of it when it came up."

When we at The National Lens heard about the ground-digger we were also overjoyed and went east to put this scraper on display for the inspection of our expert readers.

"That is pathetic," I said, "although I wish I could write my sermons like that. Or perhaps not."

"It tells you everything you need to know about Serninsea, does it not, Mrs. Jupiterus?" the husband shopkeeper added, with his wife nodding.

"Jupitas," I corrected him.

"Very sorry. Not like the comedian. You are 'as' not 'us'."

I thought, yes, I'm an 'ass' and not 'one of us' with this cassock on. (What they didn't know was that under the cassock was a bare arse, like the rest of my bare body.)

"Does that shock you?" the wife shopkeeper, Gurinder Kapoor, asked me.

"I'd say rather that the writing saddens me," I replied. "But she didn't write this - they did. It's not Serninsea's script."

Gurinder said, "It's a child of Serninsea displaying her wotsits."

For me, it would have been more honest if she were shown naked as a matter of course: not pushing out her breasts along with that cheesy text. I kept this opinion to myself.

I said, "I'll buy a Daily Cable instead and see what right-wing nonsense is in it today."

"Very good and God bless you," said the man.

I thought, 'Why bring God into it?'

"Ah yes, em, yes, God blesses you too. I think what your community does with those free meals for anyone is fantastic. I'd copy that, I really would."

"The more the merrier," he said.

Another man behind me said, "Er, vicar, vicarette: I think you'll find Kath Wickenby was also in the local papers last year and with rather more on. So is the town to blame? I'm Councillor Gethin Layne."

"She must be an asset to the community," I said rapidly, thinking then that my response could be a tabloid comment.

"I seem to remember she had a sister, vicarette," said the councillor. "Her sister must have said no. I bet she got well paid for getting them out in The National Lens."

"Come to think of it," said the shopkeeper, "Twins. They have been in our humble shop, now I think about it."

"Oh well, small world. Especially on the east coast," I commented. Small, except I never seemed to remember most faces.

Gurinder said, "Oh yes. Distracted by nonsense when a customer wrote this for you, anonymously, and I think he doesn't live here:"

*Come in now to the barren land,
Stay in the wilderness;
Focus upon your peace of mind
And depend on less and less.
For strength will come, and only come
When weakness shows your loss,
That in this wilderness you will find
The power of the Cross.*

"This is wonderful. Much more wholesome. Thank you, Gurinder. Is he older than me, younger?"

"He's likely older than forty."

"I'm still thirty-nine. For a little while."

The shopkeeper Jagjit returned to the more deleterious, "By the way, have you seen that advert in the shop window? Some locals - and it must include this lass - are putting on a magic show on in Serninsea's Church Hall in Lent, on Mothers' Day.

"Ah yes. Colin dealt with this and it was the only day he'd allow it in Lent," I replied. "So it is her, or them. Mothering Sunday, actually." I went over to look at the computer-made advert. The Magic Lantern Show: The Peter and Kath Partnerskip. With a 'k'. (It said Mothering Sunday there.) I said, "That's clever, and taking note of Lent as well."

"Yes, Mothers' Day," he said.

"Mothering Sunday," I stated, for a second time. "It's the day in Lent when domestic workers and others returned to the mother church."

"I sell cards," Jagjit said. "'Mothers' Day' is what they say."

"Oh, I wasn't trying to correct you or anything," I said. Little Nashika, their toddler, came running out from the back of the shop and disappeared again. "We Christians say and do things differently. For example, it's like Christmas, you see, that starts for us on the 25th of December but seems to start early for most."

"What sells when," he responded.

"Christmas?" called Nashika.

"Not for a long time," said her mother.

It was time to move from the diversions of the shop. Once again I'd been clumsy. An analytical, context-based, Social Theology MA, had not improved for me the context of communication.

Now the suffragan bishop wanted local economic partnerships. Of course that's what this Kath was doing: promoting the economy through personal partial exposure and by putting on a magic show. Presumably she would not expose her breasts in the Church Hall. Oh, Colin would not like that.

I went in the library, for anything and finding nothing. I wondered if I could do a poem - not something I did usually.

Goosey goosey gander:
At Serninsea does land
An egg - it finds its patch,
What secrets does it hatch?

Perhaps I could bung it in a sermon, or perhaps not. I returned to an empty house. My husband Keith had left for Harwich yesterday, his employer's headquarters. He would be back Tuesday evening. All the locations of the firm, Systematic Measuring Services, were standardising their measurement testing procedures that had tended to diverge over the last two years because of different clientele and this adjusting was ahead of a self-inspection process for internal integrity.

During Lent (Saturday 9th March)

Keith and I were enjoying some naked bed time together rather late on Saturday morning. I heard the letter box at the front door, and so went downstairs. I brought the post upstairs and got back in bed. The envelope contained a letter from our very own suffragan bishop, John Terence Barman, the Bishop of Bolingbroke. It read:

For the Serninsea Ings deanery:

As the adapted Lunar calendar begins, with Lent having truly arrived, it comes upon me to address fellow clergy to enhance our every day contact relationships and set examples for the laity, and how they relate to one another.

I am asking each of you to consider a more intimately sacrificial engagement, one to the other, to meet regularly informally as well as formally, and acquire a more personal understanding of one another including the enjoyments and travails of everyday life. Don't be afraid to then talk about these friendly encounters, with the laity, according to what is appropriate. The Bishop of Scredington, Julian Worsley, agrees with me. Be aware also of the diocesan bishop's concern to develop a more progressive personal theology.

Meanwhile he has decided to go on retreat during Lent, being inspired by God to pray at a time of the examination of the diocese and its management. The Bishop of Scredington, Julian Worsley, and myself will therefore carry out more duties at this busy time as part of our sacrificial calling.

+ John Bolingbroke

I detected some superiority there through the holy smoke. A second letter was included, which seemed to be Bishop Barman's aim at social relevance, headed, Mission and Learning Activities.

It is to be my privilege to spend some days among the managers and workers of Systematic Measuring Services (formerly Serninsea Measuring Services), sharing in their important transport monitoring work at Titansea Dock and around the country. I was there in preparation recently, so already have gained an insight into commercial work. This is part of my business outreach so far into the more eastern localities, privileged to learn what makes so much tick in the community. We need to learn so much from business on how to tackle issues of equality, diversity and inclusion. I have also visited various tourist and cultural settings and institutions and have been introduced particularly to the archaeology of the area, especially the wonderful Saxon-style Serninsea Cross. We have so much here that we can promote.

+ John Bolingbroke

Keith made a grumpy sound when I asked him to read it all and give an opinion. I could detect a level of, well, hostility.

"He was organising things with the high-ups up from Harwich. Sir Sanjay Bunker is his man, the Chair of SMS no less, and much else, and the likes of Archie Holborn, our Research and Development Director, and others. I didn't see him myself at SMS and then I went to Harwich."

"He's making an effort."

"But the bullshit meter is registering high with these pastorals. All this about clergy relationships is so 'intimate' that he doesn't even mention the diocesan bishop by name."

I asked him, "What are we supposed to do to carry it out?" I grabbed my old hair brush from my side table and dragged it through my long blonde hair.

"I don't know," said Keith. "That's your job. To be honest, I am less and less interested in him and the whole institution he represents. I'm glad I didn't see him. You want my advice? My advice is to get to know him better."

"Hey?"

"Well, you are supposed to be more interested in him. Don't you think you've brushed that enough? For fuck's sake leave your hair alone."

I put the brush down on my side table. "He does get about in our community and SMS. He probably accepted me having turned you down to show - now here in writing - a progressive outlook. More women. He is go-ahead."

"And when you meet him," asked Keith, "What do you think?"

"Well, something tells me he is not all there."

"Ah. Yes. Me too. Why?" Keith asked.

"I always smell perfume. I don't know. Why do you think?"

"I don't know either. He is perhaps up in the clouds. A bit like you. These letters have gone out across the Serninsea Ings deanery only, when he is not an area bishop."

I said, "I must not be judgmental."

"Don't be so holy with me. I shall be judgmental," he said.

"I'm not holy. Any petrol left in your tank?" I asked him.

"I think it is filling up again."

"Can you fill me up?"

"You must be travelling a lot. Nope, you're still here in the petrol station."

"Low miles per gallon - high usage - a need for more petrol pump. I'll grab your hose, to start. At least a good poke means I won't have to use my dilators today."

"Good idea. Your nozzle's not big but my pump fits it quite neatly with a bit of extra push."

"I do have an alternative tank, developed by you."

"I'll skip the diesel entrance for now, my love. That's a more energetic fill-up."

"Come on, do my petrol. Again."

Thus I was energised for the first Sunday in Lent next day. As a deacon curate, I was busy but supposed to have time to observe and follow.

O Holy Setting (Sunday 10th March, looking back)

Here I was, see, in the vestry, doing some administration and being available as a salaried deacon. (Most home-based deacons would be unpaid.) I became a curate nearly a year ago, which meant this was the year to be priested.

The policy of the National Church in England was to train people residentially in college if they were under forty and intending to be full-time paid priests. I was selected when thirty-five years old and started residential training when thirty-six. I had ended up back here because the suffragan bishop, John Terence Barman, in the diocese from eight years ago, wanted me; the diocesan bishop, appointed a year after Bishop John came on the scene, continued to allow him this sphere of influence and activity especially in the east of Wytham diocese.

The previous diocesan was the Right Reverend the Lord Bishop Daniel Dimpleby. The Right Reverend Derek Imperial had not been selected so far to sit in the House of Lords and, in any case, someone else made up the twenty-six.

In Catholic theory, the priests of his diocese are basically his hands: they represent him. The suffragans represent him too. The difference is that they also ordain others, unlike priests. Perhaps the suffragans add a bit of mouth and an ear to his extra hands.

As for the reputation for inefficiency in the diocese, the rot started with Daniel Dimpleby. How he ended up as a Lord Bishop when most priests end up as nothing further no one really knew.

Colin Cromer, my training vicar, also a representative of Derek Imperial, told me that he took the pastoral letter from the suffragan bishop very seriously; we should be more than just professionals with one another. It was a matter of Christian ethical behaviour generated from the heart under the guidance of the Holy Spirit. It did not matter that he had sent this letter to this Serninsea Ings deanery alone, because he may have identified a need to address this deanery and its relationships.

I did not respond. There are times to listen and learn in silence. Colin was approaching thirty-six years in the job, and the freehold fiefdom was his. I knew that.

The congregation in a town like this was never fantastic in number, at some forty people on a Sunday morning and twenty in its evening (with about ten actually different). That was the average, so basically the pool of the loyal was about double or so this number of unique individuals. This was across the two towns and a village running together, and attendance was worse in most neighbouring parishes, as in the Carrs and Ings. In the next parish north, from the Marshes, Reverend Jim Wilson's evangelical flexibilities of style but hardness of doctrines (a staunch believer in penal substitution) did attract some incoming car drivers, and he wanted young people to gather to bash some instruments. He also neglected ten of his eleven churches north to concentrate on the one good southern one. Here, in Serninsea, we were bog standard.

I should never have been ordained; it should have been my husband, Keith. So this is what had happened. I knew of Keith at school. He went to East Midlands University, in 1996, although I hardly registered the fact when he went. I had closer friends, like Jenny Masters and Adam Magellan and I must add Diana King. I went to university twenty-two years ago, in 1997, while Jenny had a gap year. She then went to Tees University to do Mathematics, Business and Accounting. I was into Social Sciences and Religious Studies - for their ideas. (My A levels were Economics, History and Philosophy.) Keith was an RE man too, but a year above, and yet also applying mathematics.

His family was middle class and Anglican; mine was just alternative and weird to most people. I think some people thought we were dirty and unclean. People likely saw that he conformed to his family and I was rebelling, but, more truthfully, he didn't always conform and I didn't rebel. He rebelled under the radar. I was loyal to family naturism and it mattered. In the warmth of the fields of the arable farm, all my clothes would be off. They were off in the house too, like the rest of the family. But we had a farm shop, with a minimum of clothes on.

I met Keith properly at East Midlands University and, after some trepidation and uncertainty, he accepted me and we had a mutually comforting and vigorous sexual relationship. We also then talked ideas. He did go to the Student Christian Movement Chaplaincy, in the 'moderate wing' of student Christian participation. I did go at times as his respectable partner, but was barely involved. Thus twenty years back in 1999 Keith graduated but preferred to stay with me, taking a small administration job at the university, banging me like no one else could.

When I left in 2000 we went back to my family's farm, and he lived with his parents. Keith was unemployed, and sometimes was at our farm helping. Daddy didn't like him and mummy was suspicious. I think my older sister, Lucinda, born 3rd February 1978, had enjoyed a sample or two of him before I got the more sustained treatment.

Fifteen years back Keith became a Documentation Assistant in a town museum and a year on took accountancy and computer courses. In 2006, when Keith went into accounts administration, I became an artists' model with my friend Diana. A year later I tried and did not like photographic modelling. I was called Silky. Keith approved, however, so long as I said nothing about it in church circles. He even came along to photograph me using a friend's dark room for my more personal poses.

Why was I called Silky? Because I had smooth, hairless skin below my head. Why did I do it? Easy money. As a student, I dressed loosely and walked about our accommodation naked. I believed in it. I knew the history of naturism and promoted the idealism of it. I connected it to religious ideas: I learnt the hostility to naturism in some religion, but also places of its embrace. I had an appreciation for the Hindu and Pagan relationship with the body.

I carried on as an artists' model for a further year: three years of that was enough, really. Five minutes on one leg became five minutes too many.

In 2010 Keith got work in Marketing Administration. With his believed to be stable work we became engaged. Two years on, to be sure, in 2012, we married and enjoyed a honeymoon in North Norfolk and Walsingham. Yes, the Anglican liked his Catholicism. However, later that year Keith lost his job. So we were struggling and times were difficult. I know that in 2013 he met a certain Cheryl Mould, being an old school flame of sorts (when he had several fires blazing). Despite marrying, we ourselves were a bit off and on, but we did have good friends. Via Diana we came to know older Patricia.

Thus it was in 2014 that Keith applied for and was rejected for ministry. I was still relying on the farm and Keith was still unemployed. Then in 2015 my family chose to go to a very different kind of farm in mid-Wales. Larry my eldest brother (born 12th March, 1977) was already in London, but my two sisters (Leila was born after a long period on 10th January, 2000) went with mummy and daddy. I could have gone; instead, I thought, I'll attempt what Keith attempted, and, bizarrely, I was accepted. I was able to hang on at the farm until it sold and I then went to Bishop Querceto Theological College, close to East Midlands University, in 2016. So Keith started his Masters of Business Administration as I did my MA in Social Theology.

In late 2017 Keith returned to Serninsea for a year of visiting me for many weekends and some holidays. Thus my Sunday was the Eucharist and then intense sex in the college to be followed by Evensong. I used to stand and sing at Evensong often knackered around my knees and legs.

Back in Serninsea he joined Serninsea Measuring Services as was, changing its name to Systematic Measuring Services. Of course he met a number of work colleagues, and Cheryl Mould had left to work with SMS at its new headquarters site at Harwich. Everything he did in Serninsea had to be checked by Yojana Asthana for honesty, integrity and accuracy.

In 2018 I was recommended to go to my home town to be a salaried deacon. I'd have gone to Hartlepool or Felixstowe or Harwich, if he could get a transfer, but in the end I was placed under Colin as curate. My post came with a house and Keith moved in, just as his mother and father separated and left town in different directions. He'd tried to keep them together. The front display of their family was a farce in the end; they had rotted from within. Colin tried to keep things together, but they were loveless. They didn't care for me being with Keith either, and they learnt that he had always been a bit free and easy with the women. I didn't weep over their separation: I thought they were snotty-nosed and contemptible, and the reality of their relationship was no surprise. Being upright Anglicans was a form of public bullshit. The only product of this was nurturing their son, inculturating him into the forms and thought processes seen in the chaplaincy. After all, he was banging me like someone possessed.

So I settled in with limited duties. My first sermon had been during Advent or what others now see as a commercial Christmas. (Christmas is often a good marker of how clergy handle what many regard as legend within the biblical text, yet is often presented as a form of history.)

Colin had rightly reserved the big night, the midnight service at 24th December 2018, for himself, but, for the dedicated few, he asked me to give a pink (Gaudete) Advent evening sermon on, he said, "How I understand Christmas."

"Tell this in whatever sense you like. It might give everyone a better sense of who you are. Remember, however, that Anglicans don't give opinions: we are representatives of the Church and are supposed to give its stance. We read the Gospel and preach on it. You are the mouth of the bishop, and the bishop represents proper order."

"Then it is not my opinion."

"I don't mind some personal insight from the fruits of your learning."

Trouble was, the fruits of my learning meant that I didn't really believe in Christmas. We were taught that it was the most mythical of the gospel accounts, in Matthew and Luke, and I took this to mean it never actually happened. Well, it didn't.

Keith had used a strategy of focussing on biblical scripts but, being accurate about their considered origins, he discussed them closely to the text. He liked precision. Of course he was now in the quantity checking business in transport, intended to be mainly shipping. His theological literacy from university onwards had been an interest in sources and content. He rarely mentioned it now, except when I asked.

I thought: could I find a strategy not to undermine those who believed in these mythic narratives as true? My supporting husband was perhaps becoming more agnostic regarding the bigger picture. He no longer needed to believe in it, whereas I did need to believe in it, if only for the salary and career, and necessity is the mother of claiming belief.

The orthodoxy, I knew, isn't that the incarnation grew on the man as he learnt to be a bloke and did it correctly; it was there from the start. Some icons show an adult-looking baby. He was born not just as the chosen prophet, as the Muslims have it and perhaps the Jews might have, but the very incarnation of God.

Oh, and that is not 'from the off' as a Miguel Servetus once had it, as at a conception from the Holy Spirit into Mary, but in all eternity. That was a college thing: don't agree with Miguel Servetus. His trinitarianism was rather original, and a marker of heresy.

Not only did I know, like the tutors, that the Matthew and Luke accounts cannot be melded into one, because they do different things in different directions, with different genealogies regarding Joseph the father (who isn't, or is); but, also, I did some reading on historiography and I had become aware of the limitations of the historical process and the importance of primary documents. The Gospels are primary documents of the early Churches (if even them), not of Jesus, and were somewhat edited 'after the events', whatever were actually those events.

My husband had known all this too, which was why he stuck to the text. Bury your head in the detail - origins and outcome. In his secular job, he had ended up burying his head in numbers and measurements, and indeed he was one of those who measured the use of measurements.

But I was more 'female', after all: more holistic. So via study I'd come to believe that, well, Jesus most likely did exist, and that he probably had a mission for about a year and not three (an elongating effect of John's gospel), and that he believed that the end was nigh, and enjoyed a quickly-gained populist following (unhealthy folk seeking healing). He took his mission from Galilee, where he was born, to Jerusalem. If the end was nigh, that would mean bye bye to the Romans, supernaturally, so they knocked Jesus off as they did so many in that difficult edge-of-empire territory; he hoped his actions (and those of Judas) would spark the big final God-led showdown. In fact, life continued on with Roman oppression.

History. I liked it. Claudius's descendents perhaps found Britain a much more compliant end-of-empire land than Palestine. Our Celts made money on the roadsides, or in the city, carrying out the Romans' wishes, and repairing and remaking their goods. (The Saxons did similarly, later.) Boudica was the big exception, so she and her environment received the removal treatment, just as was dished out to dissenters in the Near East.

Jesus's cosmic death - so important for the Jim Wilsons of this world - thus relies upon the accident of Roman history and brutality, unless history is some sort of preordained game. As for the resurrection, I tried to believe that God did extend Jesus's personality after his life by a miracle, one that inspired the followers to build on what Jesus had started, and which, cosmically, somehow, Jesus would also complete. But then history can't do miracles or things that go bump in the night or cosmic interventions.

So it was Advent. While people sang the hymn before my sermon, I did a quick pull through my hair with my constant companion hairbrush. This was a more recent bad habit: Colin by his sideways look to me indicated that my tugging behaviour was inappropriate in church. Keith in the pews noticed as well, moving his hand to indicate to me to stop it. I stopped. It was time to climb the pulpit and use the prompts.

"It's Advent still," I said, as an opener, "and we wait before we sing the carols that others get into straight away, including in the DIY centres and other such places pumping out muzak. But I have been asked, with memories of college, to speak of Christmas and what it means, and I, er, include Advent on this Gaudete Sunday - gaudete means 'rejoice'.

"It's the time when we appropriate the narrative of pregnant expectation, of travel, of impending danger, and of reference to ancestors. These are dramatics and metaphors. It's about the body and not just the spirit, and that's important. That is also the case with resurrection, at the other end of life, with an emphasis too on the body. With the birth comes the element of exposure to danger represented by Herod: Herod who spies, who threatens, and threatens a whole people again and their firstborn. There is the poverty of the final location for the birth, as well as the shepherds that visit - being themselves a despised class. The virginal conception to me is about God's choice and involvement and we must not forget that incarnation is also defined by genealogies of the family in the line of David. There is the reference to liberty by the involvement of Egypt. So it is all part of that Jewish tradition and reality of suffering. The suffering of course goes right through to Christ crucified, and we preach Christ crucified. And then, a little interfaith element perhaps, which is when we come to Epiphany. We have the wise men, perhaps three, perhaps not, who could be astrologers, but come from Persia, and so they are the Gentile element. And let's not forget the animals, who settle around the birth, and represent as if before the Fall in the time of Genesis, when even the land was harmonious before the first sin. So we see how the whole thing wraps up into many vital themes of the incarnation and its connections. It is too early yet, but a Happy Christmas is one that comes with barbs, if only all the celebrators knew it. It is not just tinsel and happiness, but comes with an edge. It is Christ crucified who was being born."

Well, I know this went down well - superficially. Colin Cromer seemed impressed in content but not delivery, and that meant I was in his good books. "Very good. I ought to have said much of that myself on the very night but now I cannot."

Keith himself said, afterwards, to me, "That was an impressive strategy of working the myth, and had everyone nodding. Your: 'We appropriate the narrative of pregnant expectation,' is rather a mouthful for anybody."

"Yes."

"And they probably didn't understand you hedging your bets: it sounded better than it was on the orthodox rating."

It was difficult for me to avoid speech-complexity; I'd been told this before, to try instead to say the most complicated things through the least complicated words possible. I just could not do it. Theology forced complication.

However, as I stood hand-shaking the last of the attenders, Keith said to Colin, within my earshot range at the door, "Em, I'm afraid work is meaning I can attend less. I still support her in all she is doing, and her all important ministry, and that won't diminish, but my own form of truth-work is getting more demanding. Fortunately I have a day off tomorrow. Why I am here really."

Colin said, "Well, it is your ministry to support her how you can of course. Being a deacon is an uncertain time for the future; a bit cocooned in the present."

Actually, I thought Keith was lying: that he was unimpressed, really, with the deception at the heart of what I had said and how I had said it. Much released from his own intended commitment to do the same, he was becoming free. I was not.

At home he started singing Gaudete in the manner of Maddy Prior.

Christmas came and generosity was in the thought alone. We had all the services, and they did not make me joyful. At home and mutually naked, my gift from my husband was a kettle-weight (a flat-bottomed weight with a handle above): "They were selling these in the supermarket for six quid each. So here's yours."

I bought him a set of good quality books from the charity shop, on: Henry V, Louis XIV, A History of Scotland, and the first novel of a series of three, mentioned by Diana de Groot on occasions, The Jacobite Gap Years: An Seumasach Nuadh by Gabrijela Daffron, about a time travelling woman from the present day.

The truth was, and he knew it, that I bought these as much for me as for him. We were skinflints like this from our student days, and continued so by ongoing agreement. I gave Diana a CD of handwriting fonts, and she sent me a CD of Sarah Leonard's A Portrait of English Song. Maybe she got that from a charity shop as well. Oh, I had copied the CD so that I also had these fonts. Diana approved of me buying The Jacobite Gap Years first novel, and was surprised it was in the charity shop because people tended to hang on to them. Oh, she was full of information.

Cheryl Mould had bought him five coloured ties that were SMS marked.

"Why has she bought you a present?" I asked him then.

He said, "Only that she brought them to us from headquarters when she visited, last time, remember. Just sort of tokens. Probably one for each working day."

"Did you buy her anything?"

"Well no: they've got everything down there." He asked me, "Do you remember those diaries that you could lock with a little key? Yojana wanted to give me one that was just for writing in like that. I told her I don't want a Christmas present from her, and I'm not getting presents for her or others. No cards either. But Cheryl had brought these ties up. There isn't a card from her."

He seemed quite open about her. At least she was out of the way in Harwich, at SMS relocated headquarters, but of course she came home at times, in that her parents were still in Serninsea, and he did the odd trip to Harwich (and Felixstowe, another SMS expansion).

Regarding the kettle weight, and reading its leaflet, I said, "It says it's for strengthening my arms. Well, you really need this. Wanker!"

"Ah but there's nothing better for me to sit in bed and you be on the floor on all fours with your bum in the air doing your exercises. As well as dilating."

"Oh right. Definitely a wanker." So, in front of the Christmas tree, on the lounge floor, I gave him a show of my exposed bum while using his kettle-weight.

"Very pleasing. I'll give you a good advent-ure here or back upstairs, if you like."

"Advent is gone. It is Christmas, and for some twelve days."

"X-mas the spot," then, he said. "Merry Arsemas."

"Give us one, then," I said. "On the first day of Christmas, my true love gave to me..."

The lounge floor was a good a place as any for his insertions, and after I'd stared out of focus at the carpet, we took it in turns looking up at the fairy lights.

Now Lent was upon us. By my calculation, which was never my strong point, there was something like four months to Petertide, when I would become a priest and do more than a deacon does. I'd become the diocesan bishop's ritual hands alongside Colin's hands.

Narrator: Keith. Enjoying Yojana (Wednesday 13th March 2019)

I loved my reverend wife so much that I wanted her to go to a good home - once I'd left her. That home would be her Church and parish and also in the form of the Vanguard under the Confraternity of the Theocratic Principality of the English

National Church.

I was at work speaking to my colleague, Yojana Likhsha Asthana in the Independent Inspection Unit. We had to speak to each other from time to time, despite her not being allowed to speak to me over certain tasks.

As well as talking about work matters, I remarked that I had seen this document that Terry Barman had delivered to his clergy, about more intimacy. I said that he was pushing his luck on this one and Yojana agreed. She also thought it could have a perfectly ordinary explanation - at a push.

She questioned me about any longer term repercussions after receiving those company ties in a box from Cheryl back at Christmas. After all, every time I wore one it would remind Linda of Cheryl. I responded that if it raised a puzzlement in Linda's mind, then good. Cheryl had become my love, and my intended personal destination. She reminded me that I needed to display stability on the Linda front for the purposes of our Vanguard.

"How is the sex with Linda?" she asked.

"Pretty good. Recently she's wanted it a bit rougher. I'm happy to provide."

"Good," she responded. "Is she experiencing frustrations as a curate?"

"Could be that. It's up to the Vanguard bishops. It is difficult to make the sex rough enough."

"You're not like that with me."

"I do with you what I am supposed to do, although I hope there is a personal element."

I was Yojana's mentor into the group that included, among some others, SMS employees and National Church people. It was my task to see that she was being absorbed well into the group. She asked why I didn't pursue her to join the group originally.

"We worked too closely together in what can be a conflictual setting. It's why I cannot approach my wife to join."

Once the decision was made to encourage Linda into the Confraternity - still to be actualised - they find appropriate people to do the encouraging. But the bishops of the Confraternity applied different rules to clergy than Christian lay folk, or indeed to a non-Christian like Yojana. Obedience to the bishop by clergy was interpreted as compulsion to join.

Yojana asked about the wider purpose of the group. I said it was to be a model community, of such intimacy that we could not but care for each other. We should listen to the clergy and our Vanguard theologians about bodies, sacrifice, the collective, and cultural expression. We sacrifice ourselves as individuals to the members of the group. As a Hindu she should actively seek to interpret these concepts according to the approaches of Hinduism.

But she wondered about our work roles, about her, say, concealing papers from me when we benefitted each other in the Confraternity.

"As you have been told, you carry on concealing. We work as we do."

She asked about my own one-time mentor, June Holborn, the wife of the SMS executive having responsibility for Research and Development. They had just moved to Harwich. Of course I had slept with her many times. I was initiated by the Reverend Jenny World on one of her trips south.

Yojana had the afternoon off. She told me to go to her parents' bed and breakfast, where she helped out. I took up her offer. I knew what she wanted to hear, and it was true, so I said more clearly that I had always fancied her personally.

At this northern, coastal large house, we went to her private room - her parents were busy - and again we had sexual pleasure with each other. She was a wonderful shape: not obese but well proportioned. This Asian lady of golden skin was thirty-five years old and so nearly six years younger than me.

We were both happy in our jobs, and I was even happier now that we were both in this group under the Confraternity. But, yes, as a mentor and mentored we were pushing at the Chinese Wall between us. Whilst I hadn't been allowed to pursue her as a talent scout, I had become her mentor. (I did not make the rules: I just enjoyed them.)

I did have a girlfriend, and my girlfriend had not been pursued for the group. In fact Cheryl could not be pursued for acceptance into the group.

The group was for clergy, or decision-taking laity with degrees, or promoted managers, or people of acquired means, or a combination of these. All were pastorally guided by apostolic clergy in support and obedience of the bishops. It was an elite group for elite purposes, including low rungs of aspiring management - as in my case. This also meant that whilst there could be Protestant clergy, and indeed ministers in other faiths, only apostolic bishops and priests could sanctify and therefore initiate membership of the Confraternity. So far we had one diocesan and two suffragans in two dioceses.

A point was envisaged when the group would open out to the Church as a whole, but until then it would stay as an elite vanguard. Those with a contributory theological insight were especially welcomed for consultation, and around Serninsea this included apostolic clergy, a few denominational ministers, the rabbi coming in from Wytham, and myself. But only the bishops took decisions.

We had a particularly effective thinker in the Reverend Deacon Christine Vine, not of the Serninsea Ings deanery, and only recently into the diocese, in that the bishops seemed keen to follow her insight into apostolic succession and hierarchy. As an unpaid clergywoman, she was travelling between Foss, London and Kent. She was particularly interesting in talking about female ejaculate as a form of divine sign and sanctifying liquid.

Christine had lectured and continued to lecture how sacrifice (meaning sacred death) ran alongside orgasmic pleasure (hope demonstrated in the eternal future) as God's body ritual.

I know that Terry Barman, Suffragan Bishop of Bolingbroke, has since regretted his rejection of me, but he wanted more women to choose from. As priest she could sanctify and Terry would have his woman in place, locally in the group, and not have to rely on the Hartlepool or Margate groups, or indeed a priested Christine coming in when she could. With Linda able to sanctify, the local group could expand better, and she could travel to Hartlepool or the south, or even help set up new groups. There was already the prospect of expansion into Wales, but there was nothing regarding Scotland. Perhaps Linda could go to Inverness, Pitlochry, Perth - somewhere like these places - and mix among Scottish Episcopalians and get a vanguard group going there. It would be amazing if she did.

But, as for my girlfriend, Cheryl, I could not reveal my hand. I loved them both. I loved my wife, with whom I shared a close history, and some secrets, but I knew Cheryl too, and she represented a kind of less sophisticated, simpler way of being, that attracted me. When you fuck women frequently, their lives matter. I knew Cheryl at school. She was a dirty girl! I met her again some six years ago, and she lit a spark. I enjoyed her then too, but the affair only really kicked off properly two years ago.

I lay in Yojana's double bed with her arm over me.

I told her, "If you ever talk to my wife, you don't know Terry Barman. Well, you know he exists, but he is nothing to you. I am showing a level of hostility about him and already display a distance from the Church."

I had suspected that Linda would understand this given the rejection for ministry and my moving on. But this was cover for my place in the Vanguard to be kept secret.

Yojana asked if Linda would go to bed with her once Linda became a member. She wanted to extend her experience. Of course! She had been seduced by the Reverend Deacon Christine Vine, and by the Reverend Jenny World, and had enjoyed both experiences.

"Oh yes. Linda has a bisexual background. She once had a close female friend, not Diana de Groot but the Reverend Jenny World, then Jenny Masters. They could come back together."

I explained, however, that lesbian or bisexual identity was not necessary for same-sex sex. Before my time in the group I'd never seen, never mind touched, other erect, working penises. But I had since tried one in my mouth, thanks to Stephen McPhail, and he laughed when he ejaculated and caused me to spit and swill out my mouth. I had never tasted my own sperm, and this didn't encourage me.

I said that the Vanguard was not a cult: it is a guiding fellowship, and ecclesia within an ecclesia. It was Darwinian even, in the more complete sense. "By giving up some of our personal sovereignty, we benefit ourselves but with a group outlook. We are an elite group expected to prosper through mutual support and decision-taking, Yojana, so that we can project the Church further towards its Kingdom goal." Statements to her like this had to be reported back to one of the bishops.

Yojana and I were somewhat tied to the future of our employer. Any employee might end up going to Harwich or Felixstowe or Hartlepool; I said both Harwich and Felixstowe represented a problem for active participation in the group, given that there was not a Confraternity group there. Our Suffragan Bishop Jonathan Eyre might relocate from Kent upon his coming retirement, but there were people in Margate and Brighton and Worthing needing to continue to receive his guidance. Yojana did not know about this until my explanation.

There might be a new group in South Wales, based on two bishops known to Terry Barman. Yojana did not know this either. She knew that SMS might itself open in South Wales for the sweep of ports there. I told her that the Suffragan Bishop of Casnewydd (Newport) in the Welsh Church, Niall Ifan, once known as Nigel Evans, had a concealed reputation for a string of affairs with women and men. Bishop Terry would work on him in their meetings.

"Would he have gay sex with him?" Yojana asked.

"I think he might, for the cause. It would be unusual. Terry is not gay. These rumours only arise because Terry has never been married."

There was also the Diocesan Bishop of Mynyw, Afanen Ffrwyth, 55, who was known to have a number of lesbian lovers and there was a rumour of a long-standing incestuous relationship with her niece, now Linda's age.

I said, "Do you know who is most likely to try to recruit Afanen, when she is ready?"

"No."

"You."

"Me?"

I said that SMS would need people to recruit in Wales, including those inspectors of our own operational integrity, like Yojana herself, and if Yojana set up a work team somewhere near Aberdaugleddau (Milford Haven) she could have some exciting days and nights with Afanen Ffrwyth. "She is fifty five, so if you were to work on her, it would mean sleeping with a much older woman. But she is used to having relationships with younger women, sometimes much younger."

"I'd like that," she said. "Wow."

"Also, Afanen Ffrwyth has a fine collection of Shiva statues big and small. It is rumoured that when she went to India she carried out a ritual to Ganesha. Terry says Louise Deimos, Linda's clergy confessor, has some Ganeshas and Krishnas, so there might be a chance of compromising and recruiting her."

Yojana told me that she had yet to have the pleasure of Bishop Jonathan Eyre. I told her that he would not want to resist her. I said, sweetly, that no one would want to resist her. With that comment, she went down on me, and she was happy to taste my ejaculate in her mouth, as I licked hers.

Narrator: Linda. The Duty of Visiting (Thursday 14th March)

I was out visiting through Serninsea and Sutton-on-Serninsea. My year as a deacon was to assist at worship, read the Gospel, carry out pastoral care and engage in community outreach.

So I called in on Tracey Graham, seventy years old and a long-standing active parishioner. Most conversations with parishioners were not ones to remember particularly, especially with bland kindnesses to the new curate, but this one was.

She said, "I remember when I was around forty. I used to go to your family's farm shop regularly. To get good eggs, milk, chickens, a variety of vegetables in season, we went to your farm shop. It was a bit of a journey. And I remember your mum, your dad, your brother and sisters."

"Yes."

"And I remember you. Because one day I was in the shop and your mother was serving, and you came in without a stitch on, and your mother did nothing to tell you to go out and back into the house. And a lady beside me, who passed away only last week, Charlotte Stanhope..."

"Mrs Stanhope's funeral is next week."

"...made a big fuss about it. Because you were showing signs of development, let's say. You would not get away with it today. Social services would be crawling all over the place."

"Not necessarily. I know the incident, Mrs. Graham. It wasn't me; it was Lucinda. Lucinda went in the shop. There was a big fuss about it because my mother did not like Mrs. Stanhope's comments. She thought Lucinda should be able to run around naked regardless. But Lucinda was upset, and she made a big issue of it to me, and as a result I stopped going in the shop with nothing on, Mrs. Graham. My sister was eleven. She is a year older than me - you probably know that."

"Your family was known for being a bit strange. Your mother and father were spotted, sometimes, in the fields, with nothing on. And the children."

"Yes. Well we did."

"I don't suppose you do that now, now that you are a reverend."

"The farm was sold over three years ago."

"You're respectable now."

"I am always respectable, Mrs. Graham. May I use your toilet for some minutes I'm afraid?"

No matter how I tried to go to the toilet before and in between visits, I could not control the demands of my back passage.

When I was back and apologising, she asked "And how is your family getting on? Scotland, was it?"

"Wales. Mid-Wales. Their farm is down such a long track that they can indulge themselves. Lucinda has met a very nice man who sells furniture. He is a Welsh speaker, as well. So perhaps she is taking lessons."

"Your eldest brother?"

"London. He was always the most independent. Lucinda lives on the farm and they have the annexe that has also been used for tourists. But not for tourists at the moment."

"Not if your parents are continuing to go around with nothing on; it must be cold up there."

"It is colder, higher up, but the west does get milder weather as well. It is a very different kind of farm, and they have had people in to help them."

"You were seen in the library and the charity shop recently."

"Yes, I was."

The conversation continued.

The visit to Mr James Thorne later on mentioned the fact that we had no choir functioning any more.

"We could have," I said to him, "but with four people left to sing and no one younger willing to give the commitment - we can't even get them to come to the church regularly for services - Colin took the decision to stop it."

Mr Thorne then quoted a line at me: "If there is no music, there is no mystery. If there is no mystery, there is no God. If there is no God, there is no faith. Have I lived for sixty years on a misunderstanding?"

"Very good," I said to him. "Septimus Harding," I believe.

"Popular culture," he said. "Not quite so popular."

"I watched a lot of telly when younger. DVDs at university. My dad played DVDs of British wrestling."

"There was a little bit of a scandal around the choir," he said. "Do you know about this?"

"Em, not really." (I knew there was something.)

"I won't give her name. You don't know about it or do you?"

"My husband said there was a rumour of something, but he did not know, and I didn't."

"Am I going to be the first to tell you?"

"If it is the same incident, and everyone was very sensitive about it, then perhaps you shouldn't. When was this?"

"2011 it starts and only finally ended two years ago."

"Indeed, you should not tell me," I said.

"I won't tell you the names. This person was new to the church and joined the choir, so it was hopeful for the future of the choir. And a certain person and her were rumoured to be coming somewhat friendly, let's say."

"Keep it anonymous, Mr. Thorne."

"And then, suddenly, she married someone completely different, in the town as well."

"Oh dear. Oh dear, I bet that caused some difficulty."

"Yes, it did. She left the choir. Too controversial. Five years she was married, here - the wedding was not in church - and then off she went with her daughter, and moved to the South or South West or South Wales or somewhere like that. And the rumour is that they never divorced."

"They had a daughter? It's sad when a mother leaves with a young daughter."

"She was an adult. She came in the church as well, occasionally. I don't think either of them were Anglican. Foreigners! So, really, we lost almost two new people - and they went, yes, as recently as two years ago."

"This is indeed very recent. Should I ask the vicar about this?"

"No. I think it might be better if you didn't."

"You realise that I operate under rules of confidentiality - well, the seal of the confessional."

"Seal the confession, then," he said. This gave me no choice. But it made me aware that gossip and drama were recent.

I had heard last year that, before I arrived, one foreign woman had left the church and the choir collapsed and she had only recently separated from the man she'd gone on to marry. This tale seemed to me to be anti-foreigner sentiment. I'd no idea if it was true, because one person leaving isn't going to collapse the choir; and when I asked him before about the choir ending Colin Cromer had said that the story was all tittle-tattle, but admitted that a foreign woman had been in the choir.

This conversation was adding something to my information, but to be treated carefully in case I stepped on any toes.

Sometimes visiting has a random element. There was a bit of a breeze, outside, and more to come, and there was a female walking and overtaking me on the road one block from the coast. There were some older people still behind me. Her thin dress lifted and it exposed a bare bottom. She (like me) was approaching a set of terraced houses near a double mini-roundabout: one house that seemed empty, a middle one probably some office, and she stopped at the end one.

I ran up to her and asked for her name.

With a German accent she said, "Klärchen Sisse. Hello. You are?"

I said, "The Reverend Linda Jupitas. I'm not being nosey and definitely not moralising but your dress lifted in the breeze and 'people' saw a bare bottom. Unless you have a thong that's..."

"I should have added different a dress."

"Address?"

"Dress. Heavier? Yes?"

"Sorry."

"I live just here. I change my dress."

"Not needed if you are going inside. Sorry to have bothered you."

"Would you like your tea before I go to my Upper Foss Coast College?"

"It's F - U - C - C."

"Fuck?"

"Not... Why did they..."

"Would you like your tea?"

"I've eaten and will eat..."

"Maybe coffee?"

"Oh yes. Tea. Thank you."

We went in, and she had a dog, an alsatian (I thought) that became excited on her return. As she sat down, it barged its head between her legs, and she said, "Nicht jetzt, Dieter," pushing it away.

The dog sat staring at her and then looked at me.

"German shepherd," said Klärchen. "He comes with me after our tea."

My visit discovered that she was a nominal Lutheran, in Serninsea to learn English, and she was doing a little bit of lecturing on Europe for the tourism and business based courses at Foss Upper Coast College. In effect, she was travelling around. She'd brought the dog in from Germany, and was worried about the future of Pet Passports after the referendum to leave the European Union.

"Dreadful decision," I said.

"Yah, my belief too."

"Sharing sovereignty and having multi-national elections, liberal and democratic is a good thing," I said.

When I got up the dog seemed to come for me, but stopped when Klärchen called after it. She added, "He's too enthusiastic. Loves people closely."

When at home I told Keith of the strange woman with an over-familiar dog. I started giggling and I managed to say that she was a bit too weird for me. I said I'd left these odd details out of my training pastoral report.

"Perhaps you presume too much."

"I looked up 'Nicht jetzt' afterwards, once the spelling and the meaning became obvious."

"What's her name; where does she live?" he asked.

"You know I can't tell you that."

"Will you visit her again?"

"Well, I don't think she is interested in our church life, and, to be honest, I think she has her own company to keep."

Keith said, "Serninsea is certainly a lonely, distant, isolated place to find all sorts."

I said, "It's not some distant Gaelic-speaking Scottish island, Keith."

"But all sorts come here - all sorts, and even possibly the odd Gaelic speaker. But not your Archbishop. He won't come here."

Seeing Louise Deimos (Tuesday 19th March)

On the Tuesday after the Second Sunday in Lent, I went to see the Reverend Louise Deimos, forty-five, so someone similar, my spiritual confessor, and a collector of religious knick-knacks.

She asked me, "How are you coping with the busy period?"

"I am somewhat protected in my first year but I do plenty of visiting. I meet regular folk and the odd odd person. The problem I have is in being creative with my presentation in sermons and interpretations."

"You mean you are creative? Why is that a problem?"

"I am creative with the words, stretching their meaning."

"You are doing what thousands of clergy do."

"It isn't doing the truth, though, is it?"

"Only because you and I represent the collective position when we are yet individuals. Let's call it having a three-line whip."

"I wasn't suggesting it was a religious form of BDSM."

"Some," said Louise, "think Christianity is exactly that. Salvation through torture and death, yet precisely when love was offered. You are still getting on well with Colin Cromer?"

"Yes."

"You might be swerving to run your journey when he drives down the middle of the road."

"He advocates constraint and restraint, and that I find difficult. It's like you expect this job to mean things will open out, to new vistas and far horizons, and yet, as you do it, the walls come in and the room gets smaller, the windows shuttered."

"I happen to agree. Meanwhile, are you prepared to be more intimate, as the suffragan bishop advises?"

"If I know what that means. Can I use your toilet, please?"

I did.

As I returned, apologising, Louise said, "I was asking the suffragan's question..."

"Yes, what do you think it means?" I asked her.

"I haven't got a clue."

"Loving and more personal, I think. I'm looking into Jeremy Symes' parish tomorrow. He could be your replacement as confessor. I'm missing out on my weekly meeting seeing my friend because of it. He said recently, 'Learn from a nearby parish in the deanery,' but I rejected seeing the evangelical Jim Wilson and his known strong-willed wife Connie."

"Lent means on the job training."

"He's a good guide, Colin, and I hope he gives me more to do, that he trusts me more and offers me more space. My fear is that he becomes rigid and boxes me in. This is because he has certain expectations of what Christianity and ministry should be, based on his own longevity."

"And that he might have preferred Keith. He's not much of a woman's man, Colin, although he's not overtly prejudiced. You do realise this is confidential commentary."

"Yes."

"You show competence and it may be rewarded by space, as you call it, to make your own contribution. Well, right, I'm afraid that's it, and, as you know, not only is that it for today, but for good. I'm going up to near Hartlepool where my sister Sarah is Suffragan Bishop of Hereteu."

"Harry Cockburn retired so conveniently last year and do you think Elizabeth Huett was lined up to replace him?"

"All gossip."

"Sarah became Elizabeth's extended hands. Do you go with Catholic theory, Louise?"

"Not really."

"The Suffragan Bishop of Bolingbroke is very pro-women; I'm surprised you're not staying."

"Peterlee."

I paused for a second. "You've met someone? I don't know him."

"What?"

"Peter Lee."

"No, Peterlee is my new location for my ministry. It's near Hartlepool, is it not? But, huh, let me leave you as I mean to go on. Can you keep it to yourself?"

"I keep a few secrets."

"I want to become honest. I am not becoming its parish priest in the English National Church as some people assume. There is a vacancy up there but people only have to look it up to stop making assumptions. Sarah found me a small house. They're cheaper there, like here. For money, I'm going into designing, including website designing for a local firm. In my own time, I am going to do the website for a small group called the Free Liberal Church. If you listened to me carefully, you'll know my objections to expectations regarding my ministry now."

"Sarah will be disappointed."

"She might be sympathetic. I'll find out, won't I, nearer my family? The Deimos family are from up there. I don't have a partner, so I'm free to move. I went to Bishop Querceto College, much before you did, and thus hopped over to the supposedly more liberal Wytham diocese. But it's not. Your need as a deacon is to get your new confessor."

"Jeremy?"

"If you do find Jeremy Symes is in any way unsuitable then strike him off your list. And I have got one final piece of advice for you."

"Oh?"

"When you visit parishioners, don't ask to use their toilet. Go first, before you go out, especially for that."

"I do! I know. It's embarrassing. I'll alter my behaviour if I can."

"Seek medical advice, possibly. One more thing."

"What?"

"I'm like Columbo! I'm speaking as someone with the freedom of leaving. Jim Wilson, yes, is a man of strategy, but Connie gives him his backbone. I suggest you continue to keep your distance from him and Connie."

"Doesn't she speak highly of the suffragan bishop, John Barman?"

"Go carefully, then."

"Why is that figure on the mantelpiece in light blue?"

"Because it is young Krishna in a holy colour."

"What is he eating?"

"Soil. He opens his mouth and you see the universe."

"Oh. Colin is positive about Bishop Barman."

"Colin Cromer is very generous, who delivers as required. You can learn from Colin about loyalty and the institution functioning properly. I have someone else to see, to whom I shall say much less, and then I am packing the stuff that's mine to say goodbye to all this."

Jeremy Symes' Parish (Wednesday 20th March)

Early morning I went to see the said Jeremy Symes, the priest in charge of a parish north and west of Jim Wilson's large geographical area. I'd see Diana, my naturist friend, in a week. Wednesday was not an afternoon off, officially, like Monday was, but I treated it as such and usually chatted with her.

Here was an opportunity for comparisons. With the exception of one parishioner, for confidentiality reasons, I joined him on all his visits, to mainly elderly women and one nursing home, where he also carried out a communion service. We also had a late lunch at the vicarage when his wife Emily came in all so briefly before returning to her administration job.

Jeremy said to her, "I've been showing Colin Cromer's curate here the work in our parish, and also some of the openings into the community recommended by the Suffragan Bishop of Bolingbroke."

So Emily said to me, "He means he's been using that bishop's letter that came for Lent."

"I have read it."

She said, "It was my last piece of editing for him. The bishop now has his own small office staff, with a grant from SMS. You've got your own administration to do, Jeremy, and a sermon to write."

I said, "My husband works for SMS. They must all get on very well, higher up."

"What do you make of the suffragan?" she asked.

"I think he is progressive."

"Really?" she asked, and then said, "Right, sorry, got to go."

Keith hadn't mentioned money going from SMS. Meanwhile, I said, "Pity your neighbour Louise is leaving."

"Ministry at Peterlee," he said. "Her parish will merge with mine. It won't be the first."

"One less clergyperson," I said.

The afternoon involved driving to and walking in a series of villages, one after the other, including one in Louise's parish, and one entered earlier. The purpose of this, he said, was to be seen, and indeed there were some random conversations.

He introduced me carefully in each one, always saying where I was from. He even did it when visiting shops. He was following protocol, probably.

At the third village he asked me, "Did you see that Serninsea Cross, a brooch? Lovely object. Apparently found over your boundary into Jim Wilson's parish."

"Supposed to be Anglo-Saxon."

"There was this Kath Wickenby on Sea TV saying it should be subjected to rigorous tests. She was so sceptical in tone that it's as if the bishop is taking a risk promoting it. The bishop is using it to boost the area."

"That archaeology student, I think, is also a model - in the newspaper."

"So she is."

"She's in a Lent show in our church hall that might itself promote Serninsea."

Back at the vicarage, he asked me, "What then are we supposed to make of that bishop's pastoral letter, to be more intimate and friendly? Like you and me? What difference would it have made to today?"

"You were perhaps too formal in introducing me?"

"I should change that then, if I can. I mean, you and me as colleagues, to be more friendly. What about personal stuff, say..."

"I don't know. I can see a pile of, I assume, photo albums over there."

"Yes."

"Show me. That makes it more intimate."

"They ought to have gone back upstairs."

I said, "You could tell your laity how we got on looking at your photos."

"No, not if they then wanted to look at them as well."

"Oh sorry. They are obviously private."

"Yes, it has to be something to tell the laity."

So he showed selected pages, and revealing a younger teenage girl and an older teenage boy. Emily and he went back a very long way together. I think they were both fifty.

He took me upstairs (sharing lifting photo albums) to his computer in a room made into an office. My equivalent was the smaller sitting room near the front door. Avoiding emails, he showed how he blogs his sermons. He had theological notes on items that could be used later. He showed his storage folders system.

Then he started typing towards his next sermon, and I sat as he did and he asked for comments. He said that I had not given up reading.

"Look, we haven't had a drink. Have a drink and then I want to discuss with you a theology book I've been reading. I'll bring drinks up. Can you carefully put the albums on those shelves - tight fit."

On my own I could not resist looking in at least the top album. Ah. There were pictures of him and her, and their growing teenage children, all naked on a grassy beach, with a headland far off. They were naked against some wall, naked in a house, naked at the car by a lake. I closed the album and started squeezing them into a space.

He came back with a tray of two coffees. "Our holidays," he said.

"What?"

"You mean, 'Where?' surely."

"How could you see me looking?"

"I didn't. We all succumb to temptation."

I said to him, "Well, I was brought up a naturist. And I still am. We have no children; I can't have children."

"You're not transgender?" he asked. I looked at him, and said nothing. He took and opened the album at the pages I'd seen, "It's a pity that most photos get taken on naturist holidays."

"I'd have seen my friend Diana this afternoon. We strip off, lie down in a conservatory, look at the sky and say sometimes very little." There was a pause. I said to him, "So, if I was to undress, and you were to undress, we would be happy with that and think nothing of it."

"Yes, I suppose so," he said, "so long as no one calls at the door. We could all have our tea, naked, when Emily is back."

And so I started to undress.

Looking at me, he did the same, and said, "You are definitely not transgender."

"Not with these tits," I said at him. "Or that." (I pointed below.)

He said, "They do those very well these days."

"You are clearly male."

So now we were liberated, though I and he sat on pieces of kitchen roll sourced in this upstairs room. He brought over his latest book purchased, by an Alan Lindsey, discussing the dialectic nature of doctrine and the freedom of theological enquiry. "It's like Karl Barth applied to the Holy Spirit," he said. So it is both fully doctrinal and yet has a kind of theological glasnost. What do you make of it?"

"I don't know. I will have to read it."

"I'd like to know your view. Do borrow it."

"I don't know the author."

"Brother of Andrea Lindsey, another priest and general practitioner, both of Dorset, originally, but she has been living in Somerset, and has just married the new Suffragan Bishop of Sumorsæte, Lynton Plimpton."

He selected some more books, one comparing Christian incarnation with Hindu manifestation, and another comparing Christianity and Buddhism as paths. And one on German idealism including naturism.

A pile of books to take home!

Who then in the clergy knew I was an active naturist? The suffragan bishop knew, because I'd discussed it, and Colin Cromer knew. Colin had known my naturist family, even though my family were definitely not churchgoers. Now I had discovered a fellow clergyman who was a naturist like me. I could get to know this guy, I thought.

There was a noise beyond. Then a female voice said, having ascended the stairs, "Why are you naked with another woman doing some sort of book club?" It was Emily's voice.

"Oh er, em, Linda here is a naturist, it turns out, brought up as one as well. Like me, like us. We are being more friendly, more intimate."

"Linda," she said. "Like Lindy."

"Not Lindy," he said. "Nothing like Lindy. This is Linda. She is happily married. We are colleagues..."

"Shut it," Emily said. "Linda. Two years ago this man was having an affair with a Lindy and he lied to me for a year. And she is a naturist too, as it happens, so in his case the flesh is natural but his mind is weak."

I was somewhat taken aback. I had to say, "Er, Lindy Peacock?"

"It is indeed Lindy Peacock," said Emily.

"It was," said Jeremy.

"Small world," I said.

"Did you know about them?" asked Emily. "No one was supposed to know."

"No," I said. "Lindy is an unusual name. Lindy Peacock is in my new naturist club, although it is far away from here. When I became a curate, I moved to Bever Wood away from Saxiclite. She did that too. I met her again. I don't know her that much, but I knew she was having an affair. Oh dear. I had no idea it was with you."

Jeremy said, "Bishop John Barman does not know of the affair, and it has gone no further so please it must be absolutely confidential. So you moved as well."

"Keeping it distant."

"Yes. Well, we as a family don't go to naturist clubs now: not even Saxiclite, definitely not Bever Wood," added Jeremy.

Emily said, "Linda. I do not want you to stay any longer. Get dressed. Please do not eat with us or stay for the evening. Please don't meet my children because matters are still raw. Sorry. They were badly affected by Lindy Peacock and all that, so I am asking you to leave and not see my husband again."

I was shocked, and his head had dropped. "I see Jeremy in deanery meetings," I responded. "What do you think I should do?"

"Well, don't meet, other than in such formal and many-person circumstances," Emily insisted, quietly and firmly. "No supposed intimacy meetings for sure. And Jeremy: dress too. The family can unclthe later."

"You might have become my new confessor, Jeremy."

"Definitely not," said Emily.

I said, as I dressed, and so did he, "I am very sorry."

Jeremy said, "No, I am sorry. Sorry Emily. This is still very sensitive. I thought, maybe, but..."

I said, "I'll go now. Thank you. It was good to know your work better. Emily, I really didn't know. I'm not the affair type and I am happily married. This secret is safe at my end of things."

She said to me, "We decided to tell no one. Not unless we break up and, hopefully, we won't. And now we are starting to be happy again. But Jeremy cannot do this with you. But why is this photo album out, Jeremy? Did you know Linda here was a naturist?"

"Yes. Bishop John told me. Very recently."

"Oh," I said. "So I was meant to see those photos you were concealing."

"Oh yes," he said. "Bishop John knows we are naturists but does not know about my recent affair."

Emily said to me, "Linda, will you please go downstairs and leave."

"Yes of course."

I drove home, and decided to say nothing to Keith other than about the visits, walks and the first book only. (Obviously I'd not taken his books.) I decided to tell Colin Cromer by telephone that, although it was a useful visit and I had learnt much, I did not get on with him and would prefer to avoid him in future. I would need a confessor.

Colin paused and then said that, perhaps on an evening in Lent, I would do a sermon as spontaneous as possible on the collective position of the Church. He would arrange the date and time.

This day the walls had narrowed a little further.

Chapter 02 The Plan Begins

Narrator: Keith The Plan Begins Regarding Linda (Wednesday 20th March)

My wife, I knew, would soon have to cease giving herself to me exclusively, and instead give herself wholly and completely to the group under the Confraternity of the Theocratic Principality of the English National Church.

I was at work, looking at a fleet of lorries in the yard at Titansea, supervising a team. We had to use lasers and mechanical means to check their measurements. It was a contract, and of course this fleet had to come in on rural roads to have their capacities checked and passed. All this could be so better done at Felixstowe, Harwich and Hartlepool. SMS might do well if it could get to South Wales and cover along the coastline. Gwasanaethau Mesur De Cymru, Caerdydd, and Gwasanaethau Arolygu De Cymru, Casnewydd, were already busy and would become competitors; Yojana might go to find site locations and at the same time extend the reach of the Confraternity through two bishops in Casnewydd, or Newport, and Aberdaugleddau or Milford Haven.

Anyway, I took a break at work and received a visit in person from the the National Church's Suffragan Bishop of Bolingbroke, John Terence Barman.

He had news from a recent Sexual Conference up north with Elizabeth that we were, "good to go with Linda." A Sexual Conference was making a decision whilst having orgasmic sex. This decision was now made and set as divinely guided.

I asked who would be the principal person recruiting, and his reply was the Reverend Ken Osis. He was also to be imposed as Linda's new counsellor and confessor, because she had rejected Jeremy Symes as confessor. Terry was going to investigate why.

I asked whether Ken Osis was not too close as confessor to be a talent scout. The bishop hoped that Ken Osis would "leak" some interesting information gained as confessor. Osis already had other confessor roles. He'd be easier to pressurise than Symes (not in the confraternity).

Ken's mentor into the group had been the fearsome Connie Wilson. And, on that connection, Terry Barman had information for me. Connie had seen the photos taken by Ken of my wife when Linda was a model. Ken had taken three hundred photos of her and hundreds more of other models at the local photographic studio. The bishop thought this was very many of Linda, but I said that with planning this number of shots could be taken in as few as three two-hour nude figure sessions.

Connie stole five photos and passed them on to him. Ken Osis knew Linda at the time by her studio name, and I said 'Silky' before Terry did. I pointed out that I had about thirty good ones, taken when I was in a continuing relationship with her, and thus some of my photos were explicit, assisted by a friend at the time having a dark room.

Terry asked if he could have some. I said they should be less explicit because if Linda was to see the most explicit then she would know they were mine. In those days the studio had a restriction policy around figure photography: the explicitness of her poses was because they were for me. Terry wanted five. Ken had told Connie that Linda had been very popular. She had smooth skin and her pubic area was very obvious. Loads of men took her pictures even under figure rules. Photos could come from anywhere in Serninsea.

Terry noticed that Linda had an obvious clitoris that must help channel the Divine.

(Ken had wavered regarding initiation at the last minute, and so Connie sorted it out causing him to capitulate immediately. Clergy do not have a choice: their oath of obedience to the bishops extended to the vanguard Confraternity.)

Terry thought Ken had photographed all those women in his past because he was unable to get any women in a relationship himself, and since being a clergyman the situation had been worse. Thus Linda could even marry Ken Osis after our divorce, and Linda coach him so that both would become a fantastic initiating team within the group.

Terry said others under the Confraternity would help recruit Linda. The next best after Ken was likely to be the Reformist Rabbi Maurice Neptune coming over from Wytham when visiting congregants. Maurice was theologically progressive and historical, giving interest to many meetings with Linda. The bishop knew that Maurice also wanted a wife, but this should not be relevant. But it was relevant, I said, if Ken lacks confidence. Maurice came to the group seeking sex, and Linda meeting him could start an affair.

But Terry thought that marrying a rabbi would not work. She might convert when she was needed as a priest to initiate people by the evidence of giving and receiving body fluids. Christine Vine had produced the Body Eucharist or Body Mass to incorporate initiation.

Later on he might use Connie. I said that he could use Connie sooner, as well, say via shopping. Such would ease her use later to make sure Linda signed on the dotted line.

The one person who had not to try and recruit her was me. I was to listen to how she responded to the various strategies, and only report back. I was told to leave it to those who could do it, in the right positions at the right time.

Meanwhile, I told him about the effective ceiling of opportunity in Serninsea for SMS. These trucks Terry could see were all out of their way regarding normal operation.

Then there was something else to mention. Terry told me that he was going to this conference in Margate, and his friend and another Confraternity bishop Jonathan Eyre was hosting it. Jonathan was so capable with women, and Terry wanted him involved in breaking in Linda to become sexually open.

I said, "Don't forget what I have done, in the course of our relationship too." Terry agreed that I hadn't exactly been unsuccessful myself with women. I'd captured virgins and the experienced.

Terry would discuss matters with Jonathan first in Margate and then have Jonathan come up to Serninsea to use his skills on Linda. He had fluidity and flexibility regarding opening up the many roads to the Divine Orgasm.

The other episcopal decision taker to consult was Elizabeth Huett, Diocesan Bishop of Tees, based in Middlesbrough since last year. Terry and 'Tess' met often.

I asked what the conference was about.

He said it was all about coastal town economies and society. "Let's call it, 'Faith in the Seaside,' to be pretentious."

So I suggested that Linda might go. He thought not, because it is his patch - making the connections.

It was obvious to me that Linda could go with him, and I said so. "After all, you might both fuck her - presumably apart."

No! Terry thought that even apart he might cramp Jonathan's style in a conference setting. Instead he'd write his paper and go and present it, and chat with Jonathan about what was possible with Linda and when. The one proviso was Terry would initiate Linda himself and definitely not Ken Osis.

He said, "Bishops should initiate priests."

I suggested that it was regrettable that Louise Deimos escaped recruitment.

But she was not even in the ball park, he said. She was asexual, like her sister. In fact, Terry was glad that she was exiting the Serninsea Ings deanery because she was useless to us. He'd had it from Bishop Elizabeth that she was leaving the Church altogether.

I pointed out that, as far as I knew, and I think I did, Linda had been loyal to me throughout. She had not strayed. Her considerable sexuality had been mine only, I said. I had physically changed her body and her capabilities.

This simply confirmed to Terry again that she must come into the group. Meanwhile, Terry told me not to become too attached to Yojana: that this was always the danger in mentoring. Such was never going to happen between Connie Wilson and Ken Osis. She gave him sex and then brought it to a full stop, adding to his frustrations - making him ripe for sex with Linda.

Narrator: Linda. Interview For Ministry Training (Wednesday March 16th 2016)

In a small room in a house near the cathedral in Wytham, the Suffragan Bishop of Bolingbroke introduced himself and added, "So I replaced David Stoot, who retired. Bishop Derek could have interviewed you, or even Bishop Julian, Suffragan of Screddington, but it's me."

"Yes."

"You have been provisionally accepted for ministry training, by the board, with a little influence from me. We have a file we have consulted, made up from your time so far in your parish and the EMU Chaplaincy and what we know about you, but I want to hear your authentic voice. As a deacon then priest you would give people your authentic voice, subject to being seen to uphold the doctrine of the English National Church and follow the directions of your diocesan bishop, of whom I am one direct representative."

"Yes."

"Are you shy?"

"Not really."

"Am I going to be subjected to one and two-word answers?"

"No."

"Because: if you are a naturist, you cannot really be shy."

"Ah, you know about that. Of course you do."

"You are not really shy."

"Strangely, some naturist teenagers become shy. But I didn't. I come from a family of naturists."

"Gossip exists about you. But do you think there is a kind of protection of their own in and around Serninsea?"

"I don't know. Possibly."

"You are allegedly a convert to Christianity, but not to naturism. You are much deeper into naturism than into Christianity."

"I was converted via my husband when he was my boyfriend."

"Tell me about that."

"He wasn't in the Christian Union side of things; after a slow start I took an interest in the Anglican Chaplaincy."

"That's what I question. Intellectually, maybe, but where is the deep emotional commitment?"

"So RE was rubbish at school, but in History and Philosophy A levels the religious issues interested me. So it became my focus including the Chaplaincy."

"Rubbish? The diocesan is on the SACRE for RE in Foss."

"Perhaps he could improve it."

"Wasn't your Chaplaincy participation for supporting your husband, not for yourself?"

"I read the same material and absorbed it. Educationally it is called 'concept cracking' as Religious Studies has its houses like there are 'houses of history'. I had my own interest. But I don't deny that I did support my husband."

"But, unlike Christianity, your naturism isn't ideas based. I'm beginning to sound like our esteemed Archbishop."

"How?"

"Double negatives. Your naturism is a heart thing; your Christianity is a head thing. You don't base it on ideas in naturism."

"But I do."

"I'm suggesting that your naturism is a participatory commitment, but your religion is ideas."

"No. Naturism is about who we are, which we conceptualise. It has German origins as an ideal. There was the magazine Vivre and naturism was linked to heliotherapy. I'm a bit rusty. That's right, the health thing against tuberculosis. Ideas, then."

"Pagan and romanticised," said the bishop interviewer.

"Yes, I know, and it has later very unfortunate associations, not by naturists but how the body was idealised, abused, misrepresented. The seeds of the problem lie with the ancient Greeks."

"Do you have an ideal body?"

"I don't use Platonism regarding the body."

"If I may say so, it looks all right to me."

"My body could even be counted as a surprise."

"Go on."

"Chance."

"Chance?" he asked. "Chaos theory?"

"Could be," I replied. "Biologically combining and iterating and then things not happening quite as expected. Then adjusting, adapting..."

"Hardly God's plan then," said the bishop. "Light the blue touch paper and leave it to chaos?"

"God's creativity, freedom? Who knows?"

"The Church?"

"On biology?" I asked back.

"But chaos theory, systems, evolution, can ignore God."

"Or could be the product of God. You're acting as the Devil's advocate, bishop?" I started smiling. "I'm upholding belief here," I said.

"Really? Like virgin births and things like that."

"How brain death works as well. Biology surely doesn't come in to the explanation of Church doctrines."

"You think."

"I think.."

"You are making my point for me. But I like to think we are progressive in this diocese. I am. So to sexuality. You are happily married, I take it. But you were both at the same school: very local people."

"Yes. He was a year above and, actually, largely ignored me. My sister was in his year, and he largely ignored her too. But at the same university we were together, home from home - he comforted me and I hope I did him."

"But you only got married just before he applied to be an ordinand. I suggest you two were a bit on and off in your relationship."

"You're pretty good at this, if I may say."

"I am."

"But you are wrong, Bishop John. It's six years ago in 2010 that we got engaged, and four that we married, Bishop. Two years ago he applied, to be rejected rapidly, and I applied last year, and now you are interviewing me. Yes, my time with Keith has varied in intensity. He stayed with me at university after he'd finished, and that was the start of what he called his 'other kind of clerical' career. He came back to Serninsea only when I did. He did have some unemployment. I was facing unemployment keeping the farm ticking over before it was sold on when my family moved to a farm in Wales last year."

"I've heard that you were a photographic model and an artists' model."

"How do you know that?"

"Gossip? There must be many photographs of you, and many sketches and paintings too."

"A few thousand photographs in one year. Some hundreds or so, perhaps, drawings and paintings over three years."

"They could surface."

"So what?"

"They could undermine your ordained ministry."

"Why?"

"Because they show your body."

"I can't see the problem."

"You really don't care?"

"I do care; I don't see the issue."

"There are clergy who go on holiday and they go to places like Poole and on to Studland Bay. Off it all comes. But they don't carry on back at home."

"Neither will I to answer the door, but if you ask me whether I am worried that photographs of me may circulate? I am not embarrassed, in fact the opposite."

"What is to stop you showing all?"

"What is appropriate at the time. I'm covered over now. So your whole point is that my personal deep well is naturism and Christianity is just something in the wind that has the status of a puzzle."

"But you gave up modelling only when your husband was applying to be an ordinand."

"On your account, therefore, I know when to stop doing one thing if it's incompatible with another. But your account is wrong, again. I gave up being an even artists' model seven years ago, whereas my husband applied two years ago. I was a photographic model for the money. I much preferred being an artists' model, but there's no money in it. The same people needed someone else to paint and draw, their lumps and bumps, whereas photographers take thousands of pictures and want more and more of the same. Bishop, this is a strange interview. You speak as if I should be rejected."

"Okay, let's make it a more regular interview. Who is Christ?"

"Good. Christ identifies what God is and ought to be, bishop. It is what becomes transcendent. If that is too passive, I understand the Holy Spirit is effective as motivator as well as receiver."

"Yes, very good. Yes. You've had other boyfriends?"

"Hey? Theology?"

"Should be. You've had other boyfriends?"

"Is this relevant?"

"It is contextual to your ethical outlook."

"Well none like Keith. I've had liaisons and encounters, like any girl or boy does. Did you ask my husband Keith these questions?"

"I didn't interview him. The board rejected him."

"Why did the board reject him? He was a dyed in the wool Anglican. He certainly was heart and head. He had a background of participation within a participating family. I come from a bunch of Pagan-like weirdos, so I get told."

"I don't discuss other people, not even your husband. Was he always faithful to you? Being on and off."

"You are discussing other people! Not on and off: more and less."

"I was pretty good at this some moments ago."

"Pretty good is not excellent. I still don't see the relevance of this."

"Your ideological and practised naturism must have encouraged him at university."

"So I walked around naked a lot. I told him not to misread me at first, but we struck up a relationship."

"There is a woman priest now: she is evangelical and you knew her closely."

"Are you talking about Jenny Masters?"

"The Reverend Jenny, yes. She was a bit stormy. She knew you, several chaps, and had a strong conversion experience."

"You are pretty good at this. I lost touch with her. Are you implying something, bishop? Bishop, what are you asking?"

"I'm asking you to confirm your biography."

"I gather that unlike me she was influenced by the Christian Union side when I think she was troubled. But I don't know that much. Later news of her - when I got it - was all second hand."

"Influenced by her uncle, too."

"Was she? You know more than me!"

"You were close, but how close?"

"What is the relevance of this?"

"Personal religious influences?"

"No religious influence on me as I'd gone away, and I didn't hear anything after a time."

"Don't you like to hear about other people?"

"Is that a quality I should want?"

"Yes, you should be interested in people, what happens to them, where they have come from, and where they are going."

"Definitely. I was pastoral towards my friends, towards my customers, even to the few animals. We did try some pigs."

"There are other naturists in this area."

"Are there? The nearest club, Saxiclite, is some distance away; the club is very important."

"Church should be your second home. Again, my very point."

"Well." I turned and looked at the door for a few seconds.

"But, as I have been hinting, I want a rounded person."

"When did you hint this?"

"You have a hinterland. I much prefer it. Confident, broad in sympathy; experimental, realises not everything in the garden is rosy."

"Keith doesn't have a hinterland?"

"Can't discuss him, but he is such a product of his parents as you said."

"So am I."

"But you have an older brother, an older sister, and a much younger sister. He was on his Tod."

"But my dad did prefer my eldest sister, and mum the youngest; it gave me a bit of freedom to make up my own mind."

"My very point, and Bishop Derek will warm to your theological interest. I shall inform him of that because he wants more thinkers. So I want to run with this. Congratulations!"

"Oh! Thank you."

"Can you start in September, as they say? College ends so that you can then get ordained; that's nearly two years later at Petertide. Two years is long enough for a brain like yours. Contextual Social Theology MA will work your brain beyond Church training. When is Petertide? Quiz question."

"End of June."

"Some don't know this."

"I do."

"Quite. Technically the diocesan decides, but he will confirm my decision. Now, I have much to do. I am having a meeting with the Reverend Jim and Mrs. Connie Wilson."

"I only know of them despite them being here about five years."

"Don't be so deliberately modest."

"It's simply true."

"Good wishes for your progress, and keep up and indeed increase your support for the local parish. And give my continued good wishes to Keith, even if he remains disappointed."

He gestured his hand towards the door, so I left and went directly to get a bus back to Serninsea.

Lent was proceeding, ignored by outsiders, including the world of business; the equinox was more noticed. Keith was attending the regional gathering of his employer Systematic Measuring Services, at the Titansea Grand Hotel, and this time I went along as his support. Some had been to the Wilkinson Casino, and some would go there later. The suffragan bishop was present somewhere but I represented the absent vicar.

Keith wanted me to meet some of his work colleagues.

Here was Yojana Asthana, of the firm's Independent Inspection Unit. She was of an apparently respectable Hindu Indian family that had a bed and breakfast business north of Sutton and right by the coast. I'd heard about her, but this was the first time I had met her. She was a stunning thirty-five year old. Her skin colour was beautiful, her hair was a deep black, her eyes brown and even towards yellow. As far as I knew, she was single. I could have fallen in love with her.

"My job," she said to me, "is to check that Mr. Jupitas is doing his job properly. I check on him, as he checks on others."

"Trust is important," Keith said.

"I agree," I responded. "Do you work well together?"

Yojana said, "Trust is because there are what we call Chinese walls - thin boundaries in the workplace between different operations - but we must observe them. Mr. Jupitas has an MBA, and I would like to study for an MBA - it is why he was promoted."

"My Contextual Social Theology MA doesn't have quite the same career impact."

I learnt that they would delay their annual checking procedures. They usually included some surprises that tested the internal honesty of the systems and people.

"What do you call it?" I asked. "Is it annual inspections, stress testing, honesty assessment?"

"That's a very good point, Linda," Keith said. "We call it several things: usually the word 'Annual' is involved!"

Yojana said, "So we measure the accuracy of vehicles of all kinds that carry items, but we have to be accurate about the accuracy. Once this was an area tempted by all kinds of corruption. Checking internal honesty and integrity also involves the accidental as well as the intentional."

Keith said to her, "We need to chat about our oncoming procedures."

Then Keith introduced Cheryl Mould.

I said, "Well I know you - knew you. So good to meet you again."

"You good yersen?"

"Yes, thank you."

"You get to do a lot of snecking in this place, like, but I hope I'm right eyeable here. Something for them to sneck at!"

We all knew Mouldy at school and she was bullied a bit in our earlier years. I wasn't a bully, but shame on me, I was thinking, for not having a better opinion of her and not intervening on her behalf. Like Yojana, Cheryl was wearing something of a plunging neckline, with unsuitable high heels; in fact, of all the women present, my collar made me the most covered up of us all.

She said, "I'm visiting me mam and dad; I'm down at the firm's headquarters in Harwich now, where I'm a bit of a nowter, really..."

No you're not," said Keith.

"Well, Mr. Jupitas, we are their gofers, their frim. Okay, I'm doing stuff with central admin, like. I do a lot of record keeping kept down in Harwich."

I said, "You can call him Keith as well!"

"Thank you Mrs. Reverend Jupitas, Linda. It's so posh here; they even have conger in the sarnies."

I said, "Pretty tasteless. I know that his job includes fairly regular visits to your HQ down there, and some visits to other new branches."

Cheryl said, "Yes. They like all the local admins to be - what is it?"

"Consistent," said Keith. "In other words, although the geographical source of the work is identified, the need for consistency should mean it is the same no matter where from. Obviously more and more is online but the argument is whether that makes it easier to centralise or easier to decentralise. Oh, and we consider what the centre is saying about the delays; we need to chat about that, Cheryl. Later on, I think."

Despite formalities both women seemed to have a welcoming body language about them when near Keith, like a sparkle in the face and each having a knowing smile and a bodily charisma. I tried to read people's faces and gestures but was pretty useless at it. Some males seemed a little leering about these women.

I went and found a toilet and thought about matters. Keith was a ladies' man. He was when at school. Nevertheless, work colleagues have to get on and we all have strategies to improve relationships among colleagues. Perhaps they needed a touch of the bishop's call for intimacy!

When back, and drifting about, Chair of SMS Sir Sanjay Bunker, no less, approached me and said, "Hello, Reverend Jupitas. Is Keith telling you anything interesting? It is Reverend Jupitas?"

"Technically, the Reverend - and then first name, surname. 'Consistency' or something seems to be important.."

He said, "You don't come to many of our events."

"I'm here now," I replied.

"Our further gatherings. Fun and friendly events. Perhaps Keith keeps his work life separate."

"I suppose he does," I said.

"He doesn't bring his owrk home."

"Our house in Sutton-on-Serninsea is owned by the Church and is for church use as well."

"Ah, tied housing."

"Keith!" he said, to bring him over. He said, slowly, "We need to bring to competitor South Wales operations full-on competition. We need to spare one of our people to step up to the plate and organise everything. We have two very good people here - you and Yojana."

"Yes, we need someone to do some location finding. Yojana would be excellent."

"Something to talk about afterwards," Sir Sanjay said. "The Reverend Linda, good to have met you at last," said the high boss. "We like our spouses to get involved in the firm, you know. Sometimes they listen and come up with remarkable and creative ideas. One of the best is how we socialise in Serninsea, so we really do relax. Your bishop is particularly welcome. It all adds to our sense of being a family and community, not just a business, and adds to productivity I may say."

"Gemeinschaft as opposed to just gesellschaft," I said.

"Pardon?"

"A sociological insight of community rather than association."

I looked at Keith looking at him and then me.

The boss continued, "You notice I avoided the Welsh names of those businesses. Your family has moved to Wales."

"I think my youngest sister is tackling the language."

"I and my team are always willing to hear from spouses and relatives. Yes. Don't forget our restaurant and casino gathering coming up after the internal inspections. Now, your bishop: where is he?"

The suffragan bishop was the guest speaker. Keith had successfully avoided him so far.

The Right Reverend John Barman gave an interesting presentation: Where it May Be More Ethical to be a Little Less Precise. Clever. He was, like, putting a case for the opposition: qualitative flexibility over the firm's quantitative accuracy and even rigorous self-checking.

However, he spoke in favour of clarity and efficiency, also clever in a diocese becoming notorious for ineffective management from the very top. Perhaps Bishop Barman wanted to build his reputation but his role was to assist the troubled diocesan Bishop of Wytham, Derek Imperial.

John Barman said to everyone, as part of the lecture: "The most quantifiable is the in-out model, is it not? What resources go in and what product or service comes out. Quantify everything! And so they need not know about the in-between, as long as they can record the out results. They try and do this in education; I'm resisting doing it for our clergy. It's not what matters; what matters is relationship. Well, quality and quantity are not always opposites. You can be efficient and effective, but add warmth. Intimacy might mean measuring small, but it also means relating well and in depth. Now, maths is pure and abstract, so intimacy and relationship might be idealistic, but they are real and concrete, dare I say incarnate. I say, let's spread all that emotion by more contact, contact that is real and towards the qualities of relationship."

Was this a development of his pastoral letter? I wondered. He might have mentioned personalist God theology either in the letter, or here, but he didn't.

Keith asked me, as the evening out came to a close, "What do you think of my colleagues?"

I decided to do some mimicking. "Very good, Mr. Jupitas; work well together, Mr. Jupitas; highly professional, Mr. Jupitas."

He said, in response, "Cheryl is local, not Japanese. I try to keep them in good order."

"As Japanese as Kendo Nagasaki, then. So, just the women? 'Queen's Award for Sexism'?"

"Oh no, male subordinates as well. And they all call me Keith when close."

"The Jupitas Empire."

"Eeeexcellent!"

"Are they your subordinates? She works in the Headquarters admin."

"Quite right, she is not."

"And what of the guest speaker from my line of work? What of the qualities of his speech? Don't try and measure it."

"Justifying being two-faced?"

"Well that's a little strong," I reacted.

"He has to be two-faced," Keith said. "He's relating to two constituencies."

"He links to the community. It doesn't mean he is two-faced. Be a little bit more generous, Keith."

"Perhaps he should focus on your rubbish diocese."

"Mouldy looks nice. And the other one."

"They are both exceptional women," Keith said, "and great working with them. Yojana is a Hindu, don't you know: quite rare around here."

"I like the Sikhs. You should tell me more about work and the people there. Actually, anything might be a start."

"You don't."

"I have pastoral confidentiality to consider."

"I have organisational and commercial confidentiality to consider. I work with Yojana now, and because Cheryl has moved she has a key job in Harwich with me co-ordinating things."

"Not a nowter. She's to become some manager perhaps?"

"Definitely not. She sticks with the donkey work."

"I'm pleased you're happy," I said, "Mr. Jupitas."

Meanwhile Keith suggested I made my own way home because, with all these people up from Harwich, he wanted to have meetings with them. He would be home later and indeed he was back over three hours after I had returned indoors.

I managed to say bye to Cheryl, who commented, "Your bishop bloke's cut his mouth on a brocken bottle."

I thought she might have said that about my speech, these days.

Narrator: Keith. After the SMS Official Gathering (Friday 22nd March)

The folks were going out of the further steel door, the entrance and exit for the casino, nearer the wheelie bins, and through the first one to get upstairs - the odd person able to use its chair on a rail.

Yojana came to speak to me about Cheryl and said, "She can't go upstairs, so we'll have a basic meeting down here now and then take her away sharpish."

"It would have been better if she was staying at yours, but she is actually going home to her parents again tonight."

I gathered people together and suggested we move to a corner of the casino where there was an unused table.

"It is a very short meeting," I said, "but we'll take the opportunity of Sanjay Bunker and Archie Holborn here being present. This is Cheryl Mould, up from Harwich, one of our heavy lifters, offering a perspective from the ground floor, and here is Yojana of the Independent Inspection Unit. Call it an extra meeting of an ad hoc group."

Yojana said she would take brief notes. "Ad Hoc Group Meeting, Wilkinson Casino. I'd better take names as some are managers and some are offering ground floor expertise."

We did all the formalities, and I then said, "The annual inspections stress testing, coming along, and we expect some delay this time. Why?"

Yojana said that 'ICT' had to tackle an information leak in Titansea. A client had discovered our practices. The owner of the lorry fleet had known our techniques before he brought the vehicles to us.

Sandy Bunker added that delay was because of the need to bring in Information Communications Technology experts, because from last year the systems were not robust. Their expected date for looking at security, with internal walls as well as external, had been delayed. Branches would be getting security upgrades rather than simply patching up. He'd been gaining intelligence from competitor firms in South Wales, given our intention to expand into ports along that coast. They used outside trusted individuals who were unexpected in what they do, with some methods to copy. Thus testing was likely to be tougher this year, with George Wickenby hired again to set some traps for people who were not observing proper space and non-contact.

Archie Holborn asked Cheryl if everything was ready to go among the administrators at Harwich.

"Yeah. We've a stiff row to hoe but we'll be busy. We can cope."

Archie said that it was all hands to the pumps and everyone needs to be focussed.

With the meeting soon over, people headed off quickly and Cheryl asked me where everyone else in there were going.

I didn't know was my barely credible answer. I didn't want her to see them use the second steel door.

"Look," I said, "I told Linda three hours. Let's be together before you can return to your mum and dad's."

"I didn't expect you to stay with me."

She did not need the loo so we left. It meant she was out of the way as other folks came along for a night together.

As we arrived, Cheryl asked, "Where is this?"

"By the coast..."

"I know the fucking sea when I see it. Whose is it?"

"Yojana's parents run it. She is very discreet, is Yojana. They will also waive us through at reception."

"You've paid, what, for the night or the hour?"

"I could have it all night, but I'll take you home."

So we went in a spare bedroom in the private area, next to Yojana's, and in there Cheryl and I undressed, and we took the chance to enjoy each other. The sex lasted three quarters of an hour (very long foreplay included) and then, as we dressed, we started a conversation about the future.

I told her that I had made my mind up that I would leave my wife in about four months. I said, "She'll become a priest first and then I will leave her." I hoped there would be a rapid divorce.

Cheryl was delighted. However, she said I did not have a job in Harwich and would have to seek one.

"Linda and I get on well. The Church will not priest someone even if the spouse only has been having an affair. There has to be a breakdown in the relationship long before someone else comes along. But once she is priested, it is too late for them; she has received already the indelible sign."

I drove Cheryl home to her parents', and then returned to go above the casino. Archie Holborn let me in at the nearer now locked steel door. Upstairs, some folks had started their own sex among the beds and sofas present.

There was a dance display going on by flat-chested Helen McPhail, and Stephen her husband was beaming away in admiration. I undressed and put my clothes alongside those of Yojana's and her uncle's, rather than in the cloaks area.

Brunette Helen was very attractive despite her lack of chest. They were exhibitionists and therefore only casually naked at times. Linda didn't know them.

They had each been streakers at sports events. Once, Mousey Stephen caused uproar at Foss Upper Coast College by masturbating under the table in a cafe area late at night. Unknown Helen laughed. He thus met Helen.

Later she spent ten minutes with her naked bottom out of an opened upstairs classroom window with Stephen keeping watch; when there was a commotion below, they both ran for it. They had sex in the college delivery yard with several workers egging them on. They had an irregular Internet life way beyond the limits of the local Goosechat cammers. They appeared on DisruptSex, based in France (where some of the sexual acts were staggering), using his own constructed contraptions, one of which seemed to have been reassembled in this area above the casino.

Yojana was enjoying the dance entertainment. She told me that she had been with Archie, and wanted me, but I told her I was somewhat 'spent'.

Then Stephen introduced this large device he had indeed just made. It consisted of a robust frame using pullies. Two chains hung down to each end of a closed-off horizontal drainpipe weighted within so that these not completely sharp spikes always stood upwards. The naked person, male or female, straddled the drainpipe. Helen did this. An operator, in this case Stephen himself, could lift the drainpipe by pulling a chain with attached handle. The victim was able to reach up to two hand-holds, and try to pull himself or herself up but the drainpipe could always be raised higher. The result was pressure and indentation into testicles or labia lips.

Goosechat owner, the Reverend Deacon Christine Vine, especially approved of the device, so much so that I pulled on the lifting chain with her straddling it, rather than Yojana. Christine remarked that the spikes could be sharpened further. Yojana thought I should have a go, and these spikes did press into my testicles. No, it would not be shown on Goosechat, a place where she put prostitutes to work more safely online.

Balding and somewhat podgy Ken Osis declined straddling the pipe.

Bishop Barman spoke and said he would soon meet with Bishop Huett again and they would have a Sexual Conference together to fix decisions, checking with Bishop Eyre first that these met with his approval. Bishop Terry Barman then announced some changes.

"Christine is very good on the theoretical and advisory side, which is why we now have her as an administrator at our Confraternity, taking the minutes. She's at the centre. New member, Ken Osis, ably mentored by Connie here, has been invited to advise us on confidentiality and secrecy issues." He asked Ken for a few words ahead of Christine.

The Reverend Ken Osis stood up. Connie alongside (her husband Jim the other side) gave Ken some penis tugs as he spoke.

"We already talk about talent scouts and similar metaphors. I will be advising that for secrecy we need a cover identity, and this is to develop a full theatrical metaphor. So even though the reality is the Confraternity of the Bishops, the cover is like a theatre company with actors, talent scouts, a control booth and so on. Bishop Barman can be like a theatre director - something like that."

Bishop Terry said they would decide all this for sure at a Sexual Conference. He thanked Ken for his imaginative contribution to the security of the group under the Confraternity Christine stood up. "Listen everyone. I wish to begin with a biblical reading. Most important. Jim loudly agreed.

"Awake O north wind; and come, thy south; blow upon my garden, that the spices thereof may flow out. Let my beloved come into his garden, and eat his pleasant fruits."

That was from Song of Solomon, chapter 4 verse 16.

"As you may know, I am a Reverend Deacon, encouraged into becoming this by Bishop Jonathan Eyre and I moved up nearby over a year back. I've been based in Wheaton near Eslaforde in the south of Wytham diocese; I also reside in London. I sell property and bought a lot up here, in this town, and have got a growing number of sex workers in my terraces. I bought Sexplay that has just been renamed Goosechat. I am a high-end escort myself operating out of my Urania House in Hammersmith, from humble beginnings in Ebbsfleet. I'm from a family of various clergy Catholics and charismatics.

"I have always been interested in the body as an expression of who we are under God. So this is why I have developed, with Bishop Barman, the Body Eucharist as a rite. You see, we rightly say that there has been one divine and sufficient sacrifice, but this should not make our commitment easy and costless ritually. We need to demonstrate costly commitment for participation in the one sacrifice. Material loss means body fluid. It is by oxygenated blood that we have energy, and symbolically we lose fluid, and we lose fluid with energy most beautifully gathered and expressed in the orgasm. Fluid can be anything: semen, female lubrication that is like semen with some of urine's components, urine itself, spittle, and even faeces for that matter. But they should be expressed with the Divine Orgasm."

Bishop Barman said, "This was Liz's and my received revelation, before her rapid elevation to be Tees of the Diocesans. As bishops we orgasm for divine inspiration."

"And," said Christine, "the affair was a divine happening, and properly elitist..."
I asked, "Why elitist? Christainity is supposed..."

"Because bishops are an elite: not in terms of salvation, but working the gift of grace, approved by the Church our Guardian, allowing us to have a Vanguard. The whole point about the Confraternity is that it is voting by bishops only: it is apostolic and it must be. Ken and I are advisors only, even though as a priest he can be in the fluid exchange that makes the ritual valid. We do go on to exchange bread and wine, but the Vanguard involves body fluid. Now, this is Christian, but we have an openness so that Sir Sanjay here and his niece over there can participate if they want to do so, because grace is generous regarding our vanguard ritual. Bishop."

Bishop Barman said, "She says it better than me. At the moment we have three bishops in the Confraternity of the Theocratic Principality of the English National Church..."

Christine interrupted: "I think we should use the Latin. Principatus Theocratic Confraternitati admissis in Ecclesia Anglorum Nationalibus. This is because it is special, a leading order."

"I have trouble remembering it!" Bishop Terry replied. "All three bishops are equal, despite the Church putting a woman straight into a diocesan position. We are the Vanguard in a Confraternity."

He reminded everyone that Liz's suffragan at Hartlepool was not involved. If Sarah Deimos got to know of the group, she would spill the beans and that would be the end of us.

Yojana asked, "Louise is leaving; does she know?"

Terry said, "I think she has a low opinion of me, but that's it. Not everyone loves me!" He continued: "I think our own Suffragan Bishop of Scredington, Julian Worsley, could be involved with us. We get on very well, and he has compatible views on sex, but the person next up for us is Keith's wife, the Reverend Deacon Linda Jupitas."

He said that Ken was to be our principal talent scout here, to approach her via theatrical metaphors, and there was good reason to use the absent (this evening) Rabbi Maurice Neptune of Wytham, with his theological conversation. Terry also wanted his Margate bishop colleague to experience her sexually first hand. There was no limit to the number of talent scouts, but they had not to contradict each other. They had to co-ordinate through Terry. The two people not to talent scout Linda were myself and Terry. However, I could read her reactions and he could create situations for responses.

(It seemed to me that 'creating situations' was a form of talent scouting!)

Jim Wilson said we needed to know her capacity to disobey.

The bishop concluded: "I'd love to have your wife, Keith - and I look forward to it, starting with my initiation of her into membership."

Meanwhile, I said that Cheryl Mould knew nothing about the Confraternity or the group that had formed under it.

The bishop said she was not management, even on the lowest of rungs, and was not going to be invited to join unless and until policy changed.

But I said I intended to apply for a job still in SMS in Harwich and join her, once Linda was priested. I'd hopefully resume sexual relations with Linda on our group basis.

"Oh you will," said Connie, who added that our need was greater than hers, and she would come to understand the responsibility of self-sacrifice in the sacrificial rite of initiation, on men and on lesbians. Christine would be one once priested but may well move away; Liz, Fatima and Jenny are far away even though they visit. "By the way, I've something for you, Keith, for your wife. It's a rabbit vibrator. Give it to her at a suitable moment. It is second hand and I've got loads more."

"Hope you washed it."

"I don't have a virus, you know - my juices are sweet and healthy."

"Oh, something else. My wife told me of pastoral visiting a German woman who likely has sexual relations with her dog. She wouldn't give me her name and address. If we could find her, we might want to ask her to join us."

Christine said, "We're always interested in a wider variety of practices, but achieving orgasms in mutual intimacy have to be shared and understood."

With that our meeting was over. I kissed Yojana. She spoke to her uncle Sanjay close by.

"Right, dear Yojana, let's get dressed, and go back to my sister, your mother."

"And dad," she said.

Like them, I also didn't fancy having a shower. There were showers and toilets beyond the cloaks area, being outside the main upper doors and to the left and right around those the stairs going directly down. It was a good way to socialise at the end of sex. Some did go, but I'd wanted to get home. Also, our clothes were in the main hall.

I said, also putting my clothes on, "You know, Yojana, Linda loves her dad, and can never understand why her eldest sister got more of his attention than she did."

She replied, "My brothers and sisters and I were always treated equally by dad. Come on Uncle San. Hurry up and come to my home. He still tucks me into bed when visiting."

So I went towards home, to Linda, and I was tired out.

Narrator: Linda Keith Home from the Gathering (Friday 22nd March)

I was reading online about the story of Inanna. This was the ancient Sumerian Goddess of the date palm and the communal storehouse. She went into the Underworld and came back as regeneration. So Spring Equinox was a time to achieve balance, like in the scales of justice and leading to compassion, in the process of regeneration.

When Keith arrived back I had moved on to view web pages about the University of Somerset, having looked at theological provision around the country.

"You're not thinking of going there?" he asked.

"They don't have theology but they do have Folk Studies in a School in Glastonbury. It's interesting what they do. It makes me think of the Tavistock-based Bruce Reed."

"I recall the name. I'm shagged out. These meetings are at such a ridiculous hour."

"Long one was it?"

"The meeting?"

"Well, your thing isn't!"

"There are these rumours and more of complications. Something is leaking from Titansea, and it is not a ship! If clients and others can see what we do and how we do it, then it can compromise what we do. So this means that this year's internal stress tests are more troublesome."

"And that's what you were talking about?"

"It is worrying that a lot of this came with people up from Harwich. Cheryl knew more than Yojana - that's terrible! If the leaking is discovered from down there, it makes up here more difficult to develop. People could be covering up here, and it takes down there to see what is happening."

"So you are telling me organisational and commercial things, now."

"You did ask."

"I didn't. I asked about the length of the meeting. By the way, you smell of sweat."

"That's because I had to run down to the office."

"You held your meeting - where?"

"In the casino. In a corner, away from distractions. It is not a noisy place. And you never sweat."

"I do sweat but you won't smell it. And you know all about this, unlike me, about what happens throughout SMS. Well, I have a question for you: not just about your colleague you introduced or Mouldy, but about all of the women: why are they all dressed to kill?"

"It's an SMS thing. A while back some did it, and then more. But not at work. It's the usual at work."

"If I'd have known, I'd have stripped off."

"Well, there's something in that," he said, with a smile, "but more glamour than nudity. It can be controversial. It's a bit like Friday and Saturday nights out on the town. That's how I see it." Meanwhile, Keith said, "I've received a letter from an old friend. I knew him at school. He asks, among many other things, if I know what had happened to Geoff Virgo. He believes he moved to South Wales or indeed Somerset, and got some connection with religion. You might answer this question better than me."

"How do I know? He took flight from Adam Magellan, Jenny and me. Magellan may have stayed in touch. Jenny Masters may have stayed in touch; she became an ordained curate but we don't know where. If he can find Jenny, he is more likely to find Geoff."

"There's her uncle he could contact."

"You remember better than me."

"Presumably still local-ish."

He found five Masters in the telephone book. One was a 'Rt. Rev. William', which made no sense to me. But there was an Uncle Bill, by distant memory.

Upstairs, I first used Keith's last Christmas present of the Kettle drum weight as he got into bed. He did some vaginal stretching for me with my dilators, which turned into something more pleasurable by them.

Sermon of Density (3rd Lent Sunday 24th March)

On Sunday I looked up Geoff Virgo on the Internet and discovered Bristol had a Mar Arcturus-Virginis, Bishop Geoffrey Virgo and a Mar Flacillus, Bishop Luis Mariano Callas together. A Church that consisted of two men and a website, I thought. So presumably a William Masters was the same sort of arrangement, and could well be Jenny's uncle.

My first sermon in Lent was given on its third Sunday in the evening. My boss Colin Cromer wanted his sermons to be at the important morning Eucharists. I had simple bullet points only.

I walked up the steps into the pulpit, with my all-black all-plastic brush concealed in a body belt under my black cassock. What the folks did not know was that the body belt was accompanied by nothing else.

"May my words be acceptable in your sight. Amen." That's the easy bit of any sermon. "Em, it is my task, as your preacher this evening, to uphold the Gospel. We are not supposed to give some sort of neutral, even-handed, investigation of things. Nevertheless, not doing that, I think we can do better than just preach in a one-sided way."

I went on: "The pulpit is not a place for investigation, it is said, but one wonders, like a student should, whether theology is to be that much different from other subjects - even if it is supposed to be confessional. Theology can be classified as: natural or dogmatic, within the world or heavenly pure, away from or in the Church. But we know that theology is often up against powerful scientific and social scientific explanations; so is there a purely natural theology any more? If not then this leaves simply the theology of the Church: well this Church and that Church."

I had a cold shiver. It wasn't a draught going up the cassock. Would anyone know what I was even on about? I knew what I was on about - that all theology is, in the end, dogma, or position. But did they even consider the argument and was it even relevant to their lives? I wanted to brush my hair to buy some thinking time, but obviously I didn't.

"We train in theological college," I said, "and I did until recently, but now I am here, and you are listening to a sort of introduction as to how I see things. I'm here as a willing servant of the Church and required to give its message. But then there is me and some interpretation. We are the body of the Church, and surely we make it as much as it makes us.

"1 Thessalonians then. If you put the New Testament out as it's given, you'd think there were four books giving a Jesus biography and everything else follows on. But that's not how it is. Paul's influence is throughout, and the first book would actually be this letter going to, we presume, the Gentiles in Thessalonica, where they'd converted from worshipping many gods. I think they were attracted to a one God faith rather as the Jews had it, whereas the Jews were opposed to what was happening there among the Gentiles (allowing for some Jews who were seeking Jesus as Messiah)."

I gave a slight pause for that thought to possibly sink in and then continued. Itchy hair, itchy hair. Not really. It's psychological.

"The disputes, including such differences between Jews and Gentiles, about which Paul makes his views known, come later on in subsequent letters. This letter is quite friendly. The question addressed was about the fate of the people who were dying. Paul transmitted the Jewish belief in resurrection, and they should have faith and wait for the general resurrection when bodies would leave their graves and greet the return of Christ - who'd been resurrected already. It's not about going to heaven, that sort of thing."

I was going cold. This was struggling to get out meaningfully.

"The Church does believe in resurrection, of course. That's the dogmatic theology because natural theology is we all die. I suppose what I'd like to do is derive some natural theology from this, which is a sense of expectation and preparation and have trust, and (say like the Thessalonians letter) be friendly with it. So I suppose the translation is towards that of our own experience, and what is to come, but to alter experience with an intention that comes from words as these. In other words, be alert. Amen."

Back in the front choir pew I again wanted to give my long hair a brush through. It had become my kind of comforting, irrational, ritualistic habit, but was being prevented - perhaps for my own good. Somehow the Church was shutting me down, not opening me up.

The training vicar, Colin, simply gave a smile. I was trying to avoid mistakes and wasn't stepping out into controversial areas, but I was making a meal of it - really.

After the service I said, "I need to improve, Colin. What shall I do?"

"Next sermon, in a fortnight. Ignore the set reading again, if you want. Keep it biblical. Effectiveness in Town. At the most a few prompts and reminders. See how that works. And we'll change the crowd a little, so in the morning at the Eucharist."

"Oh. Thanks."

"Now I have discovered that Jeremy Symes did not get on with you either, as you did not with him, on your parish visit. I am surprised, because I thought you both had compatible natures and interests and he could have become your confessor."

"So, er, we..."

"I don't want to discuss this further. Water under the bridge and we'd better move on."

I needed the toilet and reflected as I emptied my bowels. His sermon demand sounded like cruelty to me. 'Ineffectiveness in Town' more like. 'Me in Serninsea and Jesus in Capernaum, Discuss.'

I felt forced into a kind of preacher's evasion. Some do the Gospel as if in the past and never come out of it. Some make it like a novel, but that's not to come out of it again. Others turn it into unanswered questions. Alan Lindsey bounces one argument off against the other and like Jake Thackray's song it thereupon goes on again, on again, on again... on.

I understood that theology is out of kilter with the sociology of knowledge that people use today in all practicalities.

In my Fiesta I wondered if intellectualism does not get dropped as one goes along with the job. In training they said there's a biblical narrative and a personal narrative and one can inform the other. Some hope!

Back at home I locked the door, got the cassock and body belt off and Keith reluctantly agreed to strip and put the central heating up a few notches, and he took the brush from me because he was irritated by my constant attack on my hair.

He had vigorous sex with me as a way of helping me overcome my own frustrations. He wasn't gentle because I wanted him to be rough. He'd built up my pain threshold over time, but he still knew how to hurt me. I felt I needed a sense of pain and exhaustion, and he provided both. Afterwards he gave me a drink, unconcerned, when I was in real agony from his slaps, penetrations and seeming lack of sympathy. I deserved it and he was a good man.

Town and Diana (Monday 25th March)

Next day was a visit to, in fact, a different gynaecologist. The alarm going off, I said quickly, "I have to go into town, to shop, but I'll get up after you've gone." Monday was my day off. I leaned over for my dilators and second hand vibrator but he interrupted my intention.

"You could help me," he said. Keith's concern was the inspection delays.

"OK, I'll get your breakfast."

Going into 'town' meant Serninsea itself. Serninsea was also the common name for the wider urban space, Sutton-on-Serninsea to the north, Serninsea and Titansea to the south, all along the flat sandy coast. Sutton wasn't (say) 'Norton' because it was south of the Marshes. Titan was a now unknown likely person of importance. Sernin was a Toulouse bishop (the connection being probably geese).

Nurse Alice Peers was now located in Serninsea; she remembered me twenty-four years earlier in Wytham. I got on all fours on a bench and the visiting gynaecologist, Cyprian Laney, talked with concern about the damage in my rectum.

"How is your evacuation?" he asked.

"Too easy."

(Equally, my swallowing needed care as I'd lost my choking reflex.)

"Then use your bottom for bottom things going out and not for penises and other objects going in."

He had all the notes on screen about my inner vulva but it didn't stop him from having a good look, opening me out with a speculum and using a torch.

I went from there to a beach down Ingle Barrow, beyond some posh houses. I had a naked dip in the sea. It was lovely. I usually preferred the dykes or drains to the beach and sea because I disliked sand. Naturists are supposed to love the beach, but I'm not a sun lover as such. My skin is smooth and hairless: to do the usual naturist thing would threaten it. Going in the sea was one way of putting the examination behind me.

Then I called on my good friend Diana. In fact I rarely went to Diana's house in Serninsea itself, because we liked to take advantage of Patricia's heated conservatory facing her large wood-surrounded garden at her house beyond Carr Wood into the Serninsea Marshes. She also had a garden gazebo. Diana and family only had a small terraced house, and I'm sure they could afford better.

So, despite it being a Monday, we went to Patricia's; she had a key and knew the alarm numbers.

Diana was my long black-haired eaxl-gestealla, or shoulder companion, bosom friend, my comrade, really, as it had turned out. However, I didn't know all her love life and she didn't know all my secrets. We both had matters to keep private.

Diana King she had been, now turned 40, known since school, married eleven years before and with two children, Ruben and Luuk, of nine and eight years old respectively. She was underemployed and married to Aardse de Groot, a Business Studies lecturer originally from The Netherlands. He'd worked there with tulips (the boom and bust flower). Because she had spare time I kept good contact. Twelve years back she had worked at Wilkinson's Casino - how she met Aardse the punter - and same year she moved to 'The Playground' (a place of tourist rides) for some administration, and took relevant courses. She left 'The Playground' two years later when it closed for a period and she was pregnant. The latter job helped her get four hours a week of lecturing on an FE Tourism course six years back, never able to increase her hours, so became a colleague of her husband. As with Keith's experiences, her employment fluctuated with the continuous fall and rise of enterprises locally. She was now considering returning to the casino.

Patricia Rhymes was 39, who was Patricia Berger, but got divorced, and was Patricia Robinson at school. Her children were fifteen, fourteen and thirteen years old, all of them Bergers. She was working at Serninsea Doors and Windows, where husband Arthur Rhymes was a shareholding manager. Unlike Diana, she was increasingly right wing.

We had to be dressed when Patricia came home and before the teenagers returned.

Naked on parallel cushioned benches either side of the conservatory and both of us staring at the sky, I told her of feeling depressed about my sermon and inability to communicate.

"All I think is that you have landed one of the most secure jobs going. You do what you like, your time's your own, have cups of tea with people, and you get a full salary with no chance of ever being sacked."

"Not quite," I said. "It's not a salary but a stipend: the opportunity to be a person for others."

"Good work if you can get it," she said.

"I can never see myself wanting to be a vicar for the money."

We arranged a dinner to include her husband and mine at short notice for Wednesday, and so we wouldn't repeat the lie-down Diana in Patricia's conservatory. We could then review my short existence as a curate, especially as Aardse didn't know so much. It would also bring Keith and him together, both men being reluctant to be naturist.

Back home I looked up advice on the World Wide Web regarding my ongoing damaged backside and how to repair it. Hmm. Pilates? Pelvic floor exercises. No heavy lifting. Avoid some foods and drink less coffee, when I enjoyed elaborate coffee with spray cream and honey.

Dinner Party Chat (Wednesday 27th March)

Bought for the curate in the parish, we had been in the Church's house from just before Trinity Sunday a year ago. A little later I was ordained as deacon at the Petertide morning service.

After after a day of visiting parishioners, we friends relaxed at an evening dinner in this house. It was intended as a means to review the past year.

I'd said beforehand to Keith that he should not keep his clothes on; if Aardse was making an effort to be naturist with us, then he was to do the same.

I had a dressing gown on to open the front door to Diana and Aardse, as they were getting out of their car. (We had CCTV linked to all televisions.) I suggested that they lay their clothes in the front room. With the door shut I dropped my dressing gown in the kitchen where a bollock-naked Keith was monitoring progress. A minestrone soup that I tried to make via a recipe was ready, and a main course of beef and Yorkshire Puddings, boiled potatoes, plus peas, was nearly cooked. As inadequate cooks it was as much as we could manage for a dinner. Apple pie was on its way in the lower oven. I did not make the custard - Keith had opened a packet.

The table was lengthened in the double lounge/ dining area, where I also held meetings using the leather-effect sofa and chairs and more seats.

I said this to them: we'd made the front room our private room rather than as a study. This larger room facilitated gatherings and there was always the church hall.

It was at the main course that Aardse asked, "Hey: when people in your congregation look at you giving a sermon in your clerical garb, do they think there's that girl from the naturist family at Buzzard Farm?"

Keith said quickly, "It's like a local town protects its own."

I said, "I think those in the know accept me in the new situation. Even at school not everyone knew. Back then, when someone found out, they might bully me with words about it, and some thought it was a licence to grab my clothed breast or touch my covered bottom. Even the idiots shut up eventually. You didn't make anything of it, Diana, and you knew."

"I did think a few things at first, and couldn't see myself like it," she said, speaking slowly (a habit which she had begun for Aardse's benefit years ago). Aardse doesn't know this: I came to your farmhouse in May 1995 and I went naked there. I walked with your father while you were in the shop. You showed me the yard, the premises, and your father took me to see the fields and outbuildings. I thought it was liberating then but unusual. Aardse has only really heard the positive sell I did of naturism from later on, when you were back from university."

"I was back in June 2000."

"Yes," said Aardse, with his Dutch accent. "You were looking for a new direction - that is what you were saying - to include you and me together. Our children were also our new future, I know. I recall you very anxious before giving birth to the first boy - a lot of monitoring we had - and obsessive yes after the birth."

I said, "You tried naturism again. But it was 2003 when we were twenty-four that you joined me at Saxiclite as a full-on naturist. We became artists' models, in 2006. You stopped being an artists' model with your marriage. I ended it because it was long enough, and it did for me include a year of photographic modelling."

Keith said, "I stopped objecting. You could do it now."

"I'm definitely too old now and I am a clergywoman."

Aardse was further ahead with his reference points of time. "Our second boy, it all went smoothly. Hey: Patricia's had three, we've had two, and are there to be any children in the curate's home?"

"No," I said. "

"What I mean is to suggest that no children makes this more of a working place."

"Not for me it isn't," said Keith, who seemed to be adjusting how he was sat regarding his testicles on his towel.

"So," asked Aardse, how do you feel, Keith, being now in a curate's house when they stopped you becoming a curate? Don't you ever act the curate you that wanted to be?"

"Definitely not. Perhaps the panel and the bishop was right. You generate the sense of purpose with all your activities beforehand - I will become a priest - and then they say 'no' and you kind of deflate. So I needed a new direction as well, which I have achieved now. Linda is certainly the one wearing the collar. Well, when she wears something else." Keith smiled at me, and pushed some meat in his gob.

I said, "What made the difference was your Master of Business Administration. And you do suit management. Keith is more of a bureaucrat from you as a business person, if I may say so, Aardse."

"Lecturer, only," he said. "Joined on and off by Diana."

"We need administrators and they assist business. The NHS would not run without administrators, for example."

"What depresses me now," said Diana, "is that we are all so apparently middle class. You were a rebel and my dad was a labourer."

I said, "Keith was always middle class. You were middle class at the Student Christian Movement Chaplaincy. They all were. Very Anglican middle class. I'd have preferred the Christian Union, but I couldn't stomach their theology and demands - even though some of them were also Anglican."

Keith said, "The Chaplaincy had the odd Methodist and UPCC."

Diana said, "The contrast, Keith, with your respectable persona, is you were also a ladies man."

"Diana, please," he said.

She continued, "Come on, you had an eye on many a female in our year, never mind your own. Cheryl Mould, right, she was one of ours, Jenny, let's be honest, and me, and you kind of viewed Linda at a distance. You have never said why you viewed Linda only at a distance."

"Lucinda was in my year, but I knew about the family as all hippy, creepy, weird. The truth is, my parents did not like her parents, your parents. Cheryl Mould was a dirty girl at school but her parents were okay," Keith said. "But, although I was not a Lothario..."

"Keith," I said. "This is supposed to be about our time in this house and we've said nothing."

He ignored me. "I did want to photograph you, Diana, like I did Linda, but you only did artists' modelling. I'd have liked a painting of you or Linda, for that matter."

Diana said, "Yeah, because on your honeymoon you bought a Blake-like painting by some Christian artist at Walsingham. That had erotic overtones."

"Oh that one," he said. "Christ Resurrecting in the Dawn Sunlight."

"What happened to it?" Diana asked.

"Sold it. Rejected for ministry and unemployed, I was skint - we were skint. Two years we had it. But now, here we are, Diana, not a stitch on, and no modelling fee involved I assume, and I have a good camera."

Diana placed down her knife and fork, put her hands behind her head, and cocked her head to one side, pushing out her chest of moderately sized breasts.

I then said, after a wry smile, "Cheryl could be a model now. Is she single or married, Keith? Well, she was married wasn't she?"

"Briefly. She was Cheryl Little for a little while. I presume she isn't married now, to someone else. I don't know if she has a boyfriend. I go to Harwich to go up to the headquarters administration whereas Cheryl works in the Harwich International Port operational administration."

"I thought you said she worked at HQ, when she was up here."

"Visiting her parents or something. Serninsea has a small operational administration, then Hartlepool is getting bigger, jumps up to Harwich and Felixstowe has a huge operational administration. There's local and national in Harwich. I co-ordinate the operational so she is involved in that. I was inaccurate; I don't know her that well. She said she likes Harwich."

I said, "I can't think why."

"Au contraire," Keith said. "Okay, it's the end of the line. Parkeston is dreary. But Harwich's peninsula with the Orwell and Stour has sixteenth to eighteenth century buildings. The old town, around Church Street, King's Head Street, is actually mediaeval, if behind Georgian facades. Dovercourt has avenues and a prom. Great beach. You get your two-hourly ferries to Felixstowe. Or you can get across to Esbjerg. Lots of trains. I sometimes stay at The Pier Hotel and eat mussels and drink beer and watch the sea. There's a Deli and a wine bar. Off Fronks Road you get Edwardian and Victorian semis, detacheds and terraces."

Diana said, "It almost sounds like you've been house-hunting."

"Rather, it is what happens when you go to a hotel or guest house and have time on your hands."

Aardse said, "But you were more miserable perhaps, Keith, with your periods of unemployment."

"I am not miserable in Harwich: I do not work all the time I am there. Work here isn't secure, basically. Yes, it took a while to get going, here, and not smoothly. Your parents would not pay me when I did bits of farm work, Linda."

"No, I know. But it was great having you around. This was after university, and we'd had enough time together by then and my parents just had to accept it. We still haven't talked about being here."

Diana said, "Our friendship after your university was different, Linda, because Keith then had your attention. You two kind of stuck together and have ever since, through all the changes. And in this curate's house."

"And mum and dad and Lucinda and Leila moved away. So this, here, is very different."

"You could still have children now," said Diana. "You've never wanted them. Two's enough for us; I gave birth to our youngest when Patricia got divorced. It's amazing that Ruben is nine, Luuk is eight, already. So you are a career girl, and here is your career, in this house and that church, and how long is it here?"

"It will be for two more years. And that creates a difficulty. If I was a curate elsewhere, I might come back here to be the vicar, but only if - in this scenario - Colin retired conveniently. The assumption is to move on. Maybe I'd change diocese and go to Harwich!"

Keith said, "Being a curate and being a vicar are very different, but you're not right. If the vicar retires, then you can move into a new role and the parish would see you differently. You could be here for a long time. This suffragan bishop likes connections into the community. I think he would want you here. I bet he does, Linda."

Diana said, "Is there a difficulty at all that Colin is your training vicar, Linda, and that he had married you before you ever sought ordination?"

"No. There is an adjustment in his pastoral role towards me. But it works. I do like him. A single man all his life, no children either; I think there has been the odd girl friend, but nothing happened."

"Rumours of a foreign woman," said Keith.

"Colin?" I asked.

"Oh yes. There was someone. The choir."

"In the choir - oh, that was tittle-tattle. Some women around with nothing better to do than gossip."

"You think? It's not that long ago. Not quite ten years... Not even nine."

"Colin was hopeful about you and he did sympathise and support you at the rejection. What he feared happened: the rejection affected your parish church life."

"It was the same time as miladdo became Bolingbroke. Well, I was moving on. So you took over."

The first course was over. I demanded we changed the subject. So we talked about favourite films - hardly my subject - and not what but how we watch television these days, when I hardly do. Diana and Aardse had acquired all the new technology. They had started using streaming services, surely to become more popular. Diana liked her fiction, like Scottish time travel and romance. Streaming The Jacobite Gap Years, she was also buying the three DVDs as physical objects to match the books and watch them multiple times. Aardse showed (it was obvious to me) only limited interest.

After the meal and with coffee we played whist, naked. Trumps didn't lead to anything. We had wine later

In the end, they put back on their clothes and left to collect their boys from Patricia and Arthur. It wasn't that great of an evening - too middle class. I'd enjoyed our meal and would have savoured the flavours, but instead ended up with his sauce down my throat and had to swallow it carefully. Not exactly a digestif, I thought.

Walking with Friends (Friday 29th March)

Losing my Wednesday afternoon through added visiting, and with Patricia herself on a rare extended lunch from Titensea, we intended a three-person walk starting from her large garden. By necessity, we were clothed!

In the garden Diana said, "Aardse accused me of being like a feral cat towards your husband, and he gave me a severe fucking once at home. It was great. Do you think we can have more dinner parties together?"

"I thought it was a failure."

"That's what Aardse said."

"I got a severe fucking too. I did wonder if Keith was thinking of you."

"Good job we were too tired from work," said Patricia. "Still, if you're going to fantasise naughty things we'd rather wait for a more regular occasion."

I said, "We were no more naughty than when Diana and I stare at the sky in your conservatory talking about very little. We played ordinary whist. I insist on the ordinariness of removing my clothes."

"Look at them," said Patricia to Diana and me. We were approaching people in the field beyond (part of The Marshes) with their metal detectors. "The farmer tolerates them, looking for more, and he could be part-beneficiary of the Serninsea Cross brooch treasure."

Diana said, "That farmer takes a small fee for entry; that's what he does. A student told me. Surely he'd be in line for half the value of the item, but we've heard nothing."

This farmland was in between Patricia's and the Wilsons' vicarage, the home of the evangelical priest for the neighbouring parish to mine.

Patricia said, "They break the fences and the trees, drop litter, and sometimes stray into our property. And there are so many of them," she moaned. A problem was a small gate into that next field, negotiated by Arthur with the farmer, so a few would use it the other way into the garden.

We walked into the field to get the better view across to the Wilson's house and one person came along with her detector and a golden labrador on an extended lead..

"Found anything?" I asked her.

"Not today," she said with a muted German accent. "The club chair he doubts many are here or too far beyond."

"I'll write to him about people straying on to my land," said Patricia."

"We do not," she said. "Straying you call it."

"We do," said our haughty friend.

"Are you straying?"

"Special permission," said Patricia. "And a gate. Our gate, not your gate."

"Are you a regular over here?" I asked this woman.

"Yah. Regular, but uneven I think. I know Kathryn and Kathleen Wickenby. They did archaeology degrees together. I know they don't like detectorists too many, but they have spoken into the club. They will say we have right to be here."

Patricia said, "I've never heard of them."

Diana added, "I knew them before, four or five years ago. They did Tourism at a higher level than I taught but came into my classes for extra foundation material. Then they went off to East Midlands University, having been at the Further Education College instead of sixth form, both of them always sticking together. Their university second year practical work was back here in Serninsea, in these fields."

I asked this woman, "Do you find a lot in these fields?"

"No. Little is detected, but we do find coins occasionally and bits of metal. It was definitely an area of metalworking near now the Marsh Drain, but was before a natural, boggy river. Yah."

"What about the Serninsea Cross brooch?" I asked.

"Yah? We say it is hoax," she said. "There's some bishop man who promotes it. Like these twins say, he's a dupe or he's in on it."

"I can't imagine he is either of those," I said.

"Ask Kathryn or Kathleen. They say he should stay in his Caffenmere palace and talk about what he knows about."

"He was interested in archaeology. Romans in Britain, I think. And it's not exactly a palace," I suggested. "Large, I grant you; posh location, sure; but, well, you know." I asked her and Diana, "Incidentally, do either of you know a woman called Klärchen Sisse?"

Diana said, "Yes I do. She has a dog called Dieter."

"Ah yes too. She is from the same region of Germany as me - North Rhine Westphalia."

"Do either of you know anything about her? I met her the other day when I was visiting."

Diana said, "She's fond of her dog, an alsatian. She seems to get away with bringing it to classes. I think she's the sort of person who moves on and moves on again. I don't know her that well."

"She brought her dog from Germany. Mine came from Wytham. Hendrik here and her dog gets together very good. We do too," said the German woman.

I asked her for her name, and she said Salome Lichtblau. She said she would tell Klärchen that we met. She said, "Come and visit us. Do you have a dog?"

"No," I said.

"That's a shame," she said. We could have enjoyed time together, walking dogs and so on, going on the beach and coming back. They like going in Klärchen's shower. We have good fun."

"I met Klärchen accidentally, and now you too."

We said goodbye and I kept my thoughts to myself.

Given Patricia's temporary freedom, we went for a long walk to the railway restoration. Bad Dr. Richard Beeching had removed a vital north-south railway connection. (I knew a Beeching once, a 'good' Beeching, at Saxiclite, a year older than me. I never discussed him with anyone.)

Here tracks were being extended, and electric cables were up and ready, but the real excitement was imminently introducing the trams as a regular and local service. Begun as a tourist idea, and instead of restoring steam locomotives, trams were to be a transit system in their own right. The trams would run a winter service as a local facility as well as being a tourist attraction. The new station at the head of the restoration was on the B road from Patricia's rural house.

"Why not restore the east main line?" was Patricia's obvious point to us, and one I shared, and probably most locals did. "Run trains throughout and deliver the tourists." Here the volunteers, prisoners, community order servers and forced workfare among the unemployed had rebuilt a line from Sutton-in-Serninsea all the way south to Inglemire, at a created park, and with a brand new section for Caffenmere.

We approached a leader of these labourers alongside. He'd got acute hearing, because he said to us, "It'll never happen. And even this new service will be limited by the single line lengths."

Here, at the head of the line, a functional open air new station was using an old restored shell of a signal box alongside as a ticket office. He explained, as we looked around, "The main line through Ca'nmere is now too long gone to restore; and there are bypasses and other roads built on where its track used to be south and north. They'd have to rebuild 'longside these roads," he said.

"Ah, but," Patricia asked, "would you give up the trams to be a through line again?"

"Tomorrow," he said. "By the way, it's a great way to get the unemployed to work for their benefits and to keep criminals out of prison. So much could be done like that and at less cost."

"Patricia said, "Oh I agree with that. More projects like this."

This made me feel uneasy, and Diana too by her facial expression. Forcing the unemployed to work for benefits whilst keeping people out of prison on community orders, and prisoners doing this work, effectively criminalised the unemployed.

I said to Patricia, "When you force workfare like you force criminals you ride roughshod over innocent people."

She said, starkly, "Gets them off their backsides. We are still subsidising the workforce with these benefits but we get something back. Prisoners should be made to work," she added.

"I better carry on volunteering," said the leader, who moved sharpish.

I said, "You never used to think like that. Only since you married Arthur, and you only got your job because he was there."

"I had a formal interview," she said.

"I know," I said. "The other candidates from the Job Centre turned up under false pretences."

"No one challenged me being the best qualified."

I left it there. Diana kept quiet, but Patricia and her husband had become ever more Tory and anti-European to boot.

Patricia added, "And don't forget, the Good Samaritan needed a wallet to be effective."

I said, at this point, "I'll stick to the religious interpretations."

"Mrs. Thatcher was correct when she addressed those people."

"Presbyterians in Scotland," I said, "lecturing others from her basis of ignorance."

"She was right. And don't forget Arthur has given me a few precious hours off whereas you are both free to meet in the afternoons."

I said, "Not every afternoon. And Diana here tries to get work, but FE and adult education is a terrible employer. People bet in an instant at Wilkinson's Casino what its workers get over many hours."

"Yeah," said Patricia, "but your work is like my time off with a hobby thrown in. And if the windows and doors business goes down then we've lost our jobs, whereas you will never lose your job. And on this Diana agrees with me."

Diana said, "Yea..eah."

"And I'm not working fewer hours: I'm going back and will add time later."

Patricia called a taxi from her mobile phone, and went back to work. A visiting cousin was in their house to receive her teenagers. The taxi took us directly via Diana's, where I also got out to walk to my car at Patricia's.

As it drove off I mentioned that Patricia is becoming so right wing that she made me look like a lefty.

We parted with Diana warning me, "Do keep away from Klärchen Sisse. She doesn't wear knickers."

"But neither do I."

"I kept quiet because I bet that Salome Lichtblau is in on it all. Very strange. Do you know what I mean? You know, like..."

"Yes, I think I do."

"This place is full of weidos - and that bishop of yours stinks of perfume when you meet him. I bet dogs won't go near him."

"But he's not a weirdo, Diana."

"He's a fraud and keeps a lot to himself."

"Oh I don't know. So do we!"

"Look after yourself, Linda."

She gave me a gentle kiss on the cheek before parting, and I thought this was very nice of her. I was classified as a local weirdo, once, and probably still was.

Narrator: Linda A Secret (Saturday 30th March)

Staying in bed, Keith and I recalled the dinner party. Keith said, "They do not know that you cannot have children. Diana does not know."

"I've never had cause to tell her."

"In Patricia's conservatory, has Diana ever walked about with a string hanging down?"

"Yes. Many times."

"But you never have."

"No. I thought about doing it for effect. But no."

"Jenny knows."

"We were then investigating each other then. Anyway, she's miles away and I don't know where."

"Don't you think Diana should know?"

"How am I going to tell her now? Hey, on our walk, this detectorist said she shared bathing her dog with that woman's dog I met."

"Another one?"

"I think so."

"Isn't this supposed to be pastorally confidential?"

"It was on our walk with Diana and Patricia. Diana thought it is all very dodgy. Keep it to yourself, husband."

"Hmm. You're not coming up with a big number when you add two and two?"

"Forget it."

"Fancy another poke?"

"Yes I do, actually. Good man."

After the poke, Keith started reading some papers from work, sent from Harwich, that, he said, "most likely could delay the internal investigations further. Looks like I'll have to work on a fucking Sunday."

'Hmm. Try it,' I thought.

Chapter 03 Not So Clever as a Curate

Church Hall Show (Laetare Sunday 31st March)

Keith went into work! It was white cassock time and a touch of pink for me all day. Yes. Mothering Sunday, Refreshment Sunday, Rose Sunday, Sunday of the Five Loaves: and so an evening of entertainment was permitted in the church hall.

Keith was back from work. He said he'd join me for The Magic Lantern Show: The Peter and Kath Partnership as it would take his mind off the utter stupidity down in Titansea. It would be a young chap with a 'Kath' who'd appeared in The National Lens. Trouble was, could the magic work in its own backyard?

The turnout at the Church Hall was pathetic. Perhaps there were thirty-five or nearly forty there to watch in total. Keith and I saw that there were a few laity from the local church but probably more from the Serninsea Ings deanery, and those who were paid like me.

Keith didn't want to sit with the clergy contingent, and as Jeremy and Emily Symes were present I also wanted to keep my distance. We sat a few rows behind Bishop John Barman, the Reverend Jim Wilson and wife Connie all together.

Colin came in and instructed me to see Peter Marshall backstage with a text Colin had written for me to read out.

I went on to the stage and behind it found Peter Marshall. He was going to come out with a pink coloured lantern to introduce the show.

"It's a church hall: Colin wants this reading out," I said to him. So, instead, I would hold the lantern and read the text to then, Peter said, tap the handle with a finger of the holding hand. I went on to the stage in my white cassock and wearing a pink rose.

"Ladies and Gentlemen! I hold this lantern with verses here from Isaiah chapter 66 verses ten to eleven and Psalm 121 verse one:

"Rejoice, O Jerusalem: and come together all you that love her. Rejoice with gladness, you that have been in sorrow: That you may exult, and be filled from the breasts of your consolation. I rejoiced when they said to me: 'We shall go into God's House.'"

As I finished speaking and tapped the handle the flame went into a pink colour itself and then went into a kind of shower of pink sparks. I'd clearly performed a trick without realising it. I went behind the stage wing, handed in the lantern, and went to sit down among the audience.

However, the reading I thought about was this one, from Mark 6 in the New Revised Standard Version.

Then Jesus said to them, 'Prophets are not without honour, except in their hometown, and among their own kin, and in their own house.' And he could do no deed of power there, except that he laid his hands on a few sick people and cured them. And he was amazed at their unbelief.

We needed to suspend disbelief, locally, those that knew the twins.

The 'Partnership' was still rather impressive, I thought. As I sat next to Keith, loud music in the form of Kim Wilde's Cambodia played (and I wasn't really sure why) and continued. A vertical person-sized wardrobe-like box was wheeled on. He opened the door to the box; Kath, in a simple red dress, came on to the stage, went into the box, he shut the door, and in a couple of seconds opened it again to see Kath in a blue dress. That box was wheeled away, and another one came in, horizontal, and the same clothed Kath got in it, which was divided into two and made nearly apart, and somehow her head was in one half and legs in the other. As it appeared, this was pretty good, if hardly original. When she got out, she was in a white dress.

Part of the show was the music dropping away, and Kath in white gave a short lecture on local archaeology. The Magic man put on a projector to a flat white space at the back of the stage, so we saw the object - Kath had taken the picture when it was shown to people with expertise, last year, including locals.

I noticed that the bishop started taking notes. Kath first explained that the "so-called Serninsea Cross brooch" found last year in the Serninsea Marches would be most likely Anglo-Saxon. Christians didn't leave grave goods for a journey onwards. Being of a cross shape did not make it Christian. Yet, she said, there was something odd about it - and it seemed to appear from nowhere - because it did not seem to be associated with a grave. No originally shallow grave nearby was claimed or found by any visiting metal detectorists, and not from a rapid dig last year. Nevertheless, this land was always in transition, with fresh water streams and ponds meeting up with seawater marshes; the changing coastline had sand moving south and had been affected by rising and falling sea levels. Much was now drained of course and behind sea walls. Graves did exist but were less common than cremations. Cowrie shells and coral had been found in the area, as was once an antler comb. But one would expect to find some evidence of a grave, say a deceased woman in binding clothing that will have rotted away.

"I admit that it gives the area a greater profile today. It was handed to the Anglican Bishop of Bolingbroke for safe-keeping: it needs expert appraisal."

I recalled the detectorist with her labrador stating that the Wickenby twins were sure it was a hoax. Here Kath was hedging her or their bets. Was it because we were on church property? Was I being too cynical?

The bishop stood. "May I? Yes, it is in my safe keeping. In fact, here it is." He held it up and turned it about for everyone to see. "However, I am very happy to send it away for tests. I will send it to a laboratory that you recommend. Would that keep you happy?"

"Yes," she replied back. "Thank you." He sat down. Kath said that it was a large brooch, as a brooch, and contained garnets from India and amber. Amber represented the sun god or light. Its gold content was 75% pure and so was of value whatever its origins.

Kath said that a problem for archaeology was the sheer amount of Roman material of the living, whereas later Saxon findings concentrated on the dead. She said that there are fewer than ten excavated clearly Anglo-Saxon settlements in the UK. The wooden buildings of course rot away, leaving behind postholes that were dated by pottery: so often, what was hoped to be Anglo-Saxon turned out to be Iron Age. The best area for settlements was the rich agricultural land well west of our area going through to the Midlands. In a past settlement area you would be lucky indeed to find any dwellings, but you might find the communal hall or possibly the grub hut - a grubenhaus - with its pit for disposals, where a lot of archaeological work was done.

Kath, again talking generally, said that the Iron Age people had lived on hill tops for sight and protection, the Romans went down into the valleys for better micro-climates, and then the Anglo-Saxons went back uphill again. Saxon settlements also paid attention to administrative boundaries.

Kath mentioned about the background of the mixed tribes of the area and this mattered because Saxons and Vikings only represented twenty percent at best of the population. With the decline of Roman power: slaves will have run free to get their own back and become thieves with a general decline in law and order, the shortage of currency finally led to its absence of use, records were no longer written down, and therefore it followed that there was the inability to organise labour to maintain buildings. It was a time of a fall in the population as disease was more prevalent and, even if wanted, the diminished numbers of people remaining could not maintain the old Roman fabric. Early Anglo-Saxon pottery was rougher than the Roman equivalent and the food that went in it was poorer. However, Anglo-Saxons liked their festivals and subsistence farming on good soil could still mean times of plenty. Stones from villas and buildings were used to protect graves, and sometimes the best stones were raided. Whilst Saxon life did develop, this area had Viking rule.

She further said that the Christian God will have been blamed for the decline of the fabric of society and so was followed by a period of Paganism among most people with cells existing of Christian belief. Some continuing Celtic cells of Christians might have continued until the eventual baptisms of the elites. The Anglo-Saxons provided not just an invading people but a new culture, albeit one that would later be Christianised from the top, from the kings and lords downwards, in battles between Northumbria and Mercia impacting locally, and then tested by Viking raids and their civilisation - but where Englishness eventually succeeded up to and under the Norman-French sweep of dominant power.

Kath then speculated that today currencies are undermined by excessive supply and basic questions of confidence, that our main world power the United States is in huge debt and, if flexible, more unproductive and unable to maintain its worldwide military footprint; some of its present-day Christian reactionaries were evidence of the decline of Christianity as a general world view once again. Another Empire was being lost now. The Romans at the end were unable to innovate, there was no more land to conquer, and no more people to enslave, and so it was relatively unproductive; more flexible cultures picked it off and forced its retreat into Byzantium. The Celts might have thought that riches from Byzantium would indicate a potential Roman revival, but after say a hundred years the Saxon culture had settled. Today the United States might flood the economy with Mickey Mouse money for infrastructure improvements, but at some point it would retreat into its own real value. Since the financial crash, continuous quantitative easing had suggested a patient on life support.

Keith said, "This has been the best bit. We could have done without the derivative magic."

Nevertheless, Kath left the stage to applause and this Peter Marshall was back, doing a range of tricks. He finished with a final person sized box that had opened doors front and back and so was 'see-through'. He called it that, and Kath came on in little more than a tiny bikini. He then referred to the tabloid publicity, and that, as she went in, he swiftly removed the bra and she whooped and slapped her hands on her chest, and swinging her back to us closed that back doorway from this side. Mr. Magic then closed the front door. With a shout the topless lass was at the back of the hall, and she screamed for people to turn around and raised her arms up to bare her breasts before running out of the back doors. Cheeky, effective, and daring in a church hall, but it was back to Mark 6 - it was the twin, surely.

Something that stayed with me was from the talk, the part where the Christian God was blamed and thus was dropped from Celtic and Anglo-Saxon belief. And I thought, yes indeed, something of a similar replacement is happening now. Christianity no longer explains anything about cosmic origins or destinations, it is ethically dubious, and a dominant humanist narrative and a variety of beliefs and practices among a diverse population is taking over.

Keith said, "At least it was different. Nice chest."

"Very reasonable for a fiver each," I said.

"A fiver a tit?"

"Keith, don't be silly."

I noticed Bishop John Barman with Connie Wilson talking to Peter and Kath, with a top back on, and someone there older that Kath called 'uncle'. The Symes couple slipped away.

Keith said to me, "I was looking at your Church News. Never mind what we do at SMS, these diocesan leaks say the report is going to be a cracker. The investigative team has been uncovering some real fissures in management and its effectiveness, starting with the grand duffer himself, the diocesan Bishop of Wytham, your Right Reverend Derek Imperial."

"I saw it. The poor man has only been here less than seven years."

"The joke is that he hasn't been imperialist enough to command. They'll blame his Lordship Desperate Dan Dimpleby too. Why they gave him an actual lordship when he ceased to be the bishop I do not know. You should go and acknowledge the 'Bishop of Boiling Blokes', Linda."

Unfortunately, I was soon shaking hands with Jim Wilson, who said to me some drivel like the Serninsea Marshes were full of Pagans again and he was busy trying to convert them back. Twit.

Keith and I both knew that Bishop Derek let his two suffragans get on with it, with their titles from ancient land names. There was the Bishop of Screddington, whom we hardly ever saw, and the Bishop of Bolingbroke, who was never off the scene.

People would often spot John Terence Barman in some restaurant at the window seat with a different woman, and here was why rumours that he was gay never made much headway. Apparently, he liked the stories that suggested he might marry a woman soon.

I shook his hand (and so did Keith) and he stank of perfume.

Keith said afterwards, "He might just fancy taking you out for a meal and afters."

I said, "I'm quite tired and want to go home and sleep."

"So it is not tonight, Josephine."

"Don't call me Josephine."

"Surely I will not."

"Don't call me Shirley either."

"You should go on the stage. Oh you did! Do the whole hog, daughter, and become an actor Mrs. Worthington. But don't you think her bust is too developed for her age?"

"Kath's?"

"It's a line from the song."

"Noel Coward," I responded.

"Her personality is not, in reality, exciting enough, inviting enough, for this particular sphere."

"About whom are we talking?" I asked him.

"You, possibly, my dear."

"As a priest?"

"Well. And though it's not exactly flat she'll need a little more than that to earn a living wage."

"You really are a cunt, supporting husband. Let's go home."

"I'll skip the bit about bandy legs. My dad was mad on this song, including the fourth verse with her bandy legs."

"Awful," I said back.

Dream Sequence and Waking (Monday 1st April)

This is what it was like, in all its detail. I was at the altar rail, with other ordinands, accompanied by those known to me as they looked in the final year of sixth form and beginning of university. To my right, kneeling too, was Jenny, and to my left old long-lost friends Adam and then Geoff. We all had robes on. Here was the current suffragan Bishop John, stood in front. It's the priesting but this was the parish church and not Wytham Cathedral. There was a woman at the side, who was painting the scene with a big canvas and easel - I could not see her face, but she had nothing on and she was accompanied by a passive German Shepherd dog.

I was brushing my long hair and my impossible lush blonde pubic hair too.

The bishop said, "Take my offering from my gloria hole."

Jenny showed that she could absorb him fully. That was my ability! She drooled with her mouth full and turned to look at me as it pressed against the inside of her other cheek. I brushed my head hair more. Suitably plopped out, Jenny licked her lips and smiled at me and showed pointed teeth. The dog came to Jenny and licked her mouth, but a flick of the artist's paint brush caused the dog to go and sit back with its mistress.

Oh no, this thing was getting fatter and longer and stiffer for me. 'Purple headed mountain' sang some unseen choir. The artist was going crazy thrashing her brushstrokes and the dog wagged its tail. The bishop knocked away my hairbrush, pinched my nose and my tongue came out. I was going to choke (I don't). As I took this enormous thing into my throat, the dog came to sniff my backside.

Then the bishop's mobile phone seemed to be bleeping. I raised my arm and put out my hand to answer it for him, and my hand went through his robes as if they were not there. The dog was approaching behind me.

"Oy," said Keith, my husband, behind me, as I lay on my left side. "The alarm is going."

"Oh shit," I said. "Horrible, horrible. Ugh."

"Dreaming?"

"Best left unsaid. I could do with a quick real fuck," I said.

I turned on to my back. He got on top of me to do as I'd requested.

"Crumbs, you're far too wet," he said. "Look I can't get started in there. I can't get any purchase. You'd better pleasure yourself instead. You don't have to get up, Deacon. Sorry, but I've got lots going on at work and all that we're doing about internal security." He rolled off me. "There's no spare ten minutes for me. Can you make my breakfast?"

"I will."

"Was I in it?"

"No, actually."

"Go on then? Who?"

We were getting up and headed first to the bathroom together.

"Adam Magellan: remember him? Geoff: his gay friend. Jenny. Some woman artist and her dog."

Keith had first go for a piss.

"Ah, those in your sixth form sexual happenings. Other than a woman and her dog."

"I can only think of the painting mentioned at the dinner party, the one you got in Walsingham. Come on."

"Why was Geoff Virgo in your dream? What was he doing - giving Magellan one?"

He finished and flushed. I sat on the seat and pissed.

"No. We were at an altar rail. Geoff is some sort of self-defined bishop, I've discovered. This is too embarrassing. Bishop John Barman was making an offering to us we could not refuse, through a 'gloria hole' in his vestments."

Keith started laughing and then put toothpaste on his brush. Soon I was alongside, doing the same.

After swilling, he said, "I never liked that Adam Magellan. He became a copper and once a copper always a copper. He's George Wickenby's competitor, in town. SMS uses Wickenby. Magellan went private, and interferes with people's private lives. Did you see George Wickenby at the magic show?"

I was swilling out my mouth. "No?"

"That Kath was calling him 'uncle'."

"Oh, I see. She's related to him. They are, then. I didn't even know Adam Magellan is in town; I didn't know the twins were nieces of George Wickenby."

"You go around with your eyes and ears shut."

I then said, "Fuck off, I do need a shit."

Sometime later at the breakfast table I said, "Good job I don't preach on my dreams. Petertide is months off."

"Wickenby I mentioned is more involved this time at SMS; computer whizz-kids are coming in. People are laying traps too. It gets more and more elaborate," he said. "But we have to do it. We, who measure others, and their honesty, must be sure of our own."

"Not the only ones being checked," I said. "The diocese."

"By the way, upstairs, under the bed, is a large rabbit vibrator with little balls in it; it does rotation, vibration, and different speeds. More pleasurable than your dilators," he said.

"Where did you get it?"

"It's second hand."

"Second hand? You mean it's been up someone else's..."

"This woman at work said she didn't want it."

"At work. What do you talk about?"

"It was a gift from a bloke on a one night stand. She didn't like it. She has washed it."

"Give it to a charity shop!"

"Don't be silly. It is perfectly usable. You need to push and stretch, unlike this morning."

"OK. I'll wash it again at breakfast before I use it. Did you pay her for it?"

"No. When I said my wife would have it, she thought it could be a gift."

"You told her I could have it? Who was she?"

"You wouldn't know her. Look, it is a generous gesture from a colleague who was having fun waving this around."

"And you told everyone that I would have it?"

"No. There are batteries in it. She could have taken them out but how generous she was, leaving them in. Tell you what. I'll put on instead one of Cheryl Mould's ties she gave me back at Christmas. Company tie; show some authority."

"Well, thank the woman for her gift. Tell her that I am delighted, ecstatic, it is just what I wanted, and I will use it with intense pleasure. I'll be spending more than twenty minutes with this."

Narrator: Keith At Caffenmere (Tuesday 2nd April)

I went with Yojana to Caffenmere and the bishop's large house, where we also met the diocesan Bishop of Tees, brunette Elizabeth Huett. She'd arrived yesterday. He called her 'Tess' from recently.

"Tess?" I asked.

As the first woman Bishop of the Diocese of Tees, they were already calling her Tees of the Diocesans, helped by some natural curls. So he went all Thomas Hardy.

He'd known her from 2007 when she was a priest at Wallsend. Then he called her Seg and she called him Tel. It's not clear who took whom to bed, when he was a Midlands priest attending the Roman Economy Conference at Wallsend-on-Tyne that she'd organised. Seen as a talent for organising and communicating, when the Right Reverend Penuel Fairthing retired in 2015 she became Suffragan Bishop of Segedunum (a still-used name for Wallsend at the end of Hadrian's Wall). When the neighbouring diocesan Bishop of Tees Hardwick Cockburn (called Harry Co'burn) retired in 2018, Liz became his successor.

Present at this meeting were these two bishops, the Reverend Christine Vine, the thinning curly scruffy black-haired Reverend Ken Osis, the Reverend Jim Wilson, June Holborn visiting from the south, Helen McPhail, Connie Wilson, Yojana and me.

It wasn't the best turnout because people were busy.

Rarely were all three bishops together. Jonathan Hopkirk Eyre, Bishop of Margate since 2009, was busy on the south coast. Bishop Elizabeth was widely known for being organised, strategic, multi-talented, too busy for relationships, and Bishop Terry was known for being progressive, engaging with the public, and too choosy to stay with dated women. Jonathan Eyre, however, was joked about - a wife was somewhere but he was a clerical 'father' of Sunday School children he'd helped to populate.

The now episcopal couple spent some time showing us around Terry's large house. It had been furnished by the Church, just like in our curate's house. A bit like Linda might, I asked if I could visit the loo, and so was apart from them for over five minutes.

Back with them, I viewed outside a very long and wide back garden stretching to the north, and a gate at the far end. This was the bishop's tied house, his for as long as he had the role. The previous suffragan, David Stoa, used to give garden parties, but this one never had.

We moved through the house to a particular lounge. I sat next to Yojana with the two bishops at ninety degrees from us, with much light coming over them from the bay window facing the front garden and the narrow road beyond it.

Terry said that there were sometimes rumours of relationships between clergy. What few knew, but we did, was that not only did Tel and Tess get it together as priests, and maintained the concealed relationship, but Jon, made bishop in 2009, joined in a sexual threesome in 2010.

"It wasn't the first time that Jonathan and I had sex with one or two women - the first time was at theological college!"

Liz, Terry and Jonathan's three-way was to celebrate John Terence Barman becoming Suffragan Bishop of Bolingbroke. It was that year, he said, that Liz and himself had a revelation about the Divine Orgasm, and discussed with Jon about organising groups of available people based on promoting this. Liz said that the twosomes then threesome were so excessively enjoyable that these had to be a model for the Kingdom of God, rather as the wine got better and stayed plentiful during the wedding Jesus attended.

Liz continued that the Confraternity might now be considered sempiternal, to the point where the eternal Kingdom breaks in. The first name for the overall group was The Khajuraho Oversight, after the erotic Indian sculptures, but this name was dropped as it was Hindu and over-exotic. Similarly, the concept of Sigheh Oversight was introduced, as that of temporary marriage for during sexual encounters, but this was dropped because of its Shia Islamic origins. Terry said that Jonathan Eyre had one lover of many, then laywoman Christine Vine (with us), and she gave the whole thing its Christian theoretical and theological backbone. The four knew this could be scandalous to the outside world, so they decided to set up a bishops-led, secretive, Confraternity of the Theocratic Principality of the English National Church or Principatus Theocratic Confraternitati admissis in Ecclesia Anglorum Nationalibus. This was Christian and as authoritarian as necessary to be secretive.

If I could have the influence of Christine! Liz explained, with Christine nodding, that Christine bedded Jonathan Eyre frequently, and managed his sexual aggression, and she bedded Sir Sanjay Bunker, and managed his sexual divergencies. Christine had thought that Saint Augustine made terrible errors, and she wanted to be the new saintly guide to the vision of the perfect city.

Greying Jim Wilson however suggested that sin did exist in disobedience, such as when refusing the gift of salvation.

Terry said that the Confraternity claims that orgasmic sex is the highest expression of the divine. New to us here was his explanation of the divine economy. The three bishops learnt recently from the Reverend Deacon Christine that the Middle East once had mass sexual ceremonies in order to increase productivity.

Thus Christine Vine spoke. The four had discussed recently that back in the ancient days it was about eliciting a response from the fertility Gods. In modern society, gathered leading sexual athletes could perform mutual masturbation, with the goal of simultaneous orgasms, to aid commercial productivity. In addition Christine said she wrote the Body Eucharist as combining sacrifice, thanksgiving and orgasmic connection.

Reading the Bible, she said, God had always had a body. It might be unseen, but there was still a body. For example, Jesus had sat at the right hand of God. The body was continuous from God afar to humans near.

Thus the two brunette bishops present explained to us (again) the concept of sexual conferencing. This is for when they meet, either as two or as three. Liz said they will pray on a matter, have sex, enjoy Divine Orgasms - everyone present must have at least one - and then make a significant decision. It is rather like some have used collectively-encouraged but individually-experienced dreams to decide something. It takes some skill to consider something complex and contentious during sex, but it increases the bond between the decision makers. Others might watch the bishops in conference having sex, or have their own sexual encounters at the same time. But only the bishops could decide after orgasms.

Blonde Christine commented that there was something equivalent here to the Business Meeting of the Quaker Movement prompted by the Spirit, in a condition of waiting, ministry and active consideration leading to decisions. Here there was consideration, sexual encounter, the divine sign of the Orgasm, and thus a decision under divine guidance.

Tess and Tel therefore decided in this place to do some sexual conferencing. We could touch each other if we wanted, but they stripped off in front of us and engaged in mutual masturbation. As this began, Tess, or Liz, asked Yojana if any of what Christine Vine had said about sacrifice made any sense.

Christine stayed silent, to listen as Tel pushed by hands his very long still semi-stiff penis somewhat into Tess's vagina.

I put my hand down between Yojana's legs under her knickers to stroke her dampness. Yojana then referred to the Sakta in Hinduism who still practise animal sacrifice. The two bishops slowed their effort to listen. The female-like emphasis of energy or power in Shakti Hinduism refers to human sacrifice, but it isn't actual, said Yojana. People know about the wife throwing themselves on the man's funeral pyre. All kinds of animals have been sacrificed, she said; the Jhatka method tries to avoid animal pain. But she didn't know that much. It seemed quite a lot to me. I slipped my finger up into her wetter vagina.

Yojana pointed out that sacrifice is in order to obtain salvation. The spirit of the Vedic sacrifices is what is followed now. There are the Vedas, philosophical Vedanta and Mimamsa ritual theology of Ramanuja. Fasting is the obvious self-sacrifice towards devotion. She thought we were all about having pleasure, although she understood that Terry's ejaculation into her mouth at her initiation was a kind of giving. This seemed to be a cue for Elizabeth to take his well endowed energised member out of her vagina and into her mouth.

I thought that Linda would surely energise the whole group at her very induction.

We were, I recalled in public, first and foremost 'theosexuals' - our sexual orientation was towards God. Pleasure could be seen as a by-product for bonding together as a fellowship under God. (I felt that I had to say something.) Christine's eyes went up. Liz was indeed bonding with Terry under God.

With everyone quiet and touching one another, the two worked themselves into their orgasms: back in her vagina, Tel came inside Tess and then masturbated her to her own orgasm.

Here came a divinely based instruction. The Bolingbroke bishop declared a decision for theatrical metaphors as divinely instituted. Ken Osis had shown him how Wilkinson Casino and above used to be a theatre. It was so in the 1960s and on two floors. The theatre was upstairs and service rooms were downstairs, with also a hall below. Once you could get up to the first floor at the far end, and it went up behind the actual stage upstairs. Thus Terry said that this legacy would disguise our group as it started to really expand. Therefore, we were going to be called The Worshipful Company of Serninsea Theatre Players, and use this rather than refer to 'the group' under the Confraternity. We would still refer to talent scouts as before, but now add actors, the control booth, and front of house. Terry would be the assistant director.

I said, "Actors as a concept instead of sigheh, then - but only the assistant? Is that because you are a suffragan bishop only?"

Apparently, he or she is the one in the control booth. As for the other groups, they would adopt the theatrical metaphors only if they worked for them.

We would all continue to use the white plastic badges as items targeted people could notice and ask about. We, the Bolingbroke Geese and Ganders showed a white B on a black Goose. The white W for Wippedsfleott on a black elephant that Christine sometimes wore was from Christine's original location of Ebbsfleet, even though the nearest bishop's area was at Margate. Her locals came from far and wide. The white H on a black stag was for Hereteu - the gathering in Hartlepool and abouts - although Sarah Deimos as bishop with this name knew nothing.

Bishop Terry asked if there was any news.

Bishop Liz pointed out that Jenny wanted to keep her distance from Linda. We had to respect that.

I pointed out that after encountering Linda in the sixth form Jenny feared homosexuality, once she was told this was sin by these charismatics.

However, Liz said that this was not true today with Fatima Tamuz as her vicar. "Fatima gives close guidance as well, as sex as Jenny's mental condition varies."

I told them that Linda had met a second person who shared her dog with the woman with the excitable dog.

"Listen. I discussed that," said Christine.

"Dogging then?" I asked in a throwaway fashion. Ha ha.

Helen McPhail looked uncomfortable. "Stephen and I do... go fucking - dogging - at times," she said.

"Could be tricky," said Terry. "All sex is good but we must protect the Confraternity, now also The Worshipful Company."

"A small number obviously know us but not this connection."

Bishop Terry pointed to developments in the plan to recruit Linda. My less explicit photos plus Ken's five had been sent anonymously to Linda's training vicar. "Can't make an omlette without cracking eggs." Terry had posted them in Sweynburgh on his diocesan travels. Also he had "chatted closely" with Emily Symes on Linda's parish experience visit.

June Holborn had a promotion idea for Terry. "Perhaps Serninsea could have an attraction like in Amsterdam." She described this cinema owned by a Natalie - '5D Porn' - with one show a time for eighteen customers only giving 3D vision, motion seats, air jets and water cannons to give additional sensations to the sex.

I said it would need more than eighteen seats to make a profit, or very short videos.

Time now was to relax. Yojana undressed completely, and so did I. On the carpet, as she wanked me, she drew attention by saying, "Keith, Christianity stresses the body whereas Hinduism is more spiritual and literary-mythical. There is a difference between being 'Christosexual' and 'Krishnosexual', and honourably so, but both are 'theosexual'."

"Oh that is brilliant," said Terry.

Christine was nodding.

But Yojana went on: "Be careful though because people cannot summarise Hinduism easily." Yojana mounted herself on to me.

Christine said that the Jewish approach from Rabbi Maurice would be 'Abramsexual' and she'd speak to him soon.

When we later rested, and Yojana was rather doting on me afterwards, Elizabeth came over above us with her damp pubes and pointed out that our groups do not break pastoral and commercial confidentiality. Linda should not know Jenny's whereabouts. Her uncle knew, which mattered. She'd changed her name to keep away from Linda.

I agreed in that if the Confraternity broke SMS commercial confidentiality, then SMS wouldn't work.

So as the afternoon faded, Terry above with his rainbow of a todger told us that this day marked the end of my mentoring Yojana. We could continue to meet but should not make an affair of it. He wanted Yojana's orientation towards the group.

Thus Elizabeth asked Yojana to accompany her for female to female seduction. Yojana seemed excited. I knew that this might be preparation for going to South Wales.

Ken, dressing like me, told me that he was delighted his metaphor ideas were taken on at the centre of decision taking. Connie looked forward to dealing with Linda, she told me.

I then left the house, as did others, leaving Yojana with Tess and Tel, and drove back to work to finish off a few papers.

Narrator: Linda Photos from the Past (Tuesday 2nd April)

Reverend Colin Cromer rang me and asked me to come in again after Morning Prayer for a matter that was "disturbing", as he put it. (He usually understated things.)

I went to his vicarage, rather larger than my place, with more rooms downstairs, and more bedrooms upstairs. He had a separate toilet, shower room and bathroom downstairs and the same upstairs. It was laid out for home, work and visitors. So I went into his study, a work area.

"Happy birthday," he said to me, giving me a card to add to those from my family and close friends. "Life begins."

"You have mail for me?"

"Not for you but about you. It is a package, as you can see, and contains photographs. Ten of them. Look."

"Right."

I looked at them, ten nudes, one from the back with arse prominent, one on my arms and legs from the side, and eight showing my bald pubes, including one lying on my side with legs pulled up and my anus clearly visible. In one nude one I was in a tin bath, and in another holding a towel. They were from my modelling days in the photographic studio.

"The implication here is blackmail," he said, as I looked at them and he looked at me.

I said, "I can't be blackmailed; I'm a naturist - as you well know."

"I know your background; I presume now you still practise this - if it is a practice - elsewhere at other times. It's the fact that someone has taken it upon themselves to send these pictures to me clearly taken in some studio. You are a little younger, but you do keep your looks."

"Twenty-seven and my birthday would be the twenty-eighth. Quite old for a model."

"The worry is that this package was posted quite far away in Sweynburgh. You don't seem embarrassed?"

"No, I'm not. Feel free to look at them. Is there an attempt at blackmail?"

"All it says is, 'Here are some pictures of Silky that might interest you vicar.' Well, they do but for all the wrong reasons. Who is 'Silky' by the way? I mean, I know it is you."

"At the photographic studio my model name was 'Silky' because of my skin. At art class in college and other venues, I was just Linda. This is the trouble," I said, "of having a past when you don't know what you are going to be in the future. Avoiding most bikini and topless sessions I still did many repetitive poses."

"Someone who took these photographs has decided now to send them to me. You've haven't even been in ministry for a year. Presumably, if you'd been recognised earlier, they would have sent these earlier."

At this point, I asked to be excused. My guts were churning - and it wasn't from embarrassment.

When I returned I said, "Someone has seen me with a cassock on, and collar, walking up and down and recognised my face? Actually, it is not that easy to recognise faces in different situations. The phrase, 'I didn't recognise you with your clothes on,' is a joke with some truth."

He asked me: "Have you recognised anyone in the congregation as one of your former photographers?"

"Photographers are difficult to remember and recognise."

"They had their clothes on. You'd recognise them."

"They can keep them on."

"One has to see the funny side, although this could be serious."

"There were one or two group events I was in, and I couldn't possibly remember all of those blokes. That's when I met most other models, doing the same thing at the same time. It was good camaraderie. Sometimes we hung about in the office, clothed, or not, and chatted to punters to get work. Some liked to show me their photos but most didn't. One chap painted me from photos but wouldn't give me or even sell me one. I looked good painted inside a frame."

"Could it be him?"

"No, not him. Too nice."

"Sometimes it is the nice ones we worry about. How many of these photographs are floating around the local area then?"

I said, "There will be thousands."

"Thousands?"

"But the collections will be in tens and maybe a few hundred in some cases."

"Ten, twenty photographers?"

"Fifty, ninety?"

"Hmm. You see, had you just been an artists' model, then you might have been recognised in the street but drawings and paintings are hardly going to identify you. They might even be considered a bit more respectable."

"One or two of them in art class took photos. Some models wouldn't allow it but I didn't mind. I mean, I was often naked on the farm, if out of the way: this photographic side was good money, and fast, but even then I stopped this modelling. Here is a point, Colin: every one of those models I knew only removed their clothes for money. I would do it at a drop of a hat. It was money for nothing."

I gave him the photographs back.

"The chicks weren't free, were they?" he commented. "And did you ever wear a hat?," he asked, with a growing smile, and started looking more closely at the pictures again. "If you didn't care, showing yourself to all and sundry, and me now, why did you stop?"

"I'm not showing you now. I am clothed."

"I mean you're not bothered as I look at these. So why did you stop?"

"The studio owners thought I was too old, even though they considered including the mature. I don't wear hats. Being naked and wearing a hat rather defeats the point."

"Have you upset anyone lately?"

"Er... Actually, yes. Emily Symes doesn't like me."

"Why not?"

"Because he is a naturist and she came in when we were both naked."

"What?"

"She came in when Jeremy and I were together naked."

"What on earth were you doing? No wonder she was upset! You told me that you and him didn't get on. Now I hear it is something else. When the bishop said to us, 'be intimate,' he didn't mean get your clothes off."

"She does it as well! The problem is that he had been having an affair until recently and she was..."

"What? Jeremy? Am I supposed to know this? Is this even true?"

"Yes. I know the woman who was involved with him; I knew she was having an affair but not with whom."

"Good grief. Is she another one? Is she local?"

"Not local, but she is a member of one of our clubs. By the way, I changed my membership to a different one further away a year ago. So did she, maybe a year before me."

"I'm getting seriously worried about this part of the world," said Colin. "How would Emily Symes have any photos of you?"

"I don't know. I rather doubt it."

"Next thing you'll tell me is that he posed like you did."

(I noticed he did not question whether Jeremy or Emily were naturists. I'd assumed he knew.)

"Jeremy never came even to the college to pose, as far as I can remember. It's possible. Artists often draw and paint naturists."

"Life used to be so simple. The question is what to do about this."

I said, "I suppose someone in his parish could have given them to Emily to use against me. Yet, I can't imagine Emily Symes sending them to you, rather because she wouldn't find them embarrassing."

"Did she lay down any conditions regarding you meeting him?"

"Only to keep away from him."

"And have you kept away from him, one of your work colleagues?"

"Yes. I went nowhere near them at the Church Hall show."

"Where the assistant to the magician, an intelligent archaeologist, bared her breasts."

"At the back of the hall."

"Did you know she was going to do that? Did you encourage her to do that?"

"It's 'no' to both questions, Colin."

"Hmm. I am thinking, could we just keep a lid on this here? I don't want to tell the diocesan bishop, but given that the suffragan seems to be 'hands on' I ought to tell him. It is a question of avoiding blackmail, and he needs to be in the know."

"I can't see how I can be blackmailed."

"What happens if next week posters of you naked start appearing all over the town?"

"In an ideal world I'd just walk through the town naked."

"Have you noticed the temperature today?"

"Dad taught me to be robust."

"Your dad? The image this creates!"

"Don't be so surprised. Does Bishop Barman need to be told?"

"I think so. But what I will do is tell him that we ought to protect you and us from blackmail. When should I ring him?"

I said, "Do it now."

"He is often not available and may have to ring me back. But let's see."

So the desk phone was used, on the speakerphone, via a predial.

"Bishop of Bolingbroke, John Terence Barman here. I see it is your number, the Reverend Colin."

"It is."

"Greetings, greetings: always doing the work of the Lord. Echoey! Is someone there?"

"Yes. Linda Jupitas, Bishop. There is something delicate I have to inform you about. Your deacon is a victim here. She used to be a photographic model a dozen years ago. Some pictures of her from then have been sent to me and they arrived today. The photographs are naked and quite explicit."

"Oh dear. But let me wish her a happy birthday. Life begins at forty, Linda."

I said, "Thank you. The photographs aren't naked."

"What?" Colin asked. "What would you call them?"

"I was naked, in the photos."

Bishop John said, "She's something of a pedant, our deacon."

Colin said, "Bishop John, I'm worried about blackmail - against Linda but also against the Church."

"Yes indeed."

I said, "You already know it was something I did long before I even thought of being ordained."

"Are you upset about it?"

"No. I'm not bothered. Why now is a puzzle."

"You're not bothered?"

"No! I've said that to Colin. I don't care. I don't flaunt it, but I really do not care."

"Somebody may have recognised you, and perhaps thought Colin ought to know. Have you upset anyone lately?"

"Colin asked me this and I said Emily Symes. I went to shadow Jeremy's ministry and..."

"Ah yes, he is a naturist and he has been having an affair. I can guess what happened. You and he indulged in your shared ideology, got undressed and his wife is very sensitive at the moment."

"You are well informed, Bishop," I said. "Or very good at putting things together."

"It is my job to be well informed - and to put things together. Now there is a chap in Titansea who is called George Wickenby and he does investigating. I often ask him to look into things for me, especially when there is a risk to our beloved Church. So I might ask him if he can work out who may have sent these. Can you tell Colin to put them back as he received them in the post and I'll be in town a little later and will call in and collect them. You don't mind me seeing them, Linda?"

"Not at all. Colin, bishop: looking at them, some have a different hue. So I think there are five taken on one occasion and five taken on another. It could be a photographer who came back again - perhaps with different cameras involved."

With this insight the suffragan bishop ended the call. So the bishop would be oggling over my pictures. 'Enjoy,' I thought.

Colin said to me, "With any luck this will be an end to it. And, by the way, you do look very attractive, and I don't doubt you could still do it - but I would advise that clothes off is strictly private."

"There's what I do do. Thanks Colin."

"And the other thing is: no matter how we try to serve, we all have enemies. I think there is a Gospel message there. In fact it is the Gospel message."

"It is the very narrative," I said.

I went home and told Keith, once he came in. "Oh dear," he said, "the past can catch up with us. You didn't tell me the real reason you and Jeremy now have to stay at a distance but Emily helps the bishop at times."

"She was keeping the affair private."

"Someone else could be out to frustrate your ministry. Perhaps someone envious wanting to hold you in check, limit your potential. I think the same is happening to me at work. There is nothing but delay, delay, delay to getting this checking ourselves done. We need to be robust internally, but I can't see how they can handle every eventuality."

Keith's mind was elsewhere, obviously, than to worry about some photos. Yet, to be honest, the only person I could think who was envious of me in ministry and handled such photos of me was Keith himself!

He produced, for my birthday, a clingy, flesh-coloured dress. He knew all my measurements. I could wear it at those SMS gatherings.

Later in the evening there was a call from Colin Cromer. He said, "The bishop tells me that George Wickenby tells him that it is almost impossible to tell who sent the photos, not without the resources of the police. You could go to the police claiming harassment, although at the moment they are just photos. The sender may just be informing me, because one has to ask what kind of blackmail would an ordinary punter want regarding a parish church. So forget about it,' seems to be the advice."

Keith gave me a birthday fuck, which I really quite enjoyed. In my post-orgasmic state he took some photographs of me. Well, he was my husband. He then told me about a so-called 5D Porn cinema in Amsterdam with I think one film a time for eighteen customers only providing 3D vision, moving seats, air jets and water cannons to give more sensation to the sex scenes.

"What do you talk about at work?" I asked him, to no answer other than a grump.

Dogging and Electioneering (Saturday 6th April)

Nothing further happened regarding the photographs as the next few days passed. 'Who sent them?' I was wondering. Surely not Keith; hardly Emily Symes - she wanted a quiet life. Perhaps it was a one-time studio client, or even an envious fellow cleric. Jim Wilson, he was a forthright evangelical with forthright views about the blood of Christ and sin. How would he, an outsider, get hold of these photos? Presumably this George Wickenby had taken various possibilities into account, but he did not contact me over the matter.

In the dark I saw a host of cameras. On my back I raised my backside and lowered the window of my ageing car in the woods. One parishioner among the gathered cried out, "Get the film in to the vicar."

Film? I woke up. Saturday it was, and I picked up my dilators and worked myself under the duvet.

He said, "Fuck it. Saturday. I suppose I should enjoy it. It's just that next week investigating the investigations will finally begin. Do you want to go anywhere special, Linda?"

"What? I've already arranged for us to go away after your investigations.

Might have to cancel if it gets delayed again or extended."

"What about something local, now?"

I said, "Yes, I would like to go dogging in the woods."

He said, "You once said that having a dog or two would be an excuse to go for a walk."

"What?"

"We could take the neighbours'. Hmm, a dog-walking business. Some do that, you know."

Keith's knew what I'd meant. "Come on, I was joking." I then sniggered.

"Good because I don't want any pets. It takes responsibility and you get attached if it's your own, and you never know what is going to happen."

"What are you on about?"

"Animals are dependent on human longevity and long term commitment."

"You're hardly in line for an early death," I said. "You always were the dull pessimist. Dogging is a euphemism," I asserted.

"For what: special breeds, mongrels?"

"Keith, will you cut the bullshit? I've had a dream..."

"Please explain, now is the time."

"Phew. Keith, my dear: 'dogging' is humans having sex viewed by human strangers, located in the woods. Go in those copses and woods they replanted on Serninsea Marshes when we were born and you'll find people dogging."

"They celebrated our births by planting trees?"

"Fuck off."

"What do passers-by think, like, er, people walking their dogs?"

"Passers by are strangers in the night."

"Exchanging glances, then. At night, you say. How do you know?"

"I know. So do you. Pack it in."

"Not bestiality, then. Hey, where does that woman live? And she's got a friend with a dog."

"Fuck off again. If you know about bestiality, you know about dogging. They tend to leave their dogs at home."

"My father used to say he'd go and see a man about a dog and then he went to the pub or the betting shop."

"Yeah, quite. Respectable parents my arse."

"Do clergy walk in the woods?"

"No, I walk on pavements - into the library and other public spaces. Into the charity shop."

"At night?"

"Cheeses! The library is now only open during the day, and then not much. Volunteers now, you know. Same as at the charity shop."

"How do people see each other?"

"Through the empty bookshelves."

He said, "You're reading some informative books."

"You can't get them. I'm fed up with this dilating. Push, push, push."

"What's that woman called?"

"I've already said I'm not telling you."

Do they wind the window down like when a dog is left in the car?"

"Listen Cock: you wind the window down to stick your head out for some cock, Cock, or stick your arse out for some cock, Cock. Why are you playing the innocent, Cock? Perhaps you can't see the wood for the trees. If you had any wood, for that matter."

"Don't the police investigate cars with their windows wound all the way down, Cunt?"

"It's not illegal, winding your window down. It's the rest of it. At times the police go down in the woods."

He sang, "If you go down in the woods today, you're sure of a big surprise..."

"Not teddies having picnics. Poor old Henry Hall." I started laughing. "Meet me half way and stop this silliness."

"What on a dyke? Struth, not on a dyke, like a lezzy."

"Dykes have grassy mounds, you know. In a dyke's watercourse you're not seen, unless your viewer looks down from the mound. Come on, let's do something different," I said. "Even if it's indoors on the kitchen table."

"I seem to remember we went under the Christmas tree, on Christmas Day."

"We are more than half way through Lent," I pointed out.

"You're supposed to give things up in Lent."

"I'm not giving up fucking."

"On the kitchen table or under it?" he asked.

"We'll not do dogging, we'll do cerealing."

Unfortunately, the subsequent sexual exercise with me on my front across the kitchen table over spread out corn flakes was interrupted, and not by the need for breakfast. The doorbell rang.

I said, "Oh shit, a fucking parishioner and on a Saturday as well. Wipe the fucking table."

With some corn flakes knocked off I put a dressing gown on rather than a cassock.

At the door was a short stature man with a Liberal Democrat rosette on. Councillor Rhys Allen. Oh, and a dog. I was furious.

He said, merrily, "Local elections."

"Well over a month away."

"You folk here are down as supporters. Em, Reverend Keith Jupitus and Mrs. Jupitus."

Bending to pat his dog and giving the man a very good view of my cleavage and breasts, and then standing up and looking down into his face, I said, "I am the reverend here and my husband is Mr. Jupitas, thank you."

"'As' not 'us'. Sorry. And can we rely on your lack of support again? Your support?"

I lost my cool. "Right first time! I still remember when you lot stole my vote. For years you were even to the left of a right wing Labour party and look what happened: you became the wooden leg for the nastiest Tory government ever seen, and so allowing in the anti-European one that followed. I will never forget what you did, and people were forced to work in any shitty job going. You attacked the poor. You demonised those without work."

I patted the dog again as it looked a bit worried.

"So your support is swinging? We did stop a lot of Tory movement back in that time."

"Look at the jobs people do now, how they add jobs together and try to struggle on, how so much now is linked to gambling and sex. You're a student and it's debt, you want to live somewhere and you get debt, people are in credit card debt. Benefits are frozen and life is shit. The economy is an illusion - debt. So goodbye and take your lovely dog with you."

"Well, have a pleasant day, Reverend Mrs. Jupitits - as... Oh."

So after I slammed the door I told Keith still in the kitchen to make me a drink.

"A long time ago," he said. "I've cleaned the table."

"It has framed the economy ever since, and distorted the local economy." I took the gown off and sat down. He sat with nothing on like me, until it dawned on him to dress and do some preparatory work and open a message from the SMS Chair, Sir Sanjay Bunker.

"Oh no," he said. "They are delaying things even more. They are going to investigate everyone; they really are looking for new and innovative ideas about how to investigate more thoroughly."

"You look barking mad, ha ha."

Extempore Sermon (Fifth Lent Sunday 7th April)

After the main morning service Colin told me that the Suffragan Bishop Barman had informed Colin after "mutually informative conversations" on someone suitable to be my confessor. Well, no conversation with me. Apparently this new chap was already doing the confessor role with a number of priests and deacons. Colin said, "Short notice is always best - keeps us on our toes. Extempore sermon tonight: no notes. Twelfth of April you can be creative with a Lent discussion evening when they can gather in your house."

I then took myself to the corner of the road nearest Ingle Under Drain, a narrow dyke that went up to Ingle Top Drain and then out to the sea. I walked down the footpath with a towel to the bridge, sat down on its bank, in that its arch offered a modicum of privacy. I left my clothes and towel actually under the footbridge and went for a swim south west against the drain's managed flow.

Within seconds of swimming beyond the bridge, there was a woman my age on the bank. "Sorry," I said, because she could obviously see my arse. I swam on.

After ten minutes I turned and went back.

In the car, dried and clothed, I fell asleep. When I woke the clock in the car showed that I had to rush directly to the church for Evensong.

As I drove I was talking to myself. I said to myself that I just can't communicate. I liked the pastoral side, but what was it trying to achieve? I hardly believed it, the dogma. I checked some biblical references; I didn't need to make those biblical references. On top of this was the fear that people I met might report me for activities incompatible with maintaining propriety.

I went to the Evensong, because it was my job. Outside the church I attacked my hair with my longstanding favourite brush. I went in and prepared, quickly. My need for the toilet meant I was ready and present only at the moment the service started. This was an Evensong with, as ever now, no choir support. Colin led it well enough, but low numbers suggested little future.

My moment arrived to go up into the pulpit for the supposedly unscripted sermon.

"I pray my words are acceptable. Amen." I reckoned I was nervous.

"I've been asked to take this sermon without any notes. I ought to base it on the Gospels. So I am reflecting on a reading Mark 6, sometimes called 'The Rejection of Jesus at Nazareth' in some titled versions. The one where he's no good at home. I'm also reflecting on John's Gospel that offers a number of challenges, on the face of it. That's, er, chapter 6 verses 51 to 57. Jesus is saying, apparently, if you eat his flesh and blood you live forever, as it comes from heaven, whereas in previous eating you died. The location for Mark 6 there is Capernaum, which I think is significant, if he was born and raised there, and the teaching is complex, difficult, and Jesus wonders about this, even if it offends. The spirit gives life, he says, and the material doesn't, in John. He sort of said that before, didn't he, in some Bible passage I forget now where someone asks him if he's an idiot: you know: you don't get back into the womb so how are you going to be born again, ha ha, and he says you're born again in the Spirit. Ooh, sounds a bit Gnostic perhaps - where the spiritual becomes predominant. Anyway, in this passage about eating his flesh and blood there's a strange reversal of the usual 'no one gets to the father except through him' moment, as now, here, we have: no one gets to Jesus except via the Father. The disciples wobble but have no one else to associate with who is the holy one.

"Hmm. Well. I don't think this is Jesus talking at the time in his thoroughly Jewish context. It is indeed John's gospel going off in that Gnostic direction and resisting that at the same time. We should see that resistance side as important. So the material world is being rejected, and though these people are eating a material Eucharist, it comes from heaven, rather as ours was blessed this morning, as it always is. The Gnostics favoured the real heavenly over the material sinful. But on the Mark 6, a clue I think is Capernaum, which is home territory and where Jesus's message is little accepted, being among those who think he's a bit off his trolley for a local lad. That's the Mark 6 bit. And the spiritual Jesus is approached through the Father, the Father being God and of the Spirit. Something like that. They didn't believe in the Trinity then, and I mean the early Christians who were writing this stuff.

"Erm, let's face it. we are often rejected in our own localities. It's a risk for me being here, because this is my locality. Some of you know about my past but keep quiet. I appreciate that. Then there are secrets from others. There always are. A chap once told me you don't have to tell all in order to be whole - with a 'W'. I'm not breaking any confidences. If I was elsewhere my baggage would be more securely locked away. Even then, none of us are wholly known. I bet Jesus had a few surprises even for his locals there in Capernaum.

"There is something odd that the big Roman city of Sepphoris about four miles from Nazareth never gets a mention in the New Testament, and yet Jesus as a builder like his dad must have worked there. Secrets, eh? Oh I think it means Birdy, or rather the original Jewish name of Zippori for the place, so beautiful Sepphoris was like a Bird on the Hill or perhaps people did their kind of Birdie Song. The regional capital it was, for official business, and not a mention."

When I looked at people, I realised I'd gone locally muddled. I was being ineffective. Carry on!

"So what do we take from this, assuming I am about right on this? And I am open to challenge. Oh, er, this passage in John follows on from the feeding of the five thousand, which is itself a Eucharistic reference given as a miracle. That's a stumbling block for many, on its own. Understanding this is complex, and even more complex when you realise the Gnostic is being resisted. You are bound to wonder what's the point and is it too difficult and difficulty can well be another block to belief. Well it might be, and that is the wobble, but the argument is there's nowhere else to go. You have to tackle the difficult part. On the other hand, you can just eat and drink the spiritual food, and that is not too difficult. The praxis, the doing, is open to everyone. So those of us who like a challenge can have that challenge, but those who prefer it just as it is are included too. But it is worth tackling the difficult stuff because that is about understanding and we ought to try. Amen."

Colin said to me when I sat down, "What I understood I didn't like. At least we now say the creed."

I went home and took hold of the gifted second hand vibrator, in the lounge. I'd been apart from Keith all day, and this use maintained the separation a while longer.

Anglo-Saxon Village (Monday Afternoon 8th April)

After visiting around this ancient village I was in, I found myself sewing with course thread outside the door of a wattle and daub house with a fire inside it being used for cooking. It became dark, rapidly, but with strong moonlight coming down. I could smell the aroma and smoke going through the thatch behind me. Some people in the woods beyond were audibly having sex - where my man and I had copulated while the wolves howled nearby. He returned home and I went on home visits. I found one fertile woman indoors mounted by a wolf and promptly walked out.

Sat outside the door of my home, it was warm and I had nothing on. After a diversion of combing my hair with an antler comb, I resumed sewing by the moonlight. My man was inside, doing the cooking.

A naked woman in the distance finished drawing me on some sackcloth using burnt wood. She approached me and it was very good. She was busty and broad hipped and long haired, and I could feel my sex producing liquid as before with my man. Then she was gone and I wondered where I might find her.

Three farming men in rough, brownish clothing approached me. I recognised one as young Adam Magellan, one as young Geoff Virgo and one as Colin Cromer. Colin asked me, "Madam, how will the harvest be?"

"The sun," I said, "is best responding when it is half way round. I cannot tell you now. Send me the Serninsea Wizard and the twins after I've set out my altar on the ground as the sunlight returns."

He continued, "But madam, you are the chosen one for naked, priestly, witchery, acts."

The naked artist suddenly appeared at my side, looked at these people, and was gone again in a flash of purple. The men could see that my vagina was oozing liquid on to the ground.

I said to them, "When the sun is over that tree, I will be ready."

So these three farmers went away, and I put down my sewing, and next coming were two twins with the Wizard - Bishop Barman - and it was now light, being the next day and the altar was ready.

"Are these two women here within your control?" I asked the wizard.

"Yes. And I have these drawings of them naked to prove this. They were by an artist in purple and, after all, you are a model and a witch."

"And when will you take both of the twins on to you to have your babies so that I may drink these twins' milk of magic and power?"

"You may borrow their breasts now; I will give you my power through them."

I said, in response, "This is acceptable, as the universe began borrowing - for which it has never been repaid until the dark takes its revenge."

He left, taking his drawings, and both young women stood before me, and took off their loose animal skin tops to reveal their breasts.

I said to them, "These are not milk filled but I can borrow now to drink what you do not have. In return, I will treat your Wizard to the pleasures."

"He killed our first wizard," said one of them, "and took his place."

I sucked on each of the four breasts, and milkiness dribbled from my mouth - my own vagina turned into a clay pot and caught the dribbles. Now I knew I could make my altar offering.

After feeding me plenty, the women moved to the side. The three farmers of before returned and I explained that if my six amber beads and six garnets thrown into the air landed in majority to a position earlier than the sun's path, then the harvest would be in hot and wet conditions; the worst position being opposite to that (our north east) which would mean a cold, dry and unproductive harvest. It would be drier more east, wetter more west, colder more north. The amber, I said, was the sun with us, and the garnets represented the distance travelled.

"Til death us do part," said the farmer like Adam Magellan.

I told these farmers that a gift of the future was useless for me without a material sacrifice, and I expected to receive the produce of part of a pig. This was promised to me, on pain otherwise of terrible suffering to their bodies and souls. The animal would take on their sin and prevent their suffering, so they simply had to bring it later.

After a blessing I threw my valuable indicators up and they landed in a general eleven o'clock or north-north westerly position.

"The sun is happy with us," I told them, "and the water will come. All shall be well and all manner of things shall be well. Look after your crops especially carefully; the sun will have pity upon you."

The farmers each thanked me and left.

I could smell the smoke behind me this time, and my man was shouting, "I can smell burning. Can you smell burning?"

He was, I realised, calling from the front room where his papers were all over the floor. I rose from the sofa near the large lounge door and ran into the kitchen to see that toasting slices containing cheese were smoking heavily and beyond scraping. The imitation vegetarian bacon I was trying in the cooker was burnt to a crisp, not unlike real bacon.

Turning it all off, I realised I needed to go and dived into the nearby loo.

Once back in the kitchen, hands washed of course, I made some sandwiches. Real bacon I'd use next time. Being ethical is a bit of an effort, even in these food manufactured times.

"Bugger it," I said in a loud voice. "I've not got long before I meet this new confessor this evening. See, Keith, you can come home and switch off. I often have to work in the evening as well."

"What do you think I've been doing? You were the one falling asleep, dreaming away again I take it. Was I in it?"

"Yes. You were inside an Anglo-Saxon hut."

"Sexy?"

"No. I was outside our hut. I sucked on breasts on yet to be pregnant women - those archaeology twins - and collected milk in my vagina for the altar table. I was the witchery, priestly woman."

"I think you should see your new confessor," Keith said. "This evening would be a very good time."

"It is this evening. It's supposed to be my day off."

"I came home to work this afternoon and they know I'll carry on past my hours until it's all done."

"A woman was drawing me, but I think these pictures were really photographs."

"They definitely didn't have cameras in the Anglo-Saxon era," he said.

"Not sure what I am going to say. Did I even tell you I had a new confessor?"

"Well, I can't see from where else I could have got the information."

"I told you about the photos."

"You did. Stress must be affecting your memory as well as providing dreams."

"Well, I'll eat, dress a bit formally and go and see this man."

Confessor Meeting (Monday Evening 8th April)

Confessors are rarely psychotherapists or counselling professionals. Colin Cromer, my training incumbent, didn't have one when he was a curate, but found one as vicar from one of his college tutors, and he remained as his confessor until he died some years ago. He was not replaced. It's best if they are not a friend or previously well known. This expected one I knew of vaguely, with a parish some twenty-five miles away.

My clerical collar was on, but I was in a light blue clerical blouse and darker blue trousers. This 'ordinariness' for the evening was a bit unusual in church, as often I just threw on a black or white cassock. There was no bra on underneath, of course.

I was waiting in the vestry when he breezed in, and I put down my hairbrush. The vestry gave us privacy.

"Jupiter, Linda. Yes. Wow."

"No."

"I don't think we've met before; I have a rural parish away west driving east. I went to look at the beach, you know."

"Jupitas. My surname is Jupitas."

"Ah, not a good start if yer get yer name wrong," he said, being a small, roundish man, balding with curly rising hair, all in black and clerical collar. His accent was between estuary something and proper Anglican. (From college onwards we clergy start to acquire an Anglican accent. However, this chap seemed to muddle his accents.)

"I'm the Reverend Kenneth Osis, and I do a number of these counsellings as asked by Bishop Terry. Some of you call him Bishop John but some of us use his middle name. You call him..."

"Bishop John Barman."

"Sorry this is the evening. So busy these days, day times. And in a cramped vestry."

"It's fine by me; it is a workplace."

"The point is, I suppose, around our proscenium, I'm close to the control room, to yer working centre of things, where the deputy stage manager goes, and decisions are made - and I hear the decisions early. You know, like. Have yer a drink?"

"Coffee is available."

"Alcoholic I'd prefer."

"There's only the communion wine here. Proscenium?"

"It's not a drink, it's a stage."

"I know that much."

"I'll do without," he said, not making eye contact with my eyes but with my chest. "Yes. No. I've some juices. Want one?"

He'd gone! I waited. He came back and gave me a small carton with straw attached.

Straws detached and pierced in, we started sucking and saying nothing.

I asked, "So is anything I say here likely to reach the bishop?" not expecting anything other than a denial.

He said, instead, "We're starting so I'd like to pray. Please, you pray with me. Father God, descend your Holy Spirit and so bring to this our first meeting the honesty that our hearts can be opened, in Christ's name. Amen. It's not the business of yer bishop."

I hate it when there is no gap between a prayer and the following sentence. He was leaning over, his jacket had come forward, and behind to the side on his clerical shirt was a white plastic badge with a black goose centred and a white B over it. He seemed to have a lot of paper folded and stuffed in an internal jacket pocket.

He went on, "What I would urge you to do, however, is get close to him. The control booth he's in directs the stagecraft. Yer proscenium is where the action takes place."

I said, a little puzzled, "One's representative promise is to the diocesan, I think."

My chest obviously fascinated him. "That's right but the stage manager is at the wings, unseen, so in yer control room Bishop Terry has his finger on the pulse. He knows where so many are, to know the difference between the house beyond the front of house, what's the actuality." Removing these papers from inside his jacket, and unfolding them to read, revealing the badge again, he said, "Hey, your husband called Keith was promoted inside SMS."

Yeah. So you are his representative here?"

"Your husband's?"

"No, Bishop Barman." (This guy was nuts.)

"Yes, Bishop Terry. Well, no - I'm just saying. To give the ground-rules, then, what I say, what we say, goes no further than this room and the two of us. I mean, you can expect a curate to leak a little of what is said - that's only obvious if ye're beginning - but yer must, quickly, get into the practice of being able to say nothink at all from confidential meetings. Now, first of all, someone has sent your training incumbent compromising photos of you."

I looked at him directly and he did look up to see me stare. "How do you know about them?"

He said, "A source."

"You read it in those papers."

"To inform me."

"I don't even know if who sent them is a Church type."

"I suppose it is all under investigation."

"Is it? I thought it wasn't."

"All I want to know is, like the journalist's no-no question, 'How do you feel?' I'm talking about the photos."

"I feel all right."

"Really? Shouldn't you be concerned?"

"I really don't care. Seriously."

"You're not worried that someone is trying to undermine your ministry, or take away your confidence to do it, or even try to blackmail you?"

"If your source is Colin Cromer, then you'll know I'm unconcerned. My concern is my preaching, my communicating."

"Oh, you and hundreds of others. Look, you can call me Ken. It could simply be someone who took yer photos and said to the vicar, like, you should know this."

"I've just said..."

"It's actually advantageous I don't know you, and all I have is these papers as a report."

"Can I see them?"

"Can't show you. But, er, let me find... Hang on. Well, they liked your early sermons, but perhaps yer built a tension wi' yer congregation. Doubt is important - no growth without doubt - but is doubt a problem?"

I said, "It can be, if I think my views are not Church views when I'm representing the diocesan bishop and the Church."

He was looking at my chest again.

He said, "By a long chalk Wytham is no fundy-mentalist but he is theologically well-read, an' in fact Bolingbroke and Scredington are moderate men. Bolingbroke has a progressive edge: he wants more women clergy. He wants you to come into the control booth, where it's at."

"Some of my friends don't like him, often after very brief encounters. Keith, you mentioned, is becoming even dismissive."

"Keith? Is he?"

"I think so."

"Well... He's forthright, you see."

"Who is forthright? My husband or the suffragan bishop?"

"The bishop. But in any case we're here to discuss you, not him. Idealist, naturist, liberal - is that unfair? You don't match Church expectations. Like yer reaction to them photos."

I responded: "Naturists are naturists in appropriate circumstances, such as on holiday, or with particular friends; I'm an idealist, yes, but I don't flaunt it."

"Some know, some don't."

"There are those who need to know, those I like to know, those who used to know, and those I do it with: they obviously do know."

He really was staring at my chest rather than my eyes.

I asked, "Could you look at my eyes, please?"

"What's wrong with them?"

"When you talk to me."

"Oh. Ah! So you would be happy if, say, and I'm not proposing it, we both were undressed and were in conversation, like, in the nuddy?"

"Do you want me to take my top off? Hello!"

"Like, this would be normal, would it, for you? I'm not asking. Like them photos were normal. Our Bishop of Bolingbroke may even approve of your confidence."

"Hang on. Have you seen them?"

"I mean in actually being photographed all confident like. Hmm. It's what you're saying. Yer naturism, like naturism among clergy, like."

"Among clergy?"

"You didn't get on with Jeremy Symes. He's one of your lot izzen he?"

"What do you mean, 'my lot'?"

"Gettin' yer clothes off like."

"Naturists do it naked."

"Things went wrong there when you got yer togs off."

"Can't discuss that. How do you know? Oh it's in that report on me. How does it know?"

"Can't discuss that. So it's a point to ask about your family. They're in Wales, I see. Do they still do it?"

"Do what?"

"Go around naked? Bit cold."

"Yes, of course."

"Can't imagine you seeing your own dad's, em..."

"Penis."

"Yer Mother's, you know..."

"Vulva, and lots of pubic hair."

"You haven't got..."

"I what?"

"Forget that then."

"Well, your report must be detailed - even down to me having a hairless fanny? Assuming that is correct, is a hairless fanny important for a clergywoman?"

He looked further down at my crotch area.

He said, "About your family. Em, families imprint."

"What about your family? Hang on, the source for your notes must have seen the sent photos. That narrows it."

"I'll tell you: I've had difficult family deaths to deal with, last year."

"I'm sorry to hear it."

"No, I won't discuss it."

"Conversation is two-way, Ken."

"Um, my brother committed suicide; my father died. But we go on, as we can."

Now what else is in here?"

"Do you have advice for me regarding preaching?"

"It says there are commercial secrets, pastoral secrets and personal secrets and we are entitled to these even when close to the control booth. Just a minute. There's the strong bias these days to be evangelical."

"Are you?"

"I have a Baptist colleague, very nearby, the nearest I have to someone to socialise with, and he keeps me sharp. Does Colin keep you sharp?"

"He instructs me."

"Colin knows the ropes, he's been in the central crossover, gone around the wings."

I was beginning to think he was stark raving mad, and he was looking at my chest again.

"Ken, again: my brain is in my head, my ears are lower either side and my mouth is on my face. Thank you. The parish has grown around him. It's his. He's seen those photos, and he'll have passed them on."

"I'd put liberals in evangelical colleges, and I think I'd put the odd evangelical into a liberal college too, although I don't want to undermine them."

"Okay."

He was shuffling through these papers again.

"Now the wider suggestion is that your marriage isn't as good as it seems to be, that your husband is not as supportive as he was."

"From a hairless fanny to a crap marriage? I'd like to read those papers."

"Only that having a good marriage can be a solid basis for a ministry."

"You don't."

"Good if you have one, but not if it's going luke-warm."

"He still supports me; it's the Church he is more luke-warm about. There is nothing wrong with our marriage."

"But is he not giving comfort then about yer faith and works?"

"Faith and what?"

"Sex, I suppose. If it's not too personal a question."

"How much more personal can it get? Our sex life is terrific."

"What do you detect?"

"Look, Ken, he is faithful and loyal to me. But he has his own busy job and concerns, especially now. He's pragmatic, practical and also mathematically minded."

"See, I'd say, if you have stress, it's better to relieve it in sex than in alcohol. Saint Paul said..."

"Oh, come on!"

"I mean, there's several options like yer pan o' water's going cold, or it's simmering, or yer kettle's on and off, or yer boilin' away almost all the time, like - and the water disperses as steam."

"It's like an express steam train with water scooped in. Perhaps we should have a dialogue here."

"No. Not being single."

"Why not?"

"People think this and that."

I said, "There's a single woman minister for the UPCC here, since the 1980s."

No one thinks anything odd about her other than she's a good, faithful, serving minister."

"Okay, what's good for the goose... So I'm single and the job doesn't help. You can't meet people in your own congregations easily because yer have yer professional relationship, and it's hard to find outsiders 'cause the role is like 'you're weird' these days. And then we clergy have to observe them rules about marriage being the only place for sex. Or at least show discretion. But, again, this bishop understands, truly understands, showing appearances that need to be shown. He wants you into the stagecraft, sees your potential."

(We were back to that again.)

"Marriage as appearance. I think that is acting and stagecraft!"

"But I met this woman and, boy she's been strong, and was a new relief, new fun even, stagecraft if yer like. But she is into the control booth..."

"She is into the control booth? What, the same one as Bishop Barman? He's single too. He's often seen with a lady. Are we going to get an announcement?"

"It's not about me, or her, or him," the confessor stated. "You must have made impressions in the past."

"I've never made any impressions of my sex life. My sex life is in there? How does anyone know anything about my sex life?"

"It doesn't know... It is confidential."

"Who sees this paper? You, obviously. Where's it all come from?"

Now he was looking down at these gripped loose papers. "Yeah, yer have to be careful where this report goes."

"Try me as a destination."

"It gives me a starting point."

"Well, I wouldn't start from here."

"Where from? Your married life?"

"Well, for your information, about my sex life: he bangs me every night until I'm exhausted. Photos, my hairless fanny, my married life, my sex life?"

"Yer sex life is different from yer married life?"

"No it is not. This is just so wrong."

"It's always updated."

"Update it then. Actually: bin it."

"I can't update it because what we've said is confidential. And... Oh, yes, doing evening work. Do you sleep well?"

"I sleep very well because Keith knackers me with sex. I don't know how I get my energy back because he's like an animal. This little drink might help. Finished. Louise Deimos never showed or indicated any 'papers' on me. This is our supposedly progressive bishop, then. I bet he viewed those photos over and over again. No wonder people dislike him."

"So you are front of house now, with the public, but check out with Bishop Terry the areas people only see when they're involved in the stagecraft."

I still couldn't get quite what this bonkers individual was on about. "So, what is your role then? You're on the inside but you don't report back?"

"That's right. I have information and I ask you, but I don't report back."

"You are in the control booth."

"No. The Assistant Director controls access."

"Who's that?"

"Bishop Terry, as I'm saying."

"The director being Derek Imperial?"

"Well..."

"But if you can't contribute, how does this report get updated?"

"It sort of all gets there eventually."

"It's nowhere near now."

"Nor should you approach yer training incumbent or bishop directly to have it changed. All ye're then doing is breaking the meeting's confidentiality."

"This is ridiculous. Hello, I'm up here! Suppose I was in imminent danger. Suppose, say, I knew who sent those photos and he was out to damage me publically."

"Do you? Is he?" he asked.

"No. Just supposing. Status Quo."

"What? It wouldn't be status quo would it?"

"Can't I puzzle you for a change?"

"I suppose I can raise the alarm, but I won't say where the fire has started."

"Not much point, then."

"But you and I can try and put it out."

"Hey, look, how does one get into the control booth, as you call it?"

"Submit to the bishop, keep all confidences; realise the need for keeping up appearances."

"Mrs. Bucket."

"What?"

"Never mind."

"Enjoy what happens and realise the important connections. Accept the invitations when they come."

I asked, "Do you not realise that Serninsea is a backwater and that we no longer have a theatre? Wytham is for that."

"Time's up," he said, like some paid counsellor, and tried his straw in the carton one last time.

I asked him. "Before you go. What are the negatives regarding this control booth? Would one want to stay outside?"

"Good question, if you can stay outside. There are no negative consequences because it's like: controlling the lights, the sound, the scenery, the technical stuff. It's exciting, pleasurable, with the actors and staff. Must go."

"There's a bin there for your carton, straw, and those papers."

"I'll keep the papers." He then got up and went away like a rocket!

I was just gobsmacked. This little man was a raving nigmenog. A cabbage head at counselling, he was yet the suffragan bishop's choice and I needed to know why. And I'd meant to ask him about the goose badge with a B instead of a G.

I locked up and went home. I had a new view of Bishop Barman as a scamp and a rascal.

Shopping and Near Ingle Barrow (Tuesday 9th April)

It was never a burden to visit the library, and to say hello to the staff. Yet again there was nothing to read. In any case, to borrow a book created the burden of taking it back before forgetting. I was still going over the nutter confessor session.

Sometimes shopping is a burden and sometimes a pleasure. Compared with that confessor session, today's was a pleasure. Serninsea had a couple of near-hypermarkets, one off Carr Fen about the old Sutton-on-Serninsea station (a new tram stop) and one not far from George Wickenby's place. There were also the usual discount stores. I was at a discount store at Titansea in my white cassock.

Coming back to my car with a trolley full, the car next to me - a four by four, a changed vehicle since my arrival - had its boot open and shopping visible inside. A youngish woman was sat sideways at her steering wheel with her smooth legs sticking out from her scissors-cut shorts. She was 'dialling' on her mobile phone.

"Fuck this," she said. "Oh, sorry, lady vicar."

I said, "Hello. I'm Linda."

"Linda... Jupitas?"

"Yes, indeed. Well done."

"Stephen!"

I said, "I'll leave you to it."

"Stephen. The car won't start. There's fucking frozen food here."

"Look," I said, "I can give you a lift if you need it. Or give me an address and I'll take your shopping."

"Oh, Stevie, there's the reverend woman here, Linda Jupitas herself... What?"

"I'm not that well known."

"Look, the car needs sorting out. The fucker won't start. Yes! Linda Jupitas - Linda Jupitas is right here offering to give me or my fucking shopping a lift."

"Both together," I said.

"You coming here then? A couple of hours? Well, fucking make sure you do, because there is a one and a half hour limit here - though they won't check it that often. So you'll arrange it all? Hey, I'm taking up her offer. She'll be coming to ours."

Thus the simple t-shirt and shorts wearing shopper transferred her food into my car.

"Sorry, I need a piss from all that worry."

So she went in front of her own vehicle, blocking the view from the shop, with only a little hedge behind her before the road, and she relieved herself very noisily. I couldn't see her, but also looked away.

She said to me, standing up, "You could have shielded me from that road."

"Sorry," I said. "I'll try and remember to be more helpful in future. Do you know me? I mean, I suppose my name was added to the church noticeboard."

"You're famous."

(Now I needed to go, but sitting in the car offered resistance.)

So I drove off with my acquired passenger and extra goods towards the car park exit. "Why am I famous?"

"You're the curate with attitude."

"What attitude? Have I got a reputation?"

"People talk about you."

"What do they talk about? Hang on, let me get on this busy road."

"I don't know why. Anyway, what's a person like you doing at a place like that?" she asked.

"Making my money go further."

Helen told me that she went there for the basics, and got choice from one of the larger supermarkets. I said I went there for everything.

She was telling me that she lived just north of Ingle Barrow, on the road west of the dyke, where a number of rather posh houses were built with six double bedrooms each. She said that sand got everywhere in winter or when windy.

My apparent fame and reputation was even more puzzling, because this was outside Serninsea and she did not seem to be a local who would know my past. But when I pressed her on what she knew about me, she just repeated that I was famous. I had to let it go.

Instead, to make general conversation while driving along, I told her the history of women coming late into all the ministries within our branch of the Universal Church, starting in 1994.

Back on the phone she said to her husband, "Stop your wanking and get to the car. Well, it's as wasteful as wanking."

Arriving at her driveway, she offered me hospitality once inside her large house. She told me to bring my shopping in for now, for the reason that this rather exclusive house had a cold room - a large larder indeed - set up like a fridge, so it actually had heat removal that went (using a switch) either outside or elsewhere within the house for energy efficiency. Her husband had constructed this room: he was a plumber, a trained blacksmith and even a jeweller. She was a designer. Helen had no cleavage and her nipples were obvious through her t-shirt, possibly responding to the instant cold. Her legs were long, bare and unprotected. Inside the cold room she poured me an orange juice and, finding our way to her warmer lounge, she found a whisky for herself. The house drew most of its energy from roof solar panels and a small wind turbine.

I asked her, "Could you please tell me where I can find a toilet? I'm so sorry to have to ask. They don't have them in discount stores."

After the personal business, we two progressed to the back of the house, and very visible was a large brick shed-like building on the right hand side half-way down the long garden. There was no view beyond the garden because of the dyke banking.

There was a drain right by the sea, she told me. Residents could get directly on to the public beach. Each had a back gate, steps up, a simple footbridge over the dyke, and more steps down to the sand. "The banks were made high, but they don't stop rough seas and their waves crashing into our gardens."

So, Helen grabbing a key from one of some hooks of keys, led the way out of the house and into this long back garden. I looked back and could see, yes, this was definitely a very roomy house. She said it had a sauna room, and Stephen made that as well, but better for on a colder day. Down the garden, she unlocked and opened the doors of this out-house: it was a forge.

I said, "I guess he can even make his own pipes!"

More than this. He could make sculptures. He could also do the very small and high value: metal objects with ornamentation. I thought those Wickenby twins might be interested in such a place for experimental archaeology.

"He's called Stephen. He doesn't do kilter and rammel. Talented in every department."

"What's your surname?" I asked.

"McPhail. I help him out with a bit of craft, but mainly I have ideas of what he can produce. Look at my rings: I designed them but they were all crafted by Stevie."

"So is this talent, what, an interest or a business?"

"Plumbing is his main job, but he makes big things, small things. I like to design small and big. Rings, brooches, sculptures, and some things to spice up personal enjoyment. We have rings in private places."

"Oh aye."

"Not that you'd be into that I don't suppose."

"You think?" I asked. (I thought of that supposed report!)

Helen shut the doors and locked them. I said, "Thanks for showing me." We wandered further down the garden.

"Well, there are some randy clergy, I've heard, Linda. What's your speciality, Linda?"

"What, in sex?"

"If you like. You have a lovely body. Ideas, 'ologies'?"

I thought, she does know more than she is letting on.

"Phuh. Just a curate. At university I did some Sociology, Religious Studies. Met my husband Keith at university."

"Ah yeah."

"Do you know him?"

"SMS isn't he?" she asked.

"How do you know?"

"Stevie does the plumbing - and he does your Bishop Barman."

"Two connections," I said.

"So what was your maiden name?"

"Bode."

"Bodylicious?"

"Er, meaning?"

"Full of body, I think."

"Am I 'full of body?'"

"In places. I was Helen Hall who married Stephen McPhail. I'm really like a 1950s housewife. Bore his children. Lie on the beach beyond this garden. Lie in the garden. Get a tan. Design is a hobby only. Sorry, Reverend Linda, but it's fuck my husband and do the shopping.

I first met him at FUCC..." (It sounded like 'fuck'.) "...and we had fun. I met him again like in one of those crappy films. He was a plumber's mate and called with his boss to fix my parents' boiler. It wasn't quite on top of the washing machine - he rang the number he had seen on our phone and I went out with him."

"Why didn't he do jewellery, high value items for a job?"

"Were not like them Romans, Celts, Saxons or Vikings," she said. "There's no Hatton Gardens in our county of Foss. The forge is his interest."

At the bottom of the garden we went through the gate, to hold the rail and go up these steps on the banking. Next was the narrow wooden slats footbridge across a deeper water channel. We then went down the steps without a handrail, with much more sand on them. We arrived on the beach.

I said, "I swim in dykes. Wild swimming."

"Like that Alice Roberts? Can't really swim in that one. And why would you, when there's all that sea?"

The beach was broad, with seawater through in several muddy channels. To the south was vehicle and pedestrian access on to the beach, and further to the south pedestrian only access. There were no buildings at Ingle Barrow itself, except the further inland but sandy grassy mound with a small church on top. South of that was more sand, both sides of the continuing dyke flowing north.

"People come down here because it is secluded, but we've got a security camera now as the garden is too accessible."

I said in response, "My family did come down here when these houses weren't here. We didn't come as much as we might. The sand isn't the best."

"It can be muddy just underneath. You mean naked as well?"

"Er... The family. Yes."

"Let's get them off, then. Up for it? It's sheltered here. Some sun."

She was undressing, but, in my case, the collar removed and he cassock off and over my head meant instant nakedness.

Both of us stood, she said, "Well, you fucking exhibitionist."

"No, I'm not," I said. "Until I removed this, you didn't know."

"But you know," she said, removing her shoes and speeding off her clothes. "Nice body. Bodylicious."

"Thank you. I don't care for the sand but I'll do it," I replied.

"Never mind that: my tits are so flat in comparison! And your cunt is so clear."

"You're neat. But it's all irrelevant. I'll lie on the sand, but try and place much of my hair on my cassock. There is the mud below this sand." I removed my shoes and looked south down the beach.

"If you get mucky and I do we can have a shower together," she said. She didn't seem backwards in coming forwards. "You can stay while I wash your cassock, if necessary."

I said, "Secluded we are but I can see, just about, down there, a person with a red costume on and long red hair."

"You've got good eyesight. Like an elongated red blob? We can walk if you like."

"Like this?" I asked.

"Don't be a chicken, Linda."

"I can assure you I am not a chicken. If you want to walk down there, I will as well, and like this. But I'd prefer to rest and appreciate what we have here."

"Of course."

We lay down. I shut my eyes. Within a few minutes, her mobile was ringing again and it was pressed against her ear.

"He's on his way back. He was teasing me. He went straight to the car. We'd better wait for him."

"I'm not going anywhere. My dad taught me: 'Be naked in the wind, in the cold, in the rain,' so I learnt to resist wind and rain. I didn't quite manage the cold. You know, you've only just met me, and whilst I'd like to attract you to my church..."

"No chance," she said.

She said, "I need a pee. It is only sand." And she moved on to her side and the pee just came out on to the sand.

"You're like my father."

"In what way?"

"Just pissing."

"I need to go, so I go."

"I could, again."

"Do it then."

"Just a little one." So I got up, moved nearer the grass bank, squatted and relieved myself. She watched me do it. Oh, well. I went back to lie down again, placing much of my hair back on cloth. All she'd done was roll back, so her piss on the sand was drying alongside her.

Without further conversation, I got dreamy lying there, and she was as silent. After perhaps twenty minutes, I heard a noise. I opened my eyes. A man was looking down on us.

"Fuck me, is this our clergywoman, Helen?"

"Yep," she said. "Join us, Stevie."

"Hello. I'm Linda," I said, closing my eyes again. "This is a nice spot."

At first she asked him, "You were making me think you would be ages."

"Nah. Simple repair; I left the Fiesta at work and brought yours back."

Stephen was undressing. I opened my eyes, seeing him bend and place his shoes down, and closed my eyes again.

I asked him, "Do you know me?"

"I know your husband and your bishop."

"I'm the curate."

Stephen lay down to the right of his wife. He then said, "If you don't mind me saying: I thought nuns and vicars and curates were all bushy bushy, let it all grow, not shaven completely like you."

"I thought my hairless appearance was becoming common knowledge."

Helen asked, "How come, Linda?"

"I'm not supposed to say."

"You've done a fantastic job. I don't shave because when I do you still see it. Blondes are lucky."

"So," said Stephen, "I'd like to relax too."

After a time of silence two people, an elderly man and woman, came walking along the beach from the north.

Helen said, "The best way to react is: don't, Linda."

"Thanks. Stephen, tell me about the John Barman you know who tries to be a public figure."

"I'm only his plumber, or I organise plumbers to go to his luxurious home at Caffenmere."

As the two passed, Helen said, "Good afternoon."

I opened my eyes. I didn't recognise them.

"Good afternoon," said the maybe seventy year old man only. They carried on, and he looked back.

Picking up the language of my new idiot counsellor, Ken Osis, I said, "So you went to the control room then."

"The control room?" he asked, as if this was significant. "Like in, well, what?"

"I was using a theatrical metaphor for the bishop's house," I said. I asked, "How does he strike you?"

Stephen was looking at Helen. He replied, "We don't think we... actually like him. When he gets involved in things, he becomes overbearing."

So I said, "Yes. I understand that some people don't like him."

"And you?" he asked.

I thought I'd hide my developing opinion. "He tries to be progressive; perhaps he must be if he tolerates me."

Stephen got up and walked a few steps to piss a bucket load.

So I said, to show I was unshocked, "I said to Helen about my daddy. I'd be walking along with him on our farm and he would just piss away."

"What about your mum?" Helen asked, as Stephen sat and lay beside her again.

"Pendulous breasts, bushy pubes," I chuckled, as Stephen started to handle Helen's plumbing. Oh dear.

I stayed on my back but noticed two coming along from the south. They were younger than the first pair.

"Afternoon," said Helen, as Stephen paused his fiddling, but looked somewhat more erect.

"Hi," said the woman. "Might get warmer later in the week."

Stephen said, "The wind deviates just here. Linda, you do religious ceremonies then?"

"Cunt," Helen said. "Two people within hearing range and you're using her name!"

I said, picking up their choice of language, "No shit. I didn't recognise them."

He asked further, "Is what you do in church sort of theatrical?"

"Some say that about ritual. There is a bit of an act involved."

His hand was on his wife's crotch again when I glanced their way. "That's what I mean: ritual as stage directions and so on."

There were echoes here of Ken Osis.

Then Stephen said, "Your husband, Keith, works with Yojana Asthana at SMS. Beautiful woman."

"You really are a fucking nasty cunt," said Helen, like a sewer into the sea.

I said, "She checks on their checking of transport. Do you do her plumbing, Stephen?"

"I'd like to do her plumbing," he said.

"I can imagine," I said, with neutrality.

Helen said, "He fucking does SMS, and meets her, and dribbles down his chin when he talks to her."

Matters of their own plumbing started becoming very intentional, as Helen's mouth tried to get some liquid come up Stephen's pipe and possibly cause a burst.

At this point I decided to get up, and the cassock was not muddy. I put on my shoes. My two hosts realised my intention and thus stopped the fellatio. They put their footwear back on too and picked up their clothes. I carried my cassock and they took me through the garden to the house, his erection reducing away.

"She's seen it," was a reference to the forge.

Inside the house, shoes on but naked, they showed me a play room definitely not for children. There was a metal and wood contraption that he had made - like a gynaecology seat with metal tube leg stirrups. There was an X contraption on the wall as well, with chains and handcuffs.

"All from the forge."

I put my cassock back on, to try and prevent Helen demonstrating anything, and retrieved my shopping. I made my excuses and left.

I had enjoyed the fact that they didn't care but not the sand. The sun was low out the front as I drove off, pausing mid-journey to brush my hair vigorously.

Unlike after the counselling session, I mentioned this encounter to Keith, starting with Helen at the supermarket. He seemed to be surprised.

I asked him, "What's the matter? I thought they were a bit of fun."

"A bit careless."

"No one recognised us. Obviously we didn't piss in the sand when people walked by, and only four people walked past us. And if they want to fiddle with each other, that's up to them."

"Wasn't it a bit chilly? I know your skin comes with insulation."

"It was strangely sheltered and warmth came off the gardens."

"Gosh. How did they know you?"

"Because he's the plumber to the bishop and he deals with SMS plumbing with Yojana Asthana. But Helen knew me too: I didn't know I was so famous. Mission through recognition must be more widespread than I thought."

"Clearly," said my husband. "You really ought to be more careful."

"They were liberating."

Out with Diana then Keith (Wednesday 10th April)

I was on a beach, naked, with two people next to me having sex. People kept passing by and actually commenting about me and not them. Every time I spoke back I said gibberish. These passers by were telling me to get up and leave.

Keith was saying, "Get up. I have to leave soon. Look, I could do with some assistance."

It was Wednesday. We got up and he went to work. Beyond going in for Morning Prayer, I stayed away from the church.

In town after some visiting I met up with friend Diana at Café Albert on the promenade. We then drove out to the Serninsea Marshes, where Diana as usual had the key to Patricia's large house.

So we went in and stripped off, to lie down on the parallel settees in the heated conservatory. We saw the detectorists, like pins, far off at the garden boundary, so they wouldn't have been able to see us with any detail.

We talked about going away - like Diana joining Keith and me at the naturist centre. It was supposed to let him relax after about a week of investigatory tension at work, but that's not how it was working out.

Diana and I were the sort of friends who could criticise each other readily and yet not fall out. "I've had a return to bad dreams."

"Around any topic?"

"Ministry and sex, and ministry with sex."

"Why worry? You're not tied to the workplace, there are no performance tests, and you're being paid just to talk to people and the 'invisible bloke'. You didn't actually try to get this job so why worry?"

I wanted to change the well-worn subject. "Do you believe it that Keith doesn't know what dogging is?"

"Dogging? You're joking. I know about dogging. I mean, I've heard about it."

"Saturday he was asking what we could do, and I said, 'Go dogging in the woods,' and he didn't know what dogging meant. That followed on from a bad dream, with my arse out of a car window for photographs."

"Did you really want to go dogging?" asked Diana. "Seeing Keith's wood among the trees?"

"He doesn't want to keep a dog, either, because he says you never know the future."

Diana replied, "It's a long term commitment. I couldn't afford a dog if I wanted one. Vets bills and the like. Dogs are expensive but dogging is quite cheap if you fancy it. But you do have to buy batteries for the torches, petrol to leave the engine running so you don't let your car battery run down."

"I do not want to go dogging at all!"

"Do I detect mutual neglect?"

I said, "No! Sex life is still good but his attention is elsewhere. He's become very vigorous lately. He thrusts harder."

"Too much information."

"I come home frustrated; he comes home frustrated. He works with some feisty women, including Mouldy being some sort of liaison down in Harwich. He then gives me what for."

"Violence?"

"No. I can say that as a husband he is not neglecting his duties. How's Aardse?"

"Don't repeat the old joke."

"I wasn't going to. But... Oh, never mind."

Diana then said, "I see that Julie Vaughan is the latest of our lot to go down to Harwich."

"She worked near Keith, or obviously did. What's he doing wrong? They're all leaving him!"

"Her hubby worked at Arthur's windows and doors firm but got himself a job in Harwich in SMS. So she went ahead of him, on a quick transfer, while he works his notice, and she's been there for about a month at least, Patricia tells me. I liked her and him, you know. Arthur insisted he serve his notice because they find it hard to replace people so, yeah, she's gone and he can go from about now."

"I think they had a dog," I said.

"They have. The dog went with Julie."

"SMS can offer higher wages down south. I knew Julie well enough. We're all from the same era, getting older. I must ring her."

I also told Diana about Jeremy Symes, the priest-in-charge whom I'd visited, because like us we'd both stripped off.

"Keep away from this Symes bloke."

"I'm not having the affair!"

"No, but Emily will be delicate. Affairs are nothing but destructive," said Diana. "Patricia - right - and her divorce. His affair, it was, so she went off to hunt herself and Arthur was a catch."

Patricia returned ahead of her children arriving back. It was the cue to get dressed. She said, "Colin Vaughan is or was one of our best people. We are losing all our best people, and end up recruiting. It costs so much to recruit but we can't compete with SMS in Harwich."

After that, I went directly home and a slightly late and a haggard Keith suggested we went out for some fresh air. So he drove via a shop for prepared sandwiches and we went into Carr Fen woods and at listened to its sounds as it got dark. Chilly, the windows were closed. Then the windows steamed up.

As a passenger I fumbled in my bag for my hairbrush and started using it. I said to Keith, "Do you know. That sad little councillor man on Saturday called me Reverend Mrs. Jupitits. Fancy doing anything?"

He said, "Nah. Not really. It's nice to come out and sit."

He wound the window down a little again for air. I heard a car engine, I thought, so I wiped the windscreen inside. Then I saw headlights in the distance, through the darkness of silhouetted trees. I sort of paused and considered the possibilities.

"Starts early," I said. "Anyway, if we're all right here I need to go behind a tree."

He said, "I think we'd better go - as in move the car back to the road."

"I need to go. Sorry." I put the brush down and found the nearest tree to go behind.

When back inside I said. "Shit, I nearly sat on that brush. If that went into my flesh I wouldn't know what I'd do." I picked it up, sat and put the brush away. The engine fired up. And so he drove back.

"Keith, just slow down a bit. Keith, it's started over there. I lowered my window. That face lit up. Looks like - hey it could be Stevie McPhail and she's Helen!"

"You really are imagining things."

"No?"

"You're right. It's him. They are with others. Wow."

"Wow what?"

"People actually at it."

We continued on the track out. On reaching a tarmac road we were passed by a police car.

"Shit," said Keith.

"Why shit, Keith?"

He stopped and got out of the car and took to his mobile phone, walking some distance away.

Keith when back said, "That's interesting. Friend said police are doing patrols. We should never have come. I should have checked earlier."

"Your call."

"Yes, my call."

"Obviously the rozzers have got nothing else to do tonight," I said to him. "Neither have I and I'm feeling horny now."

"Linda. Have you got a weevil in you or something?"

"Why?"

"Your sex drive."

"We haven't had a sex drive; we've come away from it."

"The weevil is busy. We need a different way to satisfy you."

"Your usual way will do," I said.

Narrator: Keith Christine's Concerns (Thursday Lunch 11th April)

Tuesday evening had I texted Terry Barman.

On what happened Tuesday. Part of a plan? A coincidence?

We did not send electronic messages usually and so that was as much as I could send. A received a reply:

No worries. Know all about it. .Lnqqvz Gn Xenc Enp Aerugeba Xenc Arssnp ,Ravgfveup Grrz

The latter part meant, 'Meet Christine, Caffin Park northern car park at midday.' As a result I was eating sandwiches when Christine drove up in her car, and walked over, and sat in my passenger seat. She gave me a kiss, and put her hand down the front of my trousers, found my testicles and squeezed quite hard.

Her hand removed, and me recovering my breath, I said that I knew of no decision to use Stephen and Helen McPhail. Terry Barman usually informed me of strategies over Linda because she was, after all, my wife. Both McPhails had been exhibitionist with her, I said, which was surely risky. I thought Terry Barman was going to use Jonathan Eyre to test out Linda's flexibility and, indeed, resistance.

She said that we have to allow for the work of the Holy Spirit. I responded that this was as bad as the evangelical who thinks God arranges available parking spaces for Christian evangelicals when he can't be bothered to deal with the holocaust."

"The equivalent is within evolution, the argument that within the workings of evolution, collective altruistic organising can be more successful than individual survival of the fittest. Listen. Within the workings of a seemingly cruel and indifferent world, there are points of interaction where, understanding the mathematics, there is a complex relationship of chaos and system that shows a constructive Holy Spirit to be at work. Therefore, through the coincidences of an engine breakdown, shopping at the same time, and parking alongside each other, the Holy Spirit was able to show us Linda's flexibility, through Helen's actions, and then Stephen's, as guided by the bishop."

"That borders on the meaningless," I said.

When the McPhails started masturbating each other, Linda just shut her eyes and continued to talk with them. This was big evidence, Christine told me, that Linda was a very good prospect for the group. Christine hoped that Linda would respond to understanding sacrificial theology.

"Another thing," she said. "They were freezing. It was only twelve degrees. Some sacrifice there! It didn't bother her."

I said that this was the influence of her naturist father in particular, taking the youngster into the fields and toughening her up. "Rain, shine, and a bit cold at times. Bare feet too, sometimes."

I asked how she knew what had happened on Tuesday in such detail.

Stephen, in some excitement after Linda had left, contacted Christine directly. Stephen told her the happenings so that Terry Barman could not control the story. Interesting, I thought. Having rung her, Stephen said he'd ring Terry Barman to give a report.

"On another point," I said, "when is someone going to tell those silly sods to stop dogging in the woods?"

"I know," she said. "What is the point of nurturing group discipline when some individuals take risks of exposure? Good job you rang Stephen and everyone scarpered before the police could intervene. And what were you doing there with Linda?"

"I wanted to find a private spot and have some fun."

"People will gather around, Keith; don't do it again. The bishops are going to crack down on this because it risks the group. Dogging is superficial and grubby; our orgasms are supposed to be achievements of beauty."

Christine then said that Terry Barman wanted to mentor Linda. I wondered if it would be better if Jim Wilson was her mentor instead. Jim would apply discipline and she might fear him. It would be good for her development.

Christine said there are problems of mentoring when there are theological contrasts. Linda's ethos and Jim's were too different. Yes, he had a sacrificial theology outlook, but his was evangelical and Christine's was more Catholic. Christine said she might suit Linda. Christine could mentor her from a more lesbian standpoint, given her bisexual tendencies, and Christine would promote sevice and sacrifice.

She said, "Listen. Jim Wilson is an extremist. He is pathologically attached, even psychopathically attached, to the principle of released blood to atone for sins - particularly sins against authority." Christine said she had no qualms over any extreme sexual practice, but she rejected mechanical religious stances like Jim Wilson's. She said the difference between her and Jim Wilson is that she took it on her own body whereas he dished it out to others. Christine shocked me a little when she said that she had herself been whipped, caned and pierced with needles a lot. Not by Jim. Sir Sanjay had done it, paying a fee, and a bishop did it regularly, who didn't pay. (I could only think of Jonathan Eyre.) Jim Wilson could be cruel and feel nothing about what he did to others. She was prepared to take a lot of pain to emphasise the submission of her own obedience.

The whole purpose of the Confraternity was authoritarian, the Vanguard of Church order that demanded everything of the individual for the cause of the collective Church.

I concluded she was a Radical Orthodox in theology, so that she understood postmodern diversities and yet lived within the bosom of the Platonist Church.

Then Christine said, "I need to tell you that Bishop Terry has asked George Wickenby to arrange a complaint as if from the two older passers-by to the vicar. It's to disturb Linda some more. I don't like it but I suppose it has to be done. And I don't like it that he does like it. This is not a matter for enjoyment in itself."

"So taking risks has its uses, then," I said back to her. "Had they not sunbathed in public then we would have missed this opportunity. The Holy Spirit takes advantage of risk, Christine. Perhaps our bishop has insight."

"Listen to me: the real need is to preserve the Vanguard from opposition, and for it to be secretive, and therefore to recruit slowly and carefully." She told me that she had no objection to the 'Theatrical' cover to our operations, as suggested by Ken Osis in some detail, based on the former use of the building where we met. However, Ken's approach to Linda was to be based on her likely success to come in, her future ability to take important decisions. This was entirely the wrong angle, Christine claimed.

She said, "John Barman does not seem to get this. We are not attracting Linda to the decision making centre, which is reserved for the bishops: we are asking her to give her body for initiation and for the divinity of the Holy Orgasm."

"What have you heard about how it went between Ken and Linda?"

"He hasn't said a dicky bird. What has Linda said to you?"

"Zero. Told me about the McPhails but sweet F A on the confessional."

"They are entitled to confidentiality," she said.

I claimed that no one was being more sacrificial than me. I was losing my wife.

"Only because you prefer Cheryl."

"I'd have both of them. I want Yojana as well."

This was the point I retrieved my camera and showed Christine some post-orgasmic pictures of Linda.

"Greedy," Christine declared. "Linda, Yojana, Cheryl. Listen: it should be to a purpose, a worthy purpose."

"Should I sent these to Terry?"

"No. She'd recognise them. She's all wet and oozy."

"I realise he couldn't exactly use them."

"They should not be used to entertain him."

"What about your escorting?"

"I decided to give up my body." Yes, it made her a living, but she had used her body to acquire capital to buy and improve properties for prostitutes. She'd just bought some more from Ann Dromeghda and Labhaoise Vlahos, both ex-teachers who gave up after a short number of years teaching (including me). She took prostitutes off the street and put them online on Goosechat. She liked prostitutes because they were often driven by desperation to give up what was precious in order to feed themselves. She was once like them, and had moved up market. She had no problem extracting huge sums of money from the wealthy for their indifferent pleasures, and Sir Sanjay Bunker - my top boss - was one such person with whom she wanted a commercial relationship. She also hoped to convert him to Christianity. I said I had not worked on his niece, Yojana, at all, regarding a Christian confession.

She had told Barman that we should be the mirror opposite of the nuns who are married to the Church, living the virginal life. We marry the Church to give over our bodies. The Body Eucharist was her idea, and she was pleased that the bishops had adopted it, but disappointed that it was basically initiation by another name.

I could see a conflict in her thought. She was producing her own thought against that of the apostolic order.

"You cannot defy the bishops' judgment with your own independent thinking," I said.

"But they have accepted the basis of what I said, and adopted it. They should then follow it through."

"I also thought that you were trying to be inclusive of others."

She wanted to accommodate Sanjay, or San Bandyopadhyay as she knew him (his original Indian name), unless he converted. She tolerated his niece Yojana and the Rabbi Maurice Neptune. She could be inclusive, so long as the absolute superiority of the Christian vision on sacrificial giving and renewal was in the possession of the Church. Jim Wilson, for example, had no such generous understanding of grace. He thought conversion the only option, and would indeed apply discipline for their disobedience.

"Yojana must never be isolated with Jim Wilson," she said.

Thus from her mouth we'd had something like Milbank on Radical Orthodoxy, Coakley on mathematics understanding evolution and the working of the Holy Spirit, and Rahner on anonymous Christianity. She did not say this: I knew this; my wife assumed too easily my lack of interest in theology after going into minor management in a quantitative job.

I asked her, "Can I have sex with you?"

She said that I had asked from a stance of wanting pleasure. She still regarded me as a potential ordinand. Well, I could have sex with her, but it would cost me more than I could ever afford on my wages. She was very expensive these days. However, I would have sex with her in the context of one of the group's bonding orgies, and in the context of adopting the group's theo-ethos.

She knew how I had altered Linda's body for our purpose as a couple, and she admired that sacrifice by Linda. (However, like everyone else, she did not know all of the facts.) In a parallel with Linda's learnt and assured use of her throat and anus, Christine had learnt to endure whipping and caning without, any longer, needing to cry out, even when subjected to remorseless pain.

What then did she think of Connie Wilson, who had mentored Ken Osis? She said that Connie had been in awe of Jim's sadistic outlook to get his way. She always wanted to push matters forward. Both of them could well have been serving a long prison sentences by now, but John Barman knew them and changed their direction to a more purposeful one. Christine said that she could stand up to Jim Wilson, and take everything he could throw at her, save of course him killing her. But then she believed in resurrection. I was beginning to feel cold inside with this conversation.

Christine would be ordained into the priesthood at the same time as Linda. Linda needed to get away from her woolly theology. She would have sex with Linda if necessary in the cause of getting Linda ordained and getting her into the Confraternity's theatrical group. Oh, and we should use the Latin name of the Confraternity, because it is both special and sacred. This was the Principatus Theocratic Confraternitati admissis in Ecclesia Anglorum Nationalibus.

So, to finish, she asked me if I would support her view in her argument with John Barman? I said I agreed with her, although she should see that pleasure is a gift and we should accept the gift. Christine said that she would consider this. She suspected that John Barman was far too humanist for his own good. Decision taking was not a goal but a responsibility.

She put her hand down my trousers again and did start masturbating me.

"I'll leave it there and leave you potentially frustrated. Get a better attitude."

We left the park in our respective cars. On the way, I received a call from Terry Barman himself through the speakers. He assured me that the McPhail incident was unplanned, but it had been very useful indeed. He would use it to cause disturbance but, as a result of Linda's positive responses, Terry had just decided that he would accept my suggestion and Linda could go to the conference at Margate alone. She would have a room opposite Jonathan Eyre's, and alongside the pregnant Reverend Julie Manns' room. This way we could see how Linda would respond to Jonathan's teases and possibly Julie Manns' evident fertility with Jonathan.

Narrator: Linda Telephone Julie Vaughan (Thursday 11th April)

Free at lunchtime, I risked a telephone call to Julie Vaughan, an actual and old friend down in Harwich.

"Are you free to chat? Is it your lunch now or later or you've had it?"

"I'm in my car overlooking Cliff Park just about to have me pack-up. So pleased to hear you."

"Still got stuff to open?"

"Only one box of baps, apple..."

"I meant moving-in boxes."

"Well and truly in. It's over a month now for me - don't you realise? I came slightly early, on Pancake Day. 5th of March. Suspicious packages were found at Heathrow, Waterloo and London City Airport - I went in and out of London. Bob will bring more stuff tomorrow! I've met a few new people here already, as well as the old crew."

"You know, there's even a possibility we might move down there," I said. "I'd get priested first, and hopefully finish this curacy. I'd rather stay here though - as I know the place. Keith was promoted up here but..."

She said, "It's weird, you in that role now. I once thought Keith suited it."

"Well that was then. He's lost so much interest now."

"I've something to say as a friend - and that's because I've heard so much about it and from one of the horse's mouths. I was trying to summon up the courage to ring you. But I have to tell you."

"What, in case we move down there?" I asked.

"Actually, yes. I asked myself, what would you see? It's the fact that you haven't come down here, ever. You'd better sit down if you're not."

"Sounds strange. Go on," said I. "I am sat."

"It is about Keith. Well, there's like the Serninsea gang down here - the old crew - and, em, Cheryl Mould. Do you remember her?"

"Saw her recently at a short SMS gathering. Keith knew her. I'd not seen her for ages."

"Well she is, let's say, well-associated with Keith down here when he visits. Do you twig?"

"They work together."

"No. Don't be a nincompoop."

"She's at HQ."

"She's at Harwich as a local centre. She might occasionally be given HQ work: they can all get that. I'm so sorry to tell you but you are my friend and it's been like this. What I've heard and what I'm told. He doesn't stay in a hotel; he stays with her. Have you ever rung his hotel?"

"Guest house. Very rarely, actually."

"Direct line?"

"Usually his mobile."

"You don't see his location?"

"No, we don't track one another. You'd better tell me."

"See, the last time they were, well, together, they were together openly among the staff. They were the talk of the office, people gawping at them, sneaking about them."

"Oh. Oh shit. You sure?"

"Definitely sure, sure as sure. Arm around his waist, kisses, affection, and back. But she twitters like a bird even when he is more careful."

"Kisses? She was introduced up here on a business basis and visiting her parents. Mouldy?"

"She had no reason to go north recently," said Julie. "She's not management or direct support. She did though."

"What about her parents?"

"A place to stay. You think she took them her washing?"

"I know he often has to liaise up here with a Yojana Asthana. Down there, Cheryl Mould is... I suppose she's not, is she?"

"He has no work reason to see her."

"You really so sure?"

"Yojana is a very efficient colleague. She lays it on a bit, possibly, but she's not where his heart is. Yojana was promoted a year ago. Cheryl is nothing like that; as a clack-box she comes over as all hat and no cattle."

"But there is cattle?"

"Yes. Do find out for yourself."

"How?"

"I could think of several things: asking others, ultimately asking him."

"And what if he says it is not true?"

"Then he's definitely a wrinkler. So what are you going to do? I mean, think about the possibilities."

"I don't really know. Gosh. Hell! There's my priesting coming up in some three months. We ought to be happy families and all that. Mouldy? Actually, she looks quite glamorous these days."

"Honestly, Linda. She talks away like they have a future together. They say she wants a nipper before it's too late - with him."

"But... My ordination cannot be derailed - not at all. Gosh."

"You don't want to confront him? It may be best not to confront him if it could affect your own long-term employment life," Julie said.

"I'm thinking ahead, perhaps too far," I said. "Are you sure?"

"Look, I had to tell you. I mean you could keep it under your own hat."

"I could do that. Yes. I'm shocked but I'm thinking. I'm not sure I believe it - I do believe you."

"No doubt at all."

"Are you HQ or local?"

"Local. The writing is on the wall for Serninsea, I'm afraid. So I see her all day and she is dreamy about him. Dreamy because it is real."

"I believe you but is there someone else there to confirm it?"

"They've seen it. I can hear you're far welter'd. Why not think about hiring an investigator down here? Follow them around. Or use someone up your end. Do you remember Adam Magellan?" Julie asked.

"Yeah, rather."

"I remember that he knocked around with Geoff Virgo. I seem to remember something was up possibly involving your mate Jenny Masters but we never found out. Her uncle was into religion."

"I don't see the relevance."

"I heard she got ordained. You're all at it. "

"I still don't get it."

"The point is Adam Magellan now runs a private detective agency."

"Keith once said he became a policeman, and then left and went private."

"You could go to him. Don't go to George Wickenby, because George Wickenby helps SMS check up on itself."

"So Adam Magellan doesn't?"

"All the more reason to use him. You could pay Adam Magellan to travel to Harwich, or he could hire a local."

"I bet that's expensive. I need a plan."

"You've a stiff row to hoe, I'll say that. Something based on SMS perhaps: after all, Cheryl and Keith are both employees."

"Keith, Cheryl... Yojana... "I think I do have an idea. Keith is a manager looking at ship transportations and their measurements."

"And at other means of transporting measured supplies," she said.

"And this Yojana in this unit checks up. Their kind of self-examination is fast coming up: somehow I could get into the investigations."

Julie asked, "But it is not about Yojana up there but Cheryl down here."

I said, "So Magellan could do what Wickenby does and he investigates what?"

"No. Wickenby is on the books and facilitates the investigating of the investigating of the investigators."

"What?"

"George Wickenby has the contract for assisting the stress testing of the effectiveness of Yojana's team investigating Keith's."

"Still haven't got it, Julie."

"In other words, Keith in Compliance investigates the honesty of transport measurement, Yojana in the IIS makes sure Keith and company do it right and are uncorrupted, and they have these annual tests on the IIS and Compliance, actually, that it all works properly. This happens in every locality."

I said, "I have discovered that George Wickenby is also used by one of our bishops!"

"Why?"

"Well, we're vulnerable to all sorts of accusations. So this Bishop of Bolingbroke uses Wickenby to check out, I suppose, trouble-causers."

"What's Wickenby been doing?"

"It was about something in my past life. Do you remember that I became a model?"

"I do."

"Yes. Well, someone has just sent naked pictures of me to my training vicar from when I was modelling."

She said, "Oh, gosh. How can you be a goody goody minister in your own home town?"

"Someone suggested something similar about a prophetic figure within the New Testament," I said to her. "Small coastal towns can be like that anyway. Especially one with crap road connections, like this place."

Julie then said, "Anyway, I'm sorry about Keith and I didn't want to write or email - who'd see them? - but I was thinking of how to ring you."

"Well thanks for telling me, now that I have rung you. You'd better finish your sandwiches."

"Keith being married to you is a surprise to some down here because Keith never mentions you."

"Oh. Really."

What she said was starting to have an effect inside. I wanted some space, at this point.

"I'll ring off now," I said to Julie. "There is much to, well, think about."

"Look, let me know how things go," she said. "I'd really hope Keith and you can stay together. I won't be friendly with this Cheryl; I have to get on with her, like a colleague, but that's about it."

"No, don't do that. Better not to make any fuss. Keep it quiet," I said. "I'll handle it."

I went and sat on the toilet. I was reacting to the news physically. And how on earth could he criticise me for lying with a couple of weidos who only touched themselves, and yet he was apparently staying with and banging Cheryl Mould every time he went down to Harwich?

Doing the Will of One

My one attempt at holding a Lent group was carried out in my house lounge in the evening with Julie Vaughan's words still resonating. How could I concentrate with her revelation swirling in my mind? It wasn't helped by Keith being a host. Some sat on the leather-effect sofa and chairs, and others had seats.

Colin gave me free rein, and so I decided to have the ten mainly elderly parishioners and Colin meditate on the Genesis track One for the Vine from the Wind and Wuthering album published in 1976.

First I played a live recording of it from the Lyceum way back in 1980. I said it was written by Tony Banks, who played keyboards, and had since tried classical music composing. This was a good example of progressive rock, but I was interested in the words. Genesis words were often obscure, I pointed out, but there was something inspiring here. "Take the first three lines."

*Fifty thousand men were sent to do the will of one.
His claim was phrased quite simply, though he never voiced it loud,
I am he, the chosen one.*

"In Lent then, we are interested in the messianic claim. And here we have this, and this is a messianic figure, and what?"

One elderly woman, Barbara Legge, suggested an army, perhaps.

"Yes, or followers, perhaps," I replied. "They are like a mass of people that emphasises his will to action," I said. However, the next three lines suggested a certain ambiguity.

In his name they could slaughter, for his name they could die.

*Though many there were believed in him, still more were sure he lied,
But they'll fight the battle on.*

Thickly white haired Douglas Cole criticised the grammar, but I wanted them to consider the message.

"Well, it's not Jesus," said another older woman, Dorothea Wood-Watt.

I wondered aloud if the point was that those who believed in him could slaughter, and so many who follow charismatic figures would. "Think of the zealots then, think of terrorist leaders now."

I went on about the one who loses his belief, strays from the prepared path, and ends in any icy wilderness.

"It looks like they were coming down the mountainside. Mountains feature in many a messianic striving," I suggested. "The 'Hill of Difficulty' leads to the 'Beautiful'."

"Bunyan," said Keith, hovering just outside the room.

"It is they who have the vision, perhaps of the straying man, but the vision suggests something like the Transfiguration, perhaps."

I got the sense that I was starting to lose people, although Keith was concentrating.

"I think the next bit is a bit confusing," I said, "whether he plays their game or they follow him. Nevertheless, he'll give them strength, and to do it walks into a valley."

Keith at the doorway said, "I think you are straining some freer flowing lyrics for something more precise."

"Oh, I agree," I said, "but the lyrics give a kind of essence of what being messianic is all about."

Then Tom Bowler asked, "Is this Christian?"

I looked at Reverend Colin, who was looking down. So I carried on with the lyrics:

*He walked into a valley,
All alone.
There he talked with water, and then with the vine.
They leave me no choice.
I must lead them to glory or most likely to death.*

A man said, "This is like the wilderness, then, trying to draw strength."

"Sorry. You are?"

"Ralph. Ralph Thickett."

"Yes. Consults what is around, and then resolves."

Then Colin said, "But Jesus was tested by the wilderness; he did not consult." People nodded.

I said, "We're in the mountains and a final plain. The plain also features, often as a gathering place. It is level. The messianic figure must encourage, and then another individual has lost hope and is going back up the mountain - walking, falling, and vanishes. It is the unbeliever who vanishes."

Colin said, "I really don't understand this. What on earth is it on about? When I heard it, I thought it was the messianic figure who vanished in the air."

"Well, there are echoes of the Ascension," I said. "They are free-floating lyrics - as Keith said: themes, loose, imprecise, but they suggest how religious ideas resonate."

Mrs. Carter asked, "How do they resonate, curate?"

"Christian ideas, Jewish ideas, even Zoroastrian ideas, Gert."

"What are Zorro...astrian? Are they outer space?"

"No, the religion of Persia before Islam: they gave resurrection ideas down the Silk Road to the pharisees in the Jewish land that indeed influenced how Christians understood resurrection."

"No they did not," said Colin, "the resurrection of Christ was quite different and attested."

"Only, Colin, that he was the first of the resurrected and the model was inter-Testament last days thinking."

Keith said, "I think this is a little over-sophisticated."

"Why?" I asked. "The ideas for resurrection came from Persia. You know that. Nietzsche, when he wrote about the superman, wrote Also Sprach Zarathustra, which is his messianic figure giving due reference to Persia."

"Linda," said Colin. "We are not some interfaith discussion society. We are witnesses to Christ and Lent is our preparation. Nietzsche may even be a source in the Genesis lyrics, because he lied. Nietzsche has followers, and he said God is dead and we are fools to believe otherwise."

I said, "Shia Islam picks up on the whole messianic claim."

"No, Linda!" Colin asserted. "Everyone: we in the ministry must learn about all kinds of claims and influences on our faith, and to this extent our curate Linda is correct to let us know that they exist. But as ministers we guide the received claim to uniqueness. Our Christ is divine; our Christ intervenes in human history; history prepares but he fulfils."

I said, "I am not denying the uniqueness of the Christian claim. Indeed, I am saying something like this: that in other religion, in art, in philosophy (as from Friedrich Nietzsche), these ideas swirl around which are preparatory and show the impact of the Christian vision."

"So what you are saying," said a younger chap, Mohammad, I think, "is that Christianity has it all, and they have some of it. I didn't convert on that basis."

I said, "That's like saying they're anonymous Christians, and I don't want to say that about others. I would want to say that these ideas are theirs as well. But Christianity has a coherence of these ideas in its own package," I said. I saw Keith smile.

The session struggled on, and came soon to refreshments, Keith becoming busy again.

Doug was telling people that, as a miner in the Midlands coalfield, he used to holiday in Serninsea, and now he'd moved for retirement. He'd more time for church things now, and all the chapels here were either dead or dying and here was a fresh start.

Colin said to me, privately, that he gave me free rein and for my angle on things, but he was worried that I would have to listen more and say less. He also told me to learn the names of parishioners, and to use them every time immediately.

I told Keith this advice at this bedtime. He said he agreed. And I thought I had listened: listened to my friend that Keith was having it off with Cheryl Mould on his visits to Harwich. Her mother, Catherine Mould, hadn't been present. I knew her name.

Chapter 04 On to Margate

Narrator: Linda Different Viewpoint (Palm Sunday 14th April; Most of Holy Week)

I kept quiet about my telephone call. I wanted to think strategy.

Palm Sunday evening we had a visitor to the pulpit. I would "learn a lot" from what the Reverend Alfred Dove would say, Colin asserted.

The Gospel reading he chose freely was about six days before the Passover, giving a dinner to the raised Lazarus. Mary wiped Jesus's feet with her perfumed hair. (John 12). Then there was Paul apparently losing everything to gain Christ, sharing in his sufferings, and drawing on the power of Christ's resurrection for Paul to attain resurrection. (Philippians, chapter 3, verse 8)

"This is our role and relevant, and we join with women in the task of giving up and serving," said the Reverend Alfred Dove. "But the other texts of St. Paul must be taken into consideration. There are important statements about women in leadership that were not just cultural. To suggest otherwise is to disparage the faith and praxis of the Church for two millennia and seriously imply that the Gospel has not been preached until now."

Here we go, I thought. Here was a sermon where the texts were about one thing but he was interested in another subject. I looked at Colin, who smiled again.

"Its also to deny the respective complementarity of the sexes and even of our relationship to the Godhead. The creation of Eve from Adam through to the letter of Timothy is an all-time statement of difference and working together, and that is so within the Trinity, and also Christ to his Church and man to his wife."

I could see where this was leading. Colin nodded his head, turned to me and smiled yet again.

"I tell you this," said the preacher. "Reduce sin, evil, truth and especially salvation to a mingled mush and you have nothing left but 'everyone's own truth'. This is subjective and not external, and so, therefore, not eternal, timeless and objective as God is and must be. Now, certainly, our personal relationship with God is indeed subjective, but what we believe about God must be objective if we are to have a real faith in common, such as when we say, corporately, Credo in unum Deum.

"We are richly resourced already because tradition and scripture provide the basis for common belief, and of course present-day relativism and subjectivity do not."

I was now tapping my fingers and Colin's hand came over the top of mine for me to desist.

"The present day folly encourages egoism, or, as Joan Armatrading's song has it, Me, Myself, I."

I mumbled, "I wanna be by myself."

"Linda!" mouthed Colin.

"Egoism puts the self before everything else, and this is obviously contrary to the essence of the Gospel.

"To be clear, then: that which binds the body of Christ is more than the summation of collective individual subjective experiences, but is a gift of the shared appreciation and realisation of the objective Divine that transcends all of us irrespectively."

I had a contrary thought. I liked this guy. He was as uncommunicative as me. But then he was preaching, and I was not.

"Yes, we are subjective, but sharing the appreciation is a gift, a gift from Objectivity Himself. Indeed, we 'decrease so that He may increase' through us all; and for this very increase Our Lord prayed: ut unum sint. It means that the Father through Christ and the Holy Spirit is in us and so through Christ and in the unity of the Holy Spirit we may be one under the Father. The Lord Your God is the One God of all, for all, and seen by all who care to join in the vision. He is the one 'through whom, with whom and in whom' we have our being,' irrespective of the subjectivity of our senses."

Why were people nodding? Did they even understand this?

"Woman was born after Adam and Timothy says that women will be saved through the bearing of children. Although in our Church women do, women do not need to preach because the preaching already takes place. Virginity is indeed very good, but beyond the deliberately sacrificial denies complementary potential; contraception is denial and abortion is criminal. Sexuality in the Christian religion today has become a muddle."

I thought, what about when the plumbing means that one can't have children? Presumably we must embrace virginity and a life of prayer. Bollocks to that! He hadn't finished.

"There are no subjective human rights. Theo-rights come from the objective order of God-laid humanity. What we have today is relativising sin, as shown by apparent prayers for gay partnerships and, goodness me, in the distortion represented by gay marriage. Surely the Universal Church can stand and oppose the decline of civilisation?"

I couldn't get my hairbrush. It was trapped in a belt under the black cassock.

On he went. "I don't know if any of you were there, but we learnt this week, from a relativist and sexualised performing sister appearing in the media, that after the Romans left a few cells of isolated Christians continued until the elites were baptised and the populace could once again obey proper authority. Perhaps we are in that situation now. Civilisation has gone and the Barbarians are rampaging around."

I thought, no archaeologist would think this now about Romans and Barbarians.

"We must now defend the objective truth of our faith, in our small communities; we must do this until God sees fit to return us, under his renewed authority, to mass baptisms again. 'Stand firm!' Yes, 'Stand firm.' The Gospel says this. I pray that my words were indeed acceptable in thy sight. Amen."

Colin said to me quietly: "There you go. Put that in your female pipe and smoke it." Than he gave a little chuckle. The preacher was coming down to the pulpit to sit nearby.

As there was noise within the congregation, I was able to say, "Colin, you can't possibly agree with that."

"Well, it's all part of the mix. But I am working with a woman in authority and she's about to tell everyone to stand and say the Creed. Well, I hope so."

"Why is Kath Wickenby a sexualised sister then?"

"I send my friend local newspapers. The Creed?"

"Oh yeah. If we stand now and everyone say the Nicene Creed. We believe in God..."

The preacher and I met briefly afterwards, when he said, "It's nothing personal, but a call to witness."

"The texts don't say what you say they appear to say," I told him.

"Oh, but they do because the consistency of objective tradition underlines the consistency of the biblical narrative. I know this is not fashionable these days but the language of Father, Son and Holy Spirit is not accidental nor replaceable. The Church's role is to guard and maintain such revelation."

"You say so," I said. "I don't."

"We part disagreeing," he said, "but don't misunderstand what that means: disagreeing is not neutral; someone must be wrong and it is not me."

He was staying with Colin. Colin told me that he also knows his sister, who was inside the vicarage. Alfred Dove returned to his sister Eibhilin.

At this point I asked Colin if the parish church here ever had anything to do with Harwich.

"No. Why would it?" He answered. Then he asked, "Is your husband moving down there - are you going to have to go there?"

"No no. He goes there and comes back for best practice and aligning but his job is up here."

Colin said, "There is, though, a conference on coastal towns: on economic disadvantage. Not Harwich but Kent. Bishop John wanted to go, but he can't go, being really busy around the diocese and not just next week. He first mentioned it a while back to me. He rang me this afternoon. He had thought I could go but it would be better if you went - to indeed enhance your training. Margate. The week after Holy Week. Tuesday for two nights and home Thursday. Fancy it?"

"Yes. Sounds interesting. Are you going?"

"Nope. And it would do you no harm to have Bishop John's evaluation of you. Do you know why?"

"No, I don't."

"Because he said so. Because of the suffragan Bishop of Margate. Do you know about him?"

"Of course not."

"From the Midlands. Same stable as Bishop John. They're theology college and since pals."

"Oh, it's like that is it."

"No, it is not like that. They are both talents in our Church. The Suffragan Bishop of Margate is called the Right Reverend Jonathan Eyre. Of course there is gossip against each of them, but gossip is sin. Good. You're going. You will need to report back afterwards. An essay, Bishop John says, or a report. Jonathan Eyre can tell his friend, but you can give your own impression of the conference in writing."

"Yes. Good training," I said. "So what are the details?"

"I will send them as an email attachment."

"After this evening's bias, can I preach some time Colin?"

"When I am ready. You will be lecturing at this conference. Once."

When home I told Keith about this preacher, but he was not interested at all. And I wondered if his lack of interest in this and me was actually due to having another woman in his emotional life. Perhaps I was being a bit paranoid. I removed my textiles.

After shitting for three, I took myself to my bedroom, took hold of the second hand vibrator, and imagined I might seduce that Reverend Osis, my nincompoop rounded counsellor, in confidence, to get my own back on Keith. Ken Osis might first take some photos of me, seeing as he'd mentioned them. Instructing him as in a waking dream narrative to photograph and fuck me was enough to bring me to an orgasm. I lay on the bed, and Keith came into the bedroom.

"Oh aye," he said.

Later, on Tuesday of Holy Week, I was sat in the vestry with Colin Cromer when the Suffragan Bishop of Bolingbroke, John Barman came in. He said, hurriedly, "Right: train tickets, summary of information that you can speak on as you wish, hotel's all paid for, and by the way you'll be in the room opposite the Bishop of Margate, Jonathan Eyre. He is soon to retire by the way. Although I know him well, since college days, he is quite a bit older than me."

I said, "I contemplated driving, but rail would be more comfortable."

The bishop said, "I bought them a long time back. Look, the diocese has paid for these return tickets from Rasa Market. It is a lot easier to park at Rasa Market than in Wytham. The diocese will pay for anything featuring the Boss, even if he turns up for five minutes."

"The Most Reverend William Blair Rothach." I said, "Very Scottish."

"He is a Gael, by upbringing, and was a Scottish Episcopalian. You could do with some intellectual background on him. Have you heard that some call him 'the Right Reverend Capitalist Intellectual' at all?"

"No." I was looking at the hotel leaflet.

"That's because he is a palaeoliberal, a sort of Scottish Enlightenment Hayek plus nation state for cultural glue. Make sense?"

"Yes."

"Well?"

"Monetarist, free market, cultural reference points to connect people together and specifically Anglican and Anglian forms."

"But, on acquiring the top job, he has moderated his public views. See if Archbishop Rothach talks about theological education. He is dedicated to it."

"The market would dismiss it."

"It is cultural glue, my Reverend Linda. We mention it and we get brownie points. Go and get some brownie points yourself, Linda. But focus on the seaside. When you talk about education at the seaside, you'll be on a ladder that appears out of a magician's basket."

"For what purpose?"

"Climbing heavenward."

"As in Carry On Up the Khyber?"

"Oh yes, they Bungdit Din beforehand."

Colin laughed but I didn't because I was staring at this information: "Robert Court Hotel. Who's Robert Court?"

"I don't think 'Court' is the surname. Robert might be a surname. Somebody brought up in the imperial mould," the bishop said.

"Like Princess Jelhi?" I asked.

"I worry for you," the bishop responded. "It's a sort of half-modern half-Edwardian hotel. Your Room 302 is third floor, and the Apple Room ground floor is where the meetings are held. About eighty that room can hold, and there'll be about fifty attending. Quite a few, that. Tuesday night, Wednesday, Thursday morning. So the big Boss is the diocesan of Jonathan."

For the rest of Holy Week up to Easter Saturday I did what was expected of me. I did not preach. Not once. Fancy being a deacon and not preaching at all through Holy Week! It was as if I was useless. And Maundy Thursday and Good Friday arrived, with their patterns and the Watch to do. I felt like an untrusted fraud.

However, being otherwise focussed meant that any strategy regarding my husband had to wait. Then he had news from his secular workplace that he was going to Harwich Thursday after Easter to discuss the delays to the stress testing of their honesty and truth systems and to talk about necessary computer network changes.

Prostitute Murder (Saturday April 20th)

By telephone, Colin Cromer asked me to represent the Church at the tragic murder scene, as it would be good experience to see if anyone wanted ministry. He asked me to come to the vicarage immediately afterwards. Anyhow, when I arrived at the police cordon, a clergywoman was present with her back to me.

"I don't know you," I said, approaching.

"I'd rather be anonymous," she said, facing away from me, "due to the nature of my work. I am an Anglican unknown to your Vicar of Serninsea."

"So why are you here?" She with to neck blonde hair moved further forward.

"I knew her," she said. "We have to reduce the risk for sex workers in this town. Ah, they are taking the body now. They need space - move back."

"Yes. So you have some specialist ministry?"

"I'm a reverend deacon."

"Oh. Like me."

A female police sergeant Layla Jenkins approached her. "If you could present yourself in two hours for a formal identification at the station. At the reception you'll be taken to the morgue."

"It is Alice Morgan?" asked that reverend deacon.

"Yes," said the sergeant. "Clear the way!"

"And you have the suspect?"

"Please move back both of you."

Two men wheeled out the body to a waiting van.

"I knew him too. James Inglis. He was a client of hers and a bit more."

"What happened?" I asked her, respecting her wish for anonymity.

"Well, I've been told by another woman, Mollie Johnson, in the same premises, that yesterday James Inglis walked out on his job. He'd found Alice, and they'd been drinking in various pubs. They'd had sex and she wanted money. Mollie could hear him saying it wasn't business but friendship - and Mollie said they all say that. There was a lot of noise and it went quiet. He'd gone into a rage and then strangled her with a silk stocking. When the police went to his accommodation, they found his live-in landlady Amy Gray with bruises. He's been arrested, is in custody.

Mollie stopped talking to me to give formal evidence, but apparently he is admitting everything - according to a policeman here I know."

"Are you providing any pastoral assistance, then?"

"I'm going to see Amy Gray," said the clergywoman.

"So there is nothing I can do, nothing we can do here."

"I'll further assist Mollie. She is a fine contralto singer, but has ended up on the streets. She can surely do better."

"There seem to be many prostitutes in Serninsea," I suggested to this person avoiding me.

"It's the economy, and also students do it to get through college. The dock used to be a source but it hardly functions now - but there is a legacy from it. The Titansea Grand is busy with sex workers. Cheap housing helps, and I own some and more."

"You do?"

"Yes. Best place. Secure them in done up accommodation, and let's get them off the streets. James Inglis is a one-off, but reminds everyone of the danger."

"I'll report back to Colin Cromer."

"I'd rather you didn't."

"Why? You're avoiding..."

"Because it would affect my ministry. Just give the bare details. She's dead, he's in custody, and there is nothing further to do."

"Should I not take up a ministry to prostitutes?"

"No. It's too dangerous. Please stop trying to look round at my face. You'd need to know what you are doing. The police know me, and that's all that matters. They do not consult with the vicar, the Reverend Colin Cromer, or anyone else. They know my work. The police assure me they'll leave Mollie alone regarding her work. Now I need to visit some women."

"Yes. Right. Well, I'll leave this ministry to you."

"Listen. I'm not against sex workers meeting clients. It's how we manage sex when people put themselves at risk. It's just that the computer online goes some way to letting them get to know a client first. I'm going that way; please don't follow me."

I wished her the best.

After popping into Jagjit and Gurinder Kapoor's newsagency, telling them the basic news, I returned to the vicarage.

"What happened. Did you give ministry to anyone?"

"No. No one asked."

"But you were a witness by your presence, and this is what matters. It is why we wear our clerical clothing. And on the subject of presence and clothing, I have received a complaint."

"Oh. About me?"

"It could only be about you. I've received a reliable report that you were cavorting on the beach with Stephen and Helen McPhail."

"Ah, I met her by accident, and saw their home. I'd love to talk, Colin, but I need ten minutes in the vestry toilet."

When I came out and faced him again, I'd hoped he might have forgotten, or something like that, but he continued from where he left off. "People do not meet the McPhails by accident. They are notorious exhibitionists, with police cautions and petty fines as their personal trophies. They were churchgoers once, here, but I regard them as having become obedient to Lucifer. Their jokes about vibrators and toys and feeling fuzzy lower down were an embarrassment in inappropriate meetings. They came here knowing that some religious people are quite lonely and easy fruit. I did not want them in my church. Keep away."

"Seriously, I did not know who she was. Her car had broken down. I took her home shopping."

"You might believe that, but they target people into their sordid world. We don't want photos of you naked aged forty. Two elderly people known to church people walked by, saw your cassock folded up and you naked with them. These days younger people whip out their mobile phones and take snaps. You have been utterly careless and put your ministry at serious risk. Next time I get a report like this, I'll inform the bishop. Aha! No. You say no more. I warn you again. Keep away from the McPhails, and keep your clothes on in public. For goodness sake! No, Linda, I am telling you to be quiet. Now come with me because we have some boring stuff to do. Administration. No, you will not say any more."

Easter According to Colin Cromer (Sunday 21st April)

Easter Day and up early. A bonfire early on, a Eucharist to follow, the big Eucharist mid morning, the Evensong later, and all of this and still no preaching for me. I read the readings, like I did through all of the Passion, and even then did not read the Gospel. I hoped that Colin was going to say, at some point, let's start again.

So what was his main sermon? Perhaps he wanted me to listen and listen to catch his style and content, and get away from what was mine. I saw no notes.

"Most definitely: in the name of the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit, One God. Joy to the world!" he began. "And this is sung at Christmas, but the resurrection is the very time of enormous joy. This event turns all that brings the world and ourselves in a downwards direction into an upward direction. Doubt is ended, sickness is removed, death is overcome. Christ, in the most dramatic way, has responded with obedience to the will of God, and this is because this will is within his body. Such a body died, but could not be kept dead. With the will of God, with God present himself, and with Christ's obedience, the body had to resurrect in victory. Jesus had died; Jesus lived. John's Gospel lays this out: this was coming. From the suffering came the glorious upturning of all that had gone wrong. What can we do other than respond with thanksgiving?"

"In this combination of divine will and divine obedience, heaven touched earth. Of course, heaven touched earth as Jesus walked from Galilee to Jerusalem as well as in all that happened in Jerusalem itself. But here was the supreme heaven-meets-earth in the defeat of death. The chains that take us from birth to death had been overturned and nothing was the same again. Joy indeed.

"Christ took on the sins of the world, the sins gathered in hell. He went down into hell, and came up, and as he came up he was then resurrected. Yes, this is metaphorical, but no less true for that. We are not doing geology: we are doing Christ."

I wanted to ask obvious, dummy questions.

"Let us be clear. Jesus may well have smiled before he met his disciples in his new transformed reality. But he did not smile for himself. He did not pick up some prize or trophy for a mantelpiece at Emmaus! Imagine if he was at an awards ceremony afterwards. He would stand there, thank everybody, but most of all thank God, and yet hand the prize away to us, we who least deserve it! But we should say, back, 'Christ, we must thank you; we must thank God; we must thank the Holy Spirit. Yes I know he calls on the Holy Spirit at his later farewell sermon. We'll get to that soon enough. But the Holy Spirit is a personality of God that acts then as he acts now. God in three persons is eternal. So we thank God for Christ through the Holy Spirit."

I thought, no, this is a muddle, and yet the correct muddle. This celebratory sermon simply was not working for me.

"And the thanks we give is for the resurrection, but includes the descent into hell. Because descending into hell is when he brings us up with him. We then enter, with him, upwardly into this heavenly burst of joy. We are all invited to be rescued: rescued by Christ.

"We share in the resurrection as we are its beneficiaries. This is true for those martyrs of faith who serve and sacrifice in the faith of Christ, who sacrificed, descended and ascended. Christ says to the martyrs: 'Your sins leading to death are banished, and you are eternal in my glory.'

"What does this mean for the world? From Eve's very sinful beginning, and the inescapable evil ever since, the world seemed forever condemned: but the creatures that proceeded eating one another in a chain of evolution by advantage through death is now changed, redeemed. Yes, redeemed. After Eve, it was women who first saw him restored, and then the Christ presented himself to his disciples for the work to continue."

By his account, I thought, misogyny is built in to the very basis of Christianity.

"It is not complete yet, however. To get ahead of ourselves, Christ, after heavenly ascension, will complete his work upon his return, that which was realised in the resurrection."

I was momentarily baffled, and I'm supposed to know this stuff.

"And so, yes, ours is to say this: 'As you responded, Lord, so we respond; as you obeyed, Lord, so we obey, as you would say all therefore will be well, so we thank God for your resurrection. And when we come to our Eucharist - which means 'thanksgiving' - we participate in his one life, death and resurrection with a huge participatory thank you. Thank you our God the Father, thank you Christ our God the Son, thank you our God the Holy Spirit. Amen."

Sat on the bog afterwards, I wondered how any of this actually happened? What did happen beyond the metaphors to a man evolved like the rest of us? I just could not see the mechanics of this at all. It did not relate to any other form of knowledge. And would I ever solve the problem of my backside?

In the evening Colin said that we would have something different. "You like a bit of heresy."

"Do I? It should be fascinating then."

It was not. It was a Methodist Minister called the Reverend David Scott, of the large Serninsea circuit. He tried to be clever and claimed that Mark's gospel would have finished with the transfiguration, celebrated actually on August 6th, but for later interference. This claims that the transfiguration in Mark is awkwardly placed, and should be after the tomb, which would then tie in with reference to Elijah on the cross.

First of all, this seemed like an abuse by a visiting preacher because he should have said all this in his own church and apparently he hadn't. But it was also a load of crap, because the transfiguration is precisely the turn of the mission into a more realised and eschatological frame - where there is this reference to Moses and Elijah, particularly Elijah coming again. So it is in the proper place. Plus he was making the error that something had actually happened, whereas Mount Heron being snowy white is the only 'happening'. It's like those who think that there was a big Palm Sunday procession with crowds in the Autumn for the palm leaves to be available, or finding out which star or comet was the Star of Bethlehem.

Colin said I should be generous. His Lake District friend previously had one view, and this person had another. Colin said he wasn't against faithful debate. So I said to Colin that I found his own sermons very instructive and that I had a lot to learn. He definitely preached the Gospel, I said, but what I did not say was that the price in terms of the sociology of knowledge was not just too high but unreachable. Indeed the currency required was like a set of coins in a museum that was no longer legal tender.

Colin said that I would be able to preach on Trinity Sunday. Oh great. Interestingly, I reflected, Elijah was taken up to heaven, and was chosen, and coming again, and he wasn't divine, so why was Jesus? I kept that thought to myself, brushing my hair as I thought it.

"What about the supposed murder?" he asked.

"I had nothing to do. He is in custody, and she was killed, I was told, by strangulation with a silk stocking."

"Too many prostitutes," said Colin. "It can only lead to tragedies." (I just wasn't in the mood to argue.) Meanwhile, he turned to my immediate future. "All the best regarding next week. Make it as substantive as possible; try and avoid saying that Serninsea is full of prostitutes."

Yes, next week I would theologise a little on a seaside economy and I now knew that Keith would go down to Harwich on Thursday to discuss delays and hear about ICT upgrades imminent in some SMS sites. These concerns were for his working times; in the evenings he'd be living with and screwing Cheryl Mould. Yet I had got on with him at home, simply because home life was ostensibly just the same.

Before Margate (Monday 22nd April)

Any strategy regarding Keith had to wait beyond attending the Margate conference. Indeed, my intention in the meantime was to act normally. Thus on this day off for both of us, Keith entered me that morning, and I acted as normal, and then he and I went to Caffin Park. He drove and left his car at the northern car park there, and we did quite a bit of very pleasant walking through to Ingle Park. There was plenty of bird life to view. It was colder than of late.

Even if he admitted to an affair, I might still have to live with him and put on a public show until my ordination as priest was secured. After that he could sod off. Indeed, in the evening I lay in the bath and he got in. For someone having an affair, he was paying me a lot of attention. I enjoyed him there, as he leaned forward to clean me.

After he had used the soapy sponge on me, I said, "If you went tomorrow, I could drive you to Harwich for a change."

"I have seen your train tickets downstairs. Rasa Market. Sensible."

"Wouldn't you like me to drive you to Harwich?"

"It doesn't arise, does it?"

"If you went tomorrow, it would arise. It might arise now - oh, it has."

"I'm not going tomorrow. I have things to do here. Are you going to do me with the sponge? Put some gel on it and whip up a foam."

I did this, and leaning forward, doing his neck and chest first, avoiding the up periscope, and I said, "I fancied seeing your hotel."

"Guest house. They pay."

"So instead, I could leave Margate on Thursday and come over to your guest house. I could indulge you in lovemaking."

"You have return rail tickets."

"But, seeing as I didn't pay for them, it doesn't matter." I moved down his body, under the water and to his thighs, now his penis and legs.

"You'd have to drive there tomorrow, Linda, and you'd be knackered for the first evening session. Another time."

"Okay," I said, and decided to leave it and continued down to his feet at each side of my bottom.

"Have you written your speech?" he asked, taking the sponge off me and doing my breasts again.

"It's virtually done for me. I'll make it mine on the train."

"There you are, then." He lowered the sponge right down between my thighs. "Do you know about the Right Reverend Jonathan Eyre, the Suffragan Bishop of Margate? He'll be the hosting bishop."

"No. You know this?"

He balanced the sponge on the side of the bath, and lowered his hand to my vulva. "I've seen your literature."

"I haven't shown it to you."

"I saw the information elsewhere. It is about coastal towns and business; ideas about improvement. The literature is circulating in SMS and no doubt many other places locally."

"What about Eyre? Are you masturbating me?"

"Yes. And he's a right reverend!"

"A suffragan bishop. Er... Ooh. Let me grab your knob."

"Yes... And..." Keith stalled.

"What?"

"Never mind."

"What are you getting at?"

"Hmm. This then. He's more than ten years older than Barman, but he's from the same stable theologically; so it follows that if you impress Eyre you then impress Barman."

"I'm not going in order to impress Eyre or Barman. I'm trying to impress your knob."

"He might impress you."

"Not like you are. Is he a good speaker then?"

"You know, your attraction to me was always your innocence. Come on, let's see if you can orgasm."

"Fuck off - about my innocence. I am loyal and faithful in my religion, and loyal and faithful in my relationship. With you, Keith. You. I wanted time with you in your guest house. It could have been like, I don't know, Walsingham all over again."

I became more vigorous; he stroked me the same.

He said, "Harwich is very pretty in parts but it does not have religious shrines. There is the Shell Grotto in Margate."

"How do you know about that?"

"Some say it has dark origins from the Knights Templar or even Freemasonry. Whoo!"

"I'd rather see the Tate."

"How do you know about that?" Keith asked, as if to get one back.

"Stop being silly. Everyone knows about the Tate Contemporary at Margate. And Joseph Mallord William Turner."

"Sugar! Ah, honey, honey! Not everyone," he said. "Including you: it's the Turner Contemporary. It's on the site where Turner bonked his landlady."

"Thank you, Keith." Now I concentrated on him, and his sperm added to the floating foam on the water. He then focussed on me, so that I tensed and gasped and finally lay back in the bath.

I wondered if he'd go Wednesday instead of Thursday for more time with Cheryl Mould. I would try to find out. What he was trying to say about Jonathan Eyre had passed me by.

When we had dried, we went naked into the kitchen downstairs for a drink. I produced the papers he had not seen, and he looked with interest. The tickets were concealed in my bag.

In bed he said, oddly, "Tomorrow and until Thursday, you should enjoy yourself in any way you care to do."

"Thank you," I said, and realised that this is precisely what he would be doing from Thursday or Wednesday until back on Sunday.

Margate - Arrival (Tuesday 23rd April)

I took the Fiesta to Rasa Market Station. So much easier than parking in Wytham, even if the train then went through Wytham. I was informally dressed in the mufti of blouse, top and trousers, had my bag with documents and valuables in it and a soft large bag with carrying handles of clothes and some necessities including a laptop computer.

I hated train toilets but had to use them. On the journey down I used the laptop to make Barman's speech mine using a split screen and some additional notes. It meant the journey went much more quickly. In London I had half an hour for connecting between termini, to then spend one and a quarter hours getting to Margate. Free of writing, I was able to look out of the window more when travelling through Kent. I walked from the magnificent station to the Robert Court Hotel.

When registering I was told that only months ago the hotel had an old fashioned lift with outer and inner see-through expanding scissor-like caged doors, and similar sides, but now it was all enclosed with centre opening doors. A loss of charm, said the female receptionist. So, in this old hotel, I went up the modernised lift to my floor and room 302.

As I unlocked room 302, a tall and lean man, silver-haired to his shoulders, clean-shaven, with an open necked white shirt and tight jeans, opened the door opposite and peered out. "You must be the Reverend Linda Jupitas from the Wytham diocese, Foss."

"Yes. You are?"

"Jonathan Eyre. Bishop, for my sins."

"Ah, that makes you the Bishop of Margate."

"It does. At your service, ma'am. Good to see you. About fifty are here. You are speaking tomorrow."

A heavily pregnant woman came out of the door next to mine. She seemed to keep herself to herself and walked past us.

"Hello," I said.

"Hello," she said, glancing back towards me. "See you later downstairs."

"Yes," I said, and looked at Jonathan with curiosity and caught his light blue eyes.

"I'll let you freshen up; see you later."

"Yes. It is this evening, a session?"

"A session. Yeah, but food comes first. Could be a problem if people doze off afterwards. Later!"

Time for the old hairbrush. I kind of fancied him with those eyes, despite him being older and yet not looking older. I freshened up and sort of 'made space' for dinner in the khasi.

Arriving at dinner, the pregnant woman was sat across the same table as Jonathan, who had not changed his casual clothes, and so, after queueing for the food, I sat alongside her. The three of us were having the beef stew. Then opposite me and alongside Jonathan sat a ginger long-haired woman in red leather throughout. She had cauliflower cheese.

Unlike me, the pregnant woman was wearing a clerical collar. Jonathan seemed to look at the red woman a number of times.

I paid attention to my pregnant neighbour. "Hello. Good to meet you again. I'm Linda Jupitas."

"Julie Manns."

The woman opposite said to me, "You a skoi pilot too?"

"A what?" I asked.

"Sorry. Reverend type. Don't wanna be got wrong."

"You're not wrong. A 'sky pilot'. I like that. Are you West Country? Your accent."

"Well, Oi'm from University of Somerzet but am bred and born in Norfolk."

Jonathan Eyre said to her, "She comes from the wicked wilds of eastern Foss. I'm Jonathan, and I am a sky pilot too, possibly where the atmosphere thins."

"I am, obviously," said Julie Manns. "Warm in here."

The Norfolk woman said, "My professor says I must lessen it," she said, reducing it. "Cause you're all a bit high-learned round here."

"You shouldn't," said Julie. "It's lovely."

"Think of Alice Rogers," I said. "She doesn't."

"Roberts," this woman said.

"I'm crap with names," I admitted. "What's yours?"

"Allie. You two related, Linda and Jonathan? You're both all casual."

"No. I've only heard about him."

The bishop said, "Only good things, I hope. I knew she was coming here. My brother bishop was coming here, but this good sky pilot is here instead."

"Your brother's a bishop as well?" asked Allie.

"It's an expression," he said. "Linda. How was your journey from Rasa Market today?"

"How do you know that?"

"My brother bishop told me. And you, lady in red?"

"I came Yestidee," said she. "Mundee. Cun't come today. Going Furzdee loike the rest. Linda, let me ask you," she said in her thick accent. "What yar want in loife?"

"Gosh. What a question to kick off! Well, yes, to be authentic. Use my job to be free. A profound question so early! You?"

"Other than a bit o' kewter, an' lolloping along, I wanna be artistic and free and with the right rounded person."

Jonathan said, "Allie, look up that good man Harold Davidson who in 1906 became rector of the rural Norfolk parish of Stiffkey. I bet you are a researcher."

"I'm a Ph.D student looking for a research project. Something like within this conference, perhaps. Linda, before the first session, can I droi you?"

"As in draw me?" I asked back.

"That'll larn me," she said. "I meant that. Try and do a good un."

"Yes, if you want." So when she finished her food, she brought out a pad from her bag, and drew me with a pen. I thought her line was good. "Could I have one?"

"I'll photocopy," she said. "There's an office here. Now I'll do yow, Jonathan."

"Are you a professional artist?" I asked.

"I had a book out recently, and have a second if possible."

She'd get him a photocopy too. Julie Manns shook her head.

I said, "I was an artist's model, once. Would you like me to pose again? I could do privately, if you are serious."

"Hold you hard," she said, "in a jiffy."

Jonathan said, "We start in half an hour. Well, add ten minutes."

So when I had finished my food and drink, and she had finished, I went off with her, saying bye to the other two. We went directly to her room on floor two at 205. "If you're professional, I can undress," I said, after the door was closed.

"Perhaps you shun't, you being a vicar."

"I can. Happy to do so."

"Go bare if it's roight."

So I went bare, correcting her labelling of me to a curate, and she drew one picture and then another, and looking between them, gave me the first one. It had 'A S' on it.

I said, "This is beautiful. 'A S'?"

She responded, "Allie Shrimpton. I don't identify my models, when I paint and publish."

"No, and do you need a photograph? For the future?"

"Oh no. Good on yer for posing. Thank you."

I dressed and got up to leave. "See you anon."

She said, "Mind how you go."

Wow. I went directly to the Apple Room on the ground floor with my drawing rolled up. When I entered the Apple Room, Jonathan Eyre was ready to begin. He had this charisma simply standing up. He seemed to command his space and draw attention. He was introducing the conference and welcoming people, after which he paused. I sat next to Julie Manns, curious about her.

"How long?" I looked at her bulge.

"Hopefully a month to go. It'll be my first."

"Oh, all the best for that. From?"

"Having sex."

"No, where are you from?"

"Worthing. I'm a Methodist. Rhythm Methodist, probably. Sorry. Bad joke from a pregnant minister. You got any kids?"

"None. I am married. Anglican. I'm from the east edge of Foss."

"He said."

"Your husband and you must be thrilled about the future."

"Actually, I'm not married."

"Oh. I apologise."

"The apology may be mine. What's that you're holding?"

"It's the drawing she did of me. Would you like to see it?"

She nodded so I unrolled it.

"Ah. She's good, isn't she. I hope she wasn't offended. I didn't want to draw any more attention to myself."

So, here was a minister, pregnant and unmarried, who'd said nothing about my nudity. I could be friends with her.

"She's just coming in," I said, as I curled the paper again. The red leather-clad redhead artist sat near the door, and she had a drawing pad with her. Julie and I were on the third row of seats in semi-circles and we two seemed to be in Jonathan Eyre's direct and frequent view.

He was about to kick off properly. I glanced across at the artist, who noticed me and smiled back. She was like dynamite. Jonathan's stance had all his weight on his left leg, like a trendy modernist.

"We need to start at the beginning, and define a coastal community - to get to the tes odou of the seaside settlement. We don't really do that often enough. One way is to have a distinct area, a town, or set of villages; not an add-on to somewhere else, or somewhere strung out with few features of a coastal community.

"But when you do definition work, such seaside settlements constitute some of the worst levels of economic and social deprivation with a widening gap between coastal communities and the rest of the country. People earn less and are more likely to be unemployed and less qualified, more unhealthy and fall into disability benefits. Economic output and productivity are less. But these settlements are not dead places, and there is growth and vitality."

Julie whispered to me, "Brighton is distinct and not distinct. Worthing: so genteel. Margate is rougher, like parts of Brighton."

"What's happening?" Jonathan asked, looking at us. "Seaside towns record the highest rates of net in-migration, beyond a wider urban-rural shift in population.

There is growth in net in-commuting to seaside towns. There is a slight declining labour force participation among men and a big increase among women compared with the rest of the country. But seaside towns also record the largest increase in numbers in male employment, female employment rising just behind the rapid growth in rural areas - and yet they also have the largest increases in recorded unemployment. Complicated.

"So there is economic growth. Much of it is related to tourism and services. Think of Margate. At one time it was run down. Then came the Turner Contemporary, with local scepticism. Now look at Margate. The funfair reopened, and there are lots of art-related shops and businesses. Turner Contemporary is both national and local. The model trains went, and the headquarters came back.

"In general, then, and for specific reasons, people still do visit our seaside towns. But something isn't quite right. Perhaps so many people move into these places, and do so by choice, and often without work. What does this represent: a wish for a better life in a more pleasant setting, but without the means to support this? Do people escape to the coast?

"So many people are in poverty and this includes children. A lot of people take drugs: not just illegal use but have a dependency on antidepressants.

"But many settlers are retired. So why shouldn't they settle in a preferable area? Those who move in and hope to work experience how difficult it is to find sustainable employment at a decent wage. And this is because many move for reasons of seeking accommodation: the housing stock still available at the coast. The closure and re-use of some small hotels and boarding houses has created a stock of small privately-rented flats.

"It's not just the availability of accommodation to attract those on benefits, but actually the policy in many affluent local authorities with property shortages is to send people away to these settlements. One minute we need three bedroom properties for families, and then they grow up so we need more one-bedroomed places, and then they have families - so property is a moving issue and it isn't simply about the surplus. Recent policies are tough on those at the bottom, and they are being 'economically cleansed' from places of high property values. A lot of this is a failure to build social housing. Surely, the economy was made for us, not us for the economy.

"We look at unemployment figures and no one really believes them any more. The tougher benefits regime means fewer on the books not more in work. There is extensive joblessness in seaside towns beyond recorded, claimant unemployment. The dole office pursues people on benefits to do more work and yet they are never counted as unemployed. This matter isn't different from the rest of the country, of course. Many claim sickness benefits (and are not recorded as unemployed) who want a job. Women at home would like paid employment. There is an excess of early retired. Seaside unemployment is more like 10 per cent than the 4 per cent recorded presently, about 1% higher than elsewhere. Home Internet work is rising. The Church really ought to challenge the government on this, but we have become silenced by statistics.

"The temptation is to see coastal resorts as 'one industry towns', but unlike industrial ones that have declined, Settlement-by-the Sea has shown more resilience and growth with different migration population trends. Less resilient coastal places still need job creation efforts. Austerity sure does not help.

"The traditional tourist base has declined with foreign holidays rising but there has been growth in day-tripping and short breaks, thanks to the car. So labour market imbalances owe more to rapid population growth than to a slump in local employment.

"We all know of the problem of seasonal unemployment in seaside towns. So late autumn, winter and early spring is tougher than late spring, summer and early autumn. We all know how Blackpool extends its season with its lights, and all do with price offers.

"In terms of age-range, seaside towns are relatively old age, including older workers. In terms of sex, men who have withdrawn from the labour market have been well out-numbered by women who have entered it.

"What we need is a Trust in the Seaside report just as we once had a Trust in the City report.

"I mention the locality here, briefly, for which I have the name for Suffragan Bishop. We call the region Thanet, here in East Kent, a tourist area that is the three settlements of Margate, Ramsgate and Broadstairs. These make up a more or less continuous built-up area along the Isle of Thanet peninsular. Margate in particular became the mass market resort of London. Ramsgate was a port as well and so more socially mixed. Broadstairs is up the age-range and more passive. Well, the tourist trade has declined across all of these towns, excepting the influence of the Turner, with buildings converted from hotels and boarding houses. Still, people live in the peninsular to commute, and live here to retire. Population makes a market and waits for work. Plus, anyone who watches the BBC Money for Nothing with Sarah Moore or Jay Blades knows that Margate has a little bit of a recycling or upcycling industry - remaking via small crafts. This is what we call resilience. I said that we used to make model trains and railways.

"As for churches and faith places, there's no evidence that as people get older they join churches, but nevertheless the churches contain older people, and they form strong communal functions for the gathered. Here the sensus fidei fidelium is active. We need to perform more in the way of community services as government makes it tough at the bottom, but we in the churches are not here to substitute for reduced welfare. Plus, while work is important for identity and dignity, it is not the be-all and end-all of a worthwhile life. Lifelong education helps. Churches could offer this. However, we must agitate not substitute.

Is any of this different from the rest of the country? Well, a Trust in the Seaside report would agitate for the incoming population, for improving accommodation, against underemployment and unemployment, and offer resilience.

"That's it. Thank you."

Everyone clapped, and then we were invited in small groups to consider resilience and economic diversity and what churches could do. Julie talked about churches being more inclusive: they are not so enough, even in Brighton. I referred to possible projects to link economy and culture, but wasn't sure how. Rather weak of me, really. Fiery Allie said she thought a seaside church might have unique aspects, but we did not know what these might be.

My turn at the microphone would be the next day. Jonathan in his conference-wise conclusion mentioned my coming contribution as a specific example of a place, in a more isolated and east coast setting. Then he looked at me with those penetrating light blue eyes.

What was the matter with me? I'd whipped my clothes off in front of an unknown female and here I was having visions of moving to Margate and climbing up a fit older body to stare into this bloke's ecclesiastical eyes. This, mixed with anger about Keith's second half of the week, was potent. I didn't expect anything to happen, of course, but we all fantasise the possibilities.

The Lift and After (Tuesday 23rd April)

Quickly outside the Apple Room, I decided to ring the landline telephone at home. Keith should have been at home. He was not. Two attempts I made. I rang his mobile. He answered.

"It's me. Just finished the first session. The Bishop of Margate."

"Ah, good old Jonathan Eyre on a G string."

"What?"

"Met anyone else interesting?"

"A single pregnant Methodist minister and a Norfolk artist trying to reduce her dialect."

"Any more happening tonight?"

"Might look at my speech. You at home, then, watching the telly?"

"Yeah."

"If I listen any more to that Norfolk woman, I might start recovering my own accent."

"You don't want to do that. Don't do anything you wouldn't do."

"No. Bye."

Lying sod, I thought. I reckoned he'd gone straight to Harwich and was there with Cheryl.

I went into the lift with others. After one floor up, the renewed lift jammed.

There were six of us in this lift: the Reverend Julie and me to her right nearest the doors; behind us were a Reverend Malcolm Webberley, bald and fat, and to his right, behind me, Jonathan the bishop; and behind them were Michael White, a lay man, of neck length hair and smart in a suit, talking even then of the coast and economics, and a lay woman, Claire Bruce, to his right, behind the bishop, engaging with his expressions, of short brunette hair and herself in a suit.

After five minutes of waiting, the Reverend Julie was starting to panic. "I was going to go to the loo in my room. I need the loo."

I said, "It's not illegal for a pregnant woman to pee in public. Go."

"I can't. Not in front of... But..."

These people around, except Jonathan, said she could; then, after a pause, Jonathan said it separately: "You can, like Linda said. Well said, Linda."

So I added, "Well, I need to go too; we'll do it together. So I lowered my trousers right down to my ankles and squatted; and then she squatted, raising up her dress and parting her knickers. Turning my head, I nodded at Jonathan and said, "Hold under her shoulders, Malcolm, and you can hold me, Jonathan."

As we both peed with force over the lift floor, Jonathan's hands into my armpits, he looked down my front, and he could see that I'd worn no knickers. I was aware of my arse widening. I was getting worried: I had to control this. So I altered pose and jutted out forwards that made my piss go against the doors. My trousers got splashed.

Then I thought, charitably, that he wasn't looking at me deliberately but avoiding Julie's own partly exposed bottom. Mine was hard clamped by widening my legs completely.

The bishop said, to agreement among everyone, "Well done, our Reverend Linda; well done both. I think we need to be discreet about this: like being in an old-fashioned confessional, you know, everyone. And anyone else needing to go, just go."

No one did. Thirty minutes on of clamping my arse and it getting much hotter in there, the lights failed as the inner doors were pushed open from below. Cooler air rushed in. Two engineers seemed to be on ladders leaning either side of the lift. Combined urine spilled out, including over a lower down engineer's head holding a box and wires going to the wall. They could see all our legs.

Stroking piss through his hair with his hand, this lower engineer said, "I'm George Boyd and your assistants are Geoff and Jason. Stay where you are. I will electronically lower the lift." They did all look alike. He said, "Don't worry: we've had this before - and worse."

Geoff told us to keep back and keep still. "We're the Gee Bees," he said, as he whistled.

The lift lowered itself in jolts, to a point where my pregnant colleague could sit in our remaining piss with her legs out and get down with assistance from Jason. So I followed her down and the rest followed on.

So with wet arses, but my dry shoulder bag, I proceeded with Julie up the stairs to our neighbouring rooms. Unlocking and just going into my room, I dumped the bag on the bed and ran to the ensuite and got my shoes and trousers off in the nick of time.

Relieved that I'd survived, and having used toilet paper to partly rinse and dry my wet arse, I returned to the bedroom and got out my hairbrush before getting fresh clothing from the chest of drawers. But I looked at the outer open door, and this fully clothed bishop was staring into my room, holding in front of him a fresh pair of underpants and a fresh pair of trousers.

I realised that I was, of course, naked below. I needed to say something. "I need to change if you don't mind."

"My backside is wet too," he said, "from sitting to get out of that lift, and my shoes are wet. I wanted to say again, 'Well done,' so, well done."

I bent down to open the drawer. I realised that had not moved. He received a side view.

I asked, "What do you want?"

"Nothing. I'm, er, saying I'm impressed."

I couldn't give a sod at this point. I assumed his maturity.

I said, looking at him, "Either go or come in and shut the door for goodness sake." He came in. I said, "That lift was brand new. If it had been the caged one, it would have been less claustrophobic and the piss would have run out more immediately."

"Yes," he said, as if he was short of words. "And I know, from coming here before, that the old one was reliable."

"Get your gear off, go in the en suite and rinse your arse, if you want. If you give me your shoes, I've a small brush and black polish. I can rinse them first. I've got mine to do."

Then I thought of my husband having his end away, I could have some fun in a mature way.

I said, "Come. We'll both have a shower in my ensuite. You were sweating in that lift. There's space for two and you can do my back and arse and I'll do yours."

He undressed, willingly of course, and said to me, "You're... You're not yet forty, is that right?"

"No. Just had my birthday."

"I'm sixty-six by the way."

"Really? I wasn't told that. You're very good for sixty-six. Come on." My upper stuff came off.

So we went in the shower, and thus there was some mutual washing. I quite enjoyed myself. I hadn't really done this before with someone so relatively anonymous, especially a bishop after all. Ah, but he was close to retirement. It didn't matter.

Afterwards there was some drying, and I could see him physically responding to all this naked attention. I looked at his light blue eyes, and he pierced mine. His left hand held his stiffening member out. It was an invitation. I accepted it, by dropping down by squatting over the hard floor and taking it into my mouth. This was a new beginning. If Keith could do it, so could I.

It turned out that, when it was my turn to receive, he was a very wonderful and persistent user of his tongue between my legs. My back on the ensuite's hard floor, this chap knew when to speed up, slow down, press hard, just do the faintest of touches. His knees were hurting, so I suggested the bed, laying down a towel.

He continued as before. And I did shudder and let out a moan too, and he said, "Wonderful to have another heavenly vision!"

"The first?"

"You peeing against the lift doors, of course. Fantastic."

"Julie peed."

"Only on the lift floor. Yes, okay."

He carried on. He could stay out or go in with his tongue; the flat of his tongue applied pressure. He moistened his finger; he inserted lower down, and tapped higher up; he could also insert a little further and curled his finger to press upwards. Two fingers he tried, but found me tight.

At this point he tried to push his one finger in deeper and couldn't navigate and he started thrashing his finger about.

"You can't. You're in my urethra, Jon. If you do that I'll end up peeing again."

"Oh. Trying to find your G spot - to pulsate it. Take you to divine ecstasy."

I had to talk to his penetrating eyes. "All you are doing is pushing behind my clitoris. You may as well do what you did before."

I did orgasm. I wasn't acting.

"Bungdit Din," I said with a smile, but he now looked at me curiously. He clearly had a problem, in that he wasn't going very far in.

A little time on, I said, "You can come inside me if you want; there is no risk of anything."

Now at sixty six it was taking him some time, and he wasn't yet ready, but that was all to the good, because he worked at it, and he tried to go side to side with his stiff exploration if not very far. And when he came, saying, "For the Glory of God!" it all rather dribbled out, so he quickly went to get some toilet paper and absorbed what presented itself. I indicated that he should lay alongside me, so he did.

When it came to my suggestion I might sleep with him overnight, he said he could not, and I realised of course this was just too public. So he dressed and actually thanked me.

"Well, thank you," I said.

I reflected that at least I had resisted successfully my need to evacuate earlier in the lift. It felt like progress.

Before the Lecture (Wednesday 24th April)

Next morning, as when one hears water running in nearby sinks, showers and flushing toilets, I got a distinct sense that two people were moving about in the next room. I brushed my hair rather more vigorously than I normally did in the morning.

So at breakfast there were knowing looks and no more, and Jonathan's talk to me was friendly but formal and he went elsewhere. So I welcomed Julie, who was into the breakfast room after he was. She told me that she'd come down the stairs despite being heavily pregnant; staff had offered her a downstairs room for the night but she had refused. She sat with me.

Also at breakfast the young artist dithered near my table with her long red hair falling over a stretchy black top, no bra (like me!), pink trousers and high boots. She was looking around.

"Alice!" I guessed, and she immediately turned and looked to me. I was so hopeless with names. 'A S' did not prompt me her first name. "You're not like an official artist, surely?"

"I'm Allie. No. I'm discussing with my professor some Ph.D possibilities. 'Religion in a Seaside Town' is possible. But I'm not sure. This conference is useful background because the school does small scale qualitative research."

"Oh, I see." There was a smell. Someone had let off, near or far.

"I'm from The Glastonbury School of Folk and Ethnographic Studies at the University of Somerset. Professor Roland Mitton."

"Sit down here," I said. She sat at our table.

Julie asked, "Allie, what's your professor's speciality?"

"Here, I have a photocopy of the first drawing I did for you."

"Oh, I'll put it with the other one. Your professor?"

"He was once a Post-Gramscian structuralist Marxist interested in cultural hegemony and how ideology is negotiated through institutions of power and resistance. But now he's gone to the micro-level with interests in communication theory and people, generating identity through communicating with others."

"Not sure my speech is as deep as that," I said to her. "So his communicating theory is that you should get a more regular accent. Isn't that cultural hegemony?"

"My cousin and I tried to moderate our accents together to be more like our teachers. When we were kids, you wouldn't have understood us."

"I don't now," said Julie causing me to smile.

I supposed that Jonathon had to mix with other people.

Narrator: Keith At Home in Harwich (Wednesday 24th April)

Administrative Professionals Day! It took me nearly four hours to go from north of Serninsea to Harwich by car, setting off from Yojana's and her warm embrace, with much single carriageway and intensive driving and an option to go west to the M11. That was a gamble, because you might get a good run on the M11 but then you could also be trapped in queues. I wasn't. (Bizarrely, Hartlepool was quicker yet much further.)

At 1 pm I arrived at Cheryl's small house, in Lime Avenue, to be greeted by a hug and her taking my luggage. She had a snack for me in her adjusted lunch hour and then we were off to work.

Thus I arrived with a smiling Cheryl at the regional office in Harwich. I did meet George Petty there and it was a good time to confer on co-ordination issues. The business wanted this: the same practices in Titansea and Harwich. In this office were a number of ex-Serninsea people, and Cheryl and I met again the likes of Sarah Carver, Colin Sheen, Henry Ward and Julie Vaughan, with Cheryl on my left and her right arm around me. She was grinning and happy and released herself to sit down at her place. I kissed the top of her head.

George Petty, Manager of Compliance mumbled that he should be going to the head office as well as me. I left for HQ in Harwich to receive papers he'd already encountered and addressed. Felixstowe had the capacity to offer inspection of our processes throughout the localities (affecting Yojana's future).

In the course of the afternoon I received a summons from Sir Sanjay Bunker himself. He referred to me by my full name throughout. I called him Sir Sanjay. He advised me that the workload in Harwich would be going up, and there would be far more work than George Petty could do. Much would overflow from Felixstowe. I would probably have to work together with George Petty more.

He asked how I was getting on with Cheryl, and I said I would divorce Linda immediately Linda's ordination was done to marry Cheryl. So, yes, I did want to move down to Harwich.

"I'm to tell you about your present wife in Margate," he said. "Barman rang me. Eyre rang me. She's a star. She showed the Reverend Julie Manns a drawing done by some redhead woman. Linda had her clothes off in minutes to this complete stranger. But it got even better. They were in a lift and it broke down. Linda was with Julie and Jonathan and three others. When Julie said she needed to pee, Linda joined in to give Julie courage. Julie didn't need any courage; she might even have lasted. Linda joined in, so both were squatting and pissing hard. Jonathan thought Linda was going to do a dump on the lift floor."

"She didn't, I hope."

"No, but the engineers got wet when those doors were opened!"

"Gosh. Eventful and revealing."

"And it got even better still. Jonathan took the opportunity presented by wet clothes to go in her room and they showered together and fucked. How about that?"

"Really?"

"A lot of his sperm flowed out afterwards." Sanjay Bunker ended by saying that he would very much like to sleep with her himself.

I said, "When she's under the Confraternity, there'll be a queue!"

I was so puzzled. I had been sure that Linda would have stayed loyal to me. Julie had played a blinder in the lift, showing Linda's happy exposure in a demanding situation. I knew that Jonathan Eyre had this reputation for persuading women into his various beds, or theirs, but he only expected to tease Linda and get some information. I knew it meant nothing to her if a man was naked alongside her but how had that translated into sex?

I said to Sanjay, "That means they are surely, now, going to have sex several times. They might even be at it as we speak."

"Barman has told Eyre to go carefully, and Manns to play the innocent. She should not now join in. Jonathan had wanted Linda to play with Julie's body."

"But we don't know how Linda will react to sexual contact with a heavily pregnant woman."

Then Sir Sanjay said, "Overdo it and she'll smell a rat. Don't look so dolorous. This is a very good development."

I said I was just so surprised. The softening up of Linda and the monitoring of her responses had been so fast. Barman was also notifying Connie Wilson, because initiation into the group might come much sooner than we expected.

When I emerged from my one to one, and went to the local office, Cheryl could see that something was on my mind. I sat down and stared into space. In full view of everyone, she squatted down and put her arm around my shoulder and asked what was wrong. I said that nothing was wrong, but I had much to think about. Was it bad news? No, it was good news. More than this, we would be together, her and me, very soon.

When Cheryl squatted she did at least close her knees, and she had tights on. Again, Linda never wore tights - wearing tights was like putting Linda into netting.

"Are you getting a job here?"

"No, not yet. I cannot tell you, Cheryl; it's all confidential." This led to ears flapping, so I needed to get on with some work, and so did she.

Thus it was at five o'clock that Cheryl put her arm around mine to walk out together. At home she pulled me into the kitchen to see her prepare some home cooking. She was a much better cook than Linda: basically, Linda could not cook for toffee and definitely not toffee. Cheryl wanted me to have a Lancashire Hotpot, which she said was not that difficult to cook and if Linda could not manage this then she needed to go to college for basic home economics and cookery training.

It was a very good meal and followed by soap operas television. Linda never watched soap operas, and I had no idea what was going on.

Later on, Cheryl came into the room wearing a new nightie. She'd bought this especially for me coming down this time. Linda would not be seen dead wearing a nightie. This one came down to Cheryl's thighs. I could see her breasts within, and the dark area where her legs met. She had a present for me as well: pyjamas. Pyjamas! If Linda ever had found me wearing pyjamas, she would have taken them straight into the garden and burnt them. She might have burnt me at the stake as well for naturist heresy.

I asked Cheryl, "What ever happened to that dirty girl we all knew and loved at school?"

"I'll tell you what happened. I'm thirty nine and long since grown up. And that means something else. The clock is ticking, Keith. I want us together and I want us to have a family. You'd be over sixty when the child is twenty, at this rate, and I'd be a year under. Come on. We are trying from tonight."

This night I realised that my future must be in Harwich. At her home - it would become my home - I told her that the boss had said there was more work building up in Harwich and there would be enough for me. The complication, I said, was that George Petty had my job in Harwich.

As regards leaving Linda, Cheryl knew the timetable. "Petertide, they call it."

She said the rumours were rife, now, that Serninsea was doomed, and I had better get applying for something.

As for the end of tests celebration, Cheryl would be at the Serninsea event and not the one combined in Harwich and Felixstowe. It was again imperative that Linda should not have a clue that there was anything between us. Cheryl was to make the most of seeing her parents.

I loved Cheryl's devotion to me, but I did not want her to become uxorious. We were fucking for a baby, no less, and family life together. She made it clear that she wanted fucking as often as possible before I went back home.

Well, I wanted to raise a child as well. With Linda I could never be a father but now I had this life opportunity with Cheryl. The daft thing was to wear the pyjamas and then to take them off, and take off Cheryl's nightie, in order to make love. Her soft pubic hair was a welcome change to Linda's baldness.

I'd first fucked Cheryl six years ago, when she seemed a bit washed out with life. The affair proper started two years back, and at first it was understood that I would remain as the curate's husband.

Whilst the prospect of having a son or daughter was exciting, it was also exciting that Linda should take her body into the Worshipful Company under the Confraternity, and lose herself in her service to the collective.

Narrator: Linda Margate - Speech and After (Wednesday 24th April)

After breakfast I had my speech ready, based on what I had received from Bishop John, but I had stripped out his statistics for a handout, and decided against any computer projection, as indeed had this Bishop Jonathan the day before - who was looking at me intently. His eyes again. I started with a comment on method.

I said, "Using penetration software tends to take a talk into bullet point land and becomes stilted..."

"What's penetration software?" some bloke asked.

"I meant presentation software. I'm, er, trying to penetrate the issues."

So I started with the substance of the matter.

"I am very grateful for Bishop Jonathan Eyre's lecture yesterday setting out some economic and social matters regarding coastal communities. My purpose here is to continue with what, er, Jonathan said and refer to the challenges in a place like Serninsea. Deepest Foss, east coast: I was born and brought up there and, after university and theological college in the East Midlands, I am back as a curate, first year going on second year. Can I just say I appreciate some pointers here, and some research too, from my own suffragan bishop, John Terence Barman. I understand you know each other well, Bishop Jonathan."

"We do, yeah. Terry and I share some background in training. I was one of the oldest in residential training. That luxury was stopping then. I'm enjoying your talk already: you speak very well. I agree; it's best without penetration software."

There were some giggles and a bloke said, "Penetration hardware is better."

"I suppose I will never live that down. County reports and statistics suggest that for the most part we are like many a seaside community, and ours starts with Sutton-on-Serninsea to the north, Serninsea itself in the centre, and Titansea to the south. Titansea does have a dock as a later Victorian dredging effort into the sea, and maintained ever since - but shipping is limited. There is, for example, wood importing supporting a windows and doors business, and some grain importing. So we are agriculture plus tourism plus coastal industry. The biggest hotel is on the boundary of Serninsea and Titansea, so it gets tourists and business users.

"My husband works in Titansea, which measures measurements in shipping and other transport. It was originally called Serninsea Measuring Services but now is Systematic Measuring Services, or SMS. It put a second base out to Hartlepool and then added Harwich, but Felixstowe is now dominant operationally. Harwich became the headquarters. Serninsea as a whole does have a necessary second hand car sales business, although there is a luxury car showroom that seems to do no business at all. There is some agricultural processing.

"As for tourism, attractions include an entertainment park called The Playground, sandy beaches and dunes (but mud in some places), and likely developments include a seal sanctuary. Poor roads work against day trips, but the trend towards day trips releases more residential accommodation.

"Serninsea is beyond the very extended London commuting belt. To get to the the county capital Wytham, we have nothing but single carriageway roads over moderate hills. The bus service takes two hours to get to Wytham. By car, Wytham is an hour away at best, except by flashing blue lights. We lost all our outward rail links locally thanks to the short-sighted Doctor 'B'.

"However, a group of volunteers, unemployed and community service order people have rebuilt rails and created a heritage line and tram service as both an attraction and directly useful for the locals. But we also need an east of England M11 extension - not near Wytham but up the east side of its county.

"The isolated local health service is busy, but these services are all better covered at Wytham. We do have a walk-in clinic as well as a mini-hospital. It's essential, given the number of retired and those on sickness benefits.

"Retailing is more essential than elaborate: we have two large stores and the discounters.

"We have an Further Education college. Foss Upper Coast College emphasises training. And qualifications are low. We need more training for health and technology. It has only a tiny Higher Education section. Wytham has a university: I went further west to the East Midlands University for a time. Again, my husband and I with degrees represent the smaller than usual top-end educationally. The early retired are the most educated. Labour force participation by men has fallen and women risen by just above national averages. That's typical."

"Who the hell thought up F U C C?" asked someone.

"Better than South Hollow Institute of Technology. They put one word under the other on the side of the main building!

"Migration-in has included those from abroad to make up the agricultural workforce and in our food processing plants in Titansea. It's created tensions, anti-European attitudes too - not between workers but between the elderly retired and foreign workers. We know all about the referendum. Suggestions once that we might have gas pipelines coming in faded away. We also missed out, oddly, on caravan parks and holiday camps.

"We have lots of terraced houses, mainly in Serninsea itself. Sutton-on-Serninsea is a bit posher. Where I live in Sutton are mainly bungalows and then houses like mine built since the 1970s and 1980s. The question is whether, at any one time, even with a surplus, the right kind of properties are available. The biggest and richest properties are beyond Titansea well to the south. Most are the well-off retired there, although I met a plumber recently with his wife with a six bedroom house and a long garden to the sandy beach just over the back gate. Very nice. They have their own, er, play room, sauna and forge as well."

(I thought I would write this despite Colin Cromer's hostility. I liked them!)

"Residents. Many are generation to generation. My own family, however, were migrators-in from just inside Nottinghamshire, after my eldest brother was born, for more farmland. The unemployed and seriously underemployed are less rooted; about a third have been resident for less than five years. My family recently migrated-out to Wales. We've received benefits-receiving people from the capital into our vacant properties, and these people feel rootless. Another lost group are the small but significant number of asylum seekers. The European population have suffered a political fiasco. So the local Council is less able to make more systematic use of property.

"Now, most want to live in Serninsea and would stay. Some move back in with parents. Some move in with a new partner. Some arrive having got a job, often better trained and educated than annoyed locals. The tribal hostility against Europeans is a long-standing mental construct among a more white English than usual population. Having more than the national average retired leads to older traditional tribal attitudes.

"What does wanting to live in Serninsea mean? It means returning to one's ancestral home town, or once having lived there as a child to be near friends, or as a healthier place to be, or once holidayed there why not stay, or a cheaper place to live, or for a lifestyle (as with my mum and dad), or to get away from another place. I know people who come to the isolated settlements to escape domestic violence or even become a little more anonymous.

"And housing reasons to move in are availability, to reuse what was a holiday home, to live ten months of the year and find somewhere else for two months, to find a bungalow, or live by the sea, or it is colder inland in winter even compared with the east coast.

"We get both ends: the underemployed, the long-term sick and carers, a working age sector has people struggling to make ends meet in low-paid tourist or service jobs, and the well-off retired who can afford a good location.

"Actually the young often leave - older workers seem to prefer the attractions of the seaside. You see them running bed and breakfasts. In-migration nevertheless is outstripping job growth that does exist, as Jonathan said.

At this point, I looked across at Jonathan, and then I looked across at the artist, drawing me speaking. 'Concentrate,' I told myself in my head.

"I was interested in the bishop's reference to upcycling. Archaeologically we have evidence of Iron Age and Roman recycling and repairing of existing materials. We throw away so much now, but they did not.

"And so - in my hopefully, hmm, penetrating description and analysis - I want to come to Serninsea's secretive underbelly. We have a drugs problem and an alcohol problem - we know that from the hospital and clinic activity. And then there is more than a rumour of prostitution. We seem to have a lot of it in Serninsea, and the underbelly of a sex industry. I recently met a reverend doing confidential work among sex workers. It is not impossible for a woman and even a man on the checkout during a day to be a prostitute at night, and I include people prostituting online. Massages are a front for more. In my past I was a photographic model and an artists' model, and that's because of the family's naturism: although I discovered that photographic studios are the thin end of the sex industry. Some of those who modelled went on to sell themselves more intimately, and some did not - like me."

I looked at this Allie, who seemed to be staring at me intently despite having put down her drawing pad.

"The Christian ethos ought to be compassion, service, even sacrifice, and building community.

"I've painted a portrait here." (I looked at Allie again.) "All we can do, as clergy, as Christians, is serve the locals. One of our terraced houses is a small mosque, one detached house is a gurdwara. That gurdwara does put on meals for anyone: 'Well done,' I say.

"Thank you."

Afterwards, the reference to prostitution skewed at least our table conversation, and from others' feedback too. Suggestions ranged from the frankly silly 'convert them' by a Reverend Peter Grimwade to developing a kind of faiths' social services. Some people, like Christabel Alberty, said they'd like to visit Serninsea, but it wasn't an easily-reached place on the national tourist trail.

We had lunch, and I suppose the question for me was whether yesterday's penetration plus was a one-off. I know these things happen at conferences. So we had a free afternoon, and I asked Jonathan if he wanted to, say, come out for a walk, see the sea front and more, perhaps join me and visit the Turner Contemporary.

"I'm afraid I have matters that need attention."

"Oh, of course. It's not as if you don't know the area."

Allie said, "I was expecting more theology from you. But I'd never have understood it."

Beach Walk (Wednesday 24th April)

In my room I wondered what the suffragan bishop and training vicar would think of my presentation. There was nothing that remarkable in it. Anyway, Wednesday afternoon was free time. I fancied a walk and dragged my brush through my hair.

As I arrived at reception the man who was in the lift called Michael White was sat. He'd join me, he decided there and then.

He was a lay person from Worthing. So when arriving at the beach I said, "You'll know the Reverend Julie then."

"I know them all at Worthing; she's new there. I hadn't seen much of her until I saw rather a lot of her in the lift."

"And me," I added for good measure.

"I saw rather more of you, unfortunately," he observed.

"Oh, don't say that."

"I mean unfortunate circumstances. Your, er, rosebud?"

"I'm Linda."

"I could see you were struggling from behind you."

To avoid my utter embarrassment, I just had to 'keep calm and carry on'.

"Shall we walk to the Turner?" I asked. "Go along the beach?"

"By then I will need the toilets," he said. "I think we have had enough of urinating in public."

Actually, walking on sand proved to be a bit of an effort so we returned to the paved area in parallel to the beach.

"Your surname on that paper; it's not quite the comedian's name."

"Indeed. I am Jupitas and the name comes from Jupitz, which my husband's family changed four generations up."

"My wife works in London, commuting from Worthing every sodding day. She uses her own surname. Guess!"

"Not unlike the late Cilla?"

"Or draughts. And I am like a house-husband, let out for a few days a year like at this conference. With some imagination Ms Black could work a lot from home."

"Like I said my husband works in Titansea, although at present I think he has gone already to see his mistress. Peculiar word, 'mistress'."

"Not exactly 'Jupitus' type funny, screwing..."

"She lived in Serninsea and moved to what has become his headquarters at Harwich."

"Ah. So he plays away. Oh dear. You might be reverting to your maiden name. You sure of this affair?"

"Oh yes. A name is just a name. Bode."

"Bodelicious." He turned his head to look at me with a smile.

"Ah, thank you. And I need to confront him, somehow. But I'm a deacon, and I don't want a separation to bugger up the priesting."

"Not to bugger up the priesting. No."

"I mean, I don't see why his playing away should upset my timetable."

"Quite. And, as far as I can tell, your sister urinator is single."

"She told me that."

"So I don't know how that worked out. Do they take on single pregnant women, or alternatively ask how a single woman gets pregnant in the job?" he wondered. "She probably moved to Worthing before the bump was visible."

"Ask her."

"You have children?"

"Nope, and will not."

"Well, not now," he said, "if he's playing away."

We walked nearly all the way to the Turner Contemporary. Then, I said to him. "That car over there."

"What?"

"Who's in it?" (I could tell.)

He said, "Ah. I think it is our conference bishop and indeed the very woman we were talking about."

"He told me he had matters needing attention. Don't look."

"He was looking at her."

She was in the driving seat, and they were talking to each other quite intensely.

My accompanier said, "Let's proceed directly to the gallery."

"What if they go in?"

"Perhaps they have been in," he said.

"Would have to have been a quick visit."

We arrived at the gallery, went in, looked around and appreciated some items, and then when we were outside again that car had gone.

I said, "Joseph Mallord William Turner is in a line to that modernity - his Romanticism, history painting, interiors, landscapes and seascapes including marinas. That ginger haired lass could be a bit romanticist in her sweeps of line."

"She's a bit sexy in those leathers. Would you contemplate having an affair now your husband has strayed?"

"No, not at all. Thanks for asking."

"I wasn't. Ms Black gives me my pocket money."

We walked into the streets and passed many shops - a number with artistic content - and boarding houses, guest houses and hotels, including some large ones.

Then Michael said, "It's her car again."

"Could well be."

"I made a mental note of the plate before," he said. "She's still in the driving seat."

"Oh. You do that, usually?" I asked.

"It's come in useful. If your husband is having an affair, it might be useful to you."

"Has your wife had an affair?" I asked.

"She just travels to work, comes home, and let's say pleasures me at home to clear her head."

"Treasure that," I said. "Aye. Detective work. I need to do detective work. Or find a detective."

So we were back for the evening meal, with Michael some more. The bishop and the pregnant cleric were separate again.

Bishop Jonathan came over. "Sorry I couldn't be with you this afternoon. I had some work to do, and then Julie Manns asked for my assistance, so I ended up going out after all."

"Oh."

"Can I see you later?" he asked. "After the evening meal?"

"Yes, of course. My room?"

"That would be best."

Later (Wednesday 24th April)

Before Jonathan did see me, I opened up my laptop on my knees on the loo, and did an online search and there was Julie Manns, Minister, Hollow Road Methodist Church, Brighton, and Good Shepherd Methodist Church, Hove. She'd had a four year stretch, her first own ministry. She was all of thirty two years old. She had been a lay preacher. She was not pregnant in the pictures.

I closed the laptop and placed it on the cupboard with drawers, and sat nervously on the foot of the bed.

When the sixty six year old knocked and simply marched into my room, I was like jelly. He was holding a book of some sort.

"What do you want?" he asked me, standing above me and close.

"I thought you wanted me," I replied, confused.

"I do. But I'm asking you. You see, you're not yet a priest and I am a bishop."

"I know that."

"You."

"Me?"

"I don't just give myself to anybody. I'm a bishop and I expect obedience."

"Doesn't consent come into it? Oh, I give my consent freely."

"Perversely, a Reverend Deacon has more leeway than a priest. You know why, in Catholic understanding?"

"Because priests do the Eucharist?"

"Yes, exactly. Priests are the arms of the bishop. In a way, the deacon is a glorified preacher with pastoral outreach. Your obedience is, let's say, less critical."

"You asked to see me," I said.

"Actually, to tell you that."

"I already know it. Tell me what you want and I will obey."

"Obedience."

"Look, Jonathan, don't play around with me."

"Do you want anything?"

"What do you mean?"

"From me. Now. Anything, everything?"

"Yes! You do know that. My body wants you."

"Good. It is about the body. It's about words too, translating to the body. Lie back on the bed, hold this up and read from the page I have selected, at chapter 5, verse 2, and wait for further instruction."

I laid back and held the book with both hands, and raised my arms vertically to read from the verse as instructed.

"I slept, but my heart was awake. Listen! my beloved is knocking. 'Open to me, my sister, my love, my dove, my perfect one; for my head is wet with dew, my locks with the drops of the night."

"Go on to read verse 4, while I get your shoes off and then take your trousers and knickers off."

"My beloved thrust his hand into the opening, and my inmost being yearned for him."

"No knickers," he said. "Means no blood, too. Pity. Sometimes we are blessed. We'll do what the scripture says."

"Jonathan, you can't. You cannot get your hand in."

In fact I became naked and so did he. He was in good shape.

He prised me open, and started to look.

I closed my legs somewhat, asking, "What are you looking at?"

"You. You were so tight before and I want to open you up. You've given your consent, now take my authority."

"You can't. That's why I was so tight. Look, if you want to go deep, use my mouth. The words of my mouth come from my body! I'll get on the floor, on my knees."

I did this to protect myself and take the initiative. I rapidly demonstrated something that fascinated him. I could lick his balls with him readily erect and completely inside my mouth.

"I have never, ever, crumbs, had this done to me before. Struth."

I couldn't reply, of course.

After some of this treatment he then asked, "What else can you do?"

When I released him, I said, "You could fuck me deep in my arse but I haven't brought any lubricant and I'm not prepared."

"So what you just did, I'll go again?"

"Yeah. You can fuck my mouth. Try it."

So now he was thrusting into my face, ever more and more, soon holding the back of my head with both hands. Gosh, I'd never been so horribly fucked in the head like this before. (Keith gave me the technique to absorb length, but he was never aggressive.) And I did not flinch. I think Jonathan was trying to force me to pull away, but I was not going anywhere. I would prove to be his sexual equal. For the first time in many years I was producing some gunge down in my throat, responding to this form of sex. But I was never going to throw up, like I did in the early days with Keith.

He climaxed, deep in my throat and gave out a groan, saying, "For the love of God!" If I hadn't learnt how to breathe through my nose with discipline I'd have been suffocated. When he stopped, he was bent over me and out of breath, and out of my throat he held me to his lower stomach. I took a deep breath.

I said to him, "I wand du day wiv you overnight'."

I realised he had caused me some pain inside, somehow.

He didn't answer for a while but then he said, quietly, "Might be tricky."

Two naked bodies clambered up on to my bed and we lay side by side.

Changing position on to his knees, he used his tongue on my clitoris, pointing out it was large and he did at times try to open me, and insert a digit a little, and repeated about it being tight. He brought me to orgasm by his tongue and said again, "Our Holy Spirit descended!"

After five minutes or so I got up to go the sink and rinsed out my mouth. When I looked in the mirror, my eyes were red and I had some gunge on my face and also gunge and sperm still emerging from my left nostril. Perhaps my body was trying to protect me. I also moved my jaw about.

From the small bathroom, having spat into the sink with water several times, I called out to him with a towards a croaky voice, "That chap Michael and I saw you this afternoon."

"Like I said, I was with Julie Manns, the pregnant woman."

I swilled out my mouth for a final cleanse and returned to the bed. He was sat up and no longer in a state of excitement. I said, "Yes, you were in her car, and you were deep in conversation."

"She has issues. She is a single woman."

"Methodist minister."

"Shame about that really. We could do with her talent."

"I'd like to stay with you overnight," I said to him. "I really would. Come on. I want you close and fuck me several times overnight. Jonathan, I want you. I'm already aching between my legs in anticipation. I can be fucked in the usual place; I can't be fisted."

"It wasn't exactly obedience."

"I wasn't refusing you; I was informing you. You know that from yesterday. Stay with me later tonight."

"I can't. I just can't. It's the risk."

"Were you with Julie last night?"

"You're twisting things. Don't do that. She has issues. I spoke to her early morning, yes. The afternoon off allowed her more of my pastoral attention. I do have a public face, and I'm taking a risk now in your room. Your obedience is also to my answer 'no'."

"So by obedience you mean preserving your public face."

"Part of it."

"I'd move to Margate."

"Linda. I am in a marriage that is a shell. It carries on, but it is defunct. But this is what people see - the surface. You are, I know, married. You are now effectively having an affair during a conference. It happens. You have your public face to preserve as well."

"Really?"

"Are you going to report back to your vicar that you slept with me? Let me know how that goes."

"I want to sleep with you!"

"We might well meet again in a different setting. I'm only really doing this because retirement is around the corner. If your marriage is in trouble then perhaps it needs sorting out."

"I want fucking," I told him. "By you. Let me comfort you."

"There's an apostolic order," he said to me. "Obey it."

I looked at him with a strange, skewed face, at such a comment, as if his bishop life determines his sex life directly, but he got himself dressed and left the room.

"Huh," I said alone. "Those blue eyes. Sod it. I'd have fucked that Michael tonight."

In the evening session, the Reverend Peter Grimwade gave a stupid presentation about winning seaside people for Christ, in which he said little that could not have been said about any other kind of town. I did listen but I wasn't concentrating. He did say that perhaps seaside towns have church visitor services and services for the older folk, and reach out to the transient homeless. The point is they are not particularly homeless!

We have different ecclesiologies, he later exclaimed in discussion. I'd wanted to be on Allie's table but was not. My voice was slightly affected but I looked rough.

Michael Crozier and Betty Willingdale (both from the coastal town Hornsea in Yorkshire) said plenty. Their town lost its railway and did drift somewhat.

Later I was angry. I went and stood outside Michael White's door but returned to my room to sleep.

Margate - Intellectual Indigestion (Thursday 25th April)

I was a bit annoyed waking up and getting my dilators out for a ten minute session. If only he could have fisted me: I felt so violent towards myself. I was angry for being so shallow: I'd spent a lifetime affirming my body and now I felt negative. Good job I wasn't speaking today, I thought.

We weren't sure if he was going to turn up or not. If he didn't, we'd have had open discussions. But, here he was: for Thursday morning, the Archbishop of All England, the (Scottish) Most Reverend William Blair Rothach, sometimes called William Kantos Albion (contrast with David Eoforwic Albion for York). Breakfast had finished, when I had deliberately sat alone, and he was meeting Bishop Jonathan.

Why was I sat alone? Because, within hours, this would all be all over. I'd not see Jonathan again, nor the redhead female now in complete black leather and boots with steel at the front - like safety boots.

From the microphone the Archbishop said, "I gather that you have had a most productive conference and hope it has produced a process of anakephalaiôsis."

Yes, he was speaking in his own incomprehensible style.

"To discuss the seaside residence as a community with a distinctive character does draw on images of local adaptation and diversity, in dynamic relationship with comparative and contrasting communities, the muscles and sinews of which do not fail to hold us together especially when theologically we detect a hermeneutic of Christian trust. This action of the Holy Spirit is not, I believe, unlike the pattern of the trochoid wave. It suggests a pattern of a dynamic God, almost hidden, even misinterpreted as people think of the sine wave. And then as the ground becomes shallower, the wave breaks: as the land comes, action takes place towards some sort of end point.

"I understand that the papers given in the past three days have suggested that seaside communities have problems almost by the choice of migrating in, except this pattern of activity is not, perhaps, a market information choice: it is seeking a better environment by those with few resources. And yet there is that wave that breaks presently. So seaside communities may consider that they have to take their own liberation in hand. Being a people of God suggests a conflictual tone, for which there is biblical foundation, whereas being a family of God is more functional. We are a family, in that hermeneutic of trust, if the actual families are often not there: the retired move in and their families only visit, and younger individuals enter in a fragmented form. So these people should build communities as substitute families and functional units to better themselves with what resources are available and can be developed."

He seemed to me to be wanting to say something theologically, and something practically, or, more likely, the practical was being mystified or garbled by a gloss of theological terminology.

"In this sense God assists those who set up assisting themselves: not in an aggressive way, but each looking out after the other. And the seaside community is all about hospitality, so not just in a commercial sense, but in the sense of joining together from all these individual properties in which people attempt to live. Let's improve a street; let's help one another with repairs and decoration; let's learn practical skills and raise one another up; let education and training be truly local; let the all-important health services have to relate to the populations and be accountable to them; let us build up a local culture of binding potential, one that gives rise to the identity of a seaside community. Let's have communities in churches.

"And, incidentally, out of localities grow a nation, from the nation we gain shape.

"I am not suggesting some left wing collectivist solution here, even if co-operatives have their place. I am being quite centrist: making use of not-for-profit social enterprises, for example, as established in legislation from 2005. These are not charities, but businesses, although businesses with a clear social agenda and purpose, and I am myself on the boards of a number of them, and I believe you are, Bishop Jon, as well. They can be involved in health, lifelong learning, skills and simply doing things that people need.

"And if I mention lifelong learning, can I make a plug for the purpose of theological education? A theologically educated person is capable of sometimes risky and innovative interpretation, and sees any life that is fruitful in this sense. If we are going to develop the sensus fidei fidelium, it is needs receptivity enhanced by education, so that the mystical reality nurtured by the Holy Spirit can be discerned.

"We have social sciences, for example: economics, sociology, and politics, and these, no doubt, have much featured at this conference. But even our bodily God is not some object lying around for examination, nor for acquiring qualitative and certainly, impossibly, quantitative data: because the approach to God is about seeking transformation at a social or individual level. Not just recording qualitative data, either, but making a difference. I am not a Barthian, so that I do not identify with a work I read only yesterday by Alan Lindsey. Perhaps I am closer to his sister, Andrea. Nevertheless, I appreciate the debate; I appreciate the contribution to theological literacy. But, unlike with the dialectitians, there is a role for religion as culture, culture as identity, culture so that we function into a kind of knowing who we are and can become, a counterbalance to the necessity of the market and its information, and all thus under God."

Dialectitians? Ah, 'dialectical', opposites made to argue it out.

"Christian theology itself begins with events of transformation. There is, of course, the Jewish revelatory background, but we are bound to see fulfilment in what we can tell of the life and resurrection of Jesus Christ. This is the core, I think, of a culture that says we can be renewed, can gain life from death.

"It's beyond these social sciences and beyond history: it presses our language to the maximum, when the world is not just as observed and analysed, but challenged for what it can become.

"This is our potential to achieve in educating us in theology: to get attuned to what everything can become, to see it, absorb it, and pass it on in no little sense that others may participate in this quest. Learners teach; teachers learn. Quod omnes tangit ab omnibus tractari debet. Can we educate seaside communities to become theological communities? We can then tell the Christian story as embedded into the seaside communities' possessions of stories, none of us then failing to learn one with another as we go on to be led by God within those combined stories towards transformation.

"Preachers: think of your sermons like this, and your study groups, and those you meet pastorally and whom you inform, with the people bounded by the coast. And of course there is the all-important unexpected encounter with another: a believer's vision or someone we cannot categorise.

"Yes! We call this discipleship, that follows on from discernment. It is actually a skill for living. It employs a whole heritage of narratives, perspectives, images and metaphors.

"The Bible uses these in telling us what makes the difference: the transformative difference. It's about the fullness of Being, and the Being of God is always fullness. God, as seen in Christ, as witnessed in the Bible, as worked through with further difficulty in tradition, turns over the conventions, as we see in the Christ-life lived and death faced and death overcome. The Pauline witness is a struggle to realise. He does nothing but realise. It is uncomfortable, and tells you what you don't want to know and feel - more often than not.

"As we move through tradition, we see that doctrine is like a guidance towards transformation. It's like doorways: beliefs and practices, orthodoxy and orthopraxy. Such is not a comfort blanket: fundamental to Christian understanding is that it comes at a cost.

"It is not about things far away and long ago: not like Waiting for Godot. 'Do you remember how lovely the Gospels were?' No. It is always about now and the coming future. If it isn't, it's not doing its job. The holy lives are to be formed and come, and these within communities. Yes! Companions they are, in the past, now, and into the future: folk of faith and trust. And trust means obedience, obedience in faithfulness.

"This, after all, is the make up of the body of Christ, and what it does is provide a different means of transformation beyond that of the market economy, that other invisible hand. Not just that, but providing values that glue and give identity, so that we can inform what we call the nation. This is why I am in the National Church, and what it means. The nation is a Gospel Nation: this without diminishing the work of different denominations and different faiths. Seaside communities are self-understanding and often with values, beyond just grabbing and grasping; and such beginnings of identity form the basis for a transformative identity in the promotion of a more complete freedom.

"I hope I have been sufficiently on-topic. I hope this has been to anakephalaiôsasthai even further. God bless you all."

To my table, I said (with a slightly croaky voice) that these social businesses facilitated privatisation by the back door. Julie Manns said she was completely puzzled and hadn't a clue what he was on about. Allie said she would investigate the role of Latin in producing theological gloss. Michael of our walk said there was a conflict between the implied market solution and the need for cultural glue: a dangerous nationalism and a bad use of religion.

Then the Archbishop spoke to us all. "I know because you told me, Bishop Jon, and I had a chat, that we are not without a special intelligence in this room and a student here who hopes to do a Ph.D possibly on religion and coastal communities. Am b 'urrainn dhut innse dhuinn mu dheidhinn? Allie Shrimpton."

I said to my table, "That wasn't Latin."

"Mi?" said Allie close by.

The Archbishop looked at the Bishop of Margate, who nodded.

I thought, suddenly, has Jonathan Eyre fucked the one in black leather and steel-tipped boots as well? Couldn't he just have stayed with me?

William Blair Rothach said, "Thig agus thoir seachad do òraid."

Allie said to us, as she got up from her seat: "He said then, 'Come and give your speech,' in Gaelic."

Gaelic, to a woman from Norfolk? I know that William Rothach hailed from West Scotland but she didn't. What a lovely backside she had, in that reflective leather.

Allie went to the microphone. There was that intense pong again; I'm sure it came from her rear, escaping even such tight leather. "Chan eil òraid agam, Uilliam. I haven't prepared anything, ah bor! Tha madainn bhrèagh ann. Everyone, I'm Allie. Namaste. Moy hart alive! Twenty-nine, nearly thirty. It's a fair scolder here."

People looked blank, including me.

"Oh. I was saying, 'I haven't got a speech' and 'Lovely morning,' I think, to the Archbishop William. Bishop Jonathan told me that Gaelic is your first language. Don't press me too far on it! And then, everyone, I lapsed into some of my own local speech. Sorry. Well, anyzing I say derives from moi work at The Glastonbury School of Folk and Ethnographic Studies at The University of Somerset. I am myself looking for his sort of micro-sociology in a symbolic interaction study.

"I know... There's a rum academic called Bruce Reed. He made studies of liturgy and symbolism, and these were from a standpoint o' psychological dependence. Nineteen..."

"Seventy eight," said the Archbishop. "Died in 2003."

"Yeah. Ah. People: they do oscillate from dependence to healthy independence, from self to the world. So the Christian liturgy is supposed to pick people up and transform them..."

"Go out into the world and live and work to his praise and glory!" said the Archbishop, interrupting again.

Allie continued again: "As derived from the Christian myth of loss and resurrection. Liturgy gives that strength to do this, transforming. Sins are forgiven, renewal takes place. But Reed says that people get hooked on them symbols themselves. Symbols in Christian worship are supposed to point through themselves to the transformative revelation they represent, he says. But, as in rates o' passage, people become attached to the rate itself, and that it goes nowhere else.

"This is supposed to be so in communal, area churches, loike where folk religion predominates. Folk religion is: superstition, fetishness - I loike fetish clothing and it is symbolic! - and misplaced understandings.

Hmm. To me, Reed represents arrogance: privileging official interpretations, 'eld by clergy, for example. Symbols still point outwards, but to meanings of significance among the people themselves. And, when ya think abou' it, these symbols were often pinched from the Pagans anyway and these do give sustenance and project one into loife itself. So baptism ain't just 'being done' with water but points to the universal baby, the life of generations, the family as it is now, the importance of the name in the family line. And in ordinary services, let's not forget the collective fellowship of coffee and biscuits a'terwards!

"Bruce Reed is basically arrogant. I'd hull a lot of 'is crap. Why is this important? Because many coastal places, probably not seashores, are places of risk, and risk encourages superstition, so-called, and therefore ya religious practice, where provided, will be used by people who'll interpret available symbols their way with some intensity.

"Probably moi research will be no more than researching a church from within, or perhaps an industry where superstitions exist. Perhaps there are behaviours far from official expectations - who knows. This is all I want to say. Ya can all have a mardle."

The Archbishop said, "That was not unchallenging. Churches are like authors, and who knows how the authored texts are read? Yes. Of course symbolic interpretation connects narrative events with meaning, popular after the Reformation, whereas figural interpretation connects narrative events with God's promises and his relationship with us. But to what you say: Pagans surely would make their symbolism precise to their claims; our symbols do closely interlock on our narrative and the rootedness of the early Church launching in relationship with the risen and ascended Christ, guaranteed further through the Church's apostolicity through to this time, symbols therefore essentially of Christ's tria munera."

"What?" I wondered to myself. Talk about intellectual indigestion. When Allie sat, I said, "Hey! Come to Serninsea. We could use you." (She did not reply.)

And that was it. The conference was done. But before we broke up, and after I packed, in my room, I gave the Margate sixty-six year old a good snog, and he gave my forty year old body a good grope. I wanted more.

"You have used birth control," he said, so late on.

"I told you. I won't get pregnant," I replied in a still affected voice. "Can't we just now..."

"Linda, people are leaving. We can't. Obey me. Learn to obey your bishop. One day I may see you again." So I decided to leave it to a memory with a further snog. "God bless you," said Jonathan. "See your affected throat as an offering. Seriously."

At the station on the curved platform was Julie Manns, who offered me a fruit drop. I thanked her. Also nearby was Allie Shrimpton, who I thought was stunning, still in leather and those boots. Allie gave me a broad smile. Julie said it's all right being a lay preacher around a circuit, but a minister has so much more to do. Anyway, she'd soon be having a maternity break. She hoped to sit on Worthing sea front with her new-born in better weather. She baffled me by saying that the Archbishop could do with learning some Zen Buddhism and face a wall in silence.

"One more thing," said Julie. "Thank you for what you did in the lift."

"Sure."

"You proved yourself worthy. God will bless you." She took me by both shoulders, pressed her bulge into me a little, and kissed me on the mouth with some passion. "Thank you," she said. I didn't have a reply because I was somewhat taken aback.

Allie, with a hefty bag by her side, was looking very directly at this. Julie's train departed before mine. Allie got on mine, but elsewhere. Was that distance deliberate, after seeing Julie kiss me?

At London St. Pancras, walking off the platform lugging my bag and with shoulder bag, I looked forward and saw a familiar face. It was Allie and bag, looking at me and waiting. She gestured for me to go forwards to her. I stopped and stood. She now put her hands to my shoulders and kissed me on the lips, directly and sweetly. "Bye," she said, quietly. She gave me one last direct look, then she picked up her bag, turned and walked off, not looking back.

I melted on the spot. I just did not move. Her lips were so sweet. People walked around me. She had seen Julie do it, and clearly decided she had to do it. For that obvious consideration, it had meant more, a lot more, than Julie's kiss. I went on the underground to Kings Cross in a semi-daze. Perhaps I should have followed her to Paddington, I thought. (I assumed Paddington.) The direct train stopping at Rasa Market went by in a dream: a dream of Jonathan thrusting in my throat in a way that I wanted more, peeing with pregnant Julie and her direct kiss, and the gorgeous body and beautiful kiss of Allie.

I was left to reflect at home on my own. He was fucking Cheryl in Harwich with frequency while I was taking a lemon drink with vinegar. She was there for him, but no one was here for me.

I had an essay to write, but not to include Allie's kiss, Julie's kiss and Jonathan's sessions.

A Strategy to Investigate Keith (Friday 26th April)

I was naked, sat, and two women came into my focus. One was a woman with no face and very long red hair, like a curtain spreading across the ground. The bare feet and naked body of another woman was alongside her, with unkempt pubic hair. It was the short haired face of Mouldy, Cheryl Mould, like when she was at school.

Cheryl said to me, "If you want to see the colour of her pubic hair, you are going to have to give your blessing to Keith and me."

I said, "I don't want to see the colour of her pubic hair. I can guess the colour. Try red."

"What if it isn't red? What if it is pink? Pinky poos, like the inside of your mouth? Down your throat! Down your throat!"

"My throat? Her hair? Pinky poos?"

"If you see the colour of her pubic hair, she is going to have lots of babies, because she kissed you. Pink is where you want to be. Pink and drippy and wet, like your gob, and like he has been in my pink and drippy and wet..."

I saw the bedroom and neither of these women were there. Friday morning. I was awake and then the alarm went off.

So I needed a plan. I wanted to investigate Keith, but not to be known investigating him. I needed to disguise an investigation, run it within something else, somehow, so that if it went wrong it would not come back to me. And the opportunity was indeed presenting itself imminently: the annual stress testing of inspecting the inspecting at his work setting. Merge it with that - so becoming of that and not me - and shift the focus to create a sleight of hand.

I thought, given the delays already, let's see if Keith's boss is really interested in a proposal from a wife for adding to the quality of the investigations, or if it is all talk. I had observed the stress a year back and therefore knew something of what I could offer.

I left my mobile phone at home. After Morning Prayer and with Colin first talking to a parishioner elsewhere, I rang SMS from the vestry with a proposal in confidence for Sir Sanjay Bunker.

"Tracy de Tracey, speaking, PA to Sir Sanjay Bunker. Sir Sanjay is not available now so perhaps I could take a message."

"Yes. Linda Jupitas. Well it is this: I can assist in the internal annual checking. Keith Jupitas works with Yojana Asthana; he's in Compliance and she is in the Independent Assessment Unit."

"Interdependent Investigations Unit," said the PA. "We've just renamed it and merged with Harwich and other outstations. Compliance investigated; the IIA is supposed to see that Compliance works without fear or favour. Please continue."

"Yes, well perhaps they are too friendly to be working on checking for integrity. My message is that as a wife I could set up a different private detective from George Wickenby to examine whether their friendly relationship is too close to be fit for purpose - in that she is not able to check him without preference or prejudice."

"Well, I've got that. Sir Sanjay should see this on his screen very soon. He is, in fact, in Harwich at the moment."

"Anyone could see that screen," I said.

"No, it is secure. His screen only. If he doesn't get to see it I will let him know of your message. You've not got marital troubles have you?"

"No. Yojana is a good friend. I'm responding to your boss welcoming input, and also my husband said I should be positively involved. He will actually like this; but, obviously, for the time being, neither he nor my friend Yojana can know about this."

"No, I suppose not. Thank you. Anything else?"

"Thank you. Please contact me by this line, not my mobile phone. There is an answer machine; use it only to tell me to ring back confidentially. I'm a minister of religion so that's the basis of confidentiality here."

I sat back for a few minutes and got hold of my hairbrush for a tug through my long hair. Colin Cromer came into the vestry, and said, "I thought your voice was a little bit croaky this morning. You must have been speaking a lot in Margate."

"Not sure."

"I can look, if you like?" I opened my mouth. "To the light, Linda, please. Say 'ah'..."

"Ah."

"I hope you're not going to get a temperature and come down with a cold."

"Nothing as yet," I said.

"Leave your hair alone, Linda. Now: Margate. Was it good?"

"Better than good." The telephone started ringing. I was expecting Sir Sanjay Bunker or a representative. "Excuse me, Colin, it should be for me. The Reverend Linda Jupitas speaking."

"Ah, at the workplace. Good! Bishop John here. It's you I want to speak to."

"It's Bishop John," I said to Colin.

"For me?"

"For me."

"Oh."

"Very briefly, Linda. I just want to say that my distant colleague was more than impressed with you. You made a big impact. You gave a very well-crafted speech to the various representatives and contributed fantastically to the discussions afterwards. Your speech dovetailed with Jonathan Eyre's very well. I think he mentioned you to William Blair Rothach, our Most Reverend, along with, em, a fascinating, er..."

"Bishop Jonathan spread the word about a talented Ph.D student, a real talent."

"Social anthropologist or something." I was going 'grrr' inside. He must have had her as well. Calm down! "Linda?"

"Sorry. Thanks for providing most of the information, Bishop. I stripped off the statistical data for a handout and then went through the issues; I put some of my own history in to it as well."

"You were also warm and friendly throughout and the bishop heard about you from others. You showed a strong pastoral side to the needs of a pregnant woman. You also showed a capacity to obey instructions. So, well, I will let Colin Cromer know that you made such a positive impact and it can only do you good in the Church."

"He's here now."

"Put me on, then. All the best and God's love to you."

"And to you, Bishop John. Thank you."

Colin listened. When he put the phone down he said, "Well done, Linda. You made a good impression on Bishop Jonathan and helped a woman in need as well. Things are looking up. I'm going now."

"I'd like to stay and consider my report or essay I am expected to write."

"Leave you to it then. Here is a good a place as any for thinking time."

I saw Bishop Jonathan in the vestry smiling at me, and undoing his trousers. My mouth was going hot in anticipation. It was after an hour of sleep that I was jolted awake by the telephone ringing. It was Sir Sanjay Bunker, the man himself, who indeed was contacting me from Harwich.

He said, "What a privilege to hear from you. This is a very good idea. It needs to be done pretty much immediately. Too many delays already. I have a budget for these matters. So tell me. It's like, well not quite them having an affair; I don't think you were saying that: just too close to be effective. What do you suggest you do?"

I said to him, "Well I can go to the other detective agency in town, which is run by an Adam Magellan, I understand. I like Yojana and I have no suspicions. But Yojana could be too close to be effective. They obviously like each other so I'd make the investigation look like, on the surface, about the relationship between Keith in Compliance and Yojana Asthana in the renamed unit she is in. Too close and too unreliable in the same building. It might be a bit like investigating if they are having an affair, but I have no concerns myself on that."

He said, "I'm always happy for partners to take an interest in our business activities. Coming from you it means matters can be ever so secret, being a priest too, and so outside the normal approach. Yes, we can investigate a closeness between them that could be compromising professionally."

"Specifically that angle. Say, if they spend time together outside the office. Even time she spent with me! Just to help."

"We don't mind a closeness but nothing can undermine the wall that must be between them. But, if at any point this starts to go wrong between Keith and you then we must stop it - I mean, we don't want personal casualties."

I told him, "I'd said to your PA that Keith will be pleased that I've shown such an interest in his work. I do want to show an interest. He supports me in my ministry, I support him in his work, and all this comes from an excellent marriage, Sir Sanjay."

"Very good. Obviously we cannot tell your husband or Ms Asthana until well afterwards - at the debriefs."

"Quite," I said, "and yet we can analyse things and clear up potential misconceptions as part of any assessment and evaluation."

"On the other hand, I hope Keith hasn't been discussing too much of his work with you. You seem to be on the ball with this."

"I'm drawing on his general frustration with all the delays."

"Yes. This is behind merging the local units into one Interdependent Investigations Unit. We want people down here, across the water from Harwich, to build facilities of our own monitoring of our own investigating. Felixstowe is the new centre."

Partly I was wondering if this executive knew anything about Keith and Cheryl Mould down there. If he did, surely he would have been giving signals, like: this accepted proposal might be too sensitive a strategy, if he knew something.

"So I'll make the approach," I said, "to Mr. Magellan."

"Wait for instructions, first. But yes, do it then, because she is checking Keith's integrity so we also must check hers and the his-and-her angle. Yes indeed. We changed the name of the unit to integrate the inspecting process across the country; to effectively use Felixstowe in the future - a sort of horizontal checking. Obviously, Serninsea matters now. I will consult my senior management team."

"Yes. Perhaps have them travel around a bit: email things to her home or ours deliberately," I suggested.

Sir Sanjay said, "Obviously, we do this sort of thing anyway: as in, what he does see, what she does see, when are they together. And of course, in this case, if you do the arrangements for private investigating then it's not the firm doing it: not until the evaluation."

"Yes."

He said, "Wait for a signal from one of the senior team to proceed. By the way, if Keith gets wind of this then we must know, Reverend Jupitas, because we will have a very leaky system and that is no good at all. Thank you so very much."

So I looked up the website of Adam Magellan and, it turned out that the local webmaker was Peter Marshall - Peter, the young magician himself. He was described online as being in an apprenticeship. So that meant he was otherwise unemployed and working for free.

And then the address. Crumbs. He worked in the terraced house next door to Klärchen Sisse, the woman with Dieter the dog - someone to avoid.

Then, before leaving, I received another call, from Tracy de Tracey. "Sir Sanjay's management team for the internal checking likes your suggestion and wants it properly incorporated. Due to start next week, the internal investigations have been put on hold so that everything can be incorporated properly. Please wait for instructions and do nothing until you receive them from a member of the senior management team, who will call himself 'Martin Haralambos'."

"Yes of course. I'm intrigued and not a little excited. Martin Haralambos."

"Sir Sanjay sends his best wishes."

Whatever Colin had said, I was back attacking my hair again but had no need to clamp my bottom with the toilet nearby.

Narrator: Keith Decisions & An Initiation (Friday 26th to Sunday 28th April)

On Friday afternoon some of us were summonsed to the Red Diamond Club in Felixstowe. When I arrived, there was a purple helicopter parked on flat concreted land down the road from the club. It was attracting some attention, and a man in uniform was speaking to people around it.

I went in and a receptionist nodded me through. I could see Yojana herself going in ahead of me.

"You've come down here, Yojana!"

"Consultations. Hush hush. Travelled this morning."

Inside this large room there was a stage, and Bishop Terry Barman, Sir Sanjay Bunker, Bishop Jonathan Eyre and the Reverend Julie Manns were looking at two women wearing thongs only going through some sort of interactive dance rehearsal with each other. The thongs came off, and each leg went high on to the other person in this spiral of a dance. The music was loud but not as loud as it could be.

I asked Sir Sanjay if that was his helicopter but he said it had been purchased by Christine - she could afford this plus hiring a pilot. She'd given Yojana, Helen McPhail, Connie Wilson and one other from the Serninsea area a lift, and Leon Agnew her pilot went on and had brought in Jonathan and Julie from Margate. The Reverend Christine Vine came out of the toilets.

"I needed a shit," she said to one and all.

We were expecting Bishop Liz (Tess), the Reverend Jenny World and the Reverend Fatima Tamuuz all the way from Hartlepool.

This meant all three bishops would be together.

In the meantime Sir Sanjay commented that the dancers were rather good - employed a week ago. Ken Osis (spending time in Wytham) and Rabbi Maurice Neptune were also expected, driven by Maurice's own chauffeur.

Ken arriving said to me, "Professional driving makes such a difference."

The rehearsing stopped and our people were sitting around a long table. I gave Jenny a hug as she arrived, as she had initiated me. I stroked a bare bottom cheek under her dress, and she gave me an open-mouthed kiss.

Bishop Terry Barman said that this was an important extra meeting in which the three bishops would vote according to their own decisions but taking any advice from the rest.

We were asked to go and find rooms, and take a chosen partner. Because I was not supposed to be with Yojana too often, I asked Jenny if I could go with her. Fatima decided she'd come too, receiving some grumbling from Jenny. I didn't mind. I ended up entering both women, licking them both to orgasm and having them both bring me to orgasm by hand.

At each orgasm we said, "God bless us all."

Jenny said to me, "I don't think Linda is going to join us without a struggle."

I said that it would need a careful strategy but that recent events surely suggested that she would come to enjoy the group. But Jenny said that we could end up having to use Connie and Jim Wilson. Ken Osis caved in straight away, with their actions, but Linda might not cave in, and then what?

"Then it will be severe," I said, "but I know she can take it."

"She'll resist."

"She will submit. Look, I taught her that deep throat she did with Jonathan. Now she would not be without these skills."

I asked after Fatima's young daughter, Akemi. She was being looked after by a parishioner.

And so we all returned to the room with its table, and the three bishops came in together able to take binding decisions.

A decision already taken was using the language of theatre. Ken said we should become fluent and confident about its terminology and he had a handout of terms. We should now speak as if there was an amateur dramatics group in Serninsea, but it was only set up recently and unknown because they had not become ready yet to put any plays on. So Terry said the name of The Worshipful Company of Serninsea Theatrical Players had no negative impact on the Confraternity and its vanguard rule. Nevertheless even this new theatrical identifier should be used carefully and rarely. The badges would still be used in talent scouting, so to create a puzzle about what the badges meant, each version in their location.

Terry Barman asked for feedback on Ken's meeting with Linda.

"I'm claiming full pastoral confidentiality on that."

"You can tell us nothing at all?"

"Nothing, I'm afraid."

"I'm disappointed. Keith, what did she intimate at home?"

I added that she hadn't said a word about it. "Probably too intimate."

Sir Sanjay had news of an electronics firm in Serninsea where he knew some managers would receive rewards for their work in the way of our relaxation and pleasures. He would tell more later.

Bishop Elizabeth told us that the first divine decision was taken to extend the worshipful company and theatrical terminology to all locations.

The second divine decision was to go to South Wales in setting up a new Worshipful Company. Bishop Tess said it was a matter of obedience for Yojana to go with her, but as a lay woman she could decline. Yojana agreed and said she was enthusiastic. They would meet Niall Ifan, Bishop of Casnewydd, and Afanen Ffrwyth, Bishop of Mynyw. These meetings, Yojana had to understand, were to be conducted in secrecy.

Sir Sanjay said that Yojana could think about where to locate SMS's business on the south Welsh coast given the locations of the opposition.

"And now we turn to Reverend Linda Jupitas," said Bishop Tess. "The decision is already made to recruit her, and strategy comes under that decision. Bishop Terry.

He explained that Helen discovered by sheer accident Linda's flexibility in a public space, and thus he decided that she ought to go alone to Margate. She made a speech and participated, but what was a surprise was just how responsive she was to Jonathan here. "This is a very significant development."

Jonathan told us not just what had happened, as Sir Sanjay had told me in Harwich, but indeed what had further happened on the second full day. He had sex with her a second time.

"I spoke about obedience, and she understood that. I had to test her out. You see, she'd swalled my penis to the extent that she licked my testicles. So I let rip fucking her throat more strongly than I have ever done with anyone ever. I have to tell you: she nearly gave me a heart attack. My cum had gone in her throat and up through her nose and she did not flinch.

And then Julie mentioned the drawing, and a woman artist with whom Linda posed had nude. Neither he nor Julie had worn their W badges, as this would have raised unwanted suspicions.

Given the nude posing with this Ms Shrimpton, Julie said Jonathan tried it on with her to gain information. A researcher as well as artist, she told Jonathan in a corridor that she would crush his testicles if he didn't move away.

I commented, "So you don't possess magical powers concerning women. You're not 'Supersex Man,' I said.

"Soup only, I'm afraid," Jonathan said to laughs. "Oh, Linda made us laugh. She talked of penetration software instead of presentation software. Easy mistake."

Julie said she kissed Linda with intent at Margate station, and thought that Linda was a bit taken aback. Linda had suspected correctly that Jonathan and she were together overnight. Jonathan made their relationship visibly pastoral by being in Julie's car near the Turner Contemporary art gallery.

I gave my reaction of bafflement at Linda's behaviour, because she'd always been loyal to me.

Bishop Elizabeth asked if I could think of anything that might have prompted a change in her. I had no idea.

Then Jonathan came back with an astonishing question for me. "She's not a tranny, is she?"

"Hey?" I answered.

"Well, I opened her up for a moment and wasn't sure what I was looking at. She didn't want me to look, and feared being fisted."

I said, "You saw and felt her breasts, didn't you? No one could manufacture those."

He said, "Some transgenders have natural-looking breasts."

"She's female," I said. "And I cannot fist her either. You can do her arse, but she's being trying to tighten it up lately."

Helen said that on meeting her accidentally she was astonished at Linda's ease of manner, even when people walked past her naked on the beach. She urinated into the sand with her, and showed not the slightest embarrassment when Stephen did the same after he arrived.

"Well," said Jonathan, "she pissed on the lift doors with incredible force. Is that part of her tightness then?"

"Not really," I said. I confirmed that her naked father indeed used to just pee whenever he fancied it. Rabbi Neptune then said, that if indeed Linda and I separated and divorced - I said I absolutely would, and rapidly, there was no doubt about it - then his wanting Linda for his wife would inevitably introduce personal confidentialities.

Jenny then said that she wanted to maintain her distance from Linda. She loved the group and loved sex, but she didn't want to encounter Linda sexually one to one, even after all this time. She might change her mind once seeing Linda, but wanted some space. Yes, she would be at the ordinations, but that was a formal event in which she would be with others.

Given what Jenny had said, I said I also expected to be at the ordinations to support Linda, but that immediately afterwards I would announce my intended divorce. I would try and do it after the cathedral, possibly after a celebratory party. It might come as a shock to Linda.

We were reminded that some of us would be at the SMS party at the restaurant and then go on to the casino for the annual awards and afterwards our people under the Confraternity and guests could go above the casino for our indulgences. It was a fixed date that should have happened after the annual inspections stress testing, but now would be before.

I said I might have difficulties with participation. Cheryl should be at the restaurant and my wife too. Meanwhile, Cheryl had understood that my departure from Linda was assured, on a timetable, and therefore she agreed with keeping her distance until the separation happened.

Meanwhile, Bishop Elizabeth Huett told us that a queer and radical theologian, Bishop Gretta Cox-Jenkins, was coming to the UK from Canada, first visiting Scotland, calling in at Elizabeth's at Middlesbrough, and going on to do a theological gig for the Bishop of Wytham, Derek Imperial. Although not herself in the Confraternity, being Canadian, she knew about us and she was highly sympathetic. The bishops had long decided to include her ministry in our company. Liz, during their own get-together, would encourage Gretta to connect with Linda after the lecture. The venue was the University of Wytham, not the Cathedral. Liz knew Lutheran Gretta when she was a wandering bishop with her distinctive theology and behaviour to match. Her move to the Lutherans had simply given her a salary; her life of experimental relationships had become more private. Gretta also believed that to orgasm was to touch and taste the Kingdom of God, and had adopted the term 'theosexual. There were some parallels between Gretta's practices and those of the Buddhist Anong, Sheila Patterson.

Bishop Tess reminded us that the decision on Linda had already been taken; and once a priest Linda was not free to turn down their decision for her to come under the Confraternity. Her life in the Church would become extremely difficult if she did not succumb. However, her recruitment had to be done in a way to secure the anonymity of the Worshipful Company of the Serninsea Theatrical Players and the Confraternity. It could be tricky. The decision was further made that she would be initiated by Bishop Barman.

Rabbi Neptune was asked to assist early on, engaging her on theology. He said he would arrange something using the secondary school. Ken was to continue.

Terry said, "Try and tell us at least something next time."

I said there was one thing, not mentioned. "What of the Serninsea Cross brooch?"

Terry looked at Helen and then Connie and then at me. "It's not a Worshipful Company thing." He did not wish to reveal its donor in the sense of it being put in his hands for safekeeping. He realised it would have to be tested to pass the scrutiny of the archaeological community. He kept it on his person, so we had a look at it and it was impressive.

"Tess," said Bishop Terry, "I believe we have someone to initiate today in a Body Eucharist."

"He's been waiting outside," said the Reverend Deacon Christine. Christine left the room and returned with an Andrew Walter, using a walking stick. She introduced him as a highly intelligent individual with a talent for both philosophy and psychotherapy. An ex-fireman, he had been in an accident from which he had recovered but moved to administration. He was forty seven. She could imagine him being very useful from a pastoral point of view.

I'd known all about intentions to recruit him. As a lay person he had the chance to refuse to be a member. And here was a chance again to walk away.

Christine asked him, "Do you wish to join The Worshipful Company of Serninsea Theatrical Players under the discipline of the Principatus Theocratic Confraternitati admissis in Ecclesia Anglorum Nationalabus? And do you agree to abide by its collective decisions under the bishops and its rules of secrecy in all your guided representations of the group?"

"I do."

"You will be initiated after a confirmatory vote of the bishops," she told him, and kissed him on the mouth.

In this case the bishops immediately voted again to accept this lay person. (They did not vote a second time for a clergyperson, because the decision was compulsory upon that person: they could, however, vote to reject such a person in extreme circumstances followed by efforts to discredit the person in their clerical office.)

A naked female in high heels came in with a white cloth and placed it over the table. Two naked females, the ones some of us saw earlier, also in high heels, then came in with one unlit candle in a candlestick each. Rubbing them over their pubes, they were placed either end of the table. We got up as these three rearranged the chairs to face the table in rows. The three went out and returned with cushions, laying them in front of the table and white gowns. Finally the two dancers went out and came in with wine in a large glass and bread on a plate.

We all undressed to nudity and we as laity put on the open-fronted white gowns. The three women went out and brought in simplified clergy gear all folded up and some wrapped in plastic. These three then sat among us and did not wear gowns. Christine as a deacon added a collar and green stole on her open white gown. Priested clergy - Fatima and Jenny - each put on a green gown, collar and a green stole, and the three bishops each wore a purple gown, collar, and a purple stole. All the collars needed went on.

Christine as the deacon lit the candles, and withdrew to us as a congregation. The priests stood at the sides, and the bishops went behind the table. All the Eucharistic preparatory liturgical stages were followed, to the point where we took the elements with bodily contact.

"The Body of Christ," said Liz or Tel, giving the disc and touching the person's sex.

"The blood of Christ," said the Jonathan without touching anyone.

The final consumer was Andrew Walter leaning on his stick in front of the altar table. At this point of consumption, female clergy came to him one by one (Deacon Christine included). Each sucked him off for a few minutes and they otherwise stroked his flesh. Jenny was last to have him in her mouth, at which point Liz Huett came around. He lowered himself on to the cushions, laying his stick to one side, she squatted on to his vertical erect penis, and with her gown opening from the neck she demonstrated a skillful sexual intercourse.

Eventually we could see Andrew's twitches inside Liz with some moaning from him and strokes of support from Jenny and Fatima, and then Liz raised herself with sperm dripping from her cleft. She gathered it in her fingers for him to suck on them.

In other words, they had done what was essential in the Body Eucharist initiation, which was an exchange of fluids. He had given a material offering to receive a spiritual gift. Andrew had been initiated.

The service ended with a notice. Having been his talent scout, Christine would now mentor him, but he was himself going to talent scout Laura Kingswood, a friend. Although it was unusual to talent scout a friend, Laura had delicate issues that needed his knowledge and sympathy. Christine would help.

Christine then said to me that she didn't like her own liturgy! The body initiation seemed too cut off from the Eucharist and there could be, among the dedicated, a more participatory expressive exchange of body fluids than just seeing and feeling bodies.

When all this was over, we went upstairs to a suite of rooms in the Red Diamond club. Yojana went with Elizabeth for exploratory sex and talk about their future work together. Fatima insisted on being present wherever Jenny went, and I think the rabbi went with those two. I went with Helen McPhail and she was full of approval for Linda.

I was fucking her when I indicated that Jenny thought Linda would resist joining.

"Then Connie and Jim will sort her out regardless. Christine is often too busy so Linda will be the local initiating linchpin of the Serninsea Worshipful Company.

I brought Helen to orgasm but she understood why I did not ejaculate into her, because Cheryl expected my performance to be the usual in her quest for pregnancy.

The crowd stayed overnight, but I didn't. Incidentally, this was the first time I had been in the RDC, the sister of the Blue Diamond Club in Serninsea.

I went back to Cheryl, and said that the meeting in Felixstowe had gone very well, but she understood that I could not talk about it.

I had contacted Linda on Friday and Saturday for general messages. She said she had enjoyed Margate very much and learnt a lot. Yes, the Archbishop was as incommunicable as ever. Nevertheless, Saturday was a time to enjoy with my future wife and I did seed her a number of times. I drove back Sunday, after one more morning session with Cheryl.

My balls, required to be in super-manufacturing mode, were left with the sensation of being completely out of stock. And nothing going into Cheryl had ever dribbled out.

Chapter 05 Keeping Quiet with Keith

Narrator: Linda Quizzing Keith (Sunday 28th April)

Keith returned Sunday. I was already back from Evensong on Easter 2, completely unclothed, and he said nothing at all about Cheryl Mould. He said, "You didn't ring me the second night and since then I've done all the ringing just to see you were all right. So how did it go down there in Margate, beyond enjoying yourself?"

"I did enjoy myself. It was great. Conferences become intense and you're inside their world. My talk was well-received."

"You got on well with the Suffragan Bishop of Margate?"

"He gave the first speech. Lots of talking with him and others and my voice became a little croaky."

"You know what they say about him visiting local schools on the south coast and all those kids with no fathers?"

"Is this some sort of a joke?"

"He tells them to pray to the Father but forgets to tell them that this means him."

"I don't think that's very funny."

"Well, I didn't tell you before because you were at no risk from him."

"Or anyone else - not very funny either."

"Yes but he goes for younger women than you, and obviously fertile ones."

"Keith. This is quite nasty towards me. My body no longer entices you?"

"Mind you, he is about to retire so his personal solution towards evangelism is probably over."

"I found him to be a very considerate man. Yes, Jonathan Eyre is retiring very shortly."

"Well he loves the ladies, that's all. He definitely loves the ladies."

"By the way, when did you go to Harwich?"

"Wednesday. They let me go a day early."

"Not Tuesday."

"No, I had late work with Yojana Asthana before going to Harwich. But I got home first in time to relax, sleep, and drive down. Four hours with a fifteen minute stop."

"Hmm. You like it in Harwich: the people down there, the place, the headquarters..."

"I think I like them all down there. I get a lot done and it was good advice received. It gets this office here in full alignment with local offices Harwich and Felixstowe and indeed Hartlepool. I will have to work more with a bloke called Geoff Petty there. Tomorrow I put matters into action up here. Beneficial. Yeah. And they're merging these checking units, so Yojana herself was in Felixstowe on Friday."

"Talking about coastal communities can have beneficial effects."

"If you say so. Wrong people doing the talking, that's all. And did you see the Archbishop of All England? You didn't say."

"Yes, he did call in. Gave a contribution."

"The one-time paleoliberal. The market does everything, but religion provides identity. He supports education but thinks it should all be marketised. He hasn't thought it through: if theological education was marketised, no one would do it."

"I think he thinks everything through. I think you have become very cynical since you moved on."

"I think I was during, if truth be told."

"If you say so, Keith. I'm going to the kitchen."

Keith called out, "If truth be told, did you understand a word he said?"

"Yes!" I shouted back.

I told him that I wasn't going to prepare anything, was going out, and would return with hot food. I got dressed and put a coat on and went over to Diana's. Parked outside, I used my mobile to ask for fish and chips to be ready for my collection in a short while.

At her front door Diana let me in and asked what I wanted, and so I said I wanted to make a national private telephone call and did not trust to use the house phone or even my own mobile phone. She said I did not have to pay her, even for a call to Harwich.

Julie Vaughan was in. "It's Linda. I'm asking about my husband and Cheryl." My first question was about the day of his arrival, but she answered far more.

In summary: Keith and Cheryl turned up on Wednesday afternoon after her lunch time, and they were very much together; he obviously stayed at her house; he spent one working afternoon without her over at Felixstowe, but she was quite open that he was staying until Sunday morning.

I said I would employ a detective.

I thanked Diana and said I was going to collect some fish and chips. This I did swiftly, and drove home.

This did raise a question as to why he did not answer the house telephone on Tuesday evening. Well, Julie knew only when he appeared on Wednesday. I assumed they'd have gone out somewhere together. So, as far as I cared, at least Wednesday night to this Sunday morning he was banging Cheryl Mould.

Frankly, eating the fish and chips, Keith was being super cool about everything, the sort of person who could beat a polygraph lie detector. I wasn't telling, either. I could not allow a divorce at this time.

In bed he read while I tried a larger dilator for late Sunday evening. I thought of Jonathan yet again and then Allie at London Victoria. I wondered how she felt. Probably she kissed the next woman to come along in her life. She looked younger than me.

He Must Wait (Tuesday April 30th to Wednesday May 1st)

I faced a naked woman with ginger pubic hair that was long and flowing. It was her again. Then I realised with the alarm clock going that I had Tuesday Morning Prayer to attend. It would allow me to clear my head.

After Morning Prayer, Colin Cromer handed me the telephone. "Sir Sanjay Bunker, no less. For you, apparently." Colin left the vestry. No, my head would not be cleared: there were things to do.

Sir Sanjay said to me, "After our conversation on Friday morning, everyone involved is planning your additional exciting method for investigating alongside our usual methods, and we've also made some changes elsewhere. We have been working with the George Wickenby agency as well."

"Keith is getting agitated," I told him.

"I think we should allow him the time off that would have come afterwards. There is a lot happening, including with your idea. We must get this right because we have some evidence elsewhere - in fact your husband has been finding it - that not all parts of our business are secure. Here is the problem. The fact that he has found problems elsewhere means all the more that we have to investigate him. This is why your contribution could be invaluable."

"It's like being a company wife," I said.

"This is how we like it. Some wondered about the angle of attack: Yojana and your husband, coming from you, but it makes sense regarding friendliness and documents."

"It needs handling properly," I said.

"If you are uncomfortable with this we might have to operate differently."

"On which point, you mentioned George Wickenby. I'm sure he's good but it is best for me to go with someone else," I said.

"Yes, I see. So it must be like you doing it, indeed only you doing it."

"Until afterwards," I said. "It still needs strong company evaluation afterwards. Yes?"

"Yes, of course. Well your role doesn't have to be revealed even afterwards, but that might be unethical."

"I think we could all have a really good debrief afterwards," I said. "It won't be a problem because, as I've said, I'll have taken an interest in his work. Keith will appreciate that - once it is done."

Sir Sanjay said, "Good. I'll inform those in the need to know, and from now on I'd appreciate it if you keep away from phoning or contacting the managers. Tracy de Tracey or someone will contact you."

"Can I ask you a question about Keith?"

"If it is ethical, if I can answer and it's not a company-confidential matter. Refusal may annoy."

"Do you think he is likely to be promoted further and move up - or is it down - to Harwich?"

"If he applies, I think it is quite a possibility. There is a rising amount of operational work in Harwich and especially Felixstowe. But would you want to be a priest in Harwich or Felixstowe? Is there a vacancy?"

"I rather prefer it around here; it's where I was brought up. But you never know."

"He could be senior level management in Titansea too; but it is limited for openings there and we don't know the future with your one dock and poor roads. Originally, Titansea allowed low cost entry into the business, but now we are in position to manage the debt and build our sites. Anyway, look, let's do this and hopefully there'll be a big debriefing get-together before too long. And before anything there is the firm's socialising, the dinner. It should have come afterwards, but it is a fixed booking."

"Yeah, it's on the calendar at home. Managers and spouses. And at the Titantsea Wilkinson's Casino. Sometimes I don't bother with these socials. I never know which he prefers - me not there, or me there."

"Do go," he said. "Wives and husbands matter. Hope this all helps. Bye then. We'll be in touch on this."

"Indeed. Good talking to you and good for the firm. Bye then."

When Colin saw me he asked why Sir Sanjay Bunker would want to ring me at the church. So I said it's because I attend Morning Prayer and it was a morning call. The answer was good enough.

Keith said, when he returned home in the evening, "The point about the socialising and our going away is to do it after everything has happened, after all the stress - not before. Yojana told me she is furious. All she is doing is checking on all I am doing, as normal. No one yet is checking on her. There is a leak: a shipping firm has got hold of some of our procedures, and our systems are not robust. So maybe the senior management have a new method or two to introduce. Obviously, no one can tell me or Yojana."

"I don't know," I said. "I don't know anything about it."

Next day I was back at the church again, of course, and at Morning Prayer Colin Cromer asked me if I was impressed by the Archbishop and I replied that I was indeed.

"Get noticed by him and they'll make you a bishop!"

"Colin, you are getting into the realms of fantasy."

That evening Keith said, "You left around these conference papers, and, inside them, your speech. These are drawings of you and, well, it is definitely you and I recognise all your features clothed and nude."

"Do you normally go through my things?"

"You don't have a study. Perhaps you should use the vestry at the church. So, who is 'A S' then? Adrian Smith, er... Adam Simpson, hmm... Andrew Shithole?"

"Allie Shrimpton. A woman. Ph.D student. University of Somerset."

"So have theologians dismissed the camera? Perhaps theology has not caught up with the camera yet. A bit recent for theology. I know, let's employ my mobile phone."

"As a former user of theology, you would know that the light of the world is focussed through the lens that is Christ. She was called upon to give a talk by the Archbishop no less, based on information received from the suffragan. He was also impressed by me."

"Alfia... Shrimpton. She's at the University of Somerset but comes from Norfolk."

"Alfia," I repeated.

Keith said, "'A S' is not the same as 'A R' - that painting we bought from a local artist from Walsingham. Close, though."

"No. The painting was all gothic and surreal and mystical. But I detect a similarity."

"Pity I sold it: we could have done some detective work. Can't see anything online," he said. "Not really for social media, I suppose. And did your nudity impress her to go beyond drawing?"

"No it did not. Have you heard of being professional, Keith? She did a second drawing of me nude, and she gave me one. The clothed one is a photocopy."

"She gave you one."

"That means she gave me a drawing, Keith. And it is rather good, and if I find an A4 frame I might just hang this drawing up. Would you like that?"

"Well, not where your parishioners might see it.."

"No."

"After all, you don't want to mix nudity, sexuality and religion."

"Well, I do, but not in this setting, and not with this drawing as sexuality was not involved. Sex was not involved, sexuality might have been. I don't know."

"She might have a married sister, or something like that: both artists: 'A R' and 'A S'. So you posed, made your excuses, and left."

"I had no excuses, Keith."

"Well, yes, it is very good and would be nice in the bedroom."

"I will get a frame from a photo shop if there isn't one in a charity shop. And how was work today?"

"Hmm. Half of what is going on is supposed to be about efficiency and this is now becoming inefficiency through on-high imposed brakes. Something is stupid. The boss is at Harwich and the management team members there are treating us up here like idiots but Yojana and I have decided not to protest."

"This is well outside my competence, Keith," I said. "You are alone on this one, I'm afraid. I have nothing to offer or say."

"I'm aware of this," he said. "I apologise for some of my recent comments. It is getting very frustrating lately."

"I understand," I said. "As your receptive, compassionate, loving wife: I understand."

Restaurant and Casino (Saturday 4th May)

It was the Saturday after which all the SMS internal investigations should have been ended. They had not even started. The social was, however, still on. I was also still waiting to hear about my investigating role. Still, it was time to be visible to senior management. I needed to make an impact, and against my competitor Cheryl Mould and even his colleague over the Chinese wall, Yojana Asthana.

World Naked Gardening Day, it was, but being overlooked we could not celebrate it properly.

Prior to getting ready to go out, I rang Patricia at home in the Serninsea Marshes. I went round by car and told her about the twice reported affair from Julie Vaughan. She recalled her own divorce - which was why I went to see her: I should try to avoid acrimony, and either stay together or get a clean break uncontested divorce. Plus I said there was my problem of a divorce when intending to be ordained.

"All the more reason to tread carefully," she thought aloud.

I was telling Patricia that I'd said nothing to Keith to even hint of knowing about his affair. He gave no clue either, including back home. So, with the further SMS delay, my planned holiday away was now to be before the work investigations, and so I said I might just monitor how he deals with me in the naturist setting. Patricia mentioned that Diana had some time off shortly.

I mentioned going to Margate, but only to say about the talks.

Obviously I went to see if Diana was in. She was. Whilst the art encounter was mentionable, so I said about some naturist drawing fun, the bishop encounters were buried deep. If she had some suitable time off she might join Keith and me at the Bever Wood Naturist Club.

She said she would come, but could not afford a whole week away. So we arranged the last two days when Keith and I would be there. She was surprised that Keith might be so attracted to someone like "Mouldy", as she remembered her. She might help me detect if Keith was concealing anything.

I said to her, " The SMS get-together at the Dok Dak Restaurant is followed by the nearby Wilkinson's Casino for an awards ceremony. It's open to the public. Would you want to come along to the casino?"

"No, not when I used to work there."

I went home and started to prepare for the restaurant.

"You coming on the holiday we had planned?"

Keith replied, "I cannot possibly do the whole week, with stuff to prepare."

"Three days? Three days and then come back for two and the weekend for your work preparation."

"Yes. All right."

So elsewhere in the house I rang Diana and asked her if she would like to go the other two days. I'd pay her petrol and she could share my room. She liked the idea. This did mean that she was only likely to see Keith briefly, if at all.

To make an impact at the restaurant I put on Keith's birthday bought flesh coloured dress which, frankly, hardly held anything in. I had no knickers on and no bra, obvious by viewing the slits and my breasts. He approved. I accompanied Keith to the restaurant and casino as his dutiful wife.

I was sat with Keith and everyone was along this restaurant wall or opposite. I thought I was 'daring' in context, but I was out dared. Bare middles in diamonds and circles, dresses with nothing on their shoulders to keep them up, slits as gaps to the armpits with ties across.

In the distance I could not be sure if I had seen Cheryl Mould again. If it was her, she was wearing a fantastically revealing similar fleshy outfit except that it stopped at her thighs. Crumbs, I think it was her. The duckling was definitely a swan. Yojana had this bare middle as a circle around her navel. The back of her translucent white dress showed her bronze brown skin as it plunged to the start of her arse crack. Her breasts moved freely. Gosh, I was fancying her.

After the food - Keith and I had scampi and salad and then ice cream - it was over to that nearby Wilkinson's Casino. For all my time growing up and being an adult in Serninsea, I'd not been in the casino before. Keith had, on a few occasions after work.

We went into a sealed at one end side walkway containing two opened steel doors, going through the second one of them into the casino downstairs. The first door, apparently, led into a staircase going up.

Cheryl Mould and Yojana arrived separately from us. Keith and Cheryl never even looked at each other. I even mouthed and received at a distance a brief hello from her. Yojana said a direct hello, and her non-slim body was fantastic. Keith talked shop a lot, with various men, and with Yojana a few times. Missing was Julie Vaughan; I'd so hoped she might be there. I did meet George Petty, Keith's equivalent at Harwich. The way he looked at me - not at my figure but at my eyes - made me wonder if he had seen what Julie Vaughan had seen.

"I wish you the best for the future," he said.

"Thanks. You too," I replied. I should have asked why he wished this, in particular.

Hmm. Keith and I moved to the roulette wheel where Keith tried a system. If he won, on any 1-1 (like black or red, odd or even), he would bet the lowest one pound chip again. But, if he lost he would double up. Clever, as he started to build quite a pile of low value chips, though he'd dug into eight quid to get this going. Trouble is, he had a string of losing outcomes, and he bet at one point £32 to win again. At this point, Yojana appeared alongside us and watched and randomly played as his pile shrunk and grew again, and then after a run of gains had a long run of losses including a zero that left him at a £64 bet and he lost that too. It was a controlled loss for someone on his earnings. Yojana then tapped him on the shoulder and smiled at me. I had no system and spent just a few pounds, like Yojana did. I stared at her smooth shimmering brown legs that, in their breadth, met at her dress.

What was it with these SMS women? They really were sexy, even the larger ones. So here was me, the naturist, who was still among the most covered over and yet in a flesh-coloured dress. Being at an SMS do was like watching those films giving a warning about attitudes and appearances from a previous era.

When the roulette was done, who should appear but the Reverend Ken Osis, my selected spiritual counsellor. He was not in a clerical collar, and had a sort of cravat around his neck. He gave me a good look, down and up.

He asked me, "How's it going?"

"Keith just lost a lot and me a little."

"Good to see you," he said. "I heard that Margate was a big success for you. I won't talk about work here."

"Yes, I enjoyed it. All about seaside town life." Obviously someone had told him. Later on when I looked around for him, I didn't see him. In fact a number of people (those not at the restaurant) seemed to have disappeared.

At the Blackjack I recognised Peter the magician, and the two identical archaeology women. He was quite focussed and they were watching. Then I thought, 'Who's that he's talking to?' and did a double take. Peter seemed to be informing - yes - a podgier Adam Magellan of something throughout. Also present there were Stephen and Helen McPhail. Hello to them, and I said to her I enjoyed my time with them. I recognised, also the now grey-haired retiring headteacher Kay Parker, a Helen Mirren lookalike now (she had black hair when my headteacher), along with a younger cleaved female saying something about webcams.

All Sir Sanjay Bunker did regarding me was smile. He asked for order and started handing out a few prizes for employees.

He said, "This symbolic measuring rod of precisely thirty centimetres is for Mr Keith Jupitas, a wonderful find for our business only two years ago, and he gets our Administration Prize for this year. I should say that this trained talent has worked efficiently and diligently at times of difficulty in the Compliance Department; in fact it is his work that has demonstrated a leak in confidential information and reason for further delay in our inspections. Keith, please."

"Yes. Thank you Sir Sanjay. This is very much appreciated. However, I cannot deny," said Keith, "that - as you've mentioned it - it's sad that we are not quite letting our hair down here this year."

"Well, we have had to delay matters," said Sir Sanjay.

"I fully understand that. I want to thank my link colleagues in Harwich locality and visiting: Geoff Petty, my equivalent, and one of the staff, Ms Cheryl Mould, ah, over there, for her administrative support. I hope your mother here in Serninsea gets better, as well, but it is good to see you here if perhaps for the wrong reasons."

I'd have to visit Catherine Mould.

"Can I thank also Yojana Asthana there for her patience? She checks me and the department out during the year, and I'm sure I'll be checking her, and others checking both of us, very soon, regarding all our procedures, just as vigorously as last year. And also my clergy wife..."

'Clergy wife'? The cheek of it, I thought.

"...Linda there, for putting up with my stress and comparative misery at this time. Linda, I'm going to have to take advantage of my colleagues here to have a meeting afterwards; Yojana, it is relevant for you as well. But Linda and I will be off on a nice break on Monday, which unfortunately is now before and not after our difficult work. Still, let's get everything right, shall we, and plug the gaps in our offices, and hope for a good future here in Titansea, and in Harwich, Felixstowe, and Hartlepool, and for our expansion plans."

Sir Sanjay said, "Your coming back earlier is typical of your dedication. The reason you have won this prize and recognition is indeed because of your commitment. As for everyone else - I include Mrs. Jupitas, Mr. Petty, Ms Mould and Ms Asthana - please enjoy the rest of our evening together. It is a mark of your dedication, Keith Jupitas, that you are having even a brief meeting with colleagues after this socialising and before your trip away."

Keith received a round of applause and, well, the upshot was that I went home alone, even as some were arriving.

So what was he doing? Why did these meetings take so long? He'd really had no contact with Cheryl at all; Yojana was around him a number of times, but I expected that.

I went to bed. I'd commandeered Keith's novel, The Jacobite Gap Years: An Seumasach Nuadh, about Mary Douglas travelling in time into Jacobite Scotland from the present day. She encountered a redhead bloke, Malcolm MacKenzie or Maol Choluim MacCoinnich. The clans were divided publically and religiously between Presbyterians and Episcopalians. I didn't care for this writing. Diana read this stuff too - a reimagined landscape and community. I was more interested in a real redhead woman, or had been, who learnt Gaelic as a 'folk' language, for whom religion was likely no more than a research interest. The Archbishop of All England had come from the Scottish Episcopalians, once considered Jacobite but in the 1740s they were becoming more loyal institutionally. These were of the Gaelic speaking ethnicity and therefore spoke a good English, not Scots.

On the world wide web, I wondered if there was any more about this artist... University of Somerset. I'd seen these pages. Although Alfia was an unusual name, Shrimpton wasn't. I looked up about the Bishop of Margate. Boring boring boring. I cleared my Internet search history.

It was three hours before Keith surfaced at home and seemed fit for no more than sleep. Three hours seemed to be a pattern: it had been that length before.

I said to Keith, coming into bed, putting his book to one side, "You need to relax and let's at least have a good time away. Stay the whole time, because you can; don't use Diana coming later as an excuse to leave us."

He said, "I'll see. I'll try and stay, but the Bever Wood Club suits you two nature lovers the best."

"I wish Aardse would come, but he won't; at least you do. Diana suits herself - she always has done."

He said, "I need some sleep. I'm knackered."

"Well, recover tomorrow," I said. "Nothing will happen at SMS before you go back. We'll go on Monday like we planned."

Naturist Centre (Sunday 5th to Wednesday 8th May)

Third Sunday of Easter (Europe Day, too) and Keith accompanied me to the church in the morning as a means to keep his mind off work. Afterwards, we sat by the lake at Caffin Park for a picnic, and he was just fidgety.

"You're coming," I told him.

So, next day, Bank Holiday, also the first day of Ramadan, with last minute packing and a snack done, off we went. The two of us went well beyond the west of Wytham's Saxiclite Naturist Club that I used to attend from childhood. We went into the East Midlands via the East Markham bypass but then avoiding the A1 itself. We arrived at the wooded area familiar to us naturists about the Rivers Meden and Maun, to turn into the Bever Wood Naturist Centre. I was a member and it gave privileges of access (like priority for a room) and policy voting.

Saxiclite was the only nearby club before the family moved to Serninsea. Clite means 'strange people', even weird. Suits us, we thought! Bever Wood started in 1995 after the nearby colliery had closed. There isn't actually a Bever Wood, but there are plenty of trees on the converted farm and beyond. People think Bever Wood has sexual connotations; some called Saxiclite 'Sexyclite'.

Keith had been supportive with my changed naturist club destination, because it would be more anonymous for him too. He had become more uncomfortable about going to Saxiclite when he wanted to seek ordination. I should have moved further out then.

Was he embarrassed? (Part 1) Years back at university he'd asked me about my bald pubic area among naturists. He wondered if it bothered me. Not at all. The fact is that much hair does offer a little bit of divergent modesty when lying in the sun or by the pool when your leg goes up, but the true naturist doesn't care about that. He once said he likes thick pubic hair, but second to that preferred none at all.

Was he embarrassed? (Part 2) There are two reasons to carry a towel. One is Keith's, to cover up for extra modesty. The other is to keep your bottom off surfaces others use. To that extent, if you are a couple, once the gear comes off in the changing room, you should check each other's arse that it is clean. Use two mirrors if you are single. At each club, you undress on entry, and the clothes go in your baggage as you find your room.

As I left my bag in my room and took my towel; I also had my hairbrush in my hand! This hairbrush was surely nearly twenty five years old. It would have no value on a collectables television programme but it was priceless to me.

Day one Monday was for simply lounging around. Many bodies were visibly older, fatter and lumpier than ours.

I liked to have a shallow dip in the River Meden, and while we were there along came my sixty year old second cousin. Stanley Otter was with thirty-eight year old and very pregnant mix-race Denny Pipe. He met her at the Liberal Democrats. I called him 'uncle' because this podgy man had married thin Paula Lavender, my mother's sister. Paula, another Lib Dem, died last year, 16th August, and now these two were marrying on Denny's 39th birthday on Friday 31st. His wife was younger than his son (David, forty-two in October) and daughter (Karen, thirty-nine, soon forty on 19th. Her large breasts sitting on her bulge and their big dark areolas and nipples were fabulous.

Stanley said Bever Wood offered less gossip. He noted that Saxiclite had more lawns and hedges, whereas this place had trees and the river.

"Meghan's gone into labour," said Denny.

"Who's Meghan?" I asked. "Has she left the Lib Dems?"

"Duchess. Pregnant labour."

"Oh, fairy nuff," I replied.

"Not a royalist," Keith told Denny.

Stanley looked at his phone. "She's had it." My randy uncle then said, "We've delayed our wedding by a month."

It had been scheduled for 28th June, a Friday, then at the Saxiclite club. I could not attend then because this was the week of my retreat immediately prior to ordination; in any case I didn't want to go.

He could be uncle and second cousin because John Lavender was my grandfather, now in old age and unwell. His father, who died in 1997, Kelvin, married Amy Bode, my great grandmother, and I'm a Bode. This is village life down the generations, in east Nottinghamshire.

I said to Keith later, "Something I'll never have - stretch marks like hers"

"She must take up their double bed alone. Never happen in our house."

Both Saxiclite and Bever Wood had indoor squash. Keith and I had a game. It chucked the bits around! It was followed by a great sauna session, with a plunge pool afterwards. And Bever Wood, also like Saxiclite, had an indoor swimming pool - so in we went.

On day two, Tuesday, both of were us lying naked by that glass-roofed indoor pool, both on our fronts (I was in sympathy with him). I was still reading, as much as I could be bothered, the first book of The Jacobite Gap Years again. I thought that perhaps Keith might try a timeslip method as a way to hide his affair.

Suddenly he said, "I bet there aren't many other clergy here, like you."

Book raised, I rolled a bit and faced him, my breasts both hanging down in the same direction. "Wrong, so wrong. You'd be surprised just how many there are. I know of them in some other clubs and I'll learn who's here. You don't know the scene like I do, and if you'd have been ordained you'd have found out. Slowly."

"Wouldn't you Adam and Eve it?" he said, as a joke. "Clergy as naturists."

"It's another idealism," said I, trying to be realistic and serious.

"Your suffragan bishop knew that you were and are a naturist."

"Yes. They have this ongoing report on us. I don't like that. It is all in there."

"That's interesting. How do you know that?"

"I can't really say."

"Well, you saw a new confessor. Ken Osis does a number. He's a tosser. He'll have let you see there is a report. I bet Louise Deimos showed you nothing."

"You seem well informed," I said.

Keith added: "Something else. When that team publishes the inefficiency report into the whole diocese, you know, the central authorities will take the whole circus apart."

"You delude yourself. There is no central authority to take it apart. The Archbishop of All England doesn't have that sort of power."

"He does: by using moral authority: demanding resignations, calling for the office to be reformed root and branch."

"Moral authority is easily ignored in the Church," I said, then realising that this was a devastating statement.

"The latest diocesan, Derek the cleric, is another complete duffer, and the two under him only parade comparative efficiency. They just appear to be better. This Barman chap is as ridiculous as the rest. I tell you what," he went on, "since I've been with SMS I've learnt what proper management is about, and they wouldn't last our internal checking for one second."

I said, "Maybe. There is management theory in the Church. Systemic authority, like a dispersed form of expertise, away from Weber's depressing capitalist bureaucracy, is supposed to be consistent with Saint Paul and the diversity of the organism. John Barman represents systemic authority."

"What claptrap," Keith said. "Basic stuff at best. If you want to do management theory then do it properly and not some sociological gloss dressed up into theology. Charismatic, then traditional, then bureaucratic, ooh: better make it systemic, ooh: empower the workers with the human relations... I do know all this stuff. Keep it in the college."

I reverted to the hairbrush and then lay on my back, breasts to each side. After some silence, I said, "It's a form of thinking. Human relations is too secular or uber-liberal."

Silence resumed.

I thought I saw my sixth form tutor, Mr. Grosvenor. Was it? He looked at me, I think.

"Show me that book," Keith said.

"The Jacobite Gap Years: An Seumasach Nuadh, Gabrijela Daffron. It was your present - ha ha."

"Oh God, this one, Cheryl is nuts about this. She has all three books, several of each one."

"Cheryl?"

"Cheryl Mould at Harwich. You saw her among the crowd at the restaurant, and mentioned. She parades them around the office in Harwich. In a dream world, she is. This is an old copy: the American one bugged up some of the geography and was replaced."

"So she has three books that come in two variations?"

"No: it's a series. The middle book may as well be two."

"You seem to have gone into this in some detail."

"The woman is in a dream world: contrasting doing tedious admin every day with wishing she was under some Scotsman's kilt in the dangerous romantic past. They swoon over this Malcolm MacKenzie."

"Diana could be the same," I said. But I realised that this never happened in the office. All this had happened in Cheryl's house. Far from hiding or disguising the affair, The Jacobite Gap Years was revealing it. And then I thought again of the Norfolk woman who spoke in that language to the Archbishop. "Well, I've read chunks but I won't read it further," I said. "It will allow me to respond to Diana when she comes."

Monday night we had been perhaps tired, and this second night I wanted sex but Keith was reluctant. And why, I wondered, was he so reluctant, especially after viewing nudity all day? Perhaps that was it - nudity all day had dulled his senses. Even a before-bed session with a kettle-weight and my bum in his eyes, and ten minutes pushing these dildo-like tools into my vagina, did nothing to excite him. Of course I might have tempted him with my inner arse, as once he was, but now my concern was repairing the long term consequence of his actions. Nevertheless, he did his duty for his wife. He fucked me.

He did have a general explanation for his dullness, on Wednesday evening: "I've been trying to relax, but we have just so much to do when back at work. It's all the monitoring. What if we find our own dishonesty as a business? We check the honesty of measurements all year, and Yojana checks that no one or thing has corrupted us - or made us less inefficient. But what if we are the dishonest corrupted ones? With the leak, I'm not sure that our own internal walls of security hold up. And then there is the penetration testing."

"That could be pleasurable," I said.

"It means hacking not fucking: all the data is on computers and so we employ outside hackers to break in and then tell us how they got through - but they don't discuss their own trade secrets - and then tell us what to do about it. So it's like the whole atmosphere turns," he said. "The social we've just had was supposed to act as a release afterwards."

"Use penetration software," I said, thinking of Margate.

"Some do," he said, not getting the joke (obviously).

"But you know they are monitoring you and the Independent Unit," I asserted. "Like the inspectors come to schools and the teachers put on much better lessons."

"Interdependent. There are traps. We get documents from senior management that could be false, leave trails and give ways in. And hackers are clever."

"A fire alarm going off in a fire drill," I said. "Surely."

"Yes, Shirley, it's like fire drills," he said. "Walk don't run. Along with many other jumps and hoops. And don't forget this testing is followed not so long after by a business conference: Seminsea Tomorrow. So we all have to be as one again, if any of us fall out."

"Colin might be speaking in that," I said. "Or perhaps me, after Margate."

"Or your suffragan bishop."

"The organisers have asked for a talk on Attracting Ethical Business."

"Margate all over again for you," he suggested.

"If I'm asked to do it. Different emphasis."

"I'm sure," he said. "Invite Jonathan Eyre."

I said nothing.

In the end we went back to our room and on to the dining hall, opening a door because of some noise inside - music and laughter. A bunch of teenagers were bent over and back showing arses, willies and tits over a game of Twister. We continued.

After dinner and back at our room I told Keith to strengthen his tongue contact on my clitoris. Remembering Margate, I fancied some male insertion oral sex. After all, I'd perfected the technique with Keith himself, but the fact that I'd even stopped drooling meant some soreness in my throat with Jonathan before I generated necessary gunge.

I didn't tell Keith to be rougher than usual, but he was. So I repeated this sort of lube generation while Keith got faster and more furious. Jumping back my head and shoulders to remove his erection, I said, "Oy, slow down! Don't be so rough. I don't know why you are acting like this."

He surprised me by then saying, "I do like bald pubes. Sometimes you think I don't. I like to see clarity; nothing is hidden; they are the truth."

His mind really was on his job. His violence to my throat must have been his frustration at work.

Yet I knew that all the time he was being dishonest. Mouldy was very hairy at school, in the showers; she'd be deep to her cervix too. Keith would have to adapt to her as he had perfected a shallow technique into my rabbit hole.

His comment about Cheryl's fantasy world in novels was the nearest he came in giving his affair away.

It was time to sleep. Both laid in bed he said, "I bet this place is one big knocking shop, including among those teenagers."

So I replied, "We are cultured bonobos."

"Subject title for a sermon," he suggested, unhelpfully.

"I was a good girl for too long. As you well know, when playing Twister at Saxiclite, I had reason not to fuck afterwards. Bodies so accessible, but I knew that I was different."

"You hid yourself."

"Yes. Naturists know the plumbing so I didn't open the tap."

Change the Accompaniment (Thursday to Saturday 11th May)

Uncle Stan and fiancé Denny had left early Thursday. Keith's break had come to its end too.

We were inside the reception area cloakroom on Thursday mid-morning, and he was about to drop the towel and resume textiles after these three nights away. And here was Diana, facing us, having already become as naked as the day, and lovely and hairy like I imagined Mouldy, underarms somewhat too (for a change - was this deliberate?), and he stared at her body. She stared at him too and he removed his towel from his front to his side. She ran her hand down her stomach, and he noticed this. She seemed momentarily distressed as he dressed and picked up his luggage.

Diana and I went with him out of the reception area through the main doors and outside. This area and the car park was the only place where clothes on were permitted as policy.

He made a remark. He said to me, "You're coming and going a lot lately. Margate, now here. Holiday, holiday..."

"It was a conference. You go to Harwich."

"Work! Coming up."

"Paul McCartney," I said.

"What?"

We clothesless two waved him off as he drove home.

I asked Diana, "Is something the matter?"

"Nothing. I was thinking about something else in the car. Come on. Let's go in."

"Nothing to do with Keith? Me? Aardse?"

"You know when you're driving and you suddenly ask, 'How did I get here?'"

"Something you can share?"

"Day dreaming."

So like a substitution at football, Diana joined me under the glass roof for swimming, and then played tennis (including doubles with others) outside, and had a shallow dip with me in the River Maun, and a man tried to teach us (indoor) chess to no lasting effect. Also, she wanted to learn how to do pivot tables in spreadsheets. Keith could have shown her but I sat alongside her unable to get it, bums on towels on seats, as you also do when naked in front of a computer. So I played screen card games. A nice chap came along and helped her with formulas in cells, whose wotsit at mouth level was smaller than a computer mouse.

Then, all of a sudden, with him gone, she said, "You didn't mention about going to Margate. You went to Margate."

"Oh, it was a conference. Like I told Patricia."

"There's only one reason not to mention things, and that's to hide them."

"Well I did mention Margate, to Patricia. She could have told you. Diana."

"She did."

"I didn't mention it because, frankly, one boring speech by me, a few table discussions, tedious speeches. It was nothing to remember even soon afterwards. I simply forgot to mention it. Keith went to Harwich, I went to Margate. He had the more interesting time."

"Quite. Didn't you take revenge?"

"Against whom, exactly?"

My screen went blank.

"With whom," she said. "We know against whom, it's with whom, in a bedroom, using your broom. Oh you don't have a brush."

Her screen went blank.

I said, "Shut up! I'm not a witch. I don't operate like that; I'd have to have found someone - to take revenge."

"You know what conferences are like."

"Yes. Boring."

"Hotel was it?"

"Yes. One where the bloody lift broke down. That's how crap the hotel was. Robert Court."

"Robert caught what?"

"Look it up."

"You could have given Keith a lift to Harwich."

"I went by train. The suffragan bishop had bought the train tickets. He was going to go; I went instead. So I was the stand-in."

"He'll approve of you."

"He has said as much. Yes. So I forgot to mention it. All right?"

"I believe you. Many wouldn't."

"Good. I'm concerned though about what's really going on with Keith. So he went to Harwich, and earlier than necessary."

"What Patricia says," she said, "is that eventually they give it away."

And, here, later, was something different. Diana was now in my rented room and double bed. Diana's body was highly desirable, but I'd seen it often.

However, I was horny and thinking of Cheryl. Perhaps I did want some further sort of retribution against Keith. But via Diana, my mate?

I thought I'd try the kettle-weight approach on my knees so that she got a really good view of all of my bum. Just to see. Then I used the dilators, sat on the carpet.

Diana was reading a paperback. Looking at me being busy, she asked, "Why do you have a set of smaller to larger dildos and why are you doing this now?"

"They are dilators. I use them ten minutes a day, or supposed so."

"Why?"

"Because I am one of those unfortunate women with a shallow vagina."

"I've known you a very long time and that's the first time you have told me."

"I probably have, you know."

"Not that I remember. Not so I would remember. So it is not sexual pleasure, then?"

"No. It is physical pushing."

"Have you got vaginismus?"

"No."

"Do you have difficulty inserting a tampon? Come to think of it, I have never heard you mention periods; you've never had one when we meet at Patricia's. You know that I have, walking in or out with the string hanging down."

"I'm just shallow, small - okay?"

"You are a tall woman. You've got big hands, big feet, strong legs, big breasts, but a shallow vagina with a wopping clit?"

"You missed out my narrow hips and arse."

"A bloke with big feet has a big cock."

"I haven't got a big cock and my clitoris should be the opposite."

"Should it?"

"Yes."

"Why?"

"It goes with the collection."

"I don't know what that means. So, if you had a baby, and you haven't at 40, love, it would be stuck in there? It's a Julius Caesar or nothing?"

"Don't be silly. Can we get off the subject?"

She said, "I know it doesn't need saying, but I am here sleeping alongside you, not with you. For me, to have sex is like my husband grasping my ankles, to put them as close to my ears as he can, and putting that really angry force into me as far as it will go. Deep deep. Him, you see. Him."

"Good for you, Diana. You're so fortunate."

"Sorry, I didn't mean it that way. But I didn't know. What I mean is I like a bloke, Linda, to give me one. Here's the difference. You giving me a hefty kiss - which you will not - is only to slobber all over my mouth, but Aardse can stick his dripping tongue down my throat and it is good."

"But in the past I've laid down with you on a bed and we've both masturbated. It wasn't that long ago - hardly - when you warned me about a woman with a dog and gave me a kiss."

"You misinterpreted it, then. We masturbated together as teenagers and again when we were twenty-one. I remember it and enjoyed it. And there's an interesting thing about those occasions: I wanked me off, and you wanked you off. We could because we were proper friends, really good friends, and we are now. So you masturbate yourself with pleasure. Especially with pleasure."

"Give it a rest, Diana. I'm quite safe. I won't slobber all over you. I've a few minutes of this regular dilating left."

"What's come over you all of a sudden? We meet at Patricia's and strip off, but you don't go all funny then. When I have sex, I end up losing a lot of liquid over the place, like sometimes loads; and I can't control myself when I orgasm, because a certain Aardse is like his name and is doing me rotten."

"Hang on a minute," I said, "You're saying all this deliberately."

"You are masturbating yourself. Only trying to help in a 'keep off' kind of way."

"Like I said, I am pushing not masturbating."

"Liar."

"Fuck off, Diana. I've done this ever since I was fifteen." I changed the subject. "Talking of 'back then', I'm also thinking about investigating Keith by going to Adam Magellan's. I wonder if he'll recognise me?"

"Ugh."

"Why 'ugh'?"

"Nothing."

"Nothing?"

Diana said, "You and Jenny Masters had some fun with him, you said long after. So imagine him fucking you, if that helps with what you're doing."

"You asked for it. I'm going to have a wank." I found Keith's present of a rabbit vibrator and got on to the bed. Now she had something to look at. A thought struck me as I masturbated: had this vibrator come from Cheryl? It was second hand! Soon I was jerking about a bit, all while Diana read her book alongside me.

She said, "Finished. A bit like you should have. Have you got any book?"

"The Jacobite Gap Years."

"I could tell you all about it."

"Keith told me Mouldy reads it. He had many details to tell about it. She takes it to the office."

"Reads it in bed more like," Diana said. "I discuss the books and the television series, online; I have a good friend called Glenda McKay who knows them all inside out."

"I thought she was in Emmerdale."

"Long ago. Share's that actor's name."

"I'm getting into bed now. I've had enough agitating down there."

"Linda," she now said, "I just want to add that you do have a lovely slim and revealing bottom."

Oh, what a bitch. As I stood she leaned across and kissed me on my right bottom cheek. As I turned she put her index finger up in case I had the wrong idea.

She said, "I'm pleased you weren't imagining the creep who comes into Serninsea."

"Who?"

"Your bishop bloke."

"Hardly," I said.

She sniggered some more. I wanted to snigger with her, but could not. I could have done with some cuddling body to body, lacking an orgasm. But I decided to behave and slept alongside my pal.

Narrator: Keith Arrive at Hartlepool (Thursday 10th May)

"What the fuck is going on?" I asked Charles Whyne, the Compliance Manager at Hartlepool (my equivalent there) late Thursday.

His reply was that in his office they had just completed a "quiet" full Information Communications Technology upgrade. He said that as delays went on, the upgrade was able to fit in. The system was now, also, much more secure.

"Keep up, Keith, Felixstowe is just about to do the same. We've been the test-bed."

I said I did not know this, and Charles Petty had not ordered this upgrade in Harwich. But he would do so, I was told, and the one place that was not upgrading was Serninsea.

"Last time I met Sir Sanjay he never even mentioned this."

"Work it out," this Charles said.

I thus tried to contact the bosses located in Harwich, but they were all incommunicado because of the imminence of the annual inspections stress testing. Charles told me that if the known leak was from Felixstowe the new system would plug it.

Felixstowe leaking was partly a function of size: all events were more likely to appear at Felixstowe. Of course we had this outside firm that was going to hack away to get to the documents and codes.

I confirmed, "There's a leak in Serninsea. Somehow."

"Serninsea is deemed unreliable. Work it out."

So I received a prize at the front and was stabbed in the back. Serninsea was never going to be as efficient as well as lacking the work.

Charles Whyne was not in the Hereteu Group under the Confraternity, but within Hartlepool two of SMS were. One was Rory Jackson, it's Interdependent Inspection Unit Manager, and another was his deputy Philip Shrimpton. (Yojana did not have a deputy, there was one in Harwich and two deputies in Felixstowe.) So I met these two, and they said as far as they could tell SMS had not decided to close Serninsea. The problem was that this came under commercial confidentiality and so the Hereteu Group had no privilege. They were also doing the Worshipful Company of Hasland Theatrical Players, on the model of Serninsea. Hereteu was too weird a name to use, so they chose Hasland. A complication was that it did not have its 'plays' in a deceased theatre and there was in fact an amateur dramatics group in Hartlepool. What suited Serninsea might not suit elsewhere as well.

Philip Shrimpton was to look first hand at operations in Titansea. I said he might be asked to chat up my wife. We needed to see, if possible, whether Jonathan Eyre was a one-off regarding her sudden openness to other sexual relationships.

Meanwhile, what I did not realise was that selected managers of Electronic Keys Limited were going to come into the Confraternity, meaning up and coming initiations.

I'd never intended to go up to Hartlepool at all. What happened was I got in my car and set off for home, and immediately put my messages on through the car speakers. The first one was an instruction to go to Hartlepool and make sure they were singing from the same hymn sheet as Serninsea and Harwich; Yojana had gone to Felixstowe and Harwich. So, rather than go on, on the circuitous route out, I stopped the car, turned it around, and took the shorter exit, on to the faster and straighter northern route to the A1. I didn't bother to phone Linda because I thought she was in Diana's good hands, and she didn't phone me either.

Feeling somewhat uninformed up north, I met the Reverend Fatima and the Reverend Jenny World at Fatima's on Thursday evening.

I stayed at the vicarage. Long term curate Jenny did not live in the curate's house but with Fatima Tamuuz, her second vicar. Her first curacy was under Judith Short in Marske-by-the-Sea, thirteen years back, lasting three years. Jenny was not acting as a mother to Fatima's briefly glimpsed five year old daughter, Akemi. Fatima was Akemi's only mother. Jenny was treated almost like a daughter herself, but one that Fatima had sex with very frequently. As for the father of her daughter, Fatima refused to tell anyone who he was, but Elizabeth did know, and Jenny did, and so did I.

Fatima had wanted a child. She was not interested in men, but she was interested in doing her duty through initiating men. She had become what I wanted for Linda. Sex with Philip Shrimpton wasn't that frequent under the Confraternity but she became pregnant by him, with his agreement, subject to his non-involvement afterwards.

The only question first night was whether I'd have my own room or squeeze in with them. I told them not to be silly, and I squeezed in with them. And very nice they were too. Fatima got out several times to attend to Akemi in the next room. Jenny just got out for the toilet. Jenny received both my sexual attention and Fatima's, but Fatima did not want mine. Doing her duty did not mean having intercourse with me, but Jenny did.

Fatima, 50, subscribed to our view that the orgasm was a supreme sign from the Kingdom of God. This is what Jenny provided for Fatima and received back regularly. Jenny was something of a puzzle to me. After Linda and Adam Magellan she tried a relationship with Adam alone; I met her intimately, twice getting her knickers off, and then she moved away and signed on to the evangelical, charismatic and moralistic dotted line. She became ordained, but had a series of mental events, let's just say, declared that she loved sex, and now seemed utterly ordinary in daily expression but still (I was told) evangelical in her preaching.

Narrator: Linda Diana Wakes With Linda (Friday 10th May)

Friday morning, same place, I was sat upright, and as Diana woke she asked me what was the matter.

"I keep having terrible dreams."
"It looks like you've been crying."
"A bit. It was terrible."
"Tell me about it. Can you tell me about it? I didn't involve me, I hope."
"It was so realistic. You were stood at the foot of the bed holding a lobster and a crab."
"A what and a what? As in food or alive?"
"They were alive."
"What was I doing with them?"
"I thought I was fully pregnant, with a huge belly, and you were telling me that the lobster had to live in my vagina and the crab in my mouth." Diana let out her breath preventing laughter. I insisted that it was not funny.
"You do report some dreams. Was that it? Are you pregnant?"
"No I am not. You'd taken the lobster from the vagina of this redhead, and the crab from her mouth, so that she could be fucked by the Bishop of Margate."
"Here we go."
"Both lobster and crab came from Scotland."
"Of course," Diana said. "Where else?"
"I said to you that the lobster cannot fit in my vagina and my mouth blocked would take away the only chance I could have of a really good fucking - down my throat."
"Ugh. I mean, talk about lost opportunities."
"You said that the lobster was designed to get inside me and make a home there, and when it came out later I would have a full-sized vagina, with a proper cervix and everything. Then I could be fucked properly. And as for the crab in my mouth, you said it would be for my own good."
"Have you got a problem cervix, Linda?"
"Forget it."
"You've never told me, Linda."
"I do not have a problem cervix."
"All right! Go on. Did I place the crab in your mouth, the lobster in...?"
"First you said I wasn't pregnant. You said it was all air, and you would let it out and then place the lobster inside me. So you went behind me and put your fist in my arse."
"Bloody hell."
"You manipulated my sphincter, and this huge continuous fart went out of my backside..."
She instantly howled with high-pitched laughter.
"You got out of the way. My stomach flattened."
"Oh, gawd. Linda, the fart of the century? This is horrific! What's going on? It's also very funny."
"I protested to you: Jonathan was waiting and the lobster and the crab were taking away my chance to be fucked again by Jonathan."
"Jonathan?"
"The Bishop of Margate."
"You imagined..."
I shook my head slightly.
"Shit, Linda... Linda? Did the Bishop of Margate fuck you, Linda?"

To try and deflect her if too late I said, "No, you put the lobster in my cunt and the crab in my gob."

"In real life. Linda. Linda?"

I was silent. She turned and stared at my face, close up.

"Linda?"

"You tell no one."

"Jesus."

"Not quite. Diana, I was bowled over by him. He fucked me in the throat, Diana. I've never had anything like it."

"You once said long ago about Keith..."

"Quite. I don't gag up, Diana; I put my head forward, my mouth is wide, my tongue out..."

"Wow. The Bishop of Margate."

"He fucked me so hard, Diana. I was his object. I can't explain it."

"Did he hurt you?"

"I learnt it with Keith. First, I'd have gob all over the place. I perfected the technique, and I now do it nearly dry. So in Margate my throat went red and my voice somewhat croaky. I produced some gob to help. I wanted him, like all the time."

"And you are on about Keith having an affair?"

"It was after I found out. But I am going to investigate properly. Look, I'm cold, sweaty and you could hug me."

"I could. Who was the woman? You saw her naked?"

"No. I imagined her like that. She was attractive."

"So nothing happened with her?"

"She saw me naked."

"Oh my, you don't do things by halves. Or it seems you do: half of him, half of her."

"Nothing happened with her. She's an artist and from Norfolk and speaks Scottish Gaelic."

Diana was laughing again. "In the dream."

"No, she spoke Gaelic with that Archbishop."

"Oh, that Scots academic who no one can understand. And not because of his accent."

"Yes."

"And she had a Norfolk accent with Scots Gaelic? In reality?"

"Yes."

"He didn't fuck her, then."

"I think the Bishop of Margate did."

"He gets around. Real and not a dream?"

"Diana. In the dream you put the lobster in my vagina and the crab in my mouth. When I woke up my mouth was very dry. It was terrifying."

"I'll give you a hug. But if this is cock and bull to get a hug off me... Linda, you are crying."

"You just don't understand! I am so frustrated with everything - with everything."

Diana hugged me. She was lovely. I know she found so much of it so funny, but she became serious when she realised that I was really in distress.

After a while hugging she said, "Linda. I think you should take a pregnancy test."

"I am not pregnant. I am definitely not pregnant. I've told you before, I cannot get pregnant."

"Linda: there is: 'I cannot get pregnant from what I have done,' and: 'I cannot get pregnant.' There is a difference."

"I cannot get pregnant."

She held on to me, both on the bed, and she ran her hand down my back with its cold sweat. From the side she kissed me on my mouth. She was very intimate and I let her be so.

Eventually I got up and had a shower. She had one just after me.

For the the day I just enjoyed her company. She could see that I was upset about Keith, and I was speculating about the length of his affair. Was it recent, perhaps a full two years, or as many as six?

Meanwhile, the evenly brown busty Manager at reception asked if one of us could cover for an hour while she went off to eat and pause, and seeing as there were two of us as members, one of us might review the CCTV and erase the recordings unless there was anything we'd deemed suspicious.

There were six squares for six cameras on the screen, and so Diana did this technical stuff while I dealt with the members or tried to answer enquiries.

"There he goes," said Diana. "That's Keith leaving... and down the road. Oh, and here he comes the other way up the road."

"What?"

"He's changed direction. His number plate. His face."

"Yeah. He started by heading for the Sibley junction with the A1 - the way we came - and changed to the other way east, the B road on to Gamston and the A1 further north."

Diana asked, "Why would he do that? Not for west or south."

"It's a puzzle. Perhaps this is what he does," I suggested. "He leaves false trails, leaves false information."

"There's hardly any difference," Diana said. "He'd go north via Gamston, but that's not for Harwich and Cheryl."

We closed the map. Diana told the Manager, Judi, back at reception, that the recordings could be erased.

So we had a day of lolloping about, as various east of England locals might say.

Come bedtime, I wanted sex but I didn't dare ask.

Diana noted I was using the dilators that night with a large amount of vigour. "Go easy," she said.

"You could help by doing it for me."

"No thanks," Diana said. "I can't see what benefit I'd bring."

Friday night was our last.

Narrator: Keith Shocking Scenes in Hartlepool (Friday 10th May)

I had enough knowledge to look in at Hartlepool's Interdependent Inspection Unit, on Friday, so this did involve some telephone calls and messages with Yojana. But

Charles Whyhne said I should concentrate on the operational administration because Yojana would come north to co-ordinate matters her side of the wall before she went talent scouting in South Wales (with Liz Huett) for expansion opportunities. Outside the building I met Rory Jackson, who vaped, and Philip Shrimpton, who did not.

Rory said to me, through his vapour, "Come on mate, Serninsea is less and less necessary and economically very marginal - its expertise has spread about."

"It was the original."

"Counts for nothing."

"It's barely profitable, I agree, but hasn't yet made a loss."

Philip said, "Doesn't have comparative advantage - on anything."

I said to them, "Yojana is excited about going to South Wales. One bloke, two women, all bishops. Who'd have thought it?"

I had an early finish because I'd done the SMS work. Indeed, Rory, thirty-eight, and Philip, forty-three, came over with others to the vicarage to see Bishop Elizabeth and a Buddhist woman called Anong. Elizabeth had discovered her through Interfaith work. Other Hereteu folk present were Tony Pierce, sixty-two, Janet Pierce, twenty (Tony's granddaughter), Bettina Wharfedale, fifty-seven, Kerry Wharfedale, fifty-five (Betty's sister), Michael Crozier, seventy, Ian Alcock, forty-nine, and Frances Alcock, forty-five. Also with us briefly was a woman called Sarah Farhadi, thirty-two, who took Akemi to her house for the evening and night.

Elizabeth introduced Anong who wore an orange wrap-around robe and sandals. Her head was shaven and she was thin and boney. She was from a self-started Buddhist group in Middlesbrough, with links into Thailand, and they were called the Danadeha Group. The group name meant 'Giving of the Body'. Anong said to us that her name meant Beautiful Woman. True, if she ate something.

Anong was to give us a talk; the talk with paper copies to leave behind at the vicarage; it would be sent electronically and encrypted to Christine Vine for theological scrutiny.

In our company, Anong declared that she would wear her gown open. So she did, with her rib cage very obvious, and she also removed her sandals. Elizabeth laid down her own mobile phone nearby, and switched something on.

We sat on the floor in a semi-circle and Anong was part of the semi-circle. So the bishop occupied the larger gap we all faced. Anong stood up and read her paper and, as the robe opened, we could see some scars as if from whip marks as well as her very obvious pubic bone, her slit towards an almond shape.

"Our sect name means that we gift our bodies for greater merit. We offer merit to sentient beings, deities, devas, and even ghosts. Ghosts? Well, these may haunt us, yet may, through merit, become our guardians. Buddhist views on the body range from almost attitudes of self-destruction to a respectful stance that our bodies are transitory. Generating a sense of the loathsomeness of the body is a powerful method for countering attachment to sensual pleasures, whether through activity or pride as generated through appearances. Very often the female body is seen as foul in Buddhism, and equating the female body as the equivalent of shit is an attempt to reduce sexual desire. The problem with this is that many get off on shit. The foul and disgusting is itself a form of sexual pleasure, for a few.

"By this argument, sexual pleasure is a trap, to turn us into slaves. It never brings true joy or satisfaction; instead it causes conflict, inflames the mind, and introduces bad company. In other words, it is no road to nirvana; it is stuck in samsara. Sexual pleasure is indeed the prime example of craving for existence. Buddha is supposed to have said that, 'It would be better that your penis be stuck into the mouth of a poisonous snake than into a woman's vagina. It would be better that your penis be stuck into a pit of burning embers, blazing and glowing, than into a woman's vagina.' He did not say whether the vagina is better off, as far as we know.

"However, we have the whole Tantric tradition, or perhaps traditions. Most Tibetans surely believe that Tantric texts should be pursued metaphorically rather than physically, within rituals and using meditative visualisations. But then the Gelug sect of Tibetan Buddhism promotes sexual yoga as physical practice to attain Buddhahood in one lifetime: either during it or by death, or without it, as in the case of the founder Tsongkhapa, a philosopher of the logic of negation. The fourteenth Dalai Lama of the Gelug sect stated that the practice should be limited to visualisation. The Nyingma sect cuts down the sex on the basis that it is not necessary to achieve Buddhahood in one lifetime.

"But if sex is normal and healthy, as here your group thinks, then Tibetan Tantric Buddhism offers techniques for bringing mindfulness and practice to sex and some Zen masters say that sex can become skillful.

"What of love? As I understand it from Elizabeth your bishop, your fellowship is aiming to achieve a boundariless theosexual love through the expression of intimacy and mutual support. You are to love each other and express it sexually, and if you can achieve this without limit you will be closest to the Kingdom of Heaven. You have yet to convince your fellow Western Christians, and they are in such a condition of Augustinian Christian negativity that you must develop your vanguard group in secrecy.

"So you must see love, all the loves, as substantive and permanent, and flowing into your eternal Kingdom of Heaven.

"But, for us, love like this is transitory, and joy emerges in a cool manner uncraved. Libido then is not to be pursued for pure pleasure, where guilt and excess reign, but in a manner to be given up. We should not teach that celibacy is pure and thus sex is impure and a source of shame. But nor should we indulge in sex. This middle way is dharmasexual.

"It's all about how we deal with a level of energetic experience. It requires concentration, focus, an asana like experience. That happens during a continual flow of various sensations, and losses of liquid, so demands to be skillful. The meditation on the body, through the body, brings questions of the now in feeling, experiencing and change.

"How then do we deal with disenchantment with the body, its coming death, and the body as disregarded and even disgusting? We act through dharmasexual practices.

"Just some history, before I get to the practices. We have been around for about fifty years as a Buddhist Group. Over ten years ago we had a division between those focussed on the practices and doing more of them, to then consider their implications, and those focussed on the processes first with practices that then relate. The latter were Buddhist in analysis and outcome, but the former wanted breadth and variety, and did attach to the New Age. There are a number of groups now up and down the country in the 'practice first' camp that have long since ceased to be Buddhist. Some are Tantric by name, some are motherly, some are called virginal to show sacrificial ritual involved in having sex. The groups are predominantly female, but a few are mixed. They have inherited our secrecy, but, in my view - our view - they are confused. Like we do, they pray for ourselves, our friends, our enemies, and the world. They may focus more on the world, however. Like we do, they study.

"They lack analysis.

"I come now to the most difficult part perhaps for you to understand, and why I think these other groups broke away and moderated themselves. We combine loathsomeness with disgust and the fact that the body must work through sensations that are indeed sexually interpreted."

She thus ended her written speech. She said that there may be no one present who wanted to carry out a practice with her. And that would be good. We always should do what we can use, and do not do what we cannot. She was going to make her body available.

It could be whipped and it could be caned but perhaps not this day. Such action can generate violent feelings without preparation of disinterest in the other's injuries.

However, her group more often than not carried flowing based rituals involving human fluid and waste. The smell, the disgust, the faecal matter in hair and crevices, did meet her two-sided criteria of both disgust and sensation that she had described. Vomit stinks and affects the giver and receiver reciprocally.

"What about dogs?" I asked.

"What about them?"

"Used sexually."

"Ah," she said. "Sex involves the knowing mind. It is reciprocal. The dog does lick afterwards, as it is cleaning up, but otherwise it must have been trained. For example, if a dog vomits then what is that?"

"I'm thinking of the dog that licks a pubic area," I said.

"It is not the same as another man or woman doing this, in full mindfulness."

"I was told about a woman who'd said to her dog, 'Not yet,' when it made a move towards her crotch."

"There may be a relationship of sorts there but it doesn't serve our purposes."

"But it involves disgust, for some," I added.

"Not for the dog. Clearly. It would amount to no more than exploitation for our purposes. The principle of compassion to sentient beings should operate."

"I'm just curious," I said.

"Well, curiosity is an example of samsara and you should drop it."

She then asked whether any of the women were menstruating. Fatima was.

"We can use such natural, flowing, life-liquid."

Anong then said that urinating emphasises the transitory: that life's medium, water, is yet made sterile with a chemical deposit after evaporation.

Many relationship partners experience the other one urinating, she said, listening with the bathroom door open or sharing the same space, or perhaps watching over a partner peeing by a roadside. However, they often do not go on to do it over each other. This was her practice with her group.

So she would now sit for five minutes whilst we discussed what we might and might not do, and what we would like to see.

Elizabeth said, "Thank you very much. Anong is being reserved and respectful. What I will do I have done with Anong before. You may be shocked. I mean shit. Please discuss."

Rory Jackson said he would like to pee on Elizabeth. His work deputy Philip Shrimpton then said he would on Anong, but it would be fierce at the moment.

"Doesn't matter," said Anong.

Tony Pierce said that he'd had a shit but wanted to see one.

Betty Wharfedale said she'd find it a practice too far.

Liz said, "People are free to walk out."

I said that my wife Linda and I often peed in the same space, but we only ever splashed each other accidentally. Linda's father was often just letting it out in the open air as he needed.

Jenny said that late in their school career Linda and she would talk while one of them and maybe then the other sat on the loo and peed. It meant nothing.

Young Janet Pierce said she fancied having the opportunity of being peed on. Her grandfather could do it if he wanted. He then said she was his favourite.

Kerry Wharfedale said that any new experiences would be in private first.

Jenny World then said she could make herself sick easily, and would vomit. Fatima then told her she would not do so, not at all.

No one else wanted to vomit. Frances Alcock said vomiting makes people feel lousy.

The Buddhist Anong said, "I expect fucking. Just do it. Enter me. Produce sperm for me. I will produce a mixed liquid."

Thus it was that we would experience a night a kind of depravity in the bathroom. Everyone but Anong going upstairs naked. Anong hung her robe on the bathroom door inside. She was so boney!

Bishop Tess insisted we start with extremity. She lay on the bathroom floor and Anong squatted over her face. We looked closely as she said, "Look. My anus stretching out shows the beauty of flower petals."

At this point sisters Betty Wharfedale and Kerry Wharfedale decided to leave, and, seeing what was to come out, so did I. Also, I felt negative after disagreeing over dogs.

So we missed what happened but we could hear it. Betty and Kerry leaned against the wall in the hallway and so I was entering them alternately. Much more fun.

We could hear groans and ughs. Someone threw up. It seemed to be two females involved.

While enjoying the fucking we could hear sprays of a kind and I doubt it was the taps or shower hose.

There was the sound of orgasms, female and male.

Anong said something, possibly in Sanskrit.

Elizabeth praised God.

Very soon afterwards the skinny and smeared Buddhist opened the bathroom door with her robe on but open, went down the stairs, put on her sandals, and left. She hadn't even said a simple goodbye to anyone.

I could hear the shower hose going now, but first out were Fatima and Jenny.

"We'll clean it up properly tomorrow."

Bishop Liz came out, with still some evidence still of what Anong did on her chest. When I pointed at it (with my penis in Kerry) Liz went back into the bathroom.

Fatima came out with blood having run down her legs.

I was deep up into Bettina when I asked, "Did Anong run off?"

"No. She'll clean up when home."

Liz came out again when I was into Kerry . I asked, "Has Anong taken offence?"

"No," said Liz. "She recognised the path of the Dharma and I then praised God. This has been an interfaith meeting. Anyway, you three chickened out?"

We vertical three said in near unison, "No!"

I then said my wife had spent our sexual life making sure I could penetrate her anus deeply and cleanly and not that.

"Exactly," said Kerry, as I withdrew to re-enter Betty.

I asked, "What will Christine think?"

Elizabeth said that the talk had been recorded, and that she would send the sound file to Christine with the text, and she would also speak to Terry and Jonathan.

I came inside Bettina Wharfedale and brought both women to their orgasms, using my tongue from below. We three praised God.

Before we dispersed, a cleaned-up Liz told everyone that this woman, Anong, and those like her, were carrying out ideas and practices that some would say were not Buddhist, just as others would say that our activities were not Christian, and thus we should observe her group's secrecy as we maintained our own.

Meanwhile, Philip Shrimpton received Elizabeth's plan to see if Jonathan Eyre and Linda was a one-off. He'd claim to be an agency teacher (to be less traceable), and meantime, for credibility, was reading up on another Jackson of the anthropological school of teaching Religious Education. Headteacher Kay Parker would introduce him to Linda; he'd take Linda out, and would report back on all of Linda's responses.

That Friday night I slept between Fatima and Jenny without the sexual activity of the night before and did not even fuck Jenny.

Fatima said, "I changed my mind about Jenny vomiting on Anong or I'd never have heard the end of it."

Narrator: Linda Lindy and Serhat (Saturday 11th May)

When I was taking baggage to Diana's car, prior to dressing, I chatted to the now temporary Centre Manager, Judi, whose contrasting stodgy husband had lots of body hair. He had specific reception and administration duties. They spent their days nude: surely a great life. However, this was a job people said they could not keep due to the call of the wider family. His father had died and there was a furniture business to run. They were returning to Chesterfield, back into a family that knew nothing of this life of freedom to the air.

"So," I asked the receptionist, "what do I call you? Is it Sir Hat or Hat? Your surname is, what, Ahmed?"

"Serhat Ahmad."

Naked Diana walked up carrying her own luggage.
I continued: "So you like - and why not? - to use your title?"
"What title?" he asked.
Diana, dropping her suitcases, said, "Linda, it's..."
"Well, what did you do to become a knight of the realm? I'm assuming you didn't inherit it."
"I don't know what you are implying."
"You title. Sir Hat."
Diana turned her back to me.
"Ah. If I had been knighted I'd be Sir Serhat. Serhat is one word."
I stood motionless, realising that I was a fast-tracked idiot. "I'm terribly sorry.
Your wife, the manager?
"Judi is a very uncomplicated name."
"So that is not an Islamic name."
Diana still facing away flapped her arms about.
I barked at her: "What have I said now?"
He answered: "Judi is the mountain where the Prophet Noah - Peace be upon him - rested after the flood, found in south-east Turkey."
Now Diana faced me with a huge grin.
"I'm so sorry that, as a Christian minister, I display such ignorance."
Somehow, my failure to learn or understand names plunged me into further embarrassment when dealing with those of other ethnic origin.
Diana now said, "I hope you can come back from time to time, and enjoy the life here."
"Yes," I said, trying to be safe by agreeing with Diana.
"Not you. Them!"
"I was agreeing with you about... and his wife. Shall we just go? Sorry, Ser... hat."
We continued towards the car park beyond the doors, with me growling.
In the entrance area outside I nearly bumped into someone I recognised. It was a clothed Lindy Peacock, presumably entering to register and stay.
"Lindy!" I said. At least I knew her name, so similar to mine. "We're off home to Serninsea. How is everything?"
"Fine, fine."
"You've moved from Saxiclite to this club, or are you just visiting?"
"Something like that."
"To get distance between you and Jeremy?"
"Not quite."
"Are you on your own?"
"How shall I answer?" was her even stranger reply.
"Doesn't my question call for a simple binary answer?"
Diana smirked.
Lindy said, "He's out there. I think he is possibly hiding."
"From whom?"
"If you two dress, and leave, then..."
"Say hello to Jeremy for me," I said.
"You encountered his wife Emily," she added. "He told me all about it. Jeremy, stop hiding!" Lindy asked, "Are you going to preach at me then?"

"Nope," I replied.

"Are you going to tell her?"

"It's up to you, Lindy - you and him."

"We changed to Bever Wood not to deceive her, but to allow Jeremy to decide whether to be with me only or with her longer. She - and he - goes to Saxiclite with the kids."

"How do you think he will function as a clergyman if he chooses you only?"

"Look, I'm happy to be what some call a 'mistress' - it is she who wants all or nothing."

So I said, "I'm not enquiring any further. Nice seeing you again."

Diana said, "Good to meet you again."

We went outside, our bare backs and bottoms to the building.

"I heard you," said also clothed Jeremy, approaching us from the side. "Well, there we are."

"Good to see you again," I said. "Let me introduce my pal Diana."

After we loaded the car, we took our bags of clothes to the cloakroom, to put them on there. And we said hello again to Jeremy and Lindy, now naked. She was thin, blonde, hairy; he was showing some spread.

According to the rules, we returned directly to the car.

Diana said, with her driving out of the woods, "You were a bit preachy. I like Lindy."

"No I wasn't. Emily was upset when she chucked me out. I told you before. So you like Lindy Peacock?"

"She has made a habit of coupling with already coupled blokes."

"Quite," I said. "But I can't preach much, given all that is happening around me."

"Given your conference affair."

"It was not an affair; I'm not going to run off to Margate. So Jeremy is continuing to see her. And I won't tell Emily."

"Because she chucked you out?"

"No. Sometimes 'secrets secrets' is the best way and gives space for something to work out."

Narrator: Keith Leaving Hartlepool (Saturday 11th May)

Saturday morning did involve a quickie with Jenny. She was taking birth control. "Anong is a nutcase," she said.

I left as Sarah brought back Akemi to Fatima. Akemi often slept over at Sarah's, married to Taran Farhadi and with their own five year old.

I was home before Linda arrived, and so I rang the Reverend Jim Wilson about the evening at Hartlepool. He'd already heard about it, that three including me had declined participation, and Jen Willingale had today exited the group with sister Betty trying to persuade her back.

He said that we did not need depravity to demonstrate sinfulness. As for me asking about dogs, he said that they could be used, for example, if Linda resisted membership.

I thought this was a bit strong, but kept my opinion to myself, except to say, "I think there is a reaction against Anong and a rejection of dogs. It's the women involved that interest me," I said.

Jim went into his own rant against people using pastoral, commercial and especially personal confidentiality. "I don't get it how a rabbi can marry a Christian minister, and start claiming personal confidentiality. We've a right to know when they get together under the Confraternity."

"I've to divorce her first," I said. "Let's get her ordained. As for Maurice, he's Reformist. Progressive Jews were sympathetic to Protestant Christianity at one time."

He replied, "Sympathy is not conversion. Anyway, are you entertaining yourself with Yojana?"

"She is about to be very busy. I am very busy," I said, "so she can't be having an affair with me." I added, "I'm a one woman man - Cheryl."

He wondered if I had tried to convert Yojana during my mentoring.

"No, but we have discussed religious beliefs."

This inadequate answer seemed to bring the call to a close, with him mumbling to himself.

A secured message from Elizabeth arrived, which started with:

NW8PH1ZTEHOnbw==#M9+... [1,148 characters]

It translated as:

Some of us seemed to be disturbed by activities with Anong. We did not want to lose people, but we are in an elite group and we should be able to learn from varied practitioners. The Reverend Deacon Christine Vine suggests that people under the Confraternity have been having entertaining and easy experiences and we should learn from Anong. However, we may not be at her or my stage of self-sacrifice yet. Anong's other name is Sheila Patterson, sixty-one years old, operating in a group of twelve women and men in Middlesbrough and they frequently practise sensations of disgust on the body. I join them at times and discuss the differences in our theologies. Christine may have more to say soon. Until then the various theatrical players will not attempt to imitate what took place on Friday at the Hereteu vicarage. [819 characters]

Diana dropped Linda off. I claimed that I'd visited the office briefly on Friday but I had worked from home otherwise. She met my explanation with a stare and a nod. I had no reason to suppose that she knew otherwise.

Chapter 06 Adam Becomes Busy

Narrator: Linda First Visit to the Detective Agency (Monday 13th & Wednesday 15th May)

We called it Monday in the fourth week after Easter. I received a telephone call at the church from the supposed Martin Haralambos. "Reverend Jupitas? Go ahead." He said no more! By this I knew that the internal monitoring and testing at Systematic Measuring Services had at last begun.

I made an appointment through Peter the receptionist at Magellan Investigations.

As it happened, on Wednesday, I was with Diana at Patricia's staring through the conservatory roof at the clouds.

"I have an appointment next to see the detective about Keith's closeness with Yojana in order to expose the one with Cheryl."

"Why not directly about Cheryl Mould?"

"Because Keith works with Yojana up here."

"An investigator cannot look at closeness. I am close to loads of blokes but there is not affair."

"In the course of investigating her, wether they are too close to function, he finds out about the affair."

"What if he is screwing Yojana as well?"

"He's not because Cheryl and Keith are soppy about each other, I'm told."

"So you already know; why not put Magellan on to them?"

"It's about evidence and exposure."

"Is there something about you not being straightforward?" Diana asked. "You're not straightforward with Church beliefs and not with this, it seems."

"So Keith is very good at concealing, and I want to come at him left field."

Patricia arrived at 3 pm as ever. This time 3 pm was the suitable timing for dressing back into a blue blouse with a clerical collar, jacket, and trousers, strapped red shoes and low heels as ever.

Diana put her hands on my shoulders and wished me the best. Patricia seemed to stare at Diana, but wished me good luck.

On the way I made an appointment at the doctor's. The formidable receptionist, Doris Schutt, wanted me to declare why I'd see the GP but I refused to tell her, as was my right.

The detective agency was situated at the southern end of Upper Road, being in a middle house of a large terrace of three Victorian houses. The third one had Klärchen Sisse as its resident. The vacated premises next door at the north end of the block had been accommodation and office space. A tenfoot went around its double garage to the back of short gardens and bordered with the long gardens of properties on the Promenade Road.

The notice, 'Magellan Investigations', was in small text, as if no one should know he was even there, next to the left side front door of this middle of the terrace. The competition, Wickenby's Detective Agency, was better known, on Caffin Road, leading out of town.

Shown in by the suited 'Magician', the corridor that soon narrowed alongside the staircase was on the left or north side of the property, and this large reception room was to the right.

The young male assistant said, "I'm Peter Marshall. Take any seat." These were all somewhat worn leather armchairs and at the far wall a reasonable condition leather settee and a low table. Peter had a seat, desk and computer. There were shelves and boxes on the floor.

After a summons by intercom, Adam Magellan came and greeted me, and we moved into the next large room on the right as Peter moved past us down the corridor. There was obviously a small kitchen at the end, and, given a flushing sound, a toilet.

Adam's sweeping desk had technology above and below. There were shelves galore, but more boxes and papers on the floor. There were chairs and another leather settee again but at right angles. The walls needed painting. He sat and started tapping at his computer. He gestured me to come to the seat on my side of the long curvy desk.

He said, "Sorry about the decor - I'm thinking of having the builders in, never mind the decorators. Sometime maybe soon. These places are bigger than they seem."

He leaned back behind his desk. I faced him but he was partly concealed by his large computer screen.

"Slow today," he said. "Shit broadband in Serninsea. You're Reverend Linda Ju...Jupi..."

"...tas. Not a bad place to be a reverend. You live here as well?" I asked.

"Upstairs. I've got my eye on next door and its double garage. Nice lass at the other end. If I had enough money I'd buy hers as well. But it's not the most lucrative of jobs, this."

I enquired some more. "How does one end up becoming a private dick?" I asked, smiling, although he was still partly hidden and choosing not to look at me.

"I'm best described as a private investigator. I do very little detection. I was in the police but didn't like the command structure. So what can I do you for, Reverend?"

"Do you know me?" I asked.

"No, I don't. I don't think we've dealt, Mrs. Reverend Jupiter - tas. I've a terrible memory for faces and names."

"I saw you - and him - in the casino recently."

"Oh," he said. "I go in there occasionally. Miladdo out there took me to show me how to do blackjack."

"I have a similar problem with names," I said. "Were you linked to the Systematic Measuring Services do in there?" I asked him, seeking any connection ahead of business.

"I noticed that that lot of them were in, and then half of them seemed to disappear. Amazing women. Jupitas. Manager of Compliance."

"Correct. I'd not even been in there before, but my husband sometimes socialises with workmates."

"Funny place, that casino. Two steel doors. There's an upstairs from the first. Mysterious, huh?"

Now he looked around his screen at me. Looking thus at Adam's features, I wondered if my appearance had changed much in twenty-two years. His hair was thinner and his body was fatter. My fairly recent dream of him had him much younger, of course.

"You still haven't said why you are here and, em, well, time is money - to me it is."

"Isn't an initial consultation free?"

"But it's opportunity cost. What else I could be doing? Don't hold back. Annie's on early."

"Who?"

"Nothing. Go on."

"I'm just establishing first that you have no connection with SMS because I have some private work for you that would be muddied up - or could be - if you work for them."

He was partially concealed again. "My competitor George Wickenby gets that work. I'm reduced to asking him if there are any scraps. Are you offering me scraps?"

"My husband and one of those amazing women is why I am here."

"So are you representing SMS and putting extra business in my direction for a change?"

"No. I am asking if Keith Richard Jupitas is having an affair among the personnel."

"Just a second. I'm typing in a hello here for 'Headgirl' Annie and give a tip. So you're the wife."

"Why don't you do yourself a favour and look up the National Church website for Wytham Diocese and the Parish of Serninsea, Titansea and Sutton and look me up."

"Bye Annie! I've left the room."

"You're still here."

"So do clergy divorce a lot? I'd I've thought they'd be in lovey dovey marriages."

"They divorce especially when there's an affair. But I'd hope there might be an alternative to divorce."

Who's he shagging, do you think - sorry - in the personnel?"

"One of them."

"He is only a year older than me. The name... I think I've heard of him, a long time ago, probs. Yeah, there was a Jupitas: a toff at school, or thought he was."

"Yes, him. Is he having an affair?"

"Cut to the chase. The cheapest option is for you to ask him yourself. I assume you have asked him and he has said no."

"I want evidence," I said.

"Oh. Evidence. Well, it is £35 an hour pure without expenses and a minimum £105, all excluding VAT. That's a lot of money for sitting in a car waiting for someone to appear, say from a hotel, all of which proves nothing."

"From the office? From her place?"

"I'd need to be within the office?"

"Perhaps she takes work home."

"What does that prove?"

"Perhaps she takes him home. I want you to observe."

"Well, I'm willing to take your money, madam, Mrs. Reverend, but you might be spending a lot for very little. Plus I like to do a thorough job and it adds up the pennies. I seem to remember Jupitas was always sniffing the females at school."

"So you don't want the work?"

"Oh I do," he said, staring at the computer screen and still only partially visible to me. "I just play straight with my clients. You give me as much information as possible, including when to act. Here is the thing. You give me good information and often I say, 'Why then do you need me?' You probably have more information than I could ever gather."

"You need to act now. They are working together now. I want to know what you observe."

"Also set yourself a maximum payment - say £525 and then add the VAT and expenses like travel. My work starts with your question for my focus and ends with a report containing an answer. You then pay the bill. I can do running commentaries for a bit extra."

"Like an essay then, at school sixth form." (I was trying to see if he would remember me.)

He said. "Not an essay, a report. Definitely not like at school."

"Perhaps there was a teacher who said, 'You must answer the question that I set.' Do you remember that, Mr. Magellan?"

"'Don't know' or 'Needs more work' is also a report."

"What about, 'Show your working?' - that's an old one."

"Oh no. That's trade secrets. Let me revise this. I can show what I did - 'your working' - but minus any secrets of the trade."

"Do you do anything tricky, different or special?"

"Well, Mrs. Reverend Jupitas... So he married a vicar!"

"I'm a curate not a vicar. And he didn't, then."

"Well, I do have a few tricks of the trade. My assistant tells me he is learning to be invisible, with the right props. He's learning to be a magician. So your question is, 'Is Mr. Keith Jupitas having an affair?' Do you have a name?" he asked, further.

"The name I do know, with whom he is said to be too close."

"Ah, with whom. School is that? Or being a vicar? Look, I work efficiently and I don't just pile on the costs. Here's a funny thing. The more you tell us, the more we can tell you. Name, places, times."

"So your magician joins in the investigating, for the same fee."

"My new assistant out there might observe and follow, but I'll make sure it's done right."

"You follow the clues."

"I put all of the information together."

"So what amount is involved now?"

"Okay. Up front as well... Ah, add seventy quid VAT. Three hundred and two."

"I see. Are you like Mr. Marker?"

"Who?"

"Seventies television. Public Eye. Alfred Burke played Frank Marker, a loner."

"Depends what he did."

"Divorces, multiple marriages, credit, missing people, protection, police liaison..."

"Look, you write down all that you suspect, in confidence with us."

Seeing whether he might remember me instead of my husband, I continued, "So, beyond paying and informing, is that it regarding me?"

"Your background is relevant, possibly. Now this SMS moved its HQ to... Harlow, didn't it?"

"Harwich."

"Of course it was. Felixstowe is another."

"Bigger operation," I said.

"And, er... Dunwich."

"Dunwich?" I asked.

"Oh no, that's different. It was twelve hundred and something. Very big port. Then. Search engines!"

"Harwich does local and national administration for SMS."

"Do you want to write stuff down now? Or you could use this computer now, if you have the time," he said.

"Okay. I'll come round to your side." This seemed the most sensible.

"Do vicars type?"

"I'm sorry: I forgot my quill pen. I must have left it in Dunwich."

"I meant, like, it's all cups of tea and... Look, here is a document template ready for you to type. Your name and contact details at the top, the investigation you want below, the details below that."

"This is like self-service," I said, with me now behind the desk, and him stood alongside me.

He said, "Ah! Don't press that. Annie."

"Your woman? You're not a lonely Frank Marker, then."

"She's not a lover, but a kind of a friend. Local, I know."

He advised me to include Keith's mobile phone number and provider. Then, "Give me some idea of when you think he is meeting this woman. Who is she? I've not yet got her name. As much as possible, please."

"Yojana Asthana, she is called. Systematic Measuring Services. You'll see she is in the Independent Inspection unit. Oh, the Interdependent Inspection Unit. So she is like a person who checks he's managing things properly, is being honest himself. The inspections test her, him, them, all sorts, but I want to know if they are having an affair."

After some of my typing, he asked, "Are you sure this is not SMS business? She's passing information?"

I paused. "Well, I suppose, if they are having an affair, she may well be passing information as well. I don't give a shit about that."

"A shit? Reverends use..."

"Reverends also shit."

"Holy shit, Batman! And why do you suspect?" he asked. "How did you suspect?"

"A member of the congregation knows someone who knows." (This was, of course, a complete lie.)

"Can I interview him or her?"

"Definitely not; it's the seal of the confessional."

"I like Donna Nook."

"I don't know anyone called Donna Nook, and if I did I wouldn't tell you in this context."

"It's a place. We might get a seals viewing facility here."

"And I am not an idiot," I said. (I was an idiot.)

"I was just thinking... So, she or he told you in one of those, like, boxes?" he asked. "Could you get her to go in again and tell you some more?"

"The 'seal of the confessional' is a phrase representing legal privilege."

"They look so helpless lying on the sands. I wonder how the sanctuary here will function. Em, do type in your precise job up there."

"I'm a deacon in the local Anglican church, to be priested in a matter of months. He's been with her probably two years since he got a job at SMS."

Looking at me from standing above, he said, "Am I supposed to know you?"

Hello, here we were. Not quite so stupid as he seemed. I played along. "You're the detective. Don't you recognise me? It could be handy for you when you do."

"I've said I have a terrible memory for faces and names."

"Bit of a handicap in your trade," I commented. "Mind you, it's awful in mine."

"Also, when I get a name wrong, I keep getting it wrong. Miladdo out there has corrected me a number of times."

"Remember Yojana Asthana. She is top bitch of the IIS in SMS."

He went on, "Where would I recognise you from in particular? Presumably the local parish church but then that's not my scene at all. Miladdo is a bit of a religious weirdo but I am definitely not."

I answered, "Do you want my maiden name?"

"Nah. It's not relevant."

"It's done, then, the relevant stuff. I think this is fairly comprehensive. I must go sharply now."

"You morph into a knife?" he asked.

"What?"

"It was a joke, Reverend Jupit...as." Laughing boy turned and walked to the door. "Follow me to Peter."

"Going to Rome?" I asked. "Crossing the Tiber?"

"Just along the corridor to miladdo."

Peter asked me, in the large reception room, "What will you download your report on?"

"Probably on to my mobile phone."

"Can I see it?"

"I suppose so. Here."

"So, a standard smart phone. When a report is ready, we will send an email It will say, em, Arguments related to the theologian James Martineau with a link. But you need to enter the password in capitals MARJUP3 to get the article. MAR for the theologian, JUP for you, and 3 as the likely usual number of reports."

Who is James Martineau?" I asked, retrieving the phone.

"A Unitarian theologian in the past."

"Oh I don't know about that," I said.

"No, he was."

"I don't want that association."

"Who do you want then?" Peter Marshall asked.

"Karl Barth?" I suggested, offhand.

"Is that a C or a K?"

"It's a K," I said. "It's t - h at the end."
"So you prefer Karl Barth?"
"Not really, no."
"Well, who do you prefer?"
"Whom."
"Who's that? I knew a John Hume at school."
Adam said, "He was in here the other day."
I said, "Dennis Nineham."
"Don't know him," said Adam.
"Dennis Nineham Hume?" Peter Marshall asked.
"No, Stupi irriot. Just, em, Dennis Nineham."
"Justine... Spell the middle name. Is it one N or two?"
"D - E - N - N - I - S first name, N - I - N - E - H - A - M second name."
"Arguments related to the theologian Dennis Nineham."
"Right," I said. "NINJUP3"
"Yes. You beat me to it."
"Show Reverend Mrs. Jupitas out," said Mr. Magellan, who left us.
I pointed at a little Buddha on a back wall shelf.
"I've seen you before," Peter Magellan said, "in the casino of course but you came to my show. We are just trying a few things out. Early days."
"Twins." I said.
"This is the trouble," he responded. "Many people here are likely to know them both, but in the publicity we have just Kath. I know it is obvious, but hiding is obvious."
I stretched to look at his screen. "You've looked me up."
"Jupitas is very unique."
"I am that. My husband's name was originally Jupitz, four generations up."
"Jewish."
"They were indeed."
"There is an actor and writer with that name - Jupitz. They say that the name Jupitz indicates an easy-going diplomat who likes to socialise," he told me.
"Is that how you do your personality profiling?"
"No. Anyway, I found out your maiden name. You're not on Facebook, but your sisters and brother have pages, and so I looked them up and looked up connections to Serninsea of course. Your family has moved to Wales."
"Yes. Correct. You might be better at this than him."
"By the way, I know you didn't say 'Justine'. Let me have your mobile phone. Show you something.
He brought a bottle from behind the desk, took my phone, seemed to bash it into the bottle and then it appeared in the bottle.
"Hey!" I said. "What happened there?"
"It's in the bottle."
"I can see that. Very clever. That's very clever. Now you just have to get it out."
"You take it home then," he said. "Bring the bottle back, but keep your clothes on after you get it out."
"I see. You found that out."
"You went to school with him, didn't you? I'll see if he realises this."

"He's got himself a good assistant. He needs one, if you ask me."

"Not a stupi irriot, then," he said.

"No. I hope he pays you well."

"Of course he doesn't. It's an apprentice scheme I'm afraid. I come free to him. Both Kath's sign on as well."

"That's not right. I'd better take this home. What do I do, hit the bottle with a hammer?"

"You'd better not," he said. "It could damage the phone. Bring the bottle back, and I can use it again."

"So how am I supposed to get it out, miladdo?"

"Give it to me."

He shook it behind the desk, and then he raised up my phone, apparently freed.

"Thank you," I said, relieved. "Well, I'll be off. See you again, naughty boy. Hope you make some progress."

"Mr. Magellan has sent me a message. Three hundred and two pounds, please, up front. Might be more at the end."

"My card; I'll pay up front by card."

Narrator: Keith A Leak in Initials and Behaving (Wednesday 15th May)

It was more and more unusual to receive things in the post at work. Most posted items were simply unwanted. I opened this letter, with a word processed address on the envelope, and an ordinary stamp, and inside was a cut sliver of paper. All it said was, A.M.K.J.R.Y.L.A.

My first thought was whether to approach Yojana on this. I could see my three initials and her three, so I did. I mentioned each letter having a full stop straight afterwards.

She saw the same, but asked, "Is A.M. a person as well or an activity?"

One of the options was that A.M. could be 'Adam Magellan'; but he would have to be working for SMS. If he was, we should not know this. (Other possibilities were: 'Action Management', 'Added Momentum', 'Aware of Management', 'Morning'.)

Yojana wondered if the note had come from a Goose in The Worshipful Company also in top management? But I pointed out that we were supposed to observe all the confidentiality and boundaries. These were commercial as well as pastoral and personal.

Yojana thought that we must obey all the Chinese wall rules. An investigator might indicate how friendly we were, and yet we would have been completely reliable.

We agreed to pause the nookie, to keep out and keep secret The Worshipful Company. We had to keep all under the Confraternity absolutely secret. No documents must be shared or exchanged.

I said that Security must read the note as it was a potential leak.

Thus we were in agreement.

Meanwhile, I asked her opinion of events in Hartlepool, when Elizabeth had brought in Anong.

Yojana did not like it, and I was right to leave the bathroom. Yojana disliked a message from Christine that we were becoming far too soft in our ways. She said the point really is to love each other, and sex was often the way to reconnect and find a way to resolve matters. She did not want to take up practices that were not lovely to enjoy. She liked fucking with me, and did not pain instead of pleasure.

"Too right," I said.

She suspected that her Uncle San and Christine were different, but she was not her uncle. He also paid Christine a great deal.

I didn't dislike use of menstrual blood, so Yojana said that, if I really wanted, she would show me having her period next time. I said I did not want to see this. Cheryl, I added, made much of her menstrual cycle because she wondered how long it would be before it starts to become irregular, and then for it to stop altogether. So we had indulged in lots of sex. Yojana said that Cheryl obviously wants a baby.

I said, "Me too."

Yojana then said that Julie Manns' coming baby was probably the first baby of the three Confraternity groups. I took her point that Julie Manns' love for the world probably meant sleeping with many in that group, but Jonathan claimed responsibility and Julie agreed. I did not tell Yojana that I knew of one other Confraternity birth, in Hartlepool.

Yojana switching back to the SMS inspections and stress-testing suggested that by travelling to and from her parents' Maa Skelter Guest House we could give investigators something to observe. We should be pally with one another. She said that throughout the year some post is sent there rather than the office and away from prying eyes.

But I said we might have to find a way to demonstrate that I did not see her documents. If George Wickenby or associates followed us we might have to manipulate impressions.

Therefore we would arrange meetings at her bed and breakfast electronically, but use the beach to show documents not changing hands.

Yojana's tour north east and to South Wales was on her mind but would happen after the investigating.

Narrator: Linda First Report from Adam Magellan (Friday 17th May)

Two days after the initial meeting I got a call from Adam Magellan.

"Is that the Reverend Linda Jupitas?" He was speaking, I would think, into his desk telephone, given the reverberation. "She's a church priest."

"Yes, Mr. Magellan. It is me. But I am not the full entity yet."

"Am I able to speak to you?"

"Yes. Keith is at his office in Titansea; I work at home, like now, among other places."

"Well, I've just received a message from a technical source that your husband is going with Yojana Asthana this lunchtime to her home, and he is giving her a lift. I don't know how often they do this. So my young colleague and I will spend some time waiting and following today. They have sent relatively sweet messages between them but they could just be friendly."

"Oh." I paused. "Relatively sweet?"

"Very friendly - well, from what I, er... And, em, by the way, I do remember who you are. Hello Linda."

"Hello Adam. What's 'relatively sweet'? Give me an example."

"Er, this might not be advisable."

"You won't hurt my feelings."

"Technicalities prevent."

"You don't want to say. Do you recall what is or was on your hand?"

"Yeah. It's fading. It was late sixth form," he said. "We cut each other, blood and simple scarring. Jenny Masters, you, and me. Keith was a year above us."

"I can just about see mine," I confirmed. "That was quite something for me to do that. My super-smooth skin I deliberately affected."

"We missed our ten year appointment, and twenty," he pointed out. "But I don't suppose you mind that now. I mean, being a priest..."

"A deacon."

"...means you will have changed."

"Well, you'd vanished in terms of my life. And the others have. Jenny Masters is in my profession, last known up north."

"Being a Reverend deflected me and 'Jupitas' didn't really register. As for me, I joined the police for just over ten years, including time in Nottingham, but with cut-backs I came back here and stayed by opening the town's second investigation agency. Gives George Wickenby a bit of competition. Geoff Virgo: now I think he might have gone abroad and did English language teaching or something like that. Jenny, yes, she got religion, and also she went up north to university a year after you. University of Tees. But her gap year was when she did nothing much, except she was with me before she was approached by a then small religious mob. So we split. I didn't know you'd got religion and I paid no attention to the local church - well, with one exception at one point, completely irrelevant to this."

"Really?"

"Well Peter Marshall, my new helper, and I haven't got long, so we are off now to have a look and keep our distance."

I asked if it was possible to be sent an instant report link to my email on today's following and he said yes for another £25 before VAT. (No discounts for friends.)

The email arrived that evening: Arguments Related to Dennis Nineham. The interim report, via my password, was entitled:

Report: Magellan Investigations: Targets Meet, Relationship Ambiguous

Report Findings: Ambiguous Relationship between Work Colleagues at Bed and Breakfast.

Just after 2 pm target Keith Jupitus drove out with target Yojana Asthana from the same workplace Systemic Measuring Services, Bolingbroke Road, Titansea, and were followed by Junior Investigator Peter Marshall and the two were travelling in the expected direction.

This was consistent with information received regarding their communications:

showing warmth and friendliness between the communicators but no electronic document sharing.

Marshall paused. Then Investigator Adam Magellan followed the targets together towards Maa Skelter Guest House run by her parents near the coast outside Sutton-on-Serninsea. With journeying as expected, Investigator Magellan turned to take a circuitous route for the bed and breakfast stopping in a nearby road while Junior Investigator Marshall parked at the Maa Skelter car park with two spaces in between his and Jupitas's car.

We know that target Asthana possessed papers she had received at her home address, indicating by private sources that Ephouse Travel Ltd. carried less than declared quantities of bulk products and that Compliance had failed to spot this. This test is by arrangement with Ephouse Travel who will report back on any contacts and information.

On the premise of he and (fictional) wife will be staying for a holiday, the female receptionist took agent Marshall up the stairs and showed him some rooms. He might stay himself as part of his travels as a salesperson in pharmaceuticals. Once downstairs again, targets Jupitus and Asthana were seen in the lounge. She had a closed documents folder close by. Target Asthana resembles the receptionist but the receptionist is older.

At the lounge door, Junior Investigator Marshall asked target Asthana if she and Jupitus were staying on holiday and what they thought of the place, and she stated that she lived there. Jupitus stayed quiet. The receptionist then declared to be her mother and asked Marshall if he wanted to book ahead; he declared he would contact his (fictional) wife and tell her what had been seen.

Marshall then rang Investigator Magellan, as if to his wife, and acted out what he had seen. At this point, the receptionist went away into a small room directly off the reception, and Marshall took an opportunity to look behind the reception desk and its shelf. He noted among other items a white plastic badge, with a white B on a black goose. It seemed noteworthy, but we do not know what it means.

The receptionist mother returned and added that the establishment provided evening meals and Marshall completed the call with this information.

The targets left the building towards the sea and Junior Investigator Marshall went into the lounge with its window. Target Asthana held the document folder under her right arm whilst outside target Jupitus was seen to put his left arm around Asthana's waist until they sat at one wooden picnic table with benches. The garden goes down to the water. The folder was unopened. Asthana waved her finger at Jupitus, and Jupitus put his hands into the air submissively. The folder stayed under her arm.

Junior Investigator Marshall left the building and went to his car. He could see along the beach and the targets walked down on to the beach and stood near the sea looking across the ocean. Hand movements suggested familiarity. Target Keith Jupitus gave target Yojana Asthana a kiss on the cheek and Marshall drove away.

An Indian family, of second and third generation of immigrants, we believe nothing culturally can be inferred from the colleagues' familiarity. Yojana Asthana is a career independent woman. We detect no particular conservatism from her background and therefore infer no excessive relationship.

Conclusion is that although consistent with an affair in working time it is on balance unlikely, especially at her home. She was indicating that he could not see the documents she held. The result is so far inconclusive regarding having an affair.

End

I rang up rather than emailed.

"Peter, my surname is Jupitas with an 'a' and not Jupitus with a second 'u'. Surely he knew the correct spelling."

"Sorry. He must be thinking of the comedian. I will make sure he gets it right in writing next time. Do you wish to speak to Adam?"

"No. Not yet."

I would have been really surprised if an affair had been declared.

I had a call from my old head teacher soon to retire. Ms Kay Parker did arrange a visit, but she wanted me to meet a Mr. Philip Shrimpton, an agency RE teacher, interested in discussing the link between RE schools (approaches, biases) and theology. He'd taught in Lude and Rasa Market, although he was from Wearside, and I might tell her about him having met him.

I did a search for the said person but found nothing; however, wise teachers didn't have social media pages as pupils might compromise them.

Keith in the evening told me that the internal and external investigations had begun in earnest; if I didn't mind, he would not talk about it and wanted a break from thinking about work. However, he asked me why I was interested in Dennis Nineham of all people.

"Have you been looking at my mobile phone?"

"You left it around like you always do, and it doesn't take much moving it for it to come on."

"So did you follow the link regarding Dennis Nineham?"

"No. I already know about him. Don't you? He is an historical relativist and thinks we can go back in time, understand things tentatively, but not be able to use them in our time. There you are: no need to look anything up. Go down his route and you won't have much to say for today. You might have to work for SMS!"

"I see that you haven't lost all your interest in theology."

"Knowledge is not interest," he said.

"Yeah, but that is the issue: anthropological cultural translation through time as well as space."

He did not ask why such a link might be password protected. So I took it he hadn't clicked the link.

After a minute I said, "I still will want to look up what scholars have said including Nineham and about Nineham."

"As you wish," Keith said. "I'm tired. I've a good colleague, you know, that Yojana - very efficient, clever, knows the crap and what's good. Anyway, welcome to the weekend."

Seeing the Doctor (Monday 20th May)

I saw Jagjit and Gurinder Kapoor, for a quick chat on nothing much, though I mentioned my embarrassment at calling Serhat 'Sir Hat'. (I didn't say where.)

"He'll be a Muslim," he said. "I knew a Mrs. McCourt who was told by her imam not to call her son Serhat."

"Like Mahatma," I said.

"No. 'Mahatma' is after the event: of Hindi and Sanskrit origin, and means 'great soul' as an additional title. It was given to Mohandas Gandhi. Rabindranath Tagore probably used this title for Gandhi in 1915."

"I've so much to learn," I said.

Next I faced the formidable German receptionist Doris Schutt at the surgery. She was a gatekeeper for everyone regarding prescriptions and appointments, via telephone, email or face to face.

The local jokes were obvious and to be regretted. She didn't have a receptionist's desk but a sentry box; she took pills to make her head less square. She alone added hundreds to the referendum votes to leave the European Union among the older nationalistic seaside locals.

I waited for my appointment to see Dr. Gujjar, at 11 am, and then went in to see this medical investigator.

Staring at a screen, like Adam Magellan did, he said, "And what can I do for you Reverend Mrs. Jupitas in our allocated ten minutes? You said nothing ascertaining to why to the receptionist."

"It's something I live with. Since I've become a curate, it has somehow started to matter more. I have a condition of relative incontinence."

"How long is it?"

"It varies, doctor."

"How long has it been?" He breathed out, noticeably.

"Origins are some twenty years. It is just becoming inconvenient, doctor."

"You were still a spring chicken, Mrs. Jupitas. It's a strange time, into your twenties, to get incontinence."

"I was damaged, I think."

"Please lower your trousers and underwear so that I can examine you. I suggest you bend over and use the rest couch by putting your upper arms on it and sticking your bottom out. Would you like a female to attend?"

"No."

So I lowered my trousers, and turned to look at him. He was looking inside a supplies cabinet, and found a hollow metal tube with a small light bulb mounted at the end. He put on some clinical gloves. Then he found a tub of grease to apply to the tube.

He said, "This is a seven inches proctoscope. I shall insert it into your rectum, to then remove the obturator so that I can look inside your anus. It may hurt."

"I doubt it."

Without assistance from me, he inserted the proctoscope and removed the obturator to allow his inspection, throwing it into the sink. He moved the device about somewhat.

"There's nothing untoward in there, but I did notice how easily it went in."

"That's the point," I said. "How easily it goes in and how easily stuff comes out. My husband, before he was my husband, spent day after day stretching my anus so that he could do more sexually. It's because my vagina is so shallow, doctor."

"Ah."

He then removed the proctoscope and also threw that into the sink.

"Pull your trousers up, Reverend, while I look at the screen, for your gynaecological reports. Please sit down.

I sat there, while he stared at the screen and moved data up and down.

"Mrs. Jupitas. You still have undescended gonads. I recommend surgery, and you could have combined surgery - remove the gonads, extend your vagina, and we could close up your rectal cavity somewhat."

"Doctor, I have spent my life using dilators. I do not want surgery. I've heard all the recommendations. My sister had surgery; I'd prefer it otherwise, as my mother, in her rapid wisdom, realised."

"I wouldn't suggest bowel surgery unless it was also with these other procedures. Here is what you can do. You can get some advice from the nurse on diet. I will give you a priority appointment here."

"Thank you."

"Try to make a regular routine for going to the toilet, say always going after meals. Have a hot drink before going to the toilet. The nurse may suggest relevant exercises. Surgery gets better control over the muscles in your back passage. We can try a sphincteroplasty, or add a monitoring device for sacral nerve stimulation, or put silicone into the muscles there to bulk up your muscle capability."

"I have declined already."

"Exercise is the best option for now. See the nurse, please on Thursday at 3 pm. There is no point me giving you a prescription."

"Well, thank you doctor."

I thought, as a failing reverend, I could do with sacral nerve stimulation.

Second Report from Adam Magellan (Tuesday 21st May)

At the church on Tuesday morning in the fifth week after Easter I rang Adam Magellan's magical receptionist and suggested 'Criticism of Dennis Nineham' for the next title link.

However, just as the bell in the tower rang for three o'clock, I left the visiting primary school party coming out of the church to find Adam Magellan standing over the road. The children were returning towards the nearby school with their teacher. So I crossed the road.

"Hi," I said. "I read your first report of course. So anything more?"

"We can't say for sure. But they went to her bed and breakfast abode again. Bode! Sorry. Like I wrote first time, he again put his hand around her waist and they kissed, like sort of formally, and she touched his shoulder."

"Sort of formally?"

"Well, clearly it is acceptable that he kisses her. She didn't initiate it, but she's clearly okay about it."

"What else happened this time?"

"Again they looked at the sea and then he drove back to work. This time she got her car out of the garage and she also drove to work."

"You saw this?"

"No, Peter Marshall did. Did she go by public transport in the morning? He thinks there's more to it but I got him to describe it accurately. He was in your house last night?"

"Peter?"

"No, your husband of course."

"He was in our bed." So I said, making this bit up: "What my friend told me is they are familiar when walking in town."

He added, "I mean, if they're having an affair, there is usually an affair bit."

"So can you look further?" I wanted this to extend.

"Getting close to the budget," he said. "But... Yes. Pay any more at the end. Does he come home late often?"

"Yeah. But not last night."

"Does he mention Yojana Asthana at all at home?"

"Yes, actually: he says she is efficient, impressive."

"Actually, that's a good sign."

"So you didn't see anything, Adam. He's clever at being discreet and discrete."

"What?"

"He's both under the radar, and careful, but also detached," I explained. "What were you doing when Peter saw them?"

"I had to do some monitoring for the State. Sometimes people think they can hide in Serninsea, it being out of the way. We'll try and find a time when he doesn't come home to you. Or any meeting with this lady when he isn't having lunch or doing work."

"Yes. Do that then."

"If we can." With surely other motives he asked me, "And are you all right? I'd like to remember old times."

"I bet you would," I said, with a smile.

"Not like that," he reacted. "Obviously things have changed a great deal with you. I'd like to hear about this departure in your life. Had you said or written 'Bode' I'd have done a double-take. An investigator needs clues."

So I said, "Things have changed a lot. I have a meeting just about now with the Vicar of Serninsea. Yep, my different life. But keep in touch - definitely."

In my head was this bad thought. If my husband could misbehave with another woman, if not this one being investigated, why couldn't I with someone where I had a past? So I was going to keep options open. So I made a bid. "We'll eat together, perhaps after you have made more progress. I want a positive result."

"If there is one," he said. "What's a positive result?"

"Er, the truth - I think. I'd better go." Adam moved off at a pace and then slowed.

As I arrived at the door he shouted out, from a distance: "So it's 'Criticism of Dennis Nineham' next time!"

"Yes!" I shouted back.

At which point, Colin Cromer appeared. "What's your interest in Dennis Nineham?"

"Historical translation."

"Well, I approve of criticising Dennis Nineham. Who was that walking away? What's his interest in Dennis Nineham?"

"Parishioner who spotted me and was on about Dennis Nineham."

"And did you invite him into the church?"

"He seems uninterested. It's the clerical collar that attracts them, though."

"Good," said Colin. "That's the idea. So less of the Dennis Nineham and, shortly, more of the administration."

"Administration then," I said to Colin. "What have I to learn?"

"How is someone interested in criticising Dennis Nineham uninterested in the church?"

"Because it doesn't follow through beyond ideas."

"Hmm. Shortly. I have received another report about your visiting. I just don't know where to begin with this one, or what to say."

"What have I done now - or supposed to have done?"

"A concerned parishioner has contacted me offering advice to my curate. She suggests not to visit these young women who, well, has some sort of relationship, er... This is sick. A dog?"

"That was ages ago."

"So it is true! I had hoped someone nasty was targetting you, like with those photographs. Look, we have about a hundred reliable regular and occasional attenders here. Something like that. Obviously not including someone who can talk about Dennis Nineham. Every one of them, or nearly every one of them, would appreciate a visit from you. Yet you seem to find these weirdos and perverts and, what's more, enjoy their company."

"She said to her dog that nudged her in the crotch, 'Not yet' speaking in German. I wanted to leave straight away, I can tell you." (This was not true. I only discovered the translation later.)

"The report I received said you met two of them."

"I later met another. I was not visiting then."

"Well, you seem to find them. Why do you find them, eh?"

"Perhaps it is animal magnetism, Colin."

"There is a time and place for humour and this is not it. I've said enough. This town is full of risk, and just try to be more careful. And I look at your reminder notes at visits, which you should indeed keep and share, and so I looked again and I didn't see any about a young woman and a dog."

"Because we don't put in pastorally sensitive details of confidentiality."

"How convenient. If you wanted to leave you could have recorded a warning to yourself."

"I did want to leave and I remember her name and address."

"And these are?"

"No, Colin, I won't tell you. I am not obliged to tell you. I am quite minded to avoid this woman and indeed her friend. In fact I dodged her house only recently."

"But you must have discovered that this other person was the pervert's friend."

"Because she also had a German accent and there was a college connection with my own friend. It sort of revealed itself - a detectorist with her dog."

"Enough! Enough. Now the administration we must do," he said.

When I left it was back to my hairbrush again. I soon received the report from Adam that laid out what I had been told in the street.

Lorry Kills Eastern European (Wednesday 22nd May)

I was in a town cafe with Diana and Patricia before Patricia would go to work and Diana and I would have gone off to Patricia's conservatory. However, I told her that Kay Parker, our old head teacher, still in office, wanted me to meet a teacher.

"He's an RE specialist, apparently, but agency employed. I think she wants a recommendation."

"Seems an odd thing to ask. I'll see you at Patricia's another time," Diana said.

Meanwhile, they said that my approach with the investigator was devious and could backfire on me, even if I found out Keith was having an affair in Harwich. (I was still knocked back still by Colin's ongoing criticism of me meeting weirdos.)

"Is Keith showing you any real evidence of having an affair?" Diana asked.

"No. Not to me. We're fucking like normal."

"Too much information," said Patricia.

I said, "The odd thing in Adam's reports is that he does seem to be a bit familiar with Yojana Asthana."

"So it might be the wrong person after all," said Patricia. "He's carrying on with a colleague here?"

"I still think..."

"He's not time-travelling then," said Diana. "Perhaps I should chat with Mouldy like I do with Glenda online. We fans find each other. Don't worry - I won't."

Suddenly there was a vehicle screech and thudding noise outside. I rushed out to find a man hit at a zebra crossing nearby, and it seemed he was lifeless. Others dialled 999; I messaged Reverend Colin, and I spoke to the shocked lorry driver bent over in his cab frozen from what had happened.

Apparently the victim was one of our agricultural workers from eastern Europe who'd looked left not right at the moment when a lorry was coming along and the driver had assumed he'd stay on the path. Colin Cromer arrived in five minutes, as did the ambulance and police. Clamping my backside, I directed some police to people who'd spoken to me (potential witnesses), and Colin gave what comforts he could to bystanders on the scene. Traffic built up and it was all soon coned off anyway. The man was killed there and then, and the lorry driver submitted himself for questioning.

When I seemed to run out of other people who wanted to speak to me, I returned to Diana and Patricia, as they had stayed in the cafe, and then used the loo. Back with them, I told them what had happened and recovered a little myself. Because the road was a potential crime scene, Patricia left to get back to her car in a car park, to get to her house and the arrival of her kids before the traffic disruption went in many directions.

As I was leaving I could overhear racist type chat at large about Eastern Europeans who shouldn't be over here in the first place and that there is nowhere to rent any more for our people. It wasn't true of course: as the Margate conference stated. It was tribal anti-European stuff.

Colin Cromer was still about and came over to me, suggesting I call it a day and he would be enquiring about who knew the deceased and whether he would be involved in funeral arrangements. He also added, "Behave yourself."

I had my appointment with Kay Parker about this agency teacher.

Meeting Philip Shrimpton the Teacher

For a reason I could not fathom, the headteacher messaged me to meet her and the agency teacher at The Playground, having reopened recently. There was no entry fee; one paid per ride.

I'd been into school twice as a curate to contribute to RE classes. Unlike Colin, I'd not taken any assemblies. But here we were in the warm open air, and the sea air was welcome.

On leaving, Kay managed to say to, "Let me know if Mr. Shrimpton is any good. One of my last acts before retirement might be to employ him."

"World Goth Day," he said to me, "And we're in Ramadan. And I'm interested in what pupils and their families do."

"Goths? I suppose they can be regarded as religious, in a sense," I replied. "So who arranged this meeting, and why here?"

"The head did. I suppose she wants you to check me out. And I said I'd come here, to have a go on the rides. It's been warm. My sort of thing."

On the thirty-five metre ferris wheel he told me all about Robert Jackson and the anthropological approach to teaching RE. He said it engaged pupils because of their experiences at home. I thought this odd, if only because I found very few religious experiences among the pupils at all. He said Rasa Market and Lude schools were favourable to his approach.

We didn't discuss anything on the slingshot ride with its forty-five metre launch height. He was like a kid himself, wanting to go here, there and everywhere. It was the same with the forty metre booster. The roller coaster was a conversation stopper too, and not a lot was said on the forty metre fly chairs (an alternative to the ferris wheel). I enjoyed the waltzers the best and let my hair down on them. The dodgems were the same, for me. We found some candy floss at a stall, and tried some shooting at passing ducks.

So to the cafe, and he wondered if I'd be more of a 'concept cracker' in applying theology to the school children. I tried to tell him that theology was usually from the inside, and pupils were inside nothing except when in strongly denominational schools. In any classroom like in Foss, in such 'white' ethnic areas, three or four pupils only would have religious communal experience. Introducing theology was for A level at best and, even then, not deeply. I'd enjoyed Religious Education but only a few from the outside find interest in such ideas and consider religion in a critical manner.

"Not phenomenological? The phenomenological school is about describing what is essential."

"Like in a tedious interfaith meeting? At least concept cracking is opening up the descriptors."

He wondered if we could go to a pub, and he'd like to talk about other things. However, I said to him I wouldn't. "I dealt with a vehicle accident earlier."

"A pub might help to soften the impact. Are you married, by the way?"

"Yes."

"A good marriage?"

"I'd rather not talk about it. Look, I'm very sorry, but I think we've tackled matters and I'd really like to go home and be alone. You know, or should know, that the headteacher asked me for a report back."

"You'll say what?"

"I'll tell her that you are theoretically well-informed but had enjoyed easier positive teaching experiences than most. Lude still has a grammar school, and Rasa Market includes pupils who live at school attending church on Sunday."

"Ah. Possibly."

"May I see you again, perhaps to socialise and have a more friendly type meeting?"

"Sorry but I'd like to leave this as a professional meeting."

Something wasn't quite right. I was pleased he was gone. The worst thought in my mind was he'd read about teaching RE in a book and hadn't actually ever taught anyone.

It was an enjoyable meeting, Kay, with Philip Shrimpton, but it was unusual to say the least that this man had such positive RE teaching experiences when an agency teacher. He seemed well versed in the schools of RE teaching, or at least three of them.

Narrator: Keith Leaks and Sabotage (Thursday 23rd May)

It turned out that Philip Shrimpton's attempt at wooing my wife towards a bed yesterday had failed spectacularly. He said she was still recalling the lorry accident earlier, but she wouldn't have gone with him for an extra ride.

As for his survey of SMS in Titansea, I thought he must have been making a report about running the place down.

Friday was intended to be the very last day of the stress testing, with an evaluation to come. In fact, we were done by late Wednesday, but on that day Security had grounds for believing that their system in Titansea was compromised and they were still running checks.

Perhaps it was Felixstowe passing on the blame! On Thursday Archie Holborn saw skulduggery in reverse: someone in ICT itself had produced a leak in order that we should upgrade in Serninsea. I told Archie that there was a leak that had come on paper in the post. What would 'A. M.' mean? He thought, possibly, 'About Monitoring'.

Why would an ICT weakness come through the post? Precisely because, he said, it would put the scent off ICT. It might all come out at the full evaluation coming along in some days. He made it clear that there were no still plans to upgrade ICT in Serninsea.

I told him that I hoped the note wasn't from anyone in the Worshipful Company, because it is supposed to observe commercial confidentiality boundaries. My mentoring Yojana was over and it shouldn't have affected anything anyway.

Meanwhile, he had some news being passed on by word of mouth from the bishops. It was that everyone, except me, should lend a hand (as the opportunity arose) in recruiting Linda. Yes, Philip had failed but I should expect unusual developments very soon. Disturbances were to continue but real actions were also to happen around me.

Narrator: Linda Seeing the Nurse (Thursday 23rd May)

A message on my phone from Kay Parker said:

Thanks for your insights. We won't be employing Mr. Shrimpton. I'd like you to come next to the school on Tuesday 4th June (precise details later) to be shared with a rabbi of the Reformist tradition.

I arrived for my 3 pm appointment to see the nurse, Sister Yvonne Curzon.

"Hia," she said, looking at her computer screen. "You're here after seeing Dr. Gujjar."

"My rectal area is a bit loose; I go to toilet at inconvenient times."

"We don't want you developing incontinence. May I look?"

So, once again, my forearms were on a resting couch, with my bottom out. This time she wanted my legs apart, and used a speculum, and shone an LED torch down the rabbit hole.

"So what exactly happened with your boyfriend?"

"I was nineteen when it began. I gave up my own accommodation and moved in with my boyfriend. He had a speculum like that, and a bar speculum. He made my anus as wide as he could get it, day after day. Basically, he did to my arse what he did to my mouth."

"Both because of your vagina dimensions."

"Yes."

"You let him do this."

"I fell in love with him. I was dependent on him, away from home. And I felt like, you know, for him or anyone to make love to me, he needed other ways to be satisfied. When I need to go, I really need to go. It's not all bad. I was away in Margate and trapped in a lift. A pregnant woman needed to pee, so I did with her, and I nearly did a dump in front of everyone. At least I proved to myself that I could clamp my backside."

"Put your trousers on and come and sit down. So this really is a gynaecological issue, with potential incontinence consequences. I don't see why this is an issue as a clergywoman as such."

"Because it's embarrassing to have to evacuate my bowels in a parishioner's toilet. A number of times I have clamped my backside to get back to the church or my house."

"A possibility is to use foam plugs for that. If you wore underwear, you could use a pad better."

"I am not wearing underwear."

"And of course, lucky you, you never have periods."

"No. Give me a plan of action!"

"You should cut down on high-fibre foods, avoid alcohol."

"I don't drink, other than awful communion wine."

"Avoid caffeine if you can. Don't use a sweetener called sorbitol. But the main thing is to exercise, and I think we can try some sat in that chair. So when you dilate, do this as well."

"Sure."

"So the pelvic floor is a muscular lining for the pelvis a bit like a hammock in shape that attaches to the sitting bone, the tail bone, and the pubic bone. The muscle complex is to resist gravity - your faeces, basically. So, with me, now, breathe in, slide the tail bone forward, breathe out and slide the tail bone and pubic bone backwards. Good. Let's go forwards and backwards. You see, moving the bones is how to train the muscular lining. Two bum cheeks, of course: so take the weight on the left side, lifting the other sitting bone and bring the weight through the centre. You should feel the movement within the pelvis and the natural lift in the lining of the pelvis."

"I think so."

"The trick is to keep your head centred over the pelvic lining way below because the weight of your head works through to the pelvic muscles. Now, do some 'bottom walking' on the chair. One side goes forwards and then the other. Good. Slide back."

She got up and found a cushion.

She said, "Put this between your knees. Squeeze on it and allow the pelvic lining to lift up, relaxing the pelvic floor again as well as contracting it. Let's maintain the lift when contracting, and let it rest - combine this with breathing, so breathe in with contracting and breath out with relaxing. I have a leaflet here."

"So just these two exercises?"

"See how you go. But get into the habit of regular toilet times, using a hot drink to help beforehand, and get ahead of the curve. You should make good progress, but if you don't then return to Dr. Gujjar and we'll take it from there."

"Thank you."

"I'm not done yet. I will take your blood pressure and I would ask you for a blood sample."

While she was doing the first of these, she asked me, "Do you see a gynaecologist regularly?"

"Fairly. It has to be mine. I create too many waves with others. I don't mind students. They need to learn."

She took a blood sample. "We'll do the usual monitoring tests. If there is anything untoward, we'll be in touch. But one more thing, how is your sex life with this husband of yours?"

"In terminal decline, I think. He's been unfaithful. I have someone in mind I'd like to be unfaithful with. I did have some sex recently with a bishop. He was very vigorous."

"In your bottom?"

"In my mouth."

"Is he local?"

"You mean geography?"

"Yes."

"Is this relevant?"

"It is for frequency."

"Ah, no, south coast."

"And how is your reflex in your throat?"

"Gone. Gone completely."

"Your husband again."

"Yes."

"I'd divorce him. Perhaps as a reverend you don't agree."

"Oh I think it is coming. He has a partner. It's a serious relationship."

"So someone else will have their bottom loosened and their throat altered?"

"Possibly. But she has a cervix I'm sure and will accommodate him easily."

"We are done, here, for now. May I also respectfully suggest some gentler treatment for your hair? It looks a bit stressed. Nothing serious. Our next appointment. I have Wednesday 10th July, bang on midday. There may be a student in then. First years and they're not allowed to do anything but observe."

I left her thinking, yes, a clean divorce is inevitable and indeed preferable. I was a fool, as a student, and was ever since.

Narrator: Keith Fun with Yojana (Friday 24th May)

Really, the internal investigations were over, but formally they ran until the end of the week. So Yojana and I decided we'd have a finale: we'd do some sabotage and celebrate with some good fucking. On the basis of our plan, I picked her up in the morning of Friday at Maa Skelter. At Titansea we communicated with each other electronically on the firm's system that we would meet and discuss documents. We grabbed some irrelevant papers.

I took Yojana to Maa Skelter, arriving about 4 pm, taking advantage of early finishing after a busy week. Outside we recognised Adam Magellan's assistant's car, but played it normal by both of us ignoring him and going through the Staff Only door. With a secluded cold beer each we decided that I'd stay back, and then Yojana would go and sabotage this particular investigating role. I sent a message to Security.

Peter Marshall of Magellan Investigations is at the Marsh Coast Maa Skelter Guest House, anticipating our movements after Yojana and I sent out electronic messages. What's going on? We are going to confront him.

A reply did not take long.

Someone could be intercepting the communications system at Titansea. It will need investigating and raising at the various evaluations.

Yojana alone went out into the public space and approached Marshall, so that he had to collect his bag and take back his payment made just before to her mother. He'd actually intended to stay overnight, which seemed somewhat over the top - but then anything was possible from Magellan and him.

I said to her when she was back behind the scenes, "The stupidity of them, saying he was in pharmaceuticals, when he was doing the crappy magic show only recently in pink Lent!"

Regarding Marshall's boss, it wasn't that I disliked Adam Magellan in particular, it's just that I regarded all ex-coppers with the same amount of contempt. I said that he'd love wielding authority - especially over that lad, someone indeed learning to be a magician.

So Yojana and I went to her room, and I had a request. I produced a shaver with new blades in it plus some foam. I was able to work her nicely to no pubic hair.

"Either one way or the other," I said to her. "Linda has nothing, her friend Diana de Groot at the Bever Wood Naturist Club was hairy - just as I remember her when we fucked."

"Okay. List the locals you have shagged," instructed Yojana. "Go on. Linda Bode was the one, very obviously. Cheryl Mould is the other. So you say Diana de Groot."

"She was Diana King then. She was good. She was on top and took me in deep, lost in the bush, producing some squeeze. Really wet she was."

Yojana said, "Jenny, of course, now among the Geese. List them. Actual sexual intercourse, but you'd better exclude the many Geese or we'll be here until tomorrow."

"Let's see. Helen Venus was the first and I lost my virginity on my sixteenth birthday - it was the dinner lady's present for me. I know that many pupils went to her house. Miss Venus, who thought I was a charming lad, later became Mrs. Helen Eris. Justine Geldzahler was at school and I was her first; Carrie Warren was full of sex talk but I was her actual first as well. Carrie has since transitioned to a man, Carl. When I came back on holiday during my first year at East Midlands University, I shagged Diana King, who was a new buddy of Linda. Diana struck me as bicurious long ago, but Linda was busy with Jenny Masters. Linda is clearly bisexual and knows it but Diana kept denying it then. Linda I avoided! Jenny Masters was next just before her fling with Adam alone. Jenny found Adam, was in a spin anyway, and spun faster into a small religious group and rammed the brakes on. However, when Linda went to my university, she hung on to me for comfort, so we had sex and she moved in with me in my third year. Later on there was Lucinda Bode..."

"Lucinda Bode?"

"When I got my degree I found a small administration job at The Bird..."

"The what?"

"East Midlands University - until Linda finished. When back in Serninsea, Diana started being Linda's close pal and that's when Lucinda was jealous - 'envious' as Linda would say - and paranoid really and came on to me. She was a lookalike and I could go deep. So, next: yep, Hannah and Tilly McClelland: Hannah and her sister were both seventeen year old farm workers - I had them both together in the same night, a bit like recently with Bettina and Kerry up in Hartlepool. I was twenty-three then. Who was next? Patricia Berger as she got divorced and then came Diana again, her mate, because she had a difficult moment in her marriage, and had sex with me, but also because she, like Lucinda, wanted to know what Linda was getting from me. But Diana couldn't take me in her throat or her arse. I tried; she tried."

"Why did you do Linda's throat and bottom? You don't with me."

"Something you do when younger. You're more experimental - but not with chance encounters."

This was six years ago and then it was a chance encounter with Cheryl. I said that we both looked back at it fondly, being after some shared fish and chips and all out of doors."

"The special encounter in your book of women."

"Yeah."

"You have been around. Children?"

"Carrie had a boy by me but I didn't know at that time. Hannah's is mine: a boy as well. I've paid maintenance for Kevin ever since when working. You don't tell anyone - I have no contact with them. I told Terry only after he'd rejected me and I realised what he was really about."

"But your reputation..."

"Parents were upstanding Anglicans and provided excellent cover. So were Carrie's and they all bugged off; I think her transitioning was the final straw for them. He, now a father, still doesn't want to know me."

"You would have become a priest."

"Being a priest would have given me good cover when it came to women. It wouldn't have stopped anything. It's Cheryl that is domesticating me."

"It's your age."

"It's not my age. I'm in bed with you, aren't I?"

That was enough. We fucked.

After that we were back downstairs where we had a meal each of steak and kidney pie and beans and roast potatoes. (It did such evening meals for guests by request.)

She asked me an interesting question. Why did I so want to leave Linda? What was it about Cheryl? After all, if I liked her - Yojana - I could just carry on with Linda because Yojana said she accepted my situation. Ah. I said there could be nothing between us. We were a Gander and Goose, in the Worshipful Company, and it was a group ethos. She seemed sad, if accepting. She knew the ethos, and she had to be sexually free herself.

"Tell me about Linda, Keith."

"Though Linda was known to study hard, her applied intelligence was perhaps a rebellion against her parents who had no respect for school. Linda kept with them in her near sacred stance on naturism."

"Not religion."

Sort of Pagans. But, in the Chaplaincy, there was a liturgical phrase, This is my body, and it resonated with her. Through any differences she affirmed her body, and she affirmed through exposure. So I set about altering her body through sexual practices."

"So how were her siblings?"

"Her older sister is stupid, their older brother is a chancer and the youngest sister is brighter, sweeter, and no way to get to her."

"You've mentioned no female at university other than Linda."

"That's because I was hopeless abroad. There were some nearlies."

"How did you meet at university? Tell me - I'm fascinated - from first meeting to first fuck."

"I first encountered Linda outside between lectures. I told her that she was the strange Miss Bode of the farm above Serninsea. She said I was the Rolling Stone of the Upper Sixth."

"Because she knew your middle name."

"And now, I told her, we could make our own life away from opinionated parents. She said she was doing Religious Studies and Social Science. I said I did Applied Theology and Applied Mathematics. She remarked that she should be able to apply Social Science to Religious Studies but couldn't see how mine would combine. So that was the first meeting."

"And then?"

"In the student bar was next, where she confessed to being a little lonely. On the third occasion, it was to the Chaplaincy, after my invitation, which was very middle class Anglican, and then to my rented house, shared with other students. I wanted to get her knickers off, except she didn't wear any."

"And then..."

"She was so tight, and it was a shallow fuck. She could see this and asked me to lick her around her pubes. So that gave her pleasure. Then I said that the run-up to Easter is very important. She said Lent too, which was what I meant. She said she'd enjoyed the Chaplaincy meeting, allowing me to explain that it was not the wild, dogmatic, Christian Union. She asked if I went to the Serninsea parish church, and I mentioned the family going, and Colin Cromer running the show, but that she and I could make a life while at The Bird. Serninsea was possibly a problem."

"Why did you continue with Linda in Serninsea."

"Because I needed someone to marry, to be respectable. I was already formulating my approach to going into the ministry, with my family behind me."

Yojana and me still eating, I continued that a fragility entered our relationship, especially once I was rejected for the ordained ministry. Linda getting the future I had wanted was a big blow for me at first. But I was distracted by my parents starting to break up. Their shop window was shattered. Colin Cromer failed to save their marriage.

"I don't think they ever really loved each other. They were themselves under pressure to make good - I was the only child."

Saying that the Confraternity recruited me, Yojana asked why. I could only suppose that Terry Barman had a certain amount of regret, at least, that he was active in turning me down for theological college. He had since realised that I had a sexual past and theological interest that suited the group as a gander. Furthermore, there was still a possibility that I could be trained to be ordained.

Yojana said her invitation to become a goose was because her uncle had been recruited. He wanted to see her body, grope it and enter her occasionally. Thus we had two Hindus in the group, demanding a need for an interfaith approach, and the rabbi was brought in given the friendship between Terry and him.

Yojana said, "I'm not converting to Christianity."

"It's not required."

Yojana asked, "She must obey the bishops?"

I said, "The Vanguard needs more discipline, especially of apostolically ordained clergy who are the focus of sacramental power. Non-conformist clergy and cleric equivalents of other faiths have a freedom of choice that cannot be given to apostolic based clergy."

Yojana got off her seat, came around me and hugged me from the back. As she did this her mother came in and asked if we wanted a sweet. No. Coffee? Yes. So coffee came.

As Yojana sat down again for the coffees, I said that I did not want to become personal with her. She was, basically, a good fuck. She'd have to learn to enjoy Bishop Liz on her coming travels, as well as the male and female (one each) bishops she'd meet. Liz, I told her, was a religious and sexual extremist.

"We are not personal to ourselves in this outfit. We open ourselves to God, and we do it in each religious tradition. You should study the erotic traditions of Hinduism that the British Victorians tried to suppress, and teach us, and open yourself to every sexual experience practised for the erotic gods."

I said that Linda had developed her skills, and I still had the metal objects by which I had altered her. If she wanted a lot of anal sex and throat fucking, I could use them to train her body. She said she would see what Liz wanted first.

We went back to Yojana's bed, despite feeling well fed. We could at least play with each other. I assured Yojana that I would not give up the group to be with Cheryl. The group represented a pure ideal of boundariless sexual liaison with one's body, a vision for a loving Pure Land. Cheryl definitely wanted a baby, and being a legitimate father appealed to me. If Yojana wanted a child, I said to her, it might have to be like in Julie Manns' situation.

"That it could be anybody's?"

"Trouble is, we know it's Jonathan's. He recruited her, mentored her, and he did the lot."

Yojana and I decided to share a warm soapy bath together, after which we returned to bed. I became ready for more action, and so we were fucking again.

I said to her, "You've done well today. The more sexual you get, the better for everyone."

I went on to say that I would report to management only that we realised we were being followed, while asking about the paper note.

It was 12:30 am before I said goodbye to Yojana's mother and father. Whilst her parents knew nothing about the Confraternity - at least I didn't think so - they did know the nature of our relationship with me being married and to be married again. After all, the mother's high-powered businessman brother was a client of an escort and had been a little incestuous with his niece.

I returned home about 1 am with the excuse for Linda of winding up all the investigating matters in hand. I told her that the stressful time was at last over. I had been working to clear all the documents, with rest periods. And, I said, "They are paying me generous overtime, as they bloody well should."

Narrator: Linda Reading Adam's Report (Saturday 25th May)

It was the Saturday afternoon that, with Keith doing a little gardening, I accessed a report headed on the phone Arguments Relating to Geoffrey Lampe. I actually downloaded this and the other reports on to my desktop computer, and made them encrypted and password protected.

The piece opened was entitled, Investigation Thwarted and dated yesterday. Oh dear, I thought. It all happened Friday. I combined reading with pelvic exercises on the seat.

Junior Investigator Peter Marshall asked for a room for one night about 3:20 pm at the Asthanas' Bed and Breakfast with a cover story of his work - resting before travelling on in the selling of pharmaceuticals to local GPs. His stock was in his car, he said. This overnight stay would be without his wife: he was of course recognised from before. Conversation was they were hoping to expand the bed and breakfast business towards a hotel with a new extension to produce a dining area with a view over the sea. Investigator Marshall took his own suitcase upstairs. He took a look around.

Investigator Marshall placed himself in the visitors' lounge downstairs where he could see people entering and leaving the establishment. Investigator Adam Magellan followed targets Keith Jupitas and Yojana Asthana in his car part-way to the guest house arriving 4 pm, satisfied that this was their destination and investigator Marshall saw them arrive together. Both walked past the lounge and through the Staff Only door. At 4:20 pm target Yojana Asthana alone emerged from the same door and walked into the lounge. She directly asked Junior Investigator Marshall if he was staying overnight and he confirmed. Target Yojana Asthana asked if Marshall had recommended the place to his own wife and he said yes and they might holiday there later.

Target Yojana Asthana's response was that he does not have a wife because, 'You are employed by that chap who runs that detective agency in town and you're not married.' Investigator Marshall was then asked, 'Are you really staying or just want to watch?' He asked about what he would watch, but she said, 'Nice knowing you,' and he was wasting his time perhaps he ought to collect his payment that they would generously not retain. Investigator Marshall retrieved his case, collected the money and returned to his car at 4:35 pm. She also stated that she had seen him talking to a private investigator.

This must be incorrect. The obvious conclusion drawn is that targets Jupitas and Asthana knew that they were under our surveillance. We do therefore suspect prior knowledge, and this could have come from George Wickenby Private Detective Agency or SMS self-investigation procedures or both.

We also conclude it unlikely although not impossible that an affair is taking place between Keith Jupitas and Yojana Asthana.

This investigation having been 'blown', no further investigation is possible by us. A final report will include all appendices.

End

Of course I was still not done with this, but was unsure where to take it. Yojana Asthana had bust the investigation with Keith not directly present but Keith had said nothing to me either. I did wonder too what Yojana was thinking asking if Peter wanted to watch.

Did Keith even suspect I was the person making the actual investigation with Adam Magellan's business? So far SMS would be paying but my actions were supposed to be private and deniable.

Having this on the computer was risky enough with Keith close by. So I re-encrypted the text, closed it securely, and made a drink for both of us.

Anyhow, having soon cleared my bowels, I went out to the High Street for anything of interest, and perhaps to bump into any active parishioners. I did not! But I did meet Salome Lichtblau and her dog Hendrik, giving it a pat and watching the direction of its nose towards me.

Enquiry Over (Sunday 6, 26th May)

Sunday and Adam Magellan was outside the church to tell me an excess bill was coming and it would add £50 on to all the costs so far. "Also, George Wickenby rang me complaining - but not at me - that he had lost the contract with SMS to investigate leaking information. He said that there could be future work for my agency instead."

"Oh dear," I said. "Or is that good?"

Adam asked me directly, "Was this really about an affair or something originating from the firm? It looks like George was doing it and I was doing it, even testing him out probably."

I tried to tell the truth, but didn't. I said, "I know he is having an affair and I wanted this discovered. I think Keith is very clever. He plays poker at the casino," I said, although as far as I knew he had never played poker at the casino.

"The inquiry is over," declared Adam. The final, formal report would be delivered the same way."

"Try with the link title What about Maurice Wiles?" I suggested. I spelt out: "W I L E S."

The Final Report was already written, he said. Anyway, he legged it before Colin might have seen us.

After Evensong I clicked on the What about Maurice Wiles? link. As well as all the summarising, there was a section on the extent to which SMS's internal investigating involved outsiders. Parties knew internally that they were being investigated and monitored, but not always by what precise means. Much would be revealed at an SMS-wide evaluation. There was a question of what the George Wickenby agency knew, leaked, stated, and did not state. The crux of the report for me was here:

It is quite possible that the gestures of friendliness or familiarity between the targets were in the context of the internal investigations and for potential display when knowing they were under surveillance - this amount of friendliness and yet reliability. After all, we discovered that they were handling documents properly.

Only with different investigating agents and/ or other means of interception at other times might it be possible to investigate further the nature of any relationship.

The central question is whether there is a relationship and sexual affair between Keith Jupitas and colleague Yojana Asthana at Systematic Measurement Services.

We found only familiarity between them that is compatible with close colleagues.

What I'd hoped for was this: that in the course of investigating Keith and Yojana, Adam would have discovered a personal conversation between Keith and Cheryl. But, obviously, nothing was found. Interestingly, Peter Marshall left the bed and breakfast at 4:35 pm but Keith still did not get in until one in the morning. So all that time went unmonitored. Was it all work? Really? This puzzled me.

As I went through all the appendix of documents, something caught my eye. There was this white plastic badge of a goose with a B on it seen under the reception shelf. The reason why this caught my attention was the connection between St. Sernin and Toulouse, and then Toulouse Geese as being good at egg laying and then raising their young. We had some on our farm, and they're productive geese that mix in their habitat with ducks. And the letter B. Bavette? Breed? Bird? But what else? Why would both Ken Osis and the Ashana's have it? Anyway, it wasn't relevant for my purposes. I now needed a strategy to turn this to tackle Keith over Cheryl Mould, and I wanted the Investigator to do it, and grabbed my favourite hair brush.

I went from the secured bedroom computer to go downstairs to Keith, who was visibly more relaxed. He asked if I fancied an early night, so I said yes and the marriage continued.

After the SMS Exercise (Monday 27th May)

Keith in bed said that a leak in the Titansea branch, thought to have been solved, was evident again at the end. Titansea was reliable, and then it was not.

I could not ask him about Ephouse Travel Ltd, and all that, in that Adam Magellan clearly knew about this material.

I did ask, "Give us an example where all this is important? For example, working relationships."

"Insurance. We measure and the insurance companies can't wriggle out of responsibilities."

"I meant within the firm."

"Well, Compliance mustn't let customers act like some MOT customers approach a garage. The customer says, 'I provide the payment, you just say the car has passed its MOT if near enough.' No. If I was like a dodgy garage, Yojana finds me out.

"And if Yojana is dodgy?"

"That's what this has been all about. Now I must get up: will you make my breakfast?"

"Yes, of course."

Later, the disguised manager Martin Haralambos rang me and told me himself that the exercise was ended, and actually my husband did very well because Yojana and her department and Keith and his did everything correctly. He then said, "I'm afraid that Adam Magellan wasn't very good. His investigation was blown by Keith and Yojana. We won't be using him again."

Martin arranged to pay me (I added up the amounts paid and yet to be paid) and added that the firm would in fact pay George Wickenby fully and use him again.

"Can I ask you a question about your monitoring of Keith and the relationship with the Independent Standards Unit?" I asked.

"Yes of course. Interdependent, now. Not 'Standards' either."

"Why monitor them when they know they are being monitored?"

"Because it reminds them of proper procedures and to use them, and it puts the heat on them when we plant various tasks where information sharing is easy.

They don't always know what is real and which is fake. And in around six months we monitor them briefly without telling them, using George Wickenby again. Which is why we can't lose George but, with his performance, we have no plans to use Adam Magellan again. I have a question for you. Magellan didn't find anything untoward that has affected your relationship?"

I said, "There was never any danger of that."

"Good. You should continue to keep your role in this unstated, at least for the time being. We'll do all the revealing in our evaluation, and he should think you've been helpful in your work."

"I've every confidence in that. Do you want the reports that Adam Magellan sent me?" I asked.

"You can keep those as private unless you want to redact by sending us only the information on document handling."

I agreed to that. I then stated, "I'd be interested in next year's formal testing." (That was untrue.)

He replied, "It's a good place to locate, Serninsea. This is a place to invest for the future. It is an upstanding place, an ethical place, good workforce."

So, I wondered, who might have been this Martin Haralambos? I went to the website and although there was no such person I reckoned who it was straight away: the Research and Development Executive, Archibald Holborn.

Chapter 07 Adam is Used

Narrator: Linda Lay Competitor? (Tuesday 28th May)

Colin suggested I go and visit and converse with Andrew Walter, a marginal and a disabled member of the congregation; in other words, he attended no more than once a month and didn't contribute much. In fact, I didn't know much about him, but his age was listed as forty-seven.

Before I went, I had a hot drink and visiting my house toilet to try and get ahead of the curve.

This was one of these pastoral visits where, basically, one was paid to have a conversation. His downstairs flat on Malbert Road turned out to be rather more extensive than I had expected and was suitable for wheelchair use, although he could walk on a stick. He'd been injured during firefighting service and had been moved to part-time administration. He had become one of those self-educated types that grapple with matters of the mind.

Entering this library-cum-study, he said, "This fireman, right, suspected a dad and his kid of starting a fire like pyromaniacs, and so the accused lad asked his accused dad if they were pyromaniacs, and he said, 'Yes we arson.'"

"Ah," I said, "but what did the religious fireman say when facing a big blaze? 'Let us spray.'"

"Call it a score draw."

He leaned on a stick, as we looked at his many books and I recognised some titles. He said, "A good chunk is psychology. I would do a degree in it, but then I don't really need to do one. It would be expensive too."

"So you also have a Christian outlook, participating in the liturgy, taking Communion about once a month or less; Colin has never got you into doing any jobs. I can't see any theology."

"I thought I would look into religion through my interest in the self. Especially after burns and muscle damage and the trauma of it all, including mental. My interest is the self in other than behaviourist terms. I don't want to get involved in institutional matters and its thinking."

"There's some sociology that says we have universal 'institutions', but we have specific 'institutes': religion is a universal institution and its institutes would include specific Churches - but you can't avoid institutions or choosing between institutes," I said. "Zidjerveld, he's called."

"Can't avoid? Only if the secular is counted as religious," he said, "and I use your rituals as a kind of engagement. But the self is active, bodily, psycho-sexual, activist, social, joining."

"You've not read any theology?"

"I wouldn't know where to start."

"Well, I could help you there. I mean, you could look at the differences between say natural and revealed theology: see if they are sustainable. One always ends up needing the other. Or between systematic and biblical, or..."

"I might have to start somewhere before all that. I'm more interested in persons, as in the great Carl Rogers, you know, who died in 1987. That was like education relating to personhood, John Dewey onwards, and a strong sense of being a person."

"All that feeds into pastoral theology, then. It's what I am supposed to do, although to be honest deacons like myself and many a priest are amateurs when it comes to theoretical knowledge."

"You clerics bumble along."

"We have cups of tea and coffee. So tell me about you and all this stuff. Let's sit down. This is a room I should have."

"You can use it any time."

We did sit at a desk in this library and study. He leaned forward pointing at books by and on Carl Rogers. As he did, I noticed that white badge again. This was the one reported behind the reception at Yojana's, and worn by Reverend Ken Osis. The badge had a black goose and a large white B on it.

He said, "Rogers was a pragmatist, an interpreter of actions and outlooks, who diagnosed dysfunctional children."

"The days of the Sunday School are long gone."

"Eh?"

"Just a thought in my head."

"The days of the secondary school here might soon go; we can surely maintain a secondary school in the main town."

"That was my school. My husband went there; all my friends. I think we'll keep it. There used to be two. The headteacher there just started as we left; she's been there yonks."

"Kay Sally Parker. A lot of what Rogers did was relational, one with the other. It becomes about the client, the person, the outlook, concepts, attitudes. Being about the person is the I-Thou therapeutic relationship."

"Ah, Martin Buber; Jewish theology, personalist theology you see," I said, jumping in. "So you could start there. 'I-Thou'. Once again you could read the 1950s, 1960s and to the 1980s personalist God material. Depth and all that."

"Indeed, depth," he said. "And then, through social institutions like marriage and the effect on individuals, forming them, self and society. Makes me a bit of a hermit."

"There you are, then: institutions!"

"I didn't deny the role of institutions; it's just a preferred perspective."

"A lot of this is interpretive sociology as well. The meaning of the situation," I added.

"Right. It is about, I think, significant others, and that makes a leap across: people constructing the self-concept. But the self and the self-concept aren't quite the same. The self-concept is constructed, whereas the self is something more fundamental."

"Sounds similar to the institution versus the institute."

"OK, I'm going to give way on this, Linda. I can call you Linda?"

"Please do. Buddhism as well," I said, "like taking the self to no-self."

"Yes, I don't quite understand that. I've seen it. But also this liturgy you have, especially that 1662 stuff, it's as if the self is rotten - there is no health in us. Well, actually, yes there is. But what is the Buddhist reducing - the self or the self-concept?"

"They'd see them as one. Schopenhauer arrived at a kind of Buddhism in that everything as it is gives way to there being only space and time."

"Recently I encountered some Buddhist material from a nun, I think, who talked about the body as something to be regarded as filth and yet it is also to be understood as transient and the means to experience."

"Have you some writing on this?" I asked.

"It was a talk. I haven't got it."

"Can I find it online?"

"No, I think it was informal; I heard about it from someone somewhere. Sorry."

"So the body is rotten, decaying, but you should be, what, positive about it?"

"I don't know. I'm sorry." (He seemed reluctant to say more, as if he shouldn't have mentioned it in the first place.) "Sounds like this contrast is within Christianity," he said, to move it on.

"As for our stuff," I said, "it's an historical tradition of the purity and goodness of God contrasted with what they used to call 'man' as utterly flawed. Very much that salvation and grace come from beyond: you can't pull yourself up with your own bootstraps. Anglicanism combines Calvinism and bishops."

"I don't know about that. But you can pull yourself up with a therapist, or with good friends, or a diary, or a wife or lovers. I mean, what makes a disinterested therapist secure is for the therapist to have a partner."

"You are single."

"I am single but you never know. I do have a sex life. With more than one person."

"Oh. I'd better not enquire, Andrew."

"It enhances everything. An ideal. Try it!" he said.

"In my job? You're right that a therapist benefits from having a stable partner: being partnered definitely helps being a deacon or a priest. Trying to go out with a member of the congregation, or even having significant friends with a member of the congregation, breaks too many walls to allow pastoral relations to work. We have to look beyond."

"Just saying. Because sex enjoyed is, what, like a vision of your Kingdom of God, or, more in my terms, a kind of inner ecstasy that is also an inner harmony?"

"Yes, I can see that. Presumably, the orgasm," I said.

"Yes, precisely."

"The danger for a minister is to become attached to the wrong person."

"And for a therapist too. Clients become dependent, might have fantasies about the therapist. 'I have a partner' is a very useful line to give to a client."

"You sound like a therapist, or you could be one," I told him.

"I've been a disaster with women. Maybe I've just been unlucky. Anyway, approval from important others is important. I'm getting that now."

"Would I be a significant other then? Pastorally?"

"Oh I see. You will be a significant other as a... You know, 'friends with benefits' does mean good friendship. But I've not even had a chat with you before," he said.

Wondering where this was going, I said, "I am happily married myself! I'm talking about the significance of pastoral relationships."

"I have chatted with Colin. He's a moderate chap. Softly spoken, light touch, knows many people locally over a long time. I think he is a bit innocent, though."

"It would be wrong for me to discuss him."

"More anonymously, a therapist provides positive inputs for a person who's had so much negativity in life - or even calls them 'conditions of worth', providing for a reciprocity that can't be given otherwise. It needs more than a therapy input: it needs a change of conditions, new significant others and so on. I mean all-round. This has happened to me."

"So, do you have these people around you?"

"Yeah. A move to firefighting admin was like a failure. So I need approving voices, and actually I've got them. Plus more understanding."

"Understanding?" I asked.

"Not appearances, not expectations from out there, but a new and different direction, saying this is right and good - positivity flows. Intimacy really helps. That's what you miss; and when you get it, it's very good."

I was a little puzzled. "I have a Spiritual Confessor. Ideally it should allow some offloading, but I think he is a bit incompetent."

"But your marriage provides intimacy," he stated. "Therapy is one thing, intimacy is another."

"I have good friends. I'm sure via this therapy material that you understand confidentiality and appropriateness. So I can tell you that I am a naturist. Naturism adds a level of intimacy to friendships: an absence of barriers and yet it emphasises the ordinary."

"You could study here naked if you want, Linda."

"Thank you very much but..."

"You and I could undress and sit closer and that would be more intimate but still with those pastoral rules," he said.

Oh dear, I was thinking, he wasn't backwards in coming forwards and this is going in a direction like with Jeremy Symes. I had to resist. I always had to open a can of worms; I could have kept my mouth shut. So I said, "We could, but not now, because it's also about appropriateness and proper relationships."

"Yes of course. Intimacy is problematic," he said.

"Rules apply."

"Why I think there is artificiality with some therapists. Each one has to be a trustworthy person, but those rules apply. Those rules aren't helpful if direct intimacy is sought."

"We're back to not mining the congregation for relationships."

"Acceptance, support, approval, are offered by therapists but a line is drawn; the other approach is to remove the line with your intimate others."

"Your experience, here: in Serninsea?"

"This is in Serninsea, yes, and some beyond. People I know here. We do the I-thou and remove the line. I get the feeling you don't want to obey rules."

"Me?"

"Yes."

"Do I give out these signals? I want to be rebellious, but then I want to be empathic in actuality and I'm saying why these rules exist, these lines."

"Outcomes improve from congruence, acceptance and empathy," he said. He leaned forward towards me, and I spotted that badge again under his jumper. "So, as a matter of interest, I approve of you." Then he leaned back.

"Well I certainly approve of you," I said. "And so this is your school of psychology?"

"Psychotherapy, actually, yes, but also I'm looking at others. I don't like behaviourism, obviously. I detect behaviourism in all these statistical publications for schools and hospitals. It's all deceptive. Performance without understanding: appearances again, nothing actual, isn't as deep."

"My bishop, well the under-bishop, reminds me about keeping up appearances. I shouldn't have said that."

"So I have my intimate circle, Linda, but there is a special woman coming into my orbit. Laura. Perhaps you could meet her, and meet her and me. We are doing some active empathy, really, given all her troubled background and even felt threats now. We have had sex."

"Oh. Is that wise?"

"It was mutual and wanted. She benefits from intimacy."

"Is she in your circle of friends?"

"She will benefit through understanding and such contact - yes, it is spiritual friendship."

"So this is spiritual friendship, intimate friendship?"

"Yes."

"Rules, again, Andrew, I'm afraid. They prevent me from talking about someone else. Indeed, like the therapist says: 'time's up' and I must move on to see others. I will see you again and you have my number."

"I'll see you out, Linda. Do come back - this could be good."

The chat made me think about this group he says existed: his intimate friends. Is the badge related to this? I wondered. I also thought about the poverty now of liturgical language, the inadequacy of our training in psychology, and how to achieve genuinely more intimacy with mind and body. He'd make a good priest, probably, at least at the pastoral level, except for perhaps these sexual intimacies, but in any case we train fewer people reaching their fifties.

Incidentally, Laura Kingswood was fifty years old and also a marginal attendee. Laura, Colin had told me, had endured a history of abuse with father, husbands, a boyfriend and even her brothers. She'd endured recent hospital mental health intervention. This was as much as Colin wanted me to know, should I find myself having to deal with her needs. Plus, apparently, she wanted anonymity where she lived as regards several of these people. Thus he said her address was in the safe, not on his computer. Therefore, being intimate with her seemed problematic.

I remarked to Colin, who found me in the church brushing my hair, at lunchtime, "Our ex-firefighter is helping Laura Kingswood; as he is well into understanding humanistic therapy, uplifting the sense of self. He's helping her, apparently, and has some sort of open relationship with her."

"Well there is a connection between them."

"It does raise the question of whether the clergy or people like him are the amateurs," I said.

"No it doesn't," Colin responded, rather definitely. "We have a distinctive religious, even missional dimension. It's not about the self, or images of the self, but transformation on a distinctive Christian understanding."

"I suppose so," I said, "now you put it like that."

Colin asked me: "Psychotherapy and open relationships and all that: did you, a Christian deacon of the Anglican tradition, convey a distinctly Christian message?"

"Well," I said, "I did refer to our liturgies, or he did, and I thought our liturgies compare, em, yeah, badly."

"I'm too old for this," he suddenly said. "He and, with respect, you at present, do not understand sufficiently the thrust of the liturgical song. Really."

"Grace?"

"Oh, so you do understand. Well, if you conveyed that then you did at least make the essential point."

"I tried to do that. More tools needed."

"We are in need of grace; grace is freely offered: it is an act of love and deeper beyond any propping up of the self."

"Not pulling up with your own shoelaces."

"Absolutely. And if you mentioned that, it is even better."

"I did. Or he did."

"Perhaps if he takes it on board he will attend here more frequently. 'Missional', you see."

"And Laura Kingswood? He and others are hoping for a closer relationship with her. Is that right?"

"I'll continue to see her for the time being," he said. "And, whilst she is free to make her own mistakes, I'd warn against too many people being over-friendly, because true intimacy is precious. An extension to that is why we have and support very much the institution of monogamous marriage, Linda."

"Quite," I said. "Thank you, Colin."

Meanwhile, with no answer at Adam's front door, I delivered a note that I wanted to pay up now. He should get in touch by telephone to the church after Morning Prayer.

I also wanted to go in to create a report, and have it delivered to my husband in person by him with me present.

Narrator: Keith Party Disagreements (Tuesday 28th May)

Permission came from on-high to have time off from lunch onwards. It was to attend a Worshipful Company gathering. The bishop was putting on a party above the casino on Tuesday afternoon for us actors, the Geese: Religion, Rest and Relaxation. Rabbi Maurice Neptune joined us from Foss. Yojana was with me but her uncle was elsewhere.

While people were having light sandwiches and drinks from the kitchen, Christine read out the Buddhist's speech in Hartlepool, which meant that Fatima, Jenny, Tony Pierce, Janet Pierce and I had to hear it again less the ad-libs. The Bishop of Tees and others up there were not present.

We then had a Body Eucharist. Christine gave the sermon and she said that she had read this Buddhist talk carefully. "The Buddhist has a strong view of transience, but we as Christians should not view transience as dominant, and science is on our side. Matter does change, but it can become energy and then matter again. It is the first law of thermodynamics: conservation. And this means that matter is to be redeemed: it is brought to fulfilment. However, the Buddhist nun Anong and our bishop were right in their actions. There is no health in us. Our attitude, therefore, must become much more sacrificial. We perhaps ought to learn some of the more difficult sexual activities that require some effort, a little pain or disgust, as too much is entertainment. Ascension Sunday is almost upon us, the moment of a torch into the reality we are promised, the means to it shown by the suffering servant himself."

At the Eucharist itself, Bishop Terry initiated Katy Ozga, the Marketing Manager of Ephouse Travel, whom he had mentored, and then Jenny initiated David Tosh, mentored by present but previously unknown to me Carolyn Goodie. Tosh was the Managing Director of Suffokent Electronics, the firm that had upgraded Felixstowe ICT and advised on the upgrade at Hartlepool. We then all participated in the bread and wine with bodily contact.

After this, the new initiate Andrew Walter said that his mentor's sermon had troubled him: he, a devotee of Carl Rogers, wanted to state that there surely is health in us and we could be positive. He asked if he could give a report to the group on his encounter with Linda.

Bishop Terry decided that, as bishop, he should speak first. He pointed out that we had a disagreement within the group and that we should not be afraid of disagreeing, so long as we continued to love and make love. A married couple having difficulty might enjoy an afternoon of sex and then find a will to solve their problems. He did not think, at this stage, that we should start with the more difficult sexual practices. The time may well come for some training in the darker practices, by someone like Christine. Meanwhile, the initiated should not become attached to their mentors and seek a wider range of sexual pleasures among more people. He wanted us to be loving and positive, spreading it about, ahead of the Kingdom.

Christine said in response of the need for shade as well as light.

Bishop Terry asked her to realise that the group just was not there yet. Meanwhile he said Philip Shrimpton's failure to go beyond a chat about Religious Education with Linda just added to the reputation of Bishop Jonathan. He agreed it was right that Philip did not wear his Hereteu badge; Andrew was sure Linda had noticed his badge.

Andrew Walter himself said that Linda and he had discussed psychology and theology. She probably noticed his badge twice. They'd discussed women openly; and she thought he was a member of some group who meet, remove their clothes and don't observe the usual boundaries. She'd asked if such a group was in Serninsea and he'd said it was. Andrew said he'd decided not to use the theatrical metaphors in case Linda joined too many dots. Andrew said that Linda was open and receptive - surprisingly so.

Bishop Terry said that we must be very very careful. Andrew had operated properly to nudge things along, as was policy for everyone but me towards Linda. The Bishop said we should praise God for all the positive signs we were receiving. Terry further said that he would see to it that Linda would still be required to continue with pastoral visits to Andrew.

Andrew said he would like to see Linda again. In fact, he wanted to fuck her. I don't know why he looked at me.

Rabbi Maurice Neptune was going to the secondary school for Religious Education on Tuesday 4th June. It was not normally a school for him to visit. The former head girl, Annie Fenwick, was with us and passed on the headteacher Kay Parker's greetings.

So Bishop Terry said, "Linda is expected there, I gather, thanks to Kay. I'll contact Colin Cromer more or less immediately to continue the visits to Tony and reinforce her visit to the school. She can teach some RE. Kay and Annie can continue the 'softly softly catchee monkey' approach for now."

We had some good sex in the afternoon, all in the one hall above the casino, and I got around a few of the women, and left Yojana to find her own men, one of whom was Terry. Jenny was good. She indicated to me that she agreed with Christine, and indeed, when the session was over, these two went off together. Young Janet, whose deep throat technique rivalled Linda's, joined her grandfather for intimate contact. Fatima was vigorous with me, and was reassured that Christine left with Jenny, and she would join them in the town. I asked Fatima why she kept such a close eye on Jenny but she was quick to tell me that I would not get an answer. She and I were some of the last people to leave the hall space.

Back at work for just an hour, Yojana said she wanted to be with me but understood what Terry had said and accepted it. She said about accommodating his huge penis, "It doesn't just hang long, it's a grower."

"I was unfortunate when God handed out penises."

Yojana said she was looking forward to trying out theosex with Elizabeth: Bishop Terry had told her that Tess would teach her a great deal when visiting the South Wales coast, via the north east. "I hope it isn't her more extreme stuff. I like pleasure."

Narrator: Linda Bank Robbery (Tuesday Afternoon 28th May)

I was walking about aimlessly in town to say hello to parish people and this meant, whatever Colin had said, anyone. I could hear all these screaming police vehicles; they must have come over from Wytham. Colin Cromer rang me. It was gone 4 pm and he said I should get to High Street in Serninsea. I first had a shit (to get ahead of the curve) at the back of Jagjit and Gurinder Kapoor's shop.

When I arrived Colin was there and we both had to remain behind a police cordon. When the people emerged from the bank, we asked what had happened but beyond brief chats no one wanted to talk to us or receive our services. Some were with the police, and others went alone.

One passed and I asked, "Was it a big robbery?"

The man said, "Two of them with guns. There were two of your clergy in there. Wow, they were brave."

Another said, typically, "No no," and went saying, "The gunmen got away."

Another said, "Your vicars went with the police. The police are interviewing the rest of us later. That's it; I'm going home."

In the street I asked Colin if he'd heard anything about which brave clergy were hostages during the bank robbery. He just shook his head. There was nothing we could do, just standing around.

"By the way, Tuesday 4th June I understand you're taking RE at the secondary school. Rabbi Maurice Neptune will be there. You're not just a substitute teacher: you represent the Church and the Christian faith in your lessons content."

One woman's comment in the street made while walking away past us intrigued me: "Horrible. Some of them had come straight from the casino."

Surely not the clergy, I thought. They were gambling even in the afternoon. Why would the two unknown clergy be anywhere around a casino? Who would be in Wilkinson's Casino during the afternoon? I hated gambling as I had met addicts.

We were left with nothing to do, but after I had arrived home I received a phone call from Colin to view the local Sea TV immediately (as he himself had been rung up). I switched on. One of Sea TV's college-based presenters had been in the bank when the robbers entered. It was thus a more vivid story and it was a scoop.

He was saying, "It was a bit busier perhaps as seven of the public had walked up from the whereabouts of Wilkinson's Casino".

Seven? it sounded like they had gone together. What did 'whereabouts' mean? Were they hanging about outside or something? So perhaps they weren't gambling.

Some time later this reporter went back to presumably repeat the essential report: "When one of the two gunmen told the staff at the window to fill his two bags with notes, the shutters came crashing down and the door locked us all in. One then took his gun and shot up into the ceiling with a mighty bang which caused bits to fall. Everyone dived down to the floor when he did that, except some elderly and wheelchair. He said he would kill if the bags were not filled with readily available notes. Two National Church clergywomen then stood up and approached the man, and said they should be killed first. I caught their names from when the police came as Christine Whirl and Jennifer Vine."

I'd never heard of them. A search produced nothing. Whirl? Well? Wool?

"What happened then was a brave bank official opened a staff door with notes in his hands, and the gunman at the counter approached him with both bags, leaving the one gunman. The two men together went behind the counters, and the robber soon emerged again with the bags filled with money. The outer door was opened, and the two robbers simply got away before the police turned up.

"Obviously local police waited for the support coming over from Wytham. Those clergywomen went with the police for interviewing but the rest of the people are to be interviewed tomorrow with counselling if needed. Reports say an abandoned vehicle has since been discovered."

All I could think was the Reverends Christine W-something and Jennifer Vine could have had a ministry to prostitutes.

I rang Colin and asked him: "Do you know them?"

"No; never heard of them."

"They are supposed to be two of ours."

"Bishop John will know them, surely."

"Should I ask him?"

"I have already. He had left a message that he is very busy today and ought not to be contacted. Apparently he was in town."

I thought. This is most odd. We don't know what is going on when he's the vicar and I'm the curate and they are two of ours? And the bishop cannot answer a simple question?

I rang Jagjit Kapoor to tell him all I knew and he'd heard no more.

Keith came in from work and said he knew about the bank robbery. "Yojana Asthana was in there - you know her all right - and she was scared shitless. Some became shitless, actually. That's who went in the ambulances."

"Two of our clergywomen were in that bank."

"Yes. They want anonymity after their remarkable bravery."

"How do you know?"

"Some of it's on social media," he said. "Your bishop was in town, briefly. I said hello to him too. He himself could have easily been in that bank. Four other SMS people were in there too. "

Five SMS, therefore, plus two clergy. I wondered, did all of them walk from the whereabouts of Wilkinson's Casino?

Gosh," I exclaimed. "Ambulances as well. "You weren't there among the SMS crowd."

"I heard about it afterwards. Busy working. It'll be on the radio and television."

"Already. But you went out."

"No, the bishop called in. He does do this since his visit. He told us all about it. Just before home time."

I said, "A Sea TV person was present too, inside the bank at the time, and since reporting it."

"Yeah, quite a scoop for them," he responded. I still thought that Keith knew rather a lot.

Diana rang, so I stopped brushing my hair. She had been going in that direction after college; also, from a different angle, Patricia and Arthur Rhymes had been in the area. Diana would see me tomorrow and given events on the media and in town she would hold off her chat for now and wait until we had met.

Also tomorrow I would pay Adam Magellan and arrange the denouement of his investigation.

In Adam's Office to Rig a Report (Wednesday 29th May)

Wednesday and a call from Adam to the church telephone asking whether I was caught up in yesterday's drama. No. I told him to hurry, because Colin Cromer was likely to walk into the vestry any minute. Two clergy people were involved, he said, and no I did not know them.

Then he said, "George Wickenby got in touch. He told me he got a letter from the company believing that he had acted in good faith. I didn't know they had suspected bad faith."

"That's good. I must go. I'll come in to pay you what's outstanding."

I rang Julie Vaughan and told her I would have to ring her from the investigator's. I didn't want her to speak now, and I needed to be off the phone. She said the yes needed to involve her in confidential contact with the investigator. Rapid hair brushing followed until Colin did enter.

Thus, in the afternoon, having received a payment from SMS into my bank, and after a hot drink and evacuation, I made my way to Peter's reception office. Adam came in.

I paid up immediately, counting notes, but said, "I think you might be charging me some more for what I now want, Mr. Magellan."

"Oh?"

"I want you to confront Keith, that he does have a relationship."

"There is inadequate evidence," said Adam. "Too much is skewed by the complications of that firm. They seem to have strong friendships there, but that's beyond my interest. Has your husband given you any clues?"

"No, that's not it," I said.

"There might be a relationship," said Peter. "They were very familiar."

"So speaks the Sorcerer's Apprentice," said Adam. "We go by evidence. There is no evidence. I cannot confront your husband with evidence I do not have. Linda Bode, as you were, I have a poem for you, and indeed for my apprentice here, nicked and reworked from the great Rudyard Kipling's Just So Stories:

*"I cut in six my method pie,
The same as then and now,
The slices are what, when and why,
And where, and who, and how."*

I said, "With that ditty, there's something to put on the bill. Because the 'what' is an affair, the 'when' is currently, and 'why' is because he prefers her over me; 'where' is in Harwich, 'who' is Cheryl Mould and 'how' is his travels."

"Cheryl Mould? Mouldy? Hey?"

Peter said, "Nothing to do with Yojana Asthana?"

"May I use the telephone?" I asked. "You can put it on your next bill to me."

Adam said, "Use the speakerphone." Three of us were stood around the telephone.

"Hello, Julie Vaughan? Put her on please. Are you free to speak to me as arranged? Ten minutes time. You have the number displayed there? Good."

Adam and Peter chose to wait for an explanation. In fact it was less than ten minutes that a call came through from a mobile phone.

"I am at Adam Magellan's and I want you simply to confirm that my husband is having an affair. Keith will be confronted very soon."

"I had to come outside, Linda; Cheryl was in the office. She hasn't suspected and didn't check the display number. So: last time they were here, they were all over each other. She's been blatant. Are you all right, Linda?"

"Fine."

"Linda, you might need to sit down again. Can I tell you something personal? By the way, I'm not going to be quoted am I? This was to be in confidence."

Adam said, "Hello, Julie Vaughan. I'm going to make a report. I do not give away my sources and I do not have to quote but can summarise."

I said, "Go ahead, Julie."

"They are trying for a baby. She might even be pregnant. She's suddenly blabbing on about no period due a week ago."

I said, "Oh. Really."

Adam said, "Julie. How long for? Do you know for how long?"

"Just now."

"The affair has just started?" he asked.

"No, her being pregnant, if she is. They say two years ago, properly. Linda? Something else. She says, and this is new, but would make sense if she is pregnant, that Keith is going to dump you very soon. He may do it without even moving down here. Sorry, Linda. How is he behaving?"

"Hmm. Like nothing is happening. Julie. I had to ring you to tell my investigator here. There is no doubt about it?"

"There wasn't before. There isn't now, either. I'd better go back."

"Bye Julie, and thank you very much."

The call ended. Then Adam instructed me to sit down, so I chose the sofa, as did Peter Marshall.

"Linda?" Adam asked. "What are you doing?"

"Pelvic exercises."

"No. I'm referring to Cheryl Mould and everything."

"Now you know."

"I need to ask you what has been going on."

"I thought you might track Keith and Yojana and find instead personal messages to and from Cheryl Mould. But he's been clever in not leaving a trail. I wanted him to think he was being investigated and perhaps he'd put a foot wrong. He didn't."

"You're asking me to confront your husband and risk getting a broken nose. You want a report where, clearly, I have to protect your source - my source now - with deception. One with my number on display. I'm not at all happy about the fact that I could have rung this Julie Vaughan earlier."

"Better she has been asked now and we confront Keith quickly so that he is less suspicious. I want the confrontation tomorrow, Adam. Bring your updated dossier."

"You haven't set this up?" he asked me directly.

"That was a 01255 number and she's a bloody good actor if I did. I did not."

"Hmm. But before I charge you even more, I need to know what I was supposed to have done to make the discovery. I don't wish to put anything in that contradicts with reality."

"You did a monitoring of him and Yojana and you discovered by, yeah, observing in Harwich and Felixstowe that you discovered the affair was between him and Cheryl."

"Why would I be observing over there?"

"You were looking for the source of the leak."

"What leak?"

"Their system was leaking information; after all, it was going to you."

"It wasn't."

"Pretend it did."

"But they'll contradict it at SMS. And we're back to an earlier question of mine, Linda. Was I doing your business or SMS business? Has SMS paid you? What is going on?"

"This was what Keith told me. About a leak. Felixstowe."

Peter said, "That wouldn't have been relevant to us at all. And they'll know where it hasn't gone."

I said, "I see. It is not relevant to you. This is personal. So can't you say you discovered communication between them, that Keith went to see Cheryl?"

"Did he?"

"Yes, overlapped when I went to Margate."

"You went to Margate?"

"Yes." I gave Adam and Peter the dates that Keith was sure to have been in Harwich. But Adam was still dissatisfied.

"Was this the last time he was in Harwich?"

"Yes."

"But it is before you hired me."

Peter said, "We can change the dates of Linda initiating the investigation."

"We need a timeline then," I said in response. "So I hired you when I suspected an affair. Let's say you investigated Keith and Yojana as cover." I realised I had to make an admission. "There is something I must tell you. SMS did take an interest."

"I knew it."

"It was my enquiry of you, Adam, but I approached SMS because it was facilitated through their business at a time of internal investigating. When they said they'd pay, and incorporate it, then I could carry it through without personal expense."

"Devious when it comes to money. Get them to pay. So they know that you suspected your husband of having an affair?"

"No, Adam, because I said to them that I didn't think there was anything in it, with Yojana. But it was a good way for them to see if their working relationship was too intimate for document handling and the Chinese Wall between them."

"But what about the reports I sent you? How do you explain them in this fiction of yours I am supposed to repeat?"

Peter said, "Your husband won't have seen them, but, in any case, they can be part of the deception."

I now said, "So the timeline is you started investigating before Margate and Harwich, and the Keith and Yojana thing was putting up a deception, by which I approached SMS."

"This will cost you. Don't forget that we do not know why Keith was able to sabotage my investigation. Did he think it was a company investigation?"

"Yes, he might have done," I admitted.

"Right Linda. Hundred quid before VAT. I will say that, using methodology I cannot disclose, I discovered the affair between Cheryl Mould and him. And only then I carried out a misdirecting investigation of him and Cheryl and the reports to you were a deception."

"Yes. But on my initiative"

"Hand over the dosh. I'll do this report straight away. I suggest I'll be at your house 7 pm tomorrow evening. Let's close this down and finish it."

I paid this part with my debit card. Adam left the room rather abruptly so that Peter was left to show me out. However, I could not resist any longer and asked if I could be excused.

When done, I returned to the reception room. "You could clean that toilet better," I said. "Why do men leave hairs all over the toilet?"

Peter said to me, "Really puzzling."

"It isn't. They drop off all the time. And I don't have any."

"I mean, I thought there was something in it. With Yojana."

"He can't be cheating on Cheryl as well."

"The kissing was good, the hand he put on her back was real. And she'd said, on a phone, 'Where's the other mobile?' What if he talks to someone else on that?"

The toilet flushed at the far end of the corridor.

"Why hasn't Adam told me this?"

"Sounds interesting, all this stuff," said one of the twins, letting herself in through the front door.

Peter said, "Hello Kathleen. You know, anyone can just walk in! Kath, you must keep anything you've heard to yourself. In any case, I'm speculating and talking about an illegal monitoring of a known mobile phone. But we don't know of this other phone."

"And neither do I," I said.

Adam came along at this point. "I've cleaned the toilet. And thank you Peter and Kathryn."

"I'm Kathleen, Mr Magellan." She sat down and joined us.

"And who's the same uncle?"

"I'm sorry Mr. Magellan. I'll go. Mr. Magellan: Kathryn and I have told Peter that we never discuss anything we hear from our uncle."

"But you might discuss what you hear with me. Peter, this is work material you are discussing with a client that has passed through a decision making process of what not to discuss and not put it in our reports."

"Sorry."

"Reverend Linda, this is all confidential. I will carry out the task as agreed, but what you have just heard must not leave these walls. If you would leave now I will speak firmly to my employee."

"No," I said.

"What?"

"Say what you want to say to him in front of me."

"I don't want a confrontation with you as well. Would you like to leave, Linda?"

"No. I do operate according to confidentiality, Adam - seal of the confessional and all that. You've told me a sin, I absolve you, and I have special legal privileges."

"What sin?"

"Illegal monitoring."

Peter said, "You're not a priest; you can't yet absolve."

I said, "It is still confidential. I'm waiting, Adam. Adam!"

"You're not going to treat me like you did when we were eighteen, Linda."

"Adam. My intended reward and treat for you is in jeopardy if you do not do as I demand."

"I'm not falling for this now I am forty. And not in front of them!"

"Adam!"

"Linda!"

"I'm not going."

"It's my property!"

"I don't care."

"Fuck off, Linda. Let me do my work and finish the job!"

"I'm not going anywhere." I folded my arms and stared directly at him.

There was a silence.

He buckled first. "Oh, fuck it. Peter. This is a sacking offence. If I sacked you this would have dire consequences on your dole. You were talking out of turn; you are my apprentice and that is all."

"Hang on," I said.

"No, Linda, you've got your way, as you always did, and he's too clever by half. And now Ms Wickenby has heard too much. And your uncle, Kathleen, got wind of our investigation, somehow."

Kathleen responded: "May I speak, Mr. Magellan?"

"Yes. Spill the beans, why not."

I said, "You're making an assumption there, Adam."

"Linda, you are no more than my client!"

Kathleen said, "It wasn't me and it wasn't Kathryn. Honestly, Mr. Magellan, and I am sorry I came in to discuss a magic trick just before Peter's break."

So Peter said, "Kathleen, can you tell Kathryn I'll see her later? I'll go out for my break."

Adam said, "Just a minute. When I have finished."

Kathleen asked, "Can I go now Mr Magellan?"

"Yeah. You can. Keep that trap shut. Not a magic trap, your gob."

She got up, and, passing us, left the room and indeed the building.

"Come on Adam," I said. "Cut the man some slack. You get him for nothing so that he is off the dole figures, and if you sack him they're not going to put him back on the dole figures."

"I won't! Peter: you're very good; you're also my trainee, but while you are here you don't talk to clients differently than me, especially when they are leaving. Because I might say what I need to say to clients and you don't then fill in any gaps. Peter, go; goodbye for now, Linda!"

Instead, I stayed while Peter went out, waving him away.

I said at Adam, "Look, one hint of a problem for this lad as a result of these conversations and it affects our renewed friendship. Understand?"

Adam said, "What friendship? Anyway, the twins are a good potential connection."

So I said, "Oh, I see. I think you might be having it both ways with these Wickenby twins. You are saying don't leak, but you want to use them."

"The dole said to me, 'He tells us he knows the nieces of George Wickenby, a private detective. Would that be a problem? No. After all, he could have gone to George, although George prefers to work alone and hire in helpers.'"

So I said, "I'll take you to a restaurant on me after you've done the deed to my husband. Starters and the main meal, and you can have afters too."

"Lovely," he said, being sarcastic. "Typical Linda."

I turned as I was leaving and said, "Do as you are told, Adam."

Outside, on the street, where I brushed my hair, Peter made a noise and was behind me.

"Where the fuck have you come from?"

"Ah. I wanted to say thanks. Are you interested in magic, Mrs. Jupitas?"

"Are you walking anywhere?"

"To a shop for sandwiches."

"I'll go your way." We walked at a brisk pace, my hairbrush put away.

Peter said, "I was reading about Gardiner and magick, and the power of their fire meetings at the beginnings of the Second World War."

"That's right. Rather than draw on the divine, they became divine, and they generate the power. It's a subtle difference, if you believe it. I might do a sermon on this - that's if I get the chance to give a sermon. My mother was into magic. She wanted to be a big breasted round tummy witch woman. She was born in the wrong era. From time to time I dream that I am a witch, Peter."

"I've a lot of time for aspects of Paganism, but magic has to be explainable," he said. "So I'm more rational too, like on the Pagan Unitarian Universalist web pages and in Britain."

"I thought they were some Victorian anti-Trinity outfit, probably gone now."

"Well, it's complicated: but no. There is a neo-Pagan wing, you know. Where are you going?"

"I'm not going anywhere," I said. "I'm walking with you."

"Where is your car?"

"Er, the church."

"I don't want to take up your time."

"This is how I use my time. Look, er, magic, Pagan, Unitarian. I'm sure I can use you. Maybe not Unitarian. Not that I want to use you. Not use. I'll leave you be, then. Be good: that's both of you."

"Me and Adam or me and Kathryn?"

"You and Adam. Is that Kathleen ahead?"

"Kathryn."

"Go and join Kathryn. Bye Peter."

I went to see Diana, at Patricia's conservatory, nude, and told her about the plan going into action and reviving the wimp that was Adam Magellan.

She growled but agreed he was a wimp.

Narrator: Keith SMS Evaluation (Wednesday 29th May)

We all sat down for an evaluation. Sir Sanjay Bunker, Chair, Archie Holborn, Director of SMS Research and Development, Yojana Asthana, and two others, Charles Rowland, Head of ICT in Serninsea, and Janet Hayes, new Marketing Developer across the business. Incidentally, Charles Rowland was about to be mentored for The Worshipful Company of Serninsea Theatrical Players by Archie's wife, June, and Janet Hayes had been talent scouted by Stephen McPhail, and his coming mentoring of her was a bit risky in my view given his and his wife's preferences for spectacle.

Here I learnt that my wife had acted for the firm on the basis of investigating the relationship between Yojana and myself as a means of further testing the reliability of the 'Chinese Wall' between us. I was told this was the firm's take on it and not hers. (I wondered about that.) This had worked via a number of documents using a client Ephouse Travel Limited. However, I pointed out the leak to Yojana and me using a paper message so that we knew what was happening. As a result, when everything was done, we sabotaged the continuing investigation. I said that I had no idea that my wife was involved.

"In a sense, she wasn't," said Archie Holborn. "But we did consult her and she said it all had to come out in the evaluation. You'd be assured to know that she never suspected an actual affair with Yojana, but we wanted Magellan to investigate on a different basis from George."

"Had this idea come from George Wickenby, passing this work to rival Adam Magellan?" I asked

"No," said the the two men together heading the annual inspections, Sir

Sanjay and Archie, who thought I should be pleased that she had taken such a keen interest and been amenable to the idea.

What of the leak: had it come from ICT? Charles said no. Security had approached him and was satisfied that ICT was not involved. Had it come from any external body, by which I meant The Worshipful Company - by staring at Sir Sanjay and Archie? No. So, there was an unexplained leak. I asked them about the source but nobody seemed to know.

"Well somebody wrote the note: all initials."

I suggested that there was an electronic leak (too) because Magellan and company were straight on to Yojana and my movements.

Yojana said we played touchy-feely colleagues whilst doing everything correctly with the documents, making this visible via hand gestures outside while being viewed.

Nevertheless the firm had paid my wife, who had passed on her expenses. Archie said that he had co-ordinated the contact with my wife after her approach to Sir Sanjay. He had called himself Martin Haralambos. So I wondered aloud if he had done any background on my wife, as this was the most ridiculous disguise of a name to be constructed. A 'Holborn' had partnered Michael Haralambos in the standard sociology tome for decades! Archie knew this, of course, and said it did not matter too much if she did know; it was for the benefit of confusing outsiders.

"Let's cut to the chase," said Sir Sanjay. "Everyone in Harwich knows you and Ms Mould are close. Linda never mentioned this, nor did we indicate this. It was solely using Yojana and you at this end."

"What were the responses to the initials leak?" Yojana asked.

"Security informed management. Security suggested several meanings of 'A. M.'"

More worrying, however, was the fact that other sites of SMS took advantage of the delays to upgrade their ICT systems whereas there were no plans to upgrade in Serninsea. I pointed out that the future of dredging the dock was in severe doubt.

The point was made by management that, up and down the SMS sites, the system of checking did work. We would also have unknown inspections later on in the year. My wife would not be involved in those, and there were no plans to hire Adam Magellan again.

I was concerned that the future of SMS in Serninsea had to be in doubt. After the meeting I asked Yojana if she had been considering moving to Felixstowe or Hartlepool. She had not, and would stay assisting at her parents' guest house, and that her uncle Sir Sanjay would be putting in his money to upgrade the property to be little short of a hotel.

She knew that I did hope to go down to Harwich, but I responded that I did not want Serninsea to close: down there I would have to join the Margate group like Janet Hayes. We needed a bishop or at least priests in Harwich. Would the Serninsea Worshipful Company even continue without SMS?

I had a special place for Cheryl because of our history, I said, and I liked her homeliness and comparative lack of ambition. I expected Yojana to do well either in tourism or accurate administration and to have lots of sexual partners including me but said it could be no more than this. She might find a boyfriend.

She felt sad about this.

Narrator: Linda Ascending (Thursday 30th May)

I was clapping at the play on stage in a theatre that was in Wytham. Keith was alongside me. On stage was a collection of people including Adam Magellan (now older) as Sherlock Holmes, Peter Marshall as Dr. Watson, and then in various suspect parts: Jenny (younger), Geoff (younger), Diana, Patricia, and the chief suspects Ken Osis and Andrew Walter, with Laura Kingswood glimpsed alongside him. Andrew announced an acted-out orgy would take place, and Adam and Peter were there to investigate. But, as the sex got underway on stage, and Keith and I were clapping at the performance, Andrew announced that Adam and Peter's characters were investigating them, and that the clever duo were not so clever after all, and that we in the audience would have to start doing the fucking ourselves. And, indeed, I woke to the pressure of my husband's body on me, and I said to him, "Go on then," and he realised I'd had yet another bad dream, if not one of the worst. As he fucked me I thought of him ascending into Cheryl.

Colin preached in the extra Eucharist during the mid-morning. I knew that, on this day, even Colin was likely to become a demythologiser. How would Colin do it? Incidentally, I had still not preached and would not until Trinity Sunday, the day to give the sermon to someone else.

"Of course," Colin said, "heaven is not up there and so Jesus will not have physically ascended as in an invisible lift shaft. The three decker universe we know is not true. Nevertheless the metaphor indicates something real. Jesus went into his heavenly state after meeting everyone over the some forty days from Easter, to guide the earthlings and set up the Church with what were its first bishops. Heaven is a spiritual state, not a geographical space, and where beyond we will meet Jesus and meet Jesus in person."

'Grrr', I was thinking. Claptrap from start to finish. He did not 'set up the Church' and the price of adjustment to our known cosmos was to sound ridiculous.

In the vestry afterwards I was brushing my hair too much and thinking that the stupidity of this Holy Thursday is that clergy and lay readers do not apply the same criteria to resurrection or miracle working. You notice how they demythologise the Ascension, but try to 'prove' the Resurrection beforehand. Yet the Ascension is essential to the narrative, because it is all about why the Early Church could not forever call upon an earthly resurrected Jesus. He'd gone. Thirty-nine days liturgically, he hung about and then went. I knew that the Ascension, and second coming, are rather unique to Christianity in the way that virgin births and resurrections are not.

Colin had restricted my preaching, the cost of which was I was thinking for myself. He had criticised my behaviour as well. And now he wanted me to sit down with him again.

"Linda, why are you shifting about in your seat?"

"Oh, sorry."

"Linda, Bishop John Barman takes a keen interest in all of us, and he is very good, very hands on. And he had a chat with Andrew Walter, who mentioned your pastoral visit. Now, Andrew Walter is under no obligation to maintain confidentiality of your conversation with him. And once again I come to you with difficult matters.

Apparently, Andrew said you were quite positive about his behavioural licence, and you showed no inclination to disapprove. Is this true?"

"No, Colin, it is not. I said about rules and boundaries, but I wasn't going to condemn his behaviour."

"Why ever not? He wants to involve Laura Kingswood, to whom I am ministering."

"She's an adult, and so is he - but I made it plain it was not for me."

"Not for you? One wonders what is for you? It seems to me that you are completely hedonistic in outlook, and it will not do."

"Go on Colin, what is the sanction this time? You stopped me preaching before."

"That was different. You became incomprehensible. Anyway, I haven't, but you should reflect on how you will preach on Trinity Sunday long before you put pen to paper."

"So what would it be? You won't now want me to visit Andrew as you don't Laura?"

"The bishop thinks you were on a fine line there, and still he is a compassionate and reasonable man. You may see Andrew and indeed Andrew with Laura, he says, but you are there to represent the Gospel and not your own hedonistic opinions."

"I tried to get him to see the relevance of theology. I'm really getting fed up with this."

"You are not some free agent handing out willy-nilly your own opinions, or going naked in public and giving expression to whatever you think is appropriate behaviour. We have sources for our statements and we have standards for our behaviour. Just be thankful that the Suffragan Bishop John Barman is a very sensitive man. I'd have stopped you seeing either of them - you were right to predict that, but I am under his authority as are you. And remember that you are the trainee here and... Look, Linda, do not put your ordination as priest in jeopardy. I think you are the sort of person who can easily go off the rails."

"Can I go now?"

"Yes, you can go now. Retain what I say. Oh, you meant go in there. That's another matter that should receive attention."

"It is. It's why I was shuffling on my bottom - pelvic floor exercising."

"Perhaps I ought to retire. I'm too old for this. Keith would surely not have been so much trouble."

"Except the reality is he's lost interest. You've got me instead."

"Don't I know it."

Confrontation

Adam Magellan knocked on our front door and I let him in. I whispered that he should at first assert an affair, and wait for a response, and then say with whom. I was nervous and perhaps he was. Keith was in the smaller living room at the front of the house.

I opened this room's door and said to my husband, "Please pay your full attention, Keith. This man here, Keith, is a private detective and he has something important - distressing - to say."

"Mr. Jupitas. I am a local private investigator, Adam Magellan, and was hired by your wife. I followed you and Yojana Asthana and I have confirmed that you have been having an affair."

I thought, that's not quite how I wanted him to say it.

"Hey?" Keith reacted. "The exercise is all over, finished, evaluated. What are you on about?"

"I am here about your affair, and to tell you for your wife."

"You are quite a failure of an investigator, Mr. Magellan. We blew your little investigation. You're some ex-copper with a little sidekick who can't organise an extra little investigation, dressed up as something between me and Ms. Asthana. Now go away, little man."

Adam said, "Pardon?"

"My employer hires George Wickenby to discover the transfer of sensitive information set against the working relationship I have with Ms Asthana, and you were used in addition. She told your little sidekick to fuck off and that included you. That should be the end of it. As for my wife, she went along with it for the firm."

Adam looked at me, but replied. "Neither your firm, SMS, nor George Wickenby for that matter, contacted me to do any work. The only person who did was your wife. The firm was involved later on."

Adam looked at me. So I said, "Carry on, Mr. Magellan, to get to your main point."

"Never mind the SMS aspect. I am here to assert that you are indeed having an affair."

"You were just passed extra work via my over-interested wife and I was going to speak to her about it at an opportune moment."

"Oh, you will, will you?" I asked Keith. "So far: nothing."

Keith responded: "I'm supposed to be grateful that you took an interest in my work. I was waiting to see what you were going to say to me. And in fact you have said nothing to me."

"Well, I was waiting for you to say something. It doesn't matter because Mr. Magellan has concluded his report."

"I am Adam Magellan and you are..."

Keith said, "Go away. Leave my house."

"It is my house Keith, or rather the Church's."

"So why did you get involved, Linda, in my working life? You've never shown so much direct interest before."

I said, "I hired him. I hired him earlier."

"That's not an answer."

"I hired him; SMS were interested that I hired him. But I had hired him earlier."

Keith said, "You're a liar. SMS used you."

"No. I used them. Adam, move to the second part."

Adam then said rapidly, "I run an independent firm, and I repeat that I did not receive work from your firm. I am asserting..."

"No? The firm paid her!"

"Keith!" I exclaimed with frustration. "Adam, please."

"Your wife hired me earlier. The investigations, the stress testing came later on, as your wife says. I have a report here and it concludes categorically that you have been having a relationship with..."

Keith said, "Then you are wrong. You listen to me, mate, and you Linda. We got a tip-off anonymously, possibly from George, or higher management, or the ICT people, or Ephouse, that Magellan Investigations at Upper Road were involved. As well as smoking you out at her parents', Yojana Asthana even put items like a nightie and knickers in my office drawer. You didn't discover those. No? Speak up, man."

Adam replied to him, "No, we did not see a nightie or knickers," said Adam, who looked at me again. "We didn't even look inside those offices."

Keith continued. "Blimey, we acted out kisses and my straying hand - deliberately, while your fool of an assistant was looking. You're a twit; you always were. I remember you; never mind that you were my wife's teenage dominatrix fling. She cut her teeth on you. Hey Linda, you must have been delighted to push him about again."

Adam said, "As far as Yojana Asthana was concerned: yes, we looked at her parents' bed and breakfast on the coast. But..."

Keith blocked Adam verbally. "That guest house Maa Skelter was a supposed private place to hand over or retain documents. I'll be generous, you twit, because I can give you our report on how you and your sidekick were a bunch of dummies. Linda, you are being misinformed by this incompetent."

Adam again said, "Well, I've made my report to your wife and my task is over."

I said, "Adam! You haven't finished."

Keith started laughing. "I can see your thumb mark on his forehead, and Ash Wednesday was long ago now."

So with me staring at Adam, he understood my look and said, "I repeat that I consider you were having an affair and it was not with Yojana Asthana at all."

Keith said, "What are you on about?"

I butted in: "And the point is the affair is not with Yojana Asthana. The evidence is you are having an affair and you should admit it. We need to discuss our future. Tell him her name, Adam."

"You are having an affair with Ms Cheryl Mould in Harwich."

Now Keith paused, and looked at him and then looked at me. I cocked my head slightly to one side, looking back at Keith.

"I don't get this," Keith said. "Measuring has to be watertight, utterly trusted and those who deliver must deliver in the quantity.. There can be no collusion. Yojana is nothing other than a colleague."

"Keith, he's already said it's not her."

I said. "He's speaking like Theresa May. Adam, tell him how you found out."

"I can't. My method is confidential."

Keith said, "You know, a penetration test with the ICT had failed before the inspection, but the leak about you investigating was different."

I said, "Keith, Mr. Magellan here is no twit, no incompetent. His later investigating around Yojana Asthana was cover for his real investigation. He is a brilliant investigator because he discovered that you are having an affair. It is with Cheryl Mould."

I could see that Adam was uneasy.

Keith said, "Anyway, what future to discuss? If I was being unfaithful you wouldn't want anything other than marriage stability if you want to be a priest. I'd be careful what you wish for."

Ah, this was interesting. It was progress.

I said, "I wish for the truth. We will have to discuss the future. It was never about Yojana or measuring volumes. I knew there was no affair with her, and told that to your management, but I suspected you were having an affair. Adam carried out his job, and then I wanted to make you sweat a bit that he was investigating you."

Keith then said, "So it was you who gave us that note, the one that said you were investigating Yojana and me."

I knew nothing about this note, so I looked at Adam. He said, "I don't discuss my methods. What I want to say is that in Harwich my methods were searching and penetrative."

"Like yours with Cheryl," I said at Keith. I further said, "Mr Magellan and his very clever magician trainee know how to set up many a decoy."

"Some sort of Otto Leipzig, eh?"

"What?"

"Never mind, Ginger Pig."

"Don't call me a Ginger Pig!"

"Him!"

"He's not ginger."

"Neither are you. The Magician, who went to Paris to help the General."

"I don't know what you are on about, Keith, but the team went to Harwich and Felixstowe. Perhaps you would you like to tell us yourself of the affair at SMS headquarters?"

"I am not having an affair with anyone at SMS HQ in Harwich and that is the truth."

"You are having an affair with Cheryl Mould in Harwich," I insisted.

"But your reports, Magellan, with those theological titles: they did not mention an affair. They said an affair with Yojana was unlikely."

"Ah," I said, "I thought you might get to see those. Did your mates at SMS break the password?"

"Oh," said Adam. "This is concerning."

Keith said, "I don't discuss my methods. You penetrate my communications and I penetrate yours."

I said, "Keith. Tell me about your affair with Cheryl Mould."

"Why would I?" he asked. "Presumably you can tell me."

This was progress indeed. I gave Adam a smile, and his eyes were opening wider towards me.

Then Keith said, "My wife approached you independently?"

Adam replied. "I thought we had established that long ago."

Then Keith said, "Then why did SMS pay you? It paid for Wickenby and it paid for Magellan."

Adam said, "I didn't receive any money from SMS. I received it from your wife."

Keith said, "Judas was paid!"

"Oh very clever," I said. "Are you following what I said?"

"And you kept your counsel."

"Like you did."

"You must have suspected at the naturist holiday, and what about Margate?"

"Mr. Magellan made sure first. Yes, I did. Anyway, wives can tell, Keith. We are not stupid."

"You gave no hint of suspicion."

"I can play the game better than you, Keith."

"Come on then, Magellan, what did you do to suppose I've been having an affair?"

Adam said to Keith, "I'm not discussing my methods: electronic, observational, hiring other detectives, sending my apprentice places, penetrating SMS in Serninsea."

Clever, I thought; Adam was protecting the source, Julie Vaughan, as was I.

"Keith said, "That place would know and I would know if you'd been there. Anyway, you're wrong. I er, I work with Cheryl Mould and she is just one woman I work with when I am in Harwich."

"Not true," I said. (We could not say that Cheryl was likely pregnant, because this could only come from her talking very recently.)

Keith said, "And Mr. Magellan, on the same basis, you could be having an affair with Linda."

"No," I said, "the difference is he has evidence, that you are having an affair, whereas I have only recently rediscovered Adam, and he's done a brilliant job. I have no idea about Mr. Magellan's private emotional life and I have no intention of enquiring. He was inquiring about you."

"Always the pedant, you."

So Adam said, following up, "Mr. Jupitas. Having now given you the name, I would like to leave. If I stay much longer, the bill goes up."

Keith said, "That's actually a good idea. Go now. I'll be looking into you. Is SMS paying for this call as well? I wonder what exactly has been going on. Blimey - if they move Yojana to Harwich or Felixstowe, I think I'll go as well."

"I'll show you out," I said to Adam, who, holding his report, was walking backwards slightly. "Wait there," I said to Keith.

I opened the front door and Adam and I stepped out.

Adam said, "I don't want to do any more of this. Does he want this report?"

"You keep it. I'll be in touch," I said.

"You really are devious, Linda Bode; I was your plaything then, and I've been your plaything now."

"Play is nice. Off you go - thanks. It's time for me and him to get to the nitty gritty. You're a good bloke, Adam."

"By the way, he hasn't admitted it."

"He almost has and he will. Bye, my rediscovered plaything." I smiled. I went back in, and stood while Keith was sat looking at me, as if waiting for my next move.

He said to me, "I wondered why you hadn't undressed."

Immediate Aftermath

I was stood, facing Keith, and he watched as I shed my clothes. I thought he may as well see the one he had betrayed. Then I went elsewhere by necessity, and returned after a good five minutes holding three pieces of kitchen roll.

He asked, as I faced him again, "What exactly has been going on?"
"Lying," I said. "You need to stop lying." I found my hairbrush again, and used it.

"I wasn't lying."

"Hardly telling the truth. Going to Harwich; staying with her."

"Well, Dennis Nineham, Geoffrey Lampe, Maurice bloody Wiles."

"Yeah. You looked at them."

"A security man at SMS gave me the lot. There was no mention of any activity outside Serninsea."

"Exactly," I said. "I knew you'd read them."

"So presumably he gave you the real reports when he was ringing you at the church."

"You seem to know quite a bit," I stated.

"I work with Cheryl Mould," he said. "She's not at HQ but the local office, where I co-ordinate."

"It's all over Harwich, you and her; it was easy for Adam to find out."

"He is not so brilliant, then."

"From the moment you joined SMS you wanted her and when she'd moved down there you eyed her up properly." (I was speculating.)

"Yojana is dead attractive. Surely I'd have an affair up here."

"You do this," I responded. "The location is Harwich: you go there from time to time, and she only comes here occasionally. It is in the safety of distant Harwich that you are having your affair. But this isn't a fling, is it? It's serious."

"I thought you needed a loyal husband," he said.

"I do," I said. "But you're not."

"I don't go using investigators, while getting others to pay. You are so devious! All I know is you need a loyal husband for your career. Your career, your life," he said.

"Loyal and bang Cheryl?" I asked.

"I bang you. You make it sound as if I have walked out on you. I've never even hinted at it, and, in any case, you don't want a divorce at a time like this in your career. We are friends down there."

"You are not friends down there," I said, "You are all over her. You stay with her. You are going to marry her."

He paused. He was obviously calculating what I knew. I sat down on, first, some kitchen roll, my legs apart.

"He told you that? Is that from gossip?"

I said, instead, "I bet she is now more the sort of person you want to be with. You've lost a lot of interest in what I'm doing. I can understand that. I knew something was more wrong than a lack of interest and now I know why."

There was another pause. He broke it.

"Well, okay, if it is truth-time," he stated. "Since you became a deacon and since I was rejected, I have indeed made a different life and I suppose she represents a secular life and a secular life I'd rather have now, as a way forward. But I didn't want it to affect us. It's not zero-sum is it?"

"What measurement is that?" I asked (as if of his job).

"Just because I burn for her doesn't stop the fire in the grate for you. It doesn't stop my business relations with Yojana, for that matter. There are coals still glowing all around. Look at your cunt now with its clit shining out. But then you're not exactly burning the enthusiasm you once had for me, if you ever quite had it."

"When was the last time you wanted to penetrate me like you did - really?"

"My goodness me. You mean deep into your arse?"

"Well, at least it showed an interest."

"Look, we've been on and off. You joined in with me, helped my application; then you 'had a go' and 'surprise-surprise' you were selected. Well that's how it is in your dud of a diocese about which I care less and less. But where's your burning ambition now? Did you read your own sermon? That's when he lets you do them."

"I know. It's all been very difficult. Anyway, selecting me and not you doesn't make the diocese a dud."

"Default error, I'd say. It's a dud, and it makes duds. And are you really committed?"

"Actually, the pastoral ideal, helping people, sacrificially, even the ideal of the purposeful life... Hang on a minute, I'm not the one having the affair. It's not me that should be examined here."

"You don't know the meaning of the word sacrificial."

"I dedicate my life."

"Then you'd better not chuck me out of this church house now, or separate now, or divorce now. Do that and the brakes go on making you a priest? Think about it."

He was right, of course. I said, "I wasn't suggesting or proposing any course of action. I wanted you to admit it. So, come on, straight up - have you had sex with Cheryl Mould when in Harwich?"

"You or he is supposed to know this already," Keith replied.

"I didn't want it to be true, and it's not as if I don't like you any more, don't love you any more. There is still heat in the grate. But discovering an affair is like chucking on a bucket of cold water."

He said, "Try this instead: Yojana is excitement, eh? I don't know what Yojana really thinks of me. In any case, her role and mine makes us intense. Nothing deep."

"You're doing it again," I said. "I'm talking about..."

"I'm hinting that I'm banging Yojana, and many others."

"No you're not. Stop deflecting this. Cheryl Mould. Come on."

"Have it your way."

"I want you to come clean. Cheryl Mould."

"Cheryl is lovely. It's great to go down there and to have someone who appreciates you, someone on your level, someone who responds."

I wanted to stay focused. "Sex with her or not?"

"There are lots of women I want to admit I'd go with, given the chance. SMS is one den of potential iniquity. Look at what they wear at events, a throwback corporate culture. What if I said I've not had sex with Cheryl Mould - that she is pure affectionate friendliness?"

"That's not the basis for moving on and finding a way forward," I stated, putting my legs further apart and ramrod straight.

"So if I say I have had sex with Cheryl Mould?" he asked.

"You are going to marry her. I'm sure you haven't decided to save yourself for the big day."

"If you, or Magellan, says so. News to me."

"Keith. Stop lying. I'm going to surprise you," I told him. "Say I give you permission, as still your wife, to go with Cheryl Mould? In exchange, you stay until I'm priested, during which I make my own relationship decisions."

"You want a withdrawal agreement and a transition period, a clerical 'Mexit' then. Let's do something for Northern Ireland where I can fuck you one end and you can fuck Magellan the other end. I nominate your arsehole."

"So imaginative. Can't I prove I am better than her? Can't I still be your future?"

"Sorry lass, I'm changing continent."

"I thought that was impossible. So you admit you are moving on. So why not admit you have had sex with Cheryl Mould?"

"Yes, of course we have had sex. There you are. Now I suppose you and I had better sleep in different beds," he said, "even different rooms. Your tied house has separate rooms, while you wait, for us."

"That's just what I am not saying," I said. "I sit naked in front of you."

"You'd sit naked in front of anybody."

"How special is Cheryl to you?"

He said, "This is getting ridiculous. Of course she is very special to me. I am going to marry her. I want a baby with her. Something you cannot do."

"You're a bastard."

"She has made the difference and she wants a baby. So do I, now that I can."

I sat and pulled my legs up on to the chair. "I'd say you've got two wives, now. You like numbers."

"You're not in a position to give me permission to take a lover."

"Okay, I want my ordination. Let's make a deal."

"My terms," he said. "I want full freedom to go with her when I like. For that, I will continue to appear with you as if we are happily married. When you are ordained, we can split. I will get out of this house only when I can. So we separate under the same building until I can go and live with her."

"My terms," I said. "I'll be friendly with you and her, and you can stay in this house, but I don't want her coming here. If she comes to Serninsea, find a hotel. I know! If she comes up here, go to Yojana's parents' bed and breakfast."

He said, "I'll accept that."

"Good. Answer me this: Two years or six?"

"We fucked six years ago after fish and chips, the fuck and the food outside. She moved south in pursuit of a bloke, but he moved south to get away from her. But when I visited Harwich we clicked. At first she realised I'd been supporting what you are doing. But things started to change, as they do. You've got your life, Linda, and I've got mine."

"And she will wait until the end of June at least?"

"Oh God yes."

"Is she pregnant?" I asked, knowing the answer.

"We don't know yet."

"When did you last speak to her?"

"Today."

"She's trying?"

"Yes, and she is late."

"It's a simple test."

"She is getting a pregnancy test kit tomorrow. I told her that she is assuming too much."

"And we say nothing about this to anyone around here," I added. "You can have your mistress."

"Don't call her a 'mistress'. She is not a mistress."

"No, I suppose not. It just means I can have the equivalent too - but I haven't got anyone as yet."

"Well, you couldn't exactly, possibly, find anyone, not with your role now. Can't exactly bonk the detective. 'Oh, well done, give us a shag.' Hardly possible, Mrs. Deacon."

"Then you've nothing to worry about. You go with your... second wife and I'll stay the dutiful career wife."

"Ranking. She's first, you're second."

"Fuck you."

"You're a career wife."

"Clergy wife', you said in public. But I'm saying now let you and me be practical."

"Aye. I suppose so," Keith replied.

"I am wife one."

"In time only. Believe me, you're wife two and will be wife zero. I think I'd like to celebrate."

"God almighty."

"I want to celebrate by us fucking. How about that, Linda? We carry on fucking. I told her. I said that she is my future, but you and me still have sex. She accepts that."

"I hope you never deceive her like you have deceived me. You want to fuck me then? Well, there's my arse and our decision goes nowhere public, so you may as well stick your little prick up it. Come on then, give me a fuck. Do it properly. We'll do it in bed, and you can fall asleep, and then when you go to Harwich, you can tell her that we are still at it, because it is what you want to do."

"Right. Wife number one, Cheryl; wife number two, Linda. I like this, I really do."

I thought he was a bastard, and on the bed I presented my backside to him, and with no lubricant he undermined recent pelvic exercises.

"Oh no, like anon," he said after pumping me with sperm and withdrawing.

"What do you mean, like anon?" I asked. "I'm still me."

"Your shitty arse could have been anybody's," he said.

"Oh dear," I said. "Don't make the same mistake with Cheryl."

"I don't fuck her in the arse; she doesn't like it and it was no way to make her pregnant."

Thus Ascension Day had an up my arse meaning for me. It wasn't the first time but, with less than a month to go, it was the last. He might stay in the house a bit longer, but I would then be shot of him. We had an agreement.

Narrator: Keith Passing on the News (Monday 3rd June)

So far Linda had acted as before. She had not even informed her friends, she told me. She was working out what she could say, consistent with keeping the situation quiet.

It was Monday and Linda took herself for a drive. I did not know where she had gone. I had a few words with Archie Holborn on what had happened. He knew nothing of earlier investigations by Magellan.

We were given time to take off in the afternoon. It was still reward time for recent efforts; however, work was slack and it was a bit concerning.

Sir Sanjay had flown off to India for a short while. Christine was looking for someone under the Confraternity to visit her at one of her properties. So Yojana and I went along to this terraced house, not before one o'clock, where there was a massage table downstairs for Christine to lie on. Prostitutes were busy on the Internet upstairs.

Christine took her top off and her breasts were red and greased. They must have been slapped many times this day. What she wanted was for both of us rub cream into her back. Where a whip mark had landed several times, her skin had cut and bled. Another potent cream had to go into these bloody lines. The lash marks looked ugly to me and there were small bloody and weepy areas. She refused to say who had done these injuries, whereas I'd have assumed Sir Sanjay. There would likely be some faint marks left a six weeks later or more, as indeed there were patches of scar tissue.

Yojana looked concerned. Yet Christine said Yojana should experience it, and me too, and in fact she would give us a gentler fifteen minutes session if Yojana and I would accept a sense of sacrifice and service, at least in theory. Theory? What was theoretical about it?

I asked her about if her bottom was affected at all, but she said the paddling she'd received would just calm down without effect. So I pulled her trousers down to look, but more concern for us was when she turned to show her front, for there was redness around her vulva as well and one cut on her thigh.

We applied the creams as she wanted.

Nevertheless I volunteered and Yojana followed my lead. We undressed completely to experience what sort of things Christine had received, but nowhere near as severely.

Staying naked but with shoes on, Christine produced a paddle to whack our backsides. It did sting. The cane she next showed us was thin and bendy. She said she would give one light stroke to each of us. Yojana yelped and, crumbs, if that was light I hated to know what was heavy. Then she decided she'd show us how we are more sensitive on our fronts to the cat o'nine tails, across my chest and across Yojana's breasts. The cat o'nine tails upwards at Yojana's crotch was especially sensitive and she bent over immediately after the strike. Then Christine produced two pegs, one for each of us, one on my left testicle and one on her Yojana's outer labia, and we easily agreed that this hurt a lot. Christine said Yojana should try loads around the body and linked by string, to be pulled off in one swift go. She refused.

"Terry Barman won't let me introduce these in the group sessions, above the casino. He says people aren't ready. But how can we represent sacrifice, beyond the giving of our bodies, unless we are at least introduced to a little pain?"

"So who in the Worshipful Company struck you?" I asked.

"The person isn't in the Worshipful Company."

This suggested to me another client.

"He paid you, a customer."

"No, he didn't and he isn't."

"Who then?" I asked.

"He is entitled to privacy," she said. "We agreed not to go public."

"It is sometimes necessary and useful," I said.

Meranwhile, Christine said that we would soon have a secure online messaging system to pass on news and comments. We would have elaborate user names and passwords to get in to make encrypted messages.

Meanwhile, I had my news to pass on within limited circles.

I now told them that Linda had used Adam Magellan to discover my affair with Cheryl Mould. He had investigated me in Harwich and then the involvement of the SMS processes, was misdirection. If she had the information she needed, why did she want to draw attention to an investigation at home? I said that the note A. M. K. J. R. Y. L. A. likely came from Adam Magellan himself, but that when I mentioned this to Archie Holborn earlier today he'd doubted it. But Archie did not know where the note had originated.

We had come to an agreement by which Linda would be ordained without disturbance.

Christine asked if anyone had spoken directly to Linda, and of course this was possible as a number of people who had gone from Serninsea to Harwich and Felixstowe.

However, it didn't matter, because the outcome was excellent. The two women should keep the news within the Worshipful Company.

I said, "Anyway, there are no more excuses: it's time to recruit Linda so that when she is ordained she can function for the Worshipful Company."

"There haven't been excuses. It's a question of getting the geese in a row."

"Very funny," I said to Christine, using geese instead of ducks.

I had already told Archie that I was very happy with everything. For the moment, Cheryl was wife number one and Linda wife number two. If I could, I would move to Harwich.

This made Yojana say she hoped I would not but realised Cheryl came first.

Christine said Linda would have to adopt the group ethos into her life, under the direction of the Vanguard Confraternity to help God bring in the Kingdom. It was not for my convenience that I would continue to fuck her but as her duty and mine. We must give our total selves for the sake of the Kingdom.

I had more news. A pregnancy test confirmed this day that Cheryl was pregnant and we were both very happy.

Christine turned her attention to Yojana. She said she needed Yojana to prove to her that she could give herself up fully. She had a client coming, called Harry. Christine wanted Yojana to go with him. Harry would not be cruel, but he would introduce some things she'd not done before. The fee of £200 indicated what was expected, whereas Christine didn't even start at ten times that much. Christine told Yojana to call herself Hind, as in hind legs, because she would have to be on her knees, sticking out her bottom, for a number of his pleasures, but Christine was also thinking of Yojana's religion.

Harry had to pay her first, and she should expect condom use. Christine gave suitable condoms and a bottle of lubricant to Yojana, or Hind. Yojana should therefore wait, undressed, as he would be along very soon. Christine said that Yojana would be doing no more than Linda would, once Christine was able to work with Linda. I said I would go to Yojana's parents' Maa Skelter guest house to spend the rest of our afternoon off. I assured Christine that we were not forming an attachment.

Thus Christine and I left the house with Yojana waiting to be a prostitute. I asked if Christine could also come to the guest house, and she said certainly not. I would have to pay her a hefty fee, "and it is a punishing fee." At this point Harry was coming along the street, so Christine stopped him. She told him that his maid was waiting for him, nervously, and he was not to be cruel, but Hind did have extra strong condoms with her. He should spend no more than two hours with her, and probably less. Then we two continued walking.

Later on I woke after a nap on Yojana's bed and looked out of the window towards the sea. Yojana was sat outside in a coat. I went out to her and her face seemed strained. Yojana said she wanted to sleep with me until I should return to Linda, but I said we must obey the group ethos. I said to reassure her that she could teach me new pleasures she'd received when we next slept together again. I said I wanted to be with her, but we have to demonstrate our willingness to be within the Theatrical Players: we are actors after all.

Yojana said that Christine is so ideological. She really is a fanatic with her logic and ideas. Yojana told me to go home to Linda because she wanted a lie down. So I did go home and arrived earlier than expected. Linda had spent the day in local parks, contemplating, and also swimming naked, she said, in various south of Serninsea dykes. She denied she had seen any friends and said that no one, not even Diana or Patricia, knew of the confrontation or our subsequent arrangement.

"They can know," I said. "But don't tell Colin Cromer and so on."

Chapter 08 Adam Gets His Reward

Narrator: Linda A School Visit (Tuesday 4th June)

Tuesday in the eighth week after Easter and Colin Cromer said that if I wanted to preach before Trinity Sunday I could. Pentecost, it would be, in the evening, perhaps offering an unusual angle. "I'm being generous here; the bishop wants you more involved." The suffragan bishop had told him that I should be given opportunities to learn, including from Rabbi Maurice Neptune this day for faith presentations.

I went to Adam Magellan's, to see that he was all right. Peter said that Adam was out all day; my guess was that he was in the building. Peter did a card trick for me, and it was some sort of special shuffle involved. He thought he had to do more and better. I reminded him that I'd want to use him among my church folk.

"Tell Adam that he did a good job that night but I detected that he was a little unhappy."

"He said he won't talk about it," Peter told me, "and neither should I."

"It's done now. See you Peter; send him my love and gratitude. I want to take him out for a meal. Tell him that."

Before I left the building, Peter told of the death of Paul Darrow yesterday. Never was there such a controversy over an apostrophe used and not used in Blake's 7 on television, the low-budget British science fiction series of moral ambiguities.

I went on to the secondary school, my secondary school indeed, and this meant taking Religious Education for Year 11 as a practitioner of the religion. One could always see how bored the kids were during RE and the relief on teachers' faces that they at least paid some attention to a visitor like me. To try and tackle the appalling reputation of RE, the classes were renamed Humanities.

Bishop Barman had been delegated on to the Local Authority Standing Advisory Council for Religious Education in Foss to improve collective worship in schools, looking at the quality of RE, finding people like me to speak, producing places to visit like our parish church, and we Anglicans should have but had not produced some teaching materials. It had been mentioned that parish clergy could add to staff training, but nothing had happened there. So far I had not taken an assembly at the school, because they did not want the religion up front. Their reflections were secular. Nevertheless the suffragan bishop was in my thoughts because he was in his element when it came to making connections into the wider community.

Humanities classes were run by Mr. Barratt and Mr. Fowler. Regarding Year 11 they told me about the confident Misty and Cathy, the 'want to be accepted' Buffy and then the loner but charismatic redhead Miriam. George and Jack were trying to impress the females, but not the teachers. Sally was actually a star pupil in Maths. Humanities seemed to cover a wider range of subjects than I expected: the Global Economy and British Constitution. These weren't Humanities! Ms Kathryn Sally Parker, the headteacher, regarded Humanities as the place to raise topics in which to discuss ethics. I would have thought a wider range of subjects discussed ethics.

Another class was about to be taught by the later-arriving Rabbi Maurice Neptune, of the Reformist denomination. So, after my staff talk and toilet visit, I met him sat waiting in this corridor before we were taken to our respective classes.

"Yes I'm Rabbi Maurice, of the Reformist Shul over in Wytham. I'm here to tell some school students in Year 10 about Judaism."

"Good to meet you; I'm the Reverend Linda, a curate in the parish here. I'll be talking to Year 11. I have to confess that in all our time in theological college I didn't knowingly meet a rabbi. We did have a talk from an imam once on the fundamentals of Islam but we told ourselves about Judaism. How arrogant that must sound."

"There is danger of inaccuracy."

"So you are definitely not, what, Orthodox, Chassidic?"

"The Reformist strand is quite observant. Our setting is these times and not, say, the mediaeval. But for RE, as they have it here in Humanities, I am just a rabbi."

I said, "In RE it's as if they learn nothing. What I will tell Year 7 I will also tell Years 8, 9, 10 and 11 because, apparently, this is what the teachers do. There is very little of what the profession calls 'progression' in Religious Education."

He responded, "I'm sure I'll be asked many times about circumcision: yes, converts must do it I'll say and be healed before immersion, like using the mikveh. We have to discuss the penis honestly and directly to pupils, and that there is no female circumcision equivalent. Not in Judaism. We don't touch the clitoris, I may tell them. Have you ever encountered a circumcised penis?"

I thought this was a bit direct. "You mean doing it?"

"In any circumstances."

"Hmm." (There was a memory that Adam Magellan's friend Geoff Virgo had one, but he didn't stay with Adam, Jenny and me for me to see it, first hand or any hand.) "Er, no." My mind was drifting at this point. I wanted to make use of meeting this rabbi. So I then said, if a little bizarrely, "Suppose you have a Christian who doesn't really believe in Jesus as God the Son. If he was still important, then the person might be a Muslim, but if not important beyond all the other messianic figures at the same time, then the person might become a Jew. Yet it seems so unlikely that people switch."

"Is that your view?"

"I'm doing an interfaith comparison."

"It does happen; maybe a hundred times a year our denomination gets converts, but it would need commitment to Jewish identity and not just a theological loss."

"You don't baptise, then, oh... immersion? What's this about some Mick?"

"Mikveh. In fact we have it for spiritual elevation, for ritual purity, and it is full immersion: it is a requirement for conversion to Judaism. But many Jews immerse before the Sabbath and High Holy Days. Many women immerse monthly in harmony with their menstrual cycle. You fancy doing that? Marriage partners immerse in our mikveh before their wedding day."

"I apologise. Mikveh."

"It is a pool at the synagogue. You can have mikveh immersion for life cycle events such as milestone birthdays, personal loss, or after a bad illness - or indeed a set time after your menstruation."

"So you don't sprinkle water."

"The water must touch and cover every strand of hair, every birthmark, every lesion. You must be thoroughly cleansed immediately before the immersion and have no adhesions such as bandages or ointment and no cosmetics. Pure you. Naked you."

"Sounds great. Does it get rid of sin?"

"Not in the sense you mean, but it does ritually cleanse a person from past deeds. A convert is like a new-born. There is a blessing that goes: 'Barukh atah Adonai Elo-henu melekh ha'olam asher kideshanu b'mitzvotav v'tzivanu al ha'tevillah,' and this means, 'Blessed are You, O Lord, our God, King of the universe, who has sanctified us with His commandments and commanded us regarding the immersion.' Now we always say it before the immersion, except with the convert. Why not with the convert, do you think?"

"Er... Because they are not yet Jewish?"

"Exactly. So the convert says it only when a Jew, and the ritual cleansing comes first."

"What are the regulations for a mikveh?"

"Yes, well it must be built into the ground or the structure of the building and be a minimum of twenty-four cubic feet of water or some two-hundred gallons. The water level should be nearly a foot above an average person's waist when stood up, and so allows everyone reasonably easy full immersion."

"Water from the Jordan?"

"No. Tap water - of natural water colour if indeed chlorinated - but some must be freely entering rainwater, which is where to start. The natural flow of waters, in other words. Like your natural flows in your body. And it must not flow when occupied in use."

"Do you have like baptismal services?"

"A conversion ceremony must take place on a daylight weekday and not on the Sabbath and accompanied by a knowledgeable person to advise and see that the ritual was properly carried out."

I said, "We in Christianity could do with more rituals and a few less beliefs."

Maurice Neptune said, "Well if you think about it, all other mitzvot use a part of the body whereas everything goes into the mikveh. Submersion plus understanding is true rebirth. So this person who does not believe: not thinking of becoming a rabbi?"

"I didn't mention any person."

"You wanted your own RE lesson?"

"Looks like that."

"It was not about you?"

"You are Reformed, then." (I ignored his question.)

"Reformist, not 'Reformed'. We are not like the 'reformed' in the United Presbyterian Congregationalist Church. It is a later Jewish theological trend. History and ideas gained a setting institutionally. We have women rabbis as well as men of course."

We were called to go to our classes. But he had a request.

He said, "Can we meet again? I would like to meet again. I can inform you about actual thought today and how Judaism might really assist you."

"Soon I'm approaching our retreat and will be ordained priest."

"Well I hope you feel you can go forward. I might even help your Christianity. But, anyway, you have a very good suffragan bishop," said Maurice. "I'm sure he'd help you if you are struggling. He knows all the theological arguments. I can debate with him. He has a stagecraft and you might ask about that as you get to know him."

At this point, he turned to shake hands, but not before he put a white plastic badge with a black goose and a white B on it into his pocket to free his hand. Hmm.

I did my presentation and responses, all of which could have been with Year 7. They were about the hardly riveting topic for them of the layout of the church. I told them what our official beliefs were - the phenomenological school. And then, about to leave the building, along came the Bishop of Bolingbroke, John Barman, and the sweet smell of whatever he sprayed on himself. I had a keen sense of smell.

"Colin Cromer said you were here. I asked them if there was a room available. Best to see me now."

I followed him to an empty classroom.

"How's Keith?"

"Keith is fine, thank you."

"Supporting you as ever?"

"Indeed."

"We should book you in for your retreat and the ordination?"

"Er, yes."

"Are you progressing?"

"Funnily enough I was talking about that earlier."

"You are or you are not?"

"Schools not; I am."

"Oh yes; that. Does your confessor Ken Osis think you are ready?"

"Has he said?"

"Nothing."

"I've only seen him once."

"You should make best use of his availability at this time, and you are not."

"I'll talk with him again."

"You see, it matters that Keith is not diverted or uninterested and still gives you attention."

This seemed unusually personal. "He gives my concerns his full attention."

"We always understand that there is a difference between what happens and what appears to happen. You could be on the inside of this. Keith always seems to me to have directions, skill, craft..."

"I don't know what you are getting at," I stated. There was something familiar about this, but I saw no badge being worn by the bishop!

I asked, "Changing the subject, did you know those clergy involved in the bank robbery?"

"Of course. Jennifer World and Christine Vine. I put Ken Osis on to counselling them, but he's not needed. They're tough old birds. Obviously you don't know them but you will meet them I'm sure in due course at the ordination."

"Very brave women."

"Are you still studying? Reading?"

"Er, I still read but the content varies: a very good chat with a rabbi here earlier on."

"Maurice Neptune. Good man. You can rejoin him in a second."

"Oh?"

"We could do with more interfaith. He's come in on the inside - so our encounter isn't just that we proclaim this and they proclaim that. Look, on my main purpose here, I'm booking you into the retreat. Julian Worsley or I or both will interview you then. The ordination is not a done deal but definitely the process is on. Concerns?"

"Everything is manageable."

"Well, must rush. Give my best wishes to Keith, you know, so busy here and in Harwich. Now, why don't you join Year 13 in their drama lesson?"

"Year 11 has Drama, Bishop. It was my lot's next lesson."

"Well, go and see how it is done. Theatre, dramatics. Good for public speaking, presentation, voice, ritual."

"I can't just walk around in the school!"

"I've already cleared Drama class with Ms Parker."

I tried to find the hall, but failed. A pupil gave me directions to go up the wide central staircase to the hall and then up a narrow staircase for the balcony. It's where I found Maurice Neptune, looking down. Meanwhile I was wondering why the bishop had mentioned Keith so much and Harwich.

I said to Maurice, on sitting alongside him, "Apparently this drama is good for presentation and even ritual."

"They do it all here. Lighting from the control room - which can be above the stage or as up here, getting the stagecraft learnt, clarity of speech and movement. Actually, I'm a forward talent scout."

"What's one of those?"

"Spotting who's good. These are Year 11, so a bit early. Far better with later sixth form, because real talent can shine then and, of course, they can go on to adult roles."

"You're into amateur dramatics."

"Well, I make suggestions. A few people get the bug. Actors can progress far from humble beginnings. You've never acted?"

"No. Never. I do like your idea of commitment through naked ritual submersion," I said, changing the subject. "I'm going to think about that."

"Actors in training. You know that they do a class in the nude? It has to be done. Simulate sex. Any of these going on professionally will have to do it."

"Not Year 11!" I joked.

"Nor Year 13, but think of the former Head Girl, whom I believe is visiting."

I was reminded of Andrew Walter and his group with whom he enjoyed sex but that surely this had to be irrelevant to the rabbi.

He said, "They're enjoying doing 'A Handbag!' here. Good Old 'Important' Ernest and Oscar Wilde. It does keep Year 11 out of mischief."

He then announced he had to go earlier than he would like, to get back to Wytham in time for a meeting.

It seemed to me alone that half of them were larking about. It was mischief. So I left the balcony.

Walking down the main stairs a somewhat familiar young woman and the headteacher seemed to join from different directions coming up. "Is Rabbi Maurice up there?" asked Ms Parker. "This is Annie, former Head Girl from our Upper Sixth." Annie seemed to have her blouse open enough to show one of those badges on her vest under her blouse.

I replied, "He went some minutes ago." So I asked, "What is that badge?"

Annie said, "It's a goose with a B on it."

"I have one," said the headteacher, revealing it from below her jacket with some of her breast revealed.

"Who wears these? What do they mean?"

Annie said, "The goose is a local animal symbol..."

"You should know this," said Kathryn Parker. "It's related to local religion."

"And," said Annie, "the B stands for Bolingbroke."

"It's an ancient local name," said the headteacher.

"So who wears these?"

"Actors!" she replied. "It's a way that we identify ourselves - to those who know. Like a club. Rabbi Maurice has one."

The recent student said, "You don't have to wear them. We're all actors and identify with each other. Obviously I know Ms Parker very well. And, Kay, I still want to look at additional lighting from the balcony."

"I've five minutes," said the headteacher to Annie. "And thank you for your lesson. I hope we see you again somehow."

Somehow this didn't seem quite right: a head teacher showing stage lighting in the balcony, and them approaching from different angles when they came to the staircase. What Andrew Walter had said now sounded like what all four had said in the school. So what was all this about actors and amateur dramatics? Why an apparent religious symbol to identify them?

Badges and Patricia's Need (Wednesday 5th June)

Wednesday I woke with Keith, as I had for years.

I told him, "Put your finger in me and swirl it around."

After this I was working on top of the duvet with my dilators and moving my pelvis with a pillow between my legs. He was still in the bed, with a book, taking Wednesday off for a change.

"What's with the pillow?" he asked.

"Exercises. I looked them up. Hopefully repairing recent damage."

"Oh."

"Do you work with Yojana Asthana a lot then, usually?"

"Some points I see her or, rather, she sees me."

"Is she an actor, into amateur dramatics?"

"That's a funny question. 'Are you thinking of going on the stage, Mrs. Robinson?'"

"What?"

"Like in, 'Don't put your daughter on the... Oh, never mind. How do I know?'"

"That report from Adam Magellan said she had a badge that shows a goose with a B on it."

"I don't want to talk about him. As for a badge, it could be her mother's or her father's. Or someone else's."

"Apparently, the goose is a local symbol and B is Bolingbroke," I said.

"I know both symbols," Keith replied.

"I found out yesterday."

"You should get out more. Or fly among the geese."

"I go out and see these badges: I'm a deacon of the local church. I did not know local actors wore badges and that they use the goose or gander identifier."

"But you know about Bolingbroke, because the suffragan is named after it."

"Yes."

"The goose is at least a religious symbol," he said.

"It is a symbol from Toulouse; St Sernin is from Toulouse."

"Not completely. Ask Colin Cromer. I'll leave you to find out more."

"Keith: someone, I cannot say, had a badge and talked about a group of people with whom he had sex. Does this make any sense? Even the rabbi was a bit personal."

"You can't ask Colin Cromer about that. Anyway, you have to get up even if I don't. That makes a change."

"Only because I'm observing Morning Prayer."

So, after Morning Prayer, I asked Colin Cromer: "Is the goose a local symbol of religion?"

"What a question!" he exclaimed. "We get the wild geese. But it's related to Toulouse, where geese were plentiful, and that's where the Basilica of St Sernin is found."

"Apparently some actors into amateur dramatics wear badges with a goose and a B on it for Bolingbroke."

He responded: "I think a number of people have used the goose. But, for us, the wild goose is a symbol of the Holy Spirit."

"Is it?" I asked.

"You seriously did not know?"

"I am asking."

"Well you will know because you now have a subject for your next sermon - this coming Sunday, of course."

"I walked into that one, Colin."

"No, it flew into you. You receive the Holy Spirit, remember. Watch the birdie: I'm going."

"Just before you do: you're not into amateur dramatics, are you Colin?"

"I'd like to do more with music. See you later. Behave."

I started brushing my hair, and realised that my bad habit wasn't reducing enough after the Magellan-Jupitas confrontation.

In the afternoon Diana, naked behind Patricia's front door, let me in and I lifted off my cassock (nothing underneath). She was keen to report something once we were laid down.

"Our lovely, stuffy, right wing friend, Patricia, with this lovely house and her lovely husband... Yes? Their marriage isn't brilliant apparently."

"Not another one," I said.

"Why? What other one?"

"Keith admitted he is having an affair. Adam Magellan confronted him, we had Cheryl Mould's name redy and he admitted it. So now we are working out what we will do."

"You and Magellan?"

"No, Keith and me - how to carry on in the short term."

"What do you mean?"

"Keeping it quiet so that I can get through the priesting at the end of June."

"But it's not your fault."

"It doesn't work like that. Because of Catholic theory - once a priest, always a priest - you get divorced only after being a priest. Patricia: what's the matter there?"

"They need to spice things up, Patricia told me. So they found some sort of therapist who'd advertised. He's a taboo buster to spice things up."

"Perhaps we could all benefit," I suggested.

"Speak for yourself. So Patricia's been going with Arthur and they've had tutoring and there might be group sessions in the same room."

"They kept that quiet."

"But here's the daft thing. She asked if Ardse and me would like to sit in while they have sex?"

"What? What?"

"I don't need to repeat it."

"You are kidding. And, well, presumably: 'No' was your short considered reply!"

"Of course!"

"I'm glad she hasn't asked me, and presumably she won't because of the clergy thing."

"Not yet."

"What?"

"Well, I did say that you might be more pastoral about it."

"Diana! Oh, come on."

"I sort of suggested you to get me out of it; you can say no as well - if she asks."

"I'll watch them wearing my cassock and collar!"

"She didn't want us to join in exactly. That's not just taboo busting: that's a whole different level."

"Fancy you suggesting me," I said, "when I've been faithful to my husband."

"That's not the reason."

"He was unfaithful to me. There's no one else in my life. I'll take Adam for a meal, if he says yes, but that's all it'll be."

"Magellan," she said. "The one and the same?"

"A thank you to him. Simple."

Then there was the sound of my mobile phone in my bag.

"Hello?"

"Colin here. About the sermon. I was telling Bishop John, and he has no problem with you doing a sermon on the goose as the Holy Spirit and all the connections, but thinks it's advisable not to mention these badges."

"Why ever not?"

"He said he understands that they are like private communications, so that one amateur actor recognises another but it's not something that should mean anything to the wider public."

I asked him, "Have you ever heard of an amateur dramatic group in Serninsea advertising and putting on a play?"

"There was something about up to ten years ago, but it folded."

"But obviously something is happening."

"I think this is the point: they are not ready. I gather that Rabbi Neptune and you looked at some drama lesson. You indicated to Rabbi Maurice that you had no interest in drama."

"I don't."

"Well, don't forget that the rabbi is based at Wytham and there is a lot of amateur drama there. So Bishop John was unsure, but he thinks these badges could be useful for other places. Bolingbroke can apply across a wide area. Anyway, do the sermon, but find a different lead-in, I'd suggest, than seeing various people wearing these badges."

After the call, Diana said, "There is actually a drama study group in the college. It is a student thing and some did drama at school."

"So have you seen people wear a small badge with a goose and a B on it?"

"I can't say I have."

"Do those students in the drama group wear them?"

"Well, I don't go to their workshops or even productions."

"The school headteacher, the former head girl, my confessor, an amateur psychotherapist, and the rabbi, all wore one, and possibly Yojana Asthana has one. I've started to notice them all over the place."

"Perhaps now you've mentioned them, I might go on to see one or two. But there is no specific Am Dram in Serninsea. Is this important?"

"For God's sake it's not important," I said.

"Have you heard about Winchester Geese?"

"No?"

"Look up the Liberty of the Clink that is located around Southwark in London. It fell under the Bishop of Winchester rather than London, and so had all sorts of dodgy goings on. Cross Bones there probably was begun as an unconsecrated graveyard for prostitutes. Cross Bones and all associates features in some literature."

"So this might have something to do with it. Hmm."

Patricia arrived home which was the usual time to get dressed. However, she said she was early and fancied a talk. So we didn't move.

But Diana opened up. "Linda has discovered that Keith has been having an affair. When he goes to Harwich, he stays and sleeps with Cheryl Mould. Do you remember Cheryl Mould?"

"Er. Not really."

I told Patricia as well that Keith would stay with me until at least I was ordained. But he called me 'Wife Number Two' rather than number one.

Diana said, "From all you say, I think he could end up with Cheryl Mould and have an affair with Yojana Asthana."

Patricia thought, "Nah. Yojana's got more get up and go; he's a pipe and slippers man. Wants to settle down. Cheryl? Yes. Yojana? No."

Diana said, "Cheryl Mould set the standard for being a tart at school."

I chipped in: "She looks so different now."

Patricia said, "From what you say about all of them, Keith would have become another Colin Cromer, had he been ordained."

I said, "So what about this Bishop of Bolingbroke, John Terence Barman? This new confessor of mine makes more sense now: he said submit to him especially, promise to keep confidences and I'll be 'on the inside' like where the hub is."

Diana said, "That bishop man is a creep. Something is concealed. Get close to him and he has this sweet smell of perfume."

I said, "He does groom himself."

Patricia said, "There's something of the dark about him. But I don't know him."

Diana added, "He's high and mighty among the tutors at college, as if he is a superior academic amongst a bunch of second-rate lecturers. Some of them join to him by the hip. He must have a charisma - and you either love him or hate him. And I don't hate anyone but he is a negative."

Patricia changed the subject back. "So Cheryl is Keith's future. What a betrayal. Don't waste energy getting angry when he's moving on."

I said, "That's what I've been doing. He can be him and let me be me. Perhaps Keith is becoming more like his parents. I've always had more edge, more danger, more risk. He's made me too risk-free."

Diana said, "You fell into that Church and it traps you. Anyway, Patricia, didn't you want to ask Linda something?"

Patricia said, "Didn't you know Keith well, at one time, Diana?"

"Er, Keith once told me I looked very brown all over."

"Hardly very revealing," I said. "You went all sun-worshipping when starting your naturism, but I didn't and don't."

Patricia stared at Diana in silence.

Diana then asked, "What do you want to talk to Linda about, Patricia?"

"I want to talk to Linda at some time."

"Well, I'll get dressed then," said Diana.

Patricia said, "Better both get dressed, it's nearly kids back time, and I can talk to you later."

"I'm in my cassock only, so dressing will take me ten seconds."

Both of us clothed, Patricia asked me into the living room. "Are you interested in helping Arthur and me in something personal. Stop smirking out there."

Diana said goodbye to us both and left the house.

"I'm interested to hear about it."

Patricia thus said to me, "Em, it's that Arthur and I have realised... We need to become more loving and intimate."

"Right. Go on. I'm all ears."

"Pipe and slippers again. We thought we could seek professional assistance and have done."

"After only six years of marriage?"

"A similar couple we know said about this consultant they'd seen, and how he'd turned them around. At Wytham is this consultant. He advertised. We've spent some money, really, and we are up to the session that focuses around taboo busting."

"You mean Diana thought I could help you."

"We had thought Keith and you could help. Obviously you're no longer a team."

"No, I'm second choice - number two, again."

"Diana is right, though: you're pastorally minded."

"Patricia. What do you think if I told my training vicar, 'Oh I'm doing some pastoral visiting, sitting in while a couple has a shag.?'"

She said, "You are right. I wasn't going to ask and we should look elsewhere. We are making progress."

"What do you want, Patricia?"

"I don't want to ask if you don't want to do it."

"Being pastorally minded, as you suggest, I might feel a compelling urge to help."

"Keep it quiet, then. Helped by people we can trust, we need an edge on things. You could watch and offer advice on how we, er, do lovemaking. Your watching is like taboo-busting. Makes things risky, makes them exciting."

"Watching?"

"You only observe. You can even comment afterwards."

"You could ask anyone."

"It is definitely not swinging. Not like dogging."

"I see."

"I'd hoped Diana would have said yes. This would be once only, to help Arthur towards being freer. We'd talk about it afterwards."

I said, "What about someone in this group?"

"It would cause a group dynamic. We are separate couples sitting in a circle. This is one intense bedroom experience."

"Just a minute. This isn't a group of sexual intimacy where you act things out?"

"Some do. It can happen."

"Do you wear a badge?"

"Yes, sometimes."

"Ah."

"What's that got to do with it?"

"It's an identifier. A white badge and black markings?"

"Yes. SDW with a rectangle and a square."

"Not a white badge and a white B on a goose in black?"

"No. What are you on about?"

"Never mind. You've never seen that badge, have you, by any chance?"

"No."

I felt guilty. "So, you're saying that by being present I will upset your safe equilibrium - is that it? Oh, fuck it. If I do this, I'm not joining in or anything like that."

"Will you be naked? That's why we wanted to ask Diana, and then there is you. I mean, she and Aardse, or Diana alone, or you, could be naked and observe."

"Patricia. And what happens afterwards?"

"We then go back to the group in Wytham guided by the counsellor and tell them."

Thinking of my new found freedom, I said, "I'll do it. Me only. Don't discuss it with anyone else. Not even Diana. I'll be there and that is all. I'll be naked; that's all right. You've seen me so often enough. You do what you do, and I'll talk about it afterwards if you want. But tell no one."

Patricia said, "I should have asked you first. When?"

I said, "Things are getting busy: sooner rather than later."

"Tonight? We can do it here from say nine and maybe to eleven and no longer than midnight. Like a good night out at the pub."

"What about the kids?" I suddenly asked. "Talk of the devils!" (The children came in.)

"Auntie Julie tonight, everyone," Patricia called out to them. "Eight O'Clock."

Your dad and I are going out."

One of them called out that she was going out with friends.

I left Patricia's to return later.

I had gathered that Diana must have had some encounter with Keith. There was a time that Diana seemed to disappear, if not for long, and came back. I was never quite sure what had happened, and asking moved off the agenda. I'd introduced Diana to naturism and she became a convert - thus she got brown rapidly. But even as good friends we kept secrets, and, by agreeing to see Patricia and Arthur on the job, I was about to add another secret.

Pastoral Help for Patricia and Arthur (Wednesday 5th June)

I told Keith I had a meeting at the vicarage and would return in some hours. First, of course, I had to get ahead of the curve with a hot drink and bowel movements.

Satisfied that Patricia was no secret badge-wearer (I didn't think she would be), I rang Patricia's doorbell at 8:45 pm, so to be ready for 9 pm and create a bit of time-space for however the proceedings would take place. I was wearing mufti.

Arthur Rhymes answered the front door, with a dressing gown on. "Thanks for coming. The kids all went at 7:30 and are staying overnight with aunt and uncle. So we are okay here. Come on in. We've had a little, er, uneventful time together. I should say she is a little uncomfortable about all of this."

"That makes two of us," I said, going in and following him.

"Three of us," he said. "But this is the point: we are upsetting the routines. We are going to do some naughty things at my business premises after hours as well. That sort of thing. Shall we go upstairs? Do you want the bathroom to prepare or anything like that?"

I asked, climbing the stairs in front of him, "Is it better I undress in the bathroom?"

"We're not asking for a striptease."

"Casually I undress and dress in front of Patricia when I chat with Diana."

"Hia Linda!" Patricia was welcoming but a little nervous in tone, I thought.

So I went into the bathroom. I needed another pee anyway, and so stripped off first. The one thing I needed with me was my hairbrush.

Then I went into the bedroom that had sidelights on either side of the bed, and was looked at by these two together, under bedclothes. I said, "Put the main light on. I need to see; I need you to see that I can see. Patricia. Get out and put the light on."

"Well, you do it Arthur."

"No, Patricia, you do it and throw that cover off."

So she got up and did as I asked. What I saw with the light put on was a woman with a large, square, closed bottom, full of cellulite and large, hanging but somewhat emptied breasts. Her legs seemed short. Laying on the bed was Arthur with a large belly and a very small manhood in an unexcited state. So I sat there in the far end corner at the foot of the bed and started my observation of their actions. Very slowly they started kissing. This could be a long night, I thought, and I hadn't even got a glass of water nearby.

Noticing his absence of response, I decided to talk. "Don't you think you might suck him off? I mean not a lot is happening. I tell you what, I'll go and get a glass of water or something from your kitchen while you get started."

"Right," said Patricia. "We'll do that, if you don't mind..."

"Crumbs," I said. "This is why I am here. Get started and keep going for when I get back."

So I left my hairbrush behind and went to the kitchen and the fridge and found some cordial and a glass in the cupboard, to fill it up and return back upstairs, where I found Patricia on her knees on the bed, her big bottom facing in my direction. So I couldn't actually see what she was doing.

So I said, grabbing my hairbrush and pointing with it, "Much as I might like the sight of your bum, Patricia, you might get Arthur to move across a bit and let me see what you are doing, and also so that you can look at me looking at you."

There was a grunt and a pause; he shuffled along and she manoeuvred around. So now I could see. She was making a bit of a chomping noise, but not a lot was happening.

So I had some advice. "Try a combination of teeth, lips, tongue and suction. Remember the more sensitive head."

"Teeth? Bite his sausage?"

"Not bite his sausage. A bit, though. Carefully. Why not do it laying on top of him? A bit of chwe-deg-naw. Croeso Chwe Deg Nain sang Dafydd Iwan, although that was about Prince Charles."

Patricia and Arthur looked puzzled and then smiled at my humour.

She turned about to lay on top of him, for chwe-deg-naw, his business end to me. He played with her dangling breasts. There was some response within his business end.

He said, "Oh come on then," as he started to shuffle away from under her. There was all sorts of turning about by her and so he was to get on top of her, both facing the wall. "I can't see you now but you look lovely, Linda."

"Concentrate on your wife, Arthur."

And she said, "Oh this could be embarrassing." This suggested to me they'd thought about what they were going to do with my observation, as in him trying an early entry.

I said, "Sorry, but now neither of you can see me. Turn around so you can see me."

So they turned about, their heads now facing me. Arthur, on his knees, grasped each of Patricia's lower legs in each hand, pulled them up, entered her shallowly and started moving inwards and outwards. To me there was incompetence in these actions. I was thinking how fortunate I had been in that Keith always had technique.

Was there anything I could do to help? Having told him to concentrate on her, he did look at me at moments, so I decided to masturbate in front of them and get some reaction. I used the handle of my hairbrush, mainly without insertion. Now there was this rhythmic slapping of flesh, more slap and noise than effect. Something would have to improve. I needed to be more interventionist.

"Come over here, Arthur," I said from my chair, and he stopped his slapping motion, looked at me for confirmation, got off her and the bed, and came across. So, hairbrush released, I grasped hold of what I needed and pulled him forward and leaned forward myself. "Watch me, Patricia." Patricia on to her side looked on and seemed accepting enough. Starting with my hand motions, I used my lips, teeth, tongue, suction and even blowing. It worked, of course, though presumably he was excited being in someone else's mouth.

"Why is it called a blow job?" he asked.

I paused. "Because it is a 'below job'. It's from prostitutes who fell to their knees. I'm staying sat down."

Getting him longer and stiff, I pushed him back and said, now stood up myself and closer to them, "Get on her, apply a muscle like feeling to it to keep it stiff, and put it in there as if you are digging. Push it in, search down the hole with it, and go left a bit and right a bit..."

"Fire," he said.

"No! Dig around. Change the motion."

"Oh, deep deep," said Patricia in response, who must have seen me upside down.

I said, standing up, "That's it and develop some rhythm slowly but keep digging around."

He said, "She's getting slippery."

So I said, "Put more effort in then to try and keep some purchase."

Patricia said, "This is so different."

Arthur said, "Brilliant advice."

I sat back down, and now took to my hairbrush handle. The result, peculiarly perhaps for them, was less slap and more rhythm, and not only that but he kept looking at me. I added to his encouragement by widening my legs and doing a little exposed play, the brush handle busy. Trouble is, when her eyes were open, Patricia was also looking at me upside down and not him. Whatever she'd thought about my presence, the result was a happy one in the sense that he changed from rhythm to spasm, and finally a Golden Shot.

So everything paused, as he moved alongside her, still looking in my direction, and after some minutes he got up to go to the bathroom, where the sound of urinating was very audible.

"Oh," said Patricia, rising up, turning to face me and swinging her legs over the bed.

I could hear her say into her breath, "I need the loo as well." She went.

He came back in the room and said to me, "Perhaps we do that again. You and me. In your mouth."

"I don't think that's the idea," I said. "It wouldn't be taboo-breaking, would it? It would become something else."

"Well, where did you learn to do it like that?"

"Acquired experience," I said. "So tell Patricia that. Yeah, I need a pee too, again." I kept my hairbrush.

I pushed forward the bathroom door and it opened. Patricia, stood at the mirror, and looking at me, I said, "I won't be a second."

So inside I just squatted down and started to pee. (I might have plopped a turd.)

She said, "Linda!"

"What? I need a pee. Masturbating brings it on. I drank too much coffee before coming out and then some of your juice. Cordial, I meant. Never mind."

"Where do you come from? I'd better go." Patricia said, "Don't get me wrong. I really appreciate it. You were very brave to come. Thing is, even, I've seen your body and Diana's so many times, but I don't like you seeing mine. Or Arthur's, really."

She passed by me on the toilet. I used some paper; I flushed. "Or me sucking him off?" I asked.

"I'm learning," she called back.

Back in the bedroom both of them were stood up, as if about to say goodbye. I said, "Arthur, she hasn't come. Go to your headboard, Patricia, and lean back on it, and open your legs. You can close your eyes if you want." She did. Arthur was stood alongside me. "It isn't just about you ejaculating, you know. Her pubes need your tongue: go to it, soldier."

"What to do?" he asked. "She's waiting."

I put my finger to my mouth. Then, on to my knees I started circling around her pubes with my tongue. I covered her eyes with one hand. I pushed a finger in, and I raised my licking over an increasingly exposed pink clitoris.

Now I looked at Arthur. He said, "Eyes still closed." He climbed on board and I moved out of the way. He resumed what I had started.

Patricia said, "If what I think has happened has happened I might be... Oh, that is so nice again."

The result was she became runny and I pointed towards her vulva for him to continue. She rived somewhat and orgasmed fully.

I said, "There you go. She's done... you're done... I'm done."

Arthur said, "Yes. It was taboo busting all right. I think I need a drink now."

"No you don't," I said. "That is your wife around your mouth. You should savour it."

Patricia said, "Linda. Will you get dressed now and perhaps Arthur and I can chat about all this?"

I replied, "I think that's a good idea. I mean there's more I could offer but..."

Patricia said, "I'll always appreciate this but nothing to Diana please and absolutely nothing to anyone else."

"Of course. She's bound to ask, because you asked her and Aardse. But I won't answer."

"It's been great," Arthur said.

Patricia said, "Definitely no repeat."

So I turned around towards the door and bathroom and said, "I'll get dressed and let myself out. Have a good chat and get that sex life spiced."

She said, "We'll tell our consultant. Might have a further session with him, but probably then drop the consulting."

Back at the bathroom I retrieved my pile of clothing, got dressed and went downstairs and out through the front door.

Back at home Keith noted that I was not so late. Did I have a good meeting at the vicarage?

I told him that I'd had a very good meeting and, for some reason I was very randy, and his "Wife Number Two" fancied some of his well-developed attention.

I felt freed and liberated as he banged away into me.

Narrator: Keith Under the Confraternity (Thursday 6th June)

All three bishops were present; they had already had a meeting of the Confraternity of the Theocratic Principality of the English National Church. Two unknown to me came up from the south. Locally was our retiring head teacher Kay Parker accompanied by the former head girl Annie Fenwick, plus the Wilsons, the McPhails, the Holborns, the Reverend Christine Vine, Rabbi Neptune, Ken Osis and Andrew Walter. From Hartlepool had come the Reverend Jenny World, the Reverend Fatima Tamuuz, Philip Shrimpton and Rory Jackson. There were the new people attending: Charles Rowland, mentored by Archie's wife, and Janet Hayes on her very first visit. But the one local person not present, nor at work and not answering at home, was Yojana.

The bishops asked the Reverend Deacon Christine Vine to give a talk with relevance to recent events.

She asserted that we under the Vanguard Confraternity could not agree with the scheme of Schopenhauer (1788-1860). Schopenhauer began with Kant that we perceive through our senses and we can't get to what is the reality in itself, except perhaps through ourselves as embodied, but where much was left mysterious. Schopenhauer in this sense pre-dates Freudian thought. Nevertheless, unlike Kant, the world itself doesn't have the differentiation as we perceive (things) except through space and time. But the one world as it is, and indeed we ourselves, have the Will, the driver; and it is really rather horrible by evidence as to the suffering it produces.

Thus Schopenhauer is a pessimist. Yet he can still state that in unity harming another is in a sense to harm ourselves, and so we should act ethically. Furthermore we have art, and art can be regarded as without material desire for consumption, and so can be approached as being disinterested.

Christine said that we can see parallels with Hinduism in the one metaphysical unity and in Buddhism with disinterest applied as ethical towards nirvana. Compassion arises with disinterest, unlike with samsara, the mixed-up clingy world as it is. However, the Will is incredibly powerful - that or the Will is not so horrible after all.

It wasn't easy to follow, this. Christine went on to give what should be our objections. She stated that the orgasm must surely be part of the Will. It is one of the energies that drives us. Indeed it comes within self-knowledge. Yet far from being part of the ugliness and horror of existence, the orgasm is an experience of beauty and connects us with the divine. It overturns Augustinian original sin.

Christine claimed that the Buddhist Anong's connection with practising disgust would link her with Schopenhauer. She was unsure what Anong would say to this. Nevertheless, we must be different from this and her, in that the orgasm approached through effort, sacrifice, and even suffering, has a redemptive quality and connects with our whole crucifixion and resurrection pattern. The orgasm makes the world ultimately good, and thus what the Confraternity promotes as our Vanguard purpose to the world along Christian lines.

Bishop Elizabeth thanked Christine for developing our thinking further in response to the meeting in Hartlepool. We had to move along with pragmatism, the bishops had decided.

We had to be careful. For example, other Anglican people might start wondering why Bishop Liz was in the county of Foss again.

Then she asked Christine what had happened with Yojana. Christine replied that she had "toughened her up" somewhat, leaving her to entertain one of her ladies' clients and Yojana collected the fee. Then Christine said that one week of Yojana being in London with Christine would sort her out completely.

Elizabeth responded, "Absolutely not!" Yojana would only accompany Elizabeth herself in South Wales. "She needs nurturing," and the decision of the bishops was that we were not now introducing these tougher theosexual practices within the Worshipful Company. "And, given your views on the authority of the Confraternity, that is that and you will obey."

"Yes," said Bishop Terry. "Keith's mentoring of Yojana has gone on far too long, especially after her initiation. Mentoring should be as short as possible."

Jenny then gave the opinion that we ought to move forward. Fatima then said no we don't. Fatima said that Yojana was probably having difficulty disconnecting from her mentor, and I did nod in some agreement.

Jenny speaking caused Bishop Terry to mention that she and Christine had been so brave at the bank. They received a round of applause. Jenny said really it was Christine who made her feel brave. The reputation of Christine as tough and self-sacrificing was raised among us even more.

Terry said, "Under the Holy Spirit the news media got your names wrong, and this preserved our anonymity."

But Christine said that two days later they corrected when there was more information from the police.

"But we were assisted at the critical moment," he said.

I mentioned that Linda was unaware of Jenny's name change and Jenny said this was the whole point of her doing it.

Next, said Elizabeth, going online would be passwords secure and encrypted, but nevertheless we ought to talk in the theatrical metaphors and have user names that meant something to ourselves but not to outsiders. Terry said that Wilkinson's Casino downstairs had said we could have a link from their website, and it would be indistinct. They did not know what we did, and assumed we held valuables up there, like the Serninsea Cross brooch. Terry reminded us that this was not a Confraternity matter.

So the topic turned to the recruitment of Linda. She had seen a number of white plastic badges now, and raised her curiosity. So far, I said, she was talking about amateur dramatics and knew there was no known drama group in town. She had picked up some sort of sexual connection but was puzzled.

Terry said that the bishops agreed today with him that Linda should be followed by George Wickenby at times likely to produce results. For example George had used powerful binoculars and a tripod at the marshes when Linda was at Patricia Rhymes', and he was sure that she and another person were naked in a conservatory.

"I could have told you that," I said. "And she had a church meeting in the evening last night, at the vicarage."

"Except she didn't," said Bishop Terry. She had been back at the same house as in the afternoon and was there for less than two hours. George did not know why, but the lights were on upstairs and eventually went off downstairs. Terry told me not to ask her what she was doing; she was not to know that she was being followed.

"But I'm wondering if we should claim that Patricia Rhymes has one of our badges - just in case."

"But if Linda asks her, when she hasn't, Linda will be suspicious," I said.

"Maybe not, then," said the bishop.

Terry suggested I test Linda's toleration by going to Harwich rapidly, taking best wishes to Cheryl for her pregnancy.

Of course this latest news was relevant to the group. I had even called Linda 'Wife Number Two' and she seemed to accept this. I added that, apparently, Adam Magellan had earlier observed me in Harwich. Nevertheless, he had not discovered the Confraternity. What did we know about him?

Christine said about him being very attached to Ann Dromeghda and her partner Labhaoise Vlahos, but not sexually.

Kay Parker said Ann had been his teacher at school, and Labhaoise was a supply teacher and became her lover. They resigned soon after the school merger. They've been partners ever since and they married.

Christine, who knew them through property deals, said that Ann would never cease to support Adam, which suggested she was in his debt; Ann and Labhaoise went into business upgrading properties, selling most on and renting a few out.

I said, "There was a hint of scandal. Magellan did marry a Rumanian, who left the church choir, and that is now a redundant relationship."

Christine said she had bought a number of their properties, when done up by them; and Christine's larger portfolio and escorting allowed her to purchase a helicopter recently and pay for a driver. Many houses were rented by prostitutes working online through her own Goosechat business. Christine and two others escorting in London had raised their fees considerably over the last few years. Sanjay Bunker was but one client. She invited Helen McPhail to go south and participate instead of Yojana and Helen said yes.

Jenny pointed out that there were rumours about teacher Ann Dromeghda threatening Adam Magellan. Then came Jenny's own late upper sixth form discovery-time with Linda and Adam, followed by her own short relationship with Adam after school during her gap year. She said that Magellan was definitely not gay, but his friend, Geoff Masters, now a self-styled bishop, was gay, in the fashion of her precious uncle Bishop Bill Masters. Jenny said Geoff lived with a gay partner in Bristol, Bishop Luis Callas. Geoff had soon given up teaching English as a foreign language.

Rabbi Maurice told us that he'd got off to a good start with Linda; he would discuss theology again and see whether she could be a wife to him.

Ken Osis stated that he could not feed back pastorally confidential conversations with Linda. Ken added that Maurice did not have a monopoly on taking Linda on as a wife.

Bishop Jonathan Eyre said we needed feedback on Linda, and confidentiality should be minimal, drawing strong support from the Wilsons.

I said I expected a rapid divorce after Petertide; there were no children to consider, of course. Philip Shrimpton, reflecting on his own failure, wondered how Jonathan had managed to bed Linda so easily, but Jonathan simply smiled.

In this setting we were introduced to Charles Rowland, the Head of ICT in Serninsea, and Janet Hayes, new Marketing Developer across the SMS business. Charles Rowland had been mentored for The Worshipful Company of Serninsea Theatrical Players by Archie's wife, June, and Janet Hayes was enjoying a short mentoring by Stephen McPhail.

Janet was going to move to Hartlepool at a convenient point; Sir Sanjay (in India at present) and the board had already approved the move, although it did not matter where she was located given she was Group Marketing Developer. She would stay at Fatima's temporarily and, of course, Jenny lived there as well.

Elizabeth suggested that I did not try to contact Yojana. She would herself, and SMS would be giving her plenty of expenses to go around South Wales. She would stay with Yojana on their travels, but Yojana would also have sex with the new bishops and there would be a South Wales Worshipful Company formed.

The Diocesan Bishop of Mynyw, Bishop Afanen Ffrwyth, fifty-five, a lesbian, with a fine collection of Shiva statues big and small that would interest Yojana, and the Suffragan Bishop of Newport, Niall Ifan, forty-six, could only be initiated by the three existing bishops. It would be a big occasion but necessarily secret. The bishops would come directly on to the Confraternity after initiation.

With the meeting over, we moved to a religious service, the Body Eucharist and Initiation, in which ordained Fatima did the honours with Charles Rowland, exchanging vaginal and penis body fluids. After the service had finished, we all had sex and this was the first time I had penetrated Janet Hayes, having known her for some time.

Narrator: Linda Keith's Immediate Trip to Harwich (Thursday 6th June)

I was walking around town and along the promenade having occasional chats with anyone who stopped me. I paused in Café Albert. I had a text message from Keith.

Going to Harwich now for three nights. Staying with Cheryl. Her address is...

I constructed what might be thought an unusual reply.

Give her my best wishes. Tell her I remember her fondly.

Armed with this information, I went to Upper Road and Magellan Investigations.

"Hello Peter. I really ought to see Adam. Is he in?"

"I'll go and ask him if he is in." After two minutes, Peter was back. "His office."

So I walked through to the second large room off the corridor and stairs. "Hello you," I said to Adam sat with his own female accompaniment. "I am here to say my 'thank you' and arrange to treat you to a meal."

"May I introduce Ann Dromeghda. Ann is my sleeping partner."

"Oh," I said. "I didn't know."

She said, "He means 'sleeping partner' in the business sense. You must remember me! I taught both of you."

"Of course I remember you. Nice to meet you again after all this time. You still live around here, or visiting?"

"Labhaoise and I do still live in Serninsea. We were young teachers at the time, only six years older than you two. You remember that the other secondary school closed, and Labhaoise came over to ours and we had a quiet exploratory relationship then."

"I do remember."

"We both got out before they pursued the rumours. Our relationship solidified. We went on to have two children, so our children are nine and they will be attending the very same secondary school themselves in a couple of years - if it stays open. Anyway, I've been hearing that the business is doing better. Very good to meet you, Linda. I'll go upstairs."

"Pleased to meet you too."

She went up his staircase, obviously feeling at liberty to do such a thing.

Adam said, "I'm one of those unfortunate blokes who proves to someone that they are lesbian."

"Adam, Keith is going to Harwich out of the blue, and tells me he is staying with Cheryl. I don't care. Our working truce is working too well, perhaps."

Adam said, "You're good at this deception game. You used me throughout."

"My apology and a thank you. Our story seems to be holding up."

"You did what your husband's lot did. Set up wild goose chases."

"Not you as well," I said.

"What?"

"Geese."

"I don't understand," he said to me.

"Good," I responded. "Look, there's a curry house in Titansea I'd like to try and it does all sorts like seafood and stuff."

"I know it."

"Are you free tonight or tomorrow evening?"

I heard a female voice from beyond and above shout, "Go!"

"Tonight, Adam? Come on, let's go tonight."

"If Ann says go, I go. Tomorrow, I think. Eight o'clock here? Talk over what we did..."

"Oh no, let's forget the business."

"What we did together when we were younger," he said.

"Definitely," I responded.

He called out, "You can come down now."

"She was listening anyway."

I remembered the time I went to Ann and Labhaoise's house. There were secrets to keep, all right.

In the street, as I got away from these terraced houses, there was an exchange of texts. I started it.

Tomorrow evening: going out with Adam Magellan. A restaurant.

Minutes later came a response.

With my blessing, if needed. Irrelevant that I don't like him. Ask about a woman that he got pregnant.

Clearly, he wanted to stir something. I had a simple response.

I might well. The meal is a thank you - I'm paying.

About ten minutes later he sent me Cheryl's house telephone number. He added a cheeky message.

Here's some close encounter detective work for you. Ask Magellan about the rookie teacher he knew.

I had a reply:

No. Water under the bridge out to sea.

After a visit to a parishioner I looked again. There was another message.

No doubt you'll swim in it.

Time for a reply:

You were the respectable one, up front, but actually otherwise. I was seen as the wild one, yet I was loyal and reliable.

Seconds later:

About to drive further south. No hard feelings to you. You may soon get them. Yojana is off with SMS to South Wales via Hartlepool. Sends you her best wishes. She sent best wishes to Cheryl.

I had to reply.

I met Ann Dromeghda today. Adam's sleeping partner, in the business sense. You too have sleeping partners.

His final message was:

Enjoy tomorrow evening in the pastoral sense. Must go.

This gave me an idea. In the early evening from home (with Keith gone) I had a dump to clear the way before ringing Julie Vaughan.

"Keith is arriving at your end of things. I thought I'd tell you he has admitted the affair. He is supposed to think Adam did observations at the time of his visit before SMS started its annual self-inspections cum stress tests, and therefore Adam looking at him and Yojana Asthana was a kind of deception."

"I see. What are you going to do?"

"We have an arrangement. He now has my blessing regarding Cheryl. I can also do as I wish."

"You, a clergywoman?"

"With discretion."

"So he just admitted it."

"After further questioning."

"He speaks highly of Yojana Asthana. I'm not saying anything more! How was it with meeting Adam Magellan after so long?"

"He didn't remember me at first."

"He was never the sharpest needle. A decade ago he returned to Serninsea after a duff time as a copper in Nottingham and Ann Dromeghda quickly bankrolled his investigations business. Do you think your arrangement with Keith will work out? What does Cheryl think?"

"It's only weeks until I'll get priested; I then want the fastest divorce, though, and he might hang on a bit before he moves in with Cheryl. You seem to have your finger on the pulse, Julie. What do you know about Ann?"

"Ann the lezzy! She was on to Adam and I think she used him to discover any vestiges of heterosexuality. She's owed him ever since. She married Labhaoise Vlahos, I heard, and they each had a child."

"Nine years old - both."

"And some minister got into property from their done-up stock."

"Who? I know there was the United Presbyterian Congregationalist minister living in her own house - the Reverend Georgie Smith."

"Wasn't her but from your lot. Loads of their done up properties are owed by some Anglican clergywoman now."

"How come I don't know any of this?"

"Because you've always gone around with your eyes shut, Linda. Do you remember the RE teacher? She said you went around 'in a cloud of unknowing'. I once thought, you'd never be a taxi driver: you don't know half of Serninsea's streets."

"I know the way to the seafood restaurant in Titansea. I'm treating Adam."

"Its name?"

"I can't remember. I'm about to search it, find out, see that there is a table."

"Dok Dak."

"What? Is that Morse Code?"

"No, it's the name of the restaurant. Free to take him further, eh?"

"Just a meal," I said.

"I'd warn you that Adam Magellan is uninterested in women, men, or animals. Women he's encountered have taken away his interest in women. Definitely not gay, unlike his mate Geoff Virgo. Here is something for you to investigate - some say there was a loveless relationship Adam did have, and she was a foreigner - already with a daughter. I'm such a gossip. Oh, so Ann and Labhaoise each had kids that are nine years old: is he the father?"

"I'm saying nothing but I owe you a thank you for telling me about Keith, and for being correct. He has been so unrevealing, but I decided what you'd said had to be true, and I got a result."

So we said our goodbyes, and the Dok Dak Indian restaurant in Titansea had a table.

I wondered: did Jenny and I really exploit and abuse Adam? Surely they were games, enjoyed on both sides. He did then go out with Jenny. Being in a 'cloud of unknowing' did have its advantages.

Restaurant (Friday 7th June)

Of course I was dressed in mufti, a long thin white dress with a no bra widening cleavage on display. An uncovered smooth left leg could be pushed into view up to the no knickers thigh. I was ultra-clean, despite being odourless even when sweating, evacuated and self-checked for cleanness. I should always look better than some, with no menopause to come: I had lean leg muscles, held an attractive female shape, and completely hairless below the head.

So we met in the डॉक डक Dok Dak Indian restaurant in Titansea. He was already in the waiting area as I parked nearby and walked in. Adam looked no different from when at work but he eyed me up and down and established a habit of talking to my chest. Good.

Each of us sat to table and agreed on a luxury seafood curry (advertised as part local region in catch) and the spice tray came first for dipping. In fact we ordered the lot at once, to include lobster, to finish with ice cream sundaes. Crab was in the mix, somewhere, as well.

In between dips I described my working and still studying days, with thoughts of priesting and then perhaps moving to a new place for future ministry if, hopefully, nearby.

"You surprise me," he said, "with all this. We lost touch, although I knew of your existence second hand."

"I had no idea you had gone to the police, or had come back to Serninsea. I never thought to enquire; nobody told me."

"Is Diana King still your friend?"

"Yes. Diana de Groot, now. She married, has kids."

"She never mentions me, for example?"

"Not until I did about seeing you."

"Oh. Heard from Jenny? I knew Jenny got religion, but not you as well. Does she mention me?"

"I haven't heard from her."

As the main meal was delivered I decided to get to the elephant in the room. "Of course I appreciate you coming to the house at Sutton. This is the thank you."

Adam said, on swallowing his first bites, "Perhaps this is also your apology. I don't like cock and bull reports. There's Shotley Gate in there for a bit of colour; it says I paid a visit to Dunwich, the lost mediaeval city. Peter's idea. I have a cloud web address for the report if you'd like to read it. You'll need the password. It is 'cherylmould', all one word.

I said, after I swallowed more, "So Keith admitted it all, and it was never about Yojana. So now he can have a relationship with Cheryl Mould with my blessing. We are quite civilised about it all."

He chomped away. "So will you not separate, divorce?"

My answer was delayed by chewing. I then said, "Yes. We will separate under the same building. Divorce must be as quick as possible. I expect him to go for good."

"You're very strong on this."

"Because he concealed it so well. What else might he be concealing?"

There was some silence. I was looking at the meal and getting the lobster part ready to start to eat. He was focusing on the tougher to eat food too.

I then said, "So I've now met our brief sixth form teacher, still with you. Ann Dromeghda. Who is she to you now?"

"As I indicated before, she is my sleeping partner in the business sense."

"I mean, why is she interested in you now?"

"She doesn't make any operational decisions."

"Don't you remember her emphasised cleavage at her desk and our view of her legs? It wasn't just for the boys, either, but for the girls."

"I was fascinated with her. She was eye-opening for me, and she still is great as a person. Labhaoise was the practical DIY one, and took all the woodwork and metalwork..."

"Design and Technology."

"... into doing up houses. We've remained close for so long. I was never going to report Ann if that's what worried them at the time. The law has tightened a lot, since. They knew the score, then. So they got into house renovation - buying, doing up, selling.

"She sold houses to a clergywoman," I suggested.

"She wasn't a clergywoman at the beginning of buying: Christine Vine. She's from a family of clergy."

"I've heard this name. She was in that bank robbery - as a customer. She was with another Jenny, Jenny World. New names to me. How is Ann's love life? How is yours?"

"Something you need to know, then. Jenny World was Jenny Masters. I saw the later television report. Two days later they had her name and her photo from the parish website."

"What? Really?"

"It certainly was Jenny. The first reports by the guy in the bank got the names mixed up. You don't watch Sea TV that much?"

"Hardly. Has Jenny married?"

"There is nothing on the parish website I found. She is a curate of a priest called Fatima Tamuuz in Hartlepool. Fatima has a five year old daughter, Akemi. Jenny is childless."

"Hartlepool of all places. SMS operates there. Is the parish website out of date?"

"No."

"A curate? I wonder if Keith knows of her there. If he does - and he needn't - it would be something else he's concealing."

"Hartlepool is a big place," Adam said. "He'd have told you if he knew."

The conversation was slowing down our eating, and taking away concentration from tackling the lobster. Still, we did engage with the food.

I asked, "Why is she a curate after all this time?"

"I don't know. I just read it off the page."

"Should we try and contact her?"

"Well, she hasn't contacted you and me."

"Why was she in Serninsea?"

His mouth was full. I waited.

"How do I know? Her parents are dead. Mother was ill and he was old enough to be her grandfather. Her uncle lives near enough. Perhaps she visits him."

"On the other hand, why Hartlepool? Eat, Adam."

With his mouth not yet empty he said, "She must have been here many times in nearly two decades."

"Yeah. I might ask Keith, but he is away in the arms of his Wife Number One and I'd rather not disturb him."

After some more eating I said, "Ann: she is local, really. Labhaoise was known as 'Labhaoise the Tease'. Someone knew she was called that before she moved to our school."

"Labhaoise's father was Greek and her mother is Irish. She understands Irish Gaelic very well."

"I met someone recently who could speak Scottish Gaelic with the Archbishop, but I don't think she was fluent. And with a Norfolk accent."

"I sometimes use her to translate into Irish Gaelic before I encrypt. That really buggers them up, those who think they can bust the encryption."

"You didn't do it for me."

"Can you read Irish Gaelic?"

"Some of the family are looking into Welsh."

Then he said, "My phone. A password! Linda, look at your phone."

"It's from Ann and Labhaoise. What is the password, Adam? It's not in Gaelic, is it?"

"No. Lower case 'hosea1114'."

When it was revealed, it said:

When Adam was a youth, I loved him;

Out of school, I owed him all.

I advise him,

I can never walk away from him.

To my Adam I sacrifice,

To his cause I burn energy.

It was I who took in Adam's love,

I took him into my thighs;

And you did not know

That I birthed from him.

With loving ties my Labhaoise,

With cords of love,

Gave birth from him.

We two raise our given two;

He stooped to us and fed us.

I said, "So they are yours."

"Yes. What do you know about Cheryl Mould?" Adam then asked.

"Nothing much. Keith met her six years ago"

"She was divorced then from Frank Little - after less than six years married."

"You're well informed!"

"She became Mould, again. Will you revert to Bode?"

"Dunno."

"You see, Cheryl paid me for a brief investigation into her husband ten years back - one of my first jobs. This is quite tasty. I had fish and chips with her."

"So did you charge her a lot ten years ago or offer her discount?"

"Why, do you want discount?"

"I'm paying extra. I will buy this meal, Adam."

"A minister of religion is bound to disapprove of that sort of discount."

"You can end that idea now," I said. "Anyway, so much around Cheryl was and is gossip. I disapprove of gossip," I said. "Well, Adam: the rumour about you is that you are sexless, uninterested, don't want it. Cheryl Mould doesn't quite fit the picture, does it?"

"Preaching one thing and doing another, Linda? You're the one now indulging in gossip. I have met women, but I do have a habit of meeting strange women - like you."

"Have you met your next door neighbour?"

"The one with the dog?"

"Yeah." I chuckled.

"Once or twice. He's her best buddy, she says."

"I bet she does."

"Why?"

"Oh, forget it Adam."

"Regarding gossip, Cheryl knew her nickname from school. Anyway, you and Jenny were once 'Bodey and Doyle' but then 'Bodey and Bendy' and then 'Boney and Bendy'."

"I'm not offended. Can you explain our nicknames?"

"Well, you still have these enormous knockers and yet you were and are quite thin. Jenny seemed to all to be your 'special friend' indeed."

"Bendy? Jenny? Like a lesbian?"

"Jenny in the gym. She was bendy: she could bend."

"I couldn't?"

"You'd fall over. Sorry. People stared at you and her, and you showed no interest in any of the lads. Geoff and I came to know different."

"I had issues of my own: I didn't want a relationship, but I did want to find things out."

"So why did you in the lower sixth form once get your breasts out in the common room?"

"Because it didn't matter? I was making a point."

"Yeah. Like they are now. Your headlights are definitely on, Linda. Don't get them out!" (I didn't.)

With more eating progress made, I said, "I thought the lads were all stupid: they will never understand me going about naked on the farm. I played Naked Twister at Saxiclite Naturist Club, so I did bend. Teenage life got so complicated there. I had issues."

"Actually, you in a leotard was like, well, why bother to put it on."

A male waiter was close. "Is madam and sir happy with the meal?"

I said, "Yes thanks. Be ready with the sundaes. What the girls saw, in the showers, was that I never wore knickers. Like now. Mother never bought them, I never wore them."

"But she had thighs."

"My mother?"

The waiter moved off and spoke to others.

"Jenny. I looked up at you, and down at her."

"She must know her place," I said, thinking of ancient television. "Adam, what did I care if you were looking at her arse and my large teenage breasts? You became intimate with both of us. I don't care now, either, for that matter."

"You're a clergywoman."

"And I am still a fucking naturist, Adam."

"Swearing with a dog collar? I know it's not on now."

"What do you remember about Keith, back then?"

"He actually got somewhere at school."

"You got A levels too..."

"Girls! Success with girls. I got nowhere."

"Jenny and me? Jenny?"

"Come on. When I came back from Nottingham I heard distantly that Keith had become happily married and was clergy-seeking with the same acquired pomposity as his parents. Never imagined he was with you. In any case I wanted to and did forget about you. You were so emotionless. Your family was known to be odd. Another reason perhaps you had no boyfriend."

"I'm a lifelong naturist. I was brought up that way. I would walk naked around town if I could."

"You nearly are."

"It wasn't easy, even on the farm. Dad, mum, brother, sisters. Not in the shop. Keith helped out in the shop. I often told him to get them off, and he did sometimes."

"By the way, a reminder of you was someone on your neighbouring farm. Yootha, she was called. Worked for Mr. Yannis Youell. You were somewhat racist."

"You know about this? How do you know about her? You are embarrassing me. She was Rumanian. She was called Agota before adopting Yootha and I did call her 'Goat'. I am not proud at all about this."

"A good reason to keep out of touch with you. I'd come back by then, from being in the police. 'Mouldy' was a cruel nickname as well. It was never about her personal hygiene, but when we were a lot younger she'd let us feel her up. She'd moulded our hands to herself, and a finger went in."

"Oh come on!" I said

"There was our sixth form Malham field trip weekend - Geoff and I did Geography - and we had the room next to her and her two mates. And when we were having a loud laugh she came round in her nightie, opened the door and told us to be quiet. Well, I mean, the way the light was through her, you could see the lot. A bit like you now, except you're behind a table."

"This is getting rather tiring, Adam."

"So I said, 'Come in and stay a few minutes,' putting my bed-side light on, and then she came in, and in the low light raised her nightie up above her breasts for the whole torso knickerless view. She came over to my bed side, and I put my hand to her pubes, and again moulded my hand to her pubes. Geoff did too but made nothing of it. Then she told us to 'fuck off' and dropped her nightie before walking straight out."

"So did you quieten down?"

"I was heated up."

"So your sex after fish and chips was in that tradition..."

"She'd put on some curves in the years since first gropes."

"So Malham was a dirty Geography field trip weekend."

"On the walk the next day she approached me in a corner of Gordale Scar..."

"Oh, there is more... Waiter, it looks like we're nearly done here on our plates."

"Gordale Scar and she grabbed me right on the, well, bone, let's say, and told me to remember the field trip. And I thought, there might be more going to happen."

"Oh," I said. "And did you make more noise next night?"

"Actually, nothing else happened. You and Jenny came along later with your proposition. But there was that notorious party at the end of sixth form. The End Party. That was a peculiar encounter."

I said, "Yes, my first ever bodily encounter with Keith. He'd left school but was still friends with those of us in younger years like Mouldy and he came to the party. Ah, it's all making sense."

"Yeah. Well, Cheryl again. It was out in the garden in the dark and some chap was pissing into the hedge. I came alongside her, said hello, and she pointed at him and grabbed me again in the area. I was too reserved to do something immediately back..."

"Good boy."

"But she grabbed my hand anyway and it was placed on obviously damp knickers and then redirected underneath to feel scratchy hair. She moved closer in to me as the ex-pisser went by and then she said, 'I'm desperate,' which meant not desperate for me but to go behind this bush. I followed despite her shaking her head, and she then, 'Oh sod it,' and squatted with her knickers pulled to the side. She was pissing like gallons. I was motionless but then looked up and stared at the orange sky - you know, those streetlights. Am I shocking you telling you this tale?"

"You were a good boy."

"Obviously not. Then she got up, gave a kiss to my cheek and went indoors. That did me for years, the action and sound of her squatting and pissing. She pissed furiously after our fish and chips sex."

"Lovely Cheryl Mould," I said. And then I thought of what my husband had said: '...a woman I went with that he then got pregnant.' "I have to ask you, Adam. Rumours of you and a foreign woman, and a woman who became pregnant?"

"Who says?"

"Keith."

Sundaes were arriving, brought by male waiters.

"Hmm. I think there might be an investigation there," he said. "I did not become a father - then. Gossip strikes where it will. Once again, Linda."

"You did with Ann and Labhaoise."

"We arranged it and it was very loving, for their future. I'm only the father in the biological sense.

"Hmm. The woman in the rumour was linked with my husband."

Adam said, "He shagged Jenny! I knew that. Jenny's free-running attitude to sex was then hit by fundamentalism. She'd met fundies at Serninsea, first of all, and they chipped away, but then a similar lot turned her at university. She vanished completely from my life."

I said, "Jenny and I started with friendly sleep-overs. Jenny saw my naked family, dad peeing into the compost, so she undressed, and then she and I started dabbling and discovering. So, as it came about, we extended our self discovery to you and your mate, Geoff, who ran off after one session. The rest between us three we can surely remember. Yes, indeed, we're having coffee after these. Thank you."

There were about four male waiters close by, hovering, with coffee being poured.

Adam said, "I had to keep secret the truth of Boney with Bendy."

"Jenny and I told each other that we were ending our virginities, both of us, with you.

Adam said to a nearby waiter, "Excuse me! Can we have the bill please?"

"I'm paying. This has been my treat. Jenny was worried if you'd come inside her. I knew then that you could in me. Do you remember? You always ejaculated outside her but after two sessions you did inside me. The very last session was the full foreplay, play, and after-play. We finished with that foolish little cut on our hands and smeared the blood on our arms, and we did that dedication ceremony. Thus we were to wait no longer than ten years before coming together again. The bill is for me, please."

"Can I see the bill?" Adam asked.

"No. Give it to me, please. Thank you."

"Halves?"

"No. I will pay for it all."

"On expenses?"

"No."

"Good job we didn't buy any wine," he said.

"Don't like it," I responded, "and I drink the crap we distribute in the Eucharists."

"I do drink, but not a lot. Mr. Wickenby: he does drink. Jenny drank, following on from her parents' habit. They died within a year of each other, both from alcohol related diseases. Colin Cromer did both funerals."

I said, "I think we have finished here. Time to leave these premises." We got up and went to the counter, and, using my phone, I paid the chap who had waited on us the most. I said, as I took the receipt, "You came inside her then when together?"

"She was on the pill by this time," Adam told me.

I took out a ten pound note and gave it to the waiter. "Share it."

"Thank you very much, madam, and for the extras."

Outside I said to Adam, "I've somewhere I want us to go. Is your car all right where it is?"

"Yes," he said. "But I'd like it to come home with me."

"I'll bring you back here," I instructed.

"Jenny. You know, she wrote me a weird letter from university. All about sin according to some Grapes church or something."

"Vineyard, not Grapes," I informed him. "Come on."

In the car Adam told me that after Jenny, he joined the police, and later did try the more plain clothes and investigative. But he had some ill health and didn't like the command structure. There was a string of redundancies coming, so he went private.

"Ann had property and I came back. I thought people are always searching for ex-directory numbers and want reports on what people are doing. George had it all to himself but there was room for some competition. Ann helped, and keeps helping."

"She paid you for your sperm."

"Absolutely not! This was my gift. Her financial help was irrelevant."

"Sorry. You can't arrest any one now."

"I have a good relationship with the police, but they have the resources - forensics is their overtaking lane. And I do get paid to go in and look over a case as a different pair of eyes, or sift through documents. Being ex-police I know the procedures. George might have SMS, but I have the police, government departments and the council. Otherwise I watch, look at financial records and compare documents. Typically, I look for unusual patterns and tell-tale signs."

"We've arrived," I told him, switching off the engine.

"Yes, I could have driven here."

"Well, you're with me. I'll take you back later. Don't panic."

Narrator: Linda Sex in the Curate's House (Friday 7th June 2019)

We got out of my car.

Adam Magellan asked, "Why did you want me to experience your driving?"

"Because I only want my car outside. Nosy neighbours. 'What is the curate doing?' That sort of thing."

"You want me to come in again, for a better chat this time? We've chatted well tonight."

"Come straight into this front room on the right and wait please."

"I confronted your husband here."

I needed the loo and went upstairs into the bathroom and I started to run a bath. I had a piss. I kept my dress on and closed the curtains in our main bedroom facing the street. Back in the bathroom I found a pair of scissors in the bathroom cupboard and lined up some bath gel and a sponge. When the water was about half way up, I checked it wasn't too hot.

Coming out of the door, I called out, "Adam! Come up the stairs."

He came to the staircase, and approached me at the top as I concealed the scissors.

"Please go in there."

He went in the bathroom. I put off the light off the downstairs hall at the double switch, as was my habit, and then went in behind him, and shut the door, for me to lean against the door.

"Take your clothes off and stand up in the bath. I have tested it with my elbow."

"Thanks but I think I will be going. Excuse me please."

"No. Take your clothes off, Adam, and stand in the bath."

"You can't stand in my way."

"You can claim wrongful imprisonment at the police station later. Take your clothes off and get in the bath."

"And if I don't?"

"I will cut your clothes off myself," I said, revealing the scissors with a smile. "Don't force things Adam, because these blades are very sharp."

"Are you serious?"

"Deadly. Snip-snip."

He looked at me, and then started to undress, giving items to me, so I threw them on to a seat under the far window.

As he paused at his underpants I said, "Take them down, yes. Come on." Handing them to me, I inspected them and said, "Oh Adam, what if you had an accident and the paramedics had to cut these off you?"

"Or if a woman you didn't know for a long time suddenly got to see them."

I left him and took his underpants and trousers with me, to prevent an escape. I took a scrubbing brush in the kitchen and scrubbed his underpants with water and spray cleaner.

"What are you doing?"

"Being a scrubber," I replied. They went in the washing machine and I returned holding his trousers, thrown back on the far pile.

"Get in and stand up to begin!"

I picked up the washing gel and sponge and got them ready. Focussing close, I now attacked the upper front of his body.

"This is like what you and Jenny did," he said.

"Arms up."

They got the treatment, and then I did his legs.

"Turn around, Adam."

I scrubbed his back and then directly went below his bottom, down his legs.

"I'm going to have to get to where it matters. Bend forward."

"No."

"Bend forward and spread your cheeks."

"I'm not some teenager facing two developing girls."

"If you don't bend over I'll take the shower hose off and stick it where the sun doesn't shine."

Adam then bent forward and separated his bottom cheeks.

I picked up a small bathroom scrubbing brush and got it wet with gel on it. I went into his bum crack.

"Oy that hurts. You bastard, Linda Bode."

"I'm still Jupitas, unfortunately."

He said, "You haven't changed a bit."

I shook the brush in the bathwater several times as I scraped its bristles into his bottom.

"Adam, turn around. A little excitement, I detect."

At this point I picked hold of his growing penis to wash it. Then, for a surprise and to assert command, I gripped it hard.

"I'll rinse you down."

First I did the front, then the back, then held his penis from around his body.

"Would you like to wash me?"

"No."

"Good job I'm clean, including my arse. Get out and I will dry you." And so he did, and I did, from a position blocking the door. He turned so I could do it all.

I grabbed his penis to lead him into my bedroom.

"Ah ah, Adam. Let's get you stood this side of the telly and you can watch me on the bed."

As I sat on to the bed, he bolted out of the door and ran into the bathroom. He grabbed his clothes and found me already at the top of the stairs.

I said, "Put the clothes back where they were." Pausing for a second, he obeyed. "Go back in he bedroom, Adam, where you were."

He said, standing between the end of the bed and the wall, "What is the matter with you? I'm grown up. I'm forty."

"If you don't shut up... Lean against the wall and watch me."

This time he obeyed, which is what I wanted to see.

I sat on the bed at an angle with legs open, rather as he once saw me all those years ago. I started playing with myself. "You play with yourself. Show me."

At this point, the doorbell rang. An outside light shone, including on to the curtains.

"What's that?" he asked.

I said, "Oh fuck. Stay there. Who is it at this time?"

I picked up a remote from the left side cupboard to put the TV on; I selected a channel, and he sat on the bed so both of us saw who was at the front door.

"It's a fucking parishioner," I said.

"That's Miss Venus the one-time sexy dinner lady. So are you going down to answer the door?" he asked.

"She knows I don't answer the door after nine o'clock unless there's a meeting on. Mrs. Helen Eris, the retired dinner lady. Nowadays she does stalls - sells rubbish for pennies."

"Do you want the light off up here?"

"No! You stay there. Let her go away." I pressed the standby switch on the remote and put it down on that bedside cupboard. "Resume watching me."

"How do you shave it so smooth? I mean, twenty years later I can't shave my face so smooth."

"Adam, I am coming over to you. Face the wall. Face the wall! Good. Back a bit and bend over."

"Not again."

"Sorry, Adam, I'm going in to get that stiff. One finger."

I pushed his back down and his bottom came out, his hands slapping the wall for balance and support. I licked my finger, and pushed it in deep to the knuckle and twisted back and forth.

"Bloody hell!" he said.

"It always works." My finger came out in one swift move. "Turn around and stand up."

He raised himself up, and I dropped down. In case he had second thoughts I gripped his testicles.

I asked, "Do you remember all the positions I did?"

I did various 'imposter vagina' and similar hand grips, one hand clapping, and then the 'batter up' to my own pirouette, and of course I had to do Church and Steeple as the roof of my outstretched fingers moved to the side and his penis emerged - to go into my mouth.

In fact he kept going into my mouth this time.

I removed the length and said, "I couldn't do that when a teenager. There are two ways to go deep into me now, thanks to Keith: one is down my mouth, and one is up my arse."

Back in he went, and I created a moving throat rhythm under my control, unlike with Jonathan Eyre.

I finished this and got on to the bed, to raise my buttocks high.

"In," I said. "Arsehole."

No," he said.

So I got up and slapped him fairly gently across the face. In case he ran, I was close to him - face to face. "You do as I say. It is ready for you. Unlike you, I made it ready."

"No!"

I squeezed his testicles, and looked directly into his eyes. Getting underneath him, I started sucking him off to keep him hard. I warned him by showing him my moving outstretched finger. That meant do it or it's back up his backside.

So this time after dragging him, I raised my buttocks and in it went easier than expected, and his whole length too.

"See, it's not too bad at all. Start fucking."

"You're appalling."

"I know."

"Ugh," he said, as he ejaculated deep inside me.

"Let your mouth go south," I said, poetically.

"To Harwich?" he asked.

"Fuck off. Lick me and insert one finger precisely."

"My, you're soft as velvet and tight as a drum."

"I rhymed and you scanned. Hold on."

I turned to lie on my back.

"I'd like to open you and look. I never did look at you like I did at Jenny."

"Stop being a gynaecologist and bring me off. Do your tongue like an ampersand. Try some of the SHIFT plus characters below the functions on top of a keyboard."

"Tell me, Linda. Is the pound better than the euro?"

"The € is Control plus Alt plus 4, Adam."

My breathing was getting stronger and I did give some small yelps. Adam did vary his tongue's speed, and soon I let out a long preparatory whine with my body raised up, tense, and increasingly sweaty; and then came the highlight of an uncontrolled spasm right up my body and through my head. Wow.

I put my hands towards him to indicate laying off, and he indeed stopped and released his finger end.

"Well done!" I said, as soon as I could.

So he came upwards, and he lay alongside me, indicating that his knees were aching somewhat. "That was a lot less clumsy than twenty-two years ago," I reported.

He ran his hand across my breasts.

"Not as long nipples as Jenny's," he said. "Small too, around."

"Time to go to the Blackpool Tower," I stated.

We repositioned so that I went on top of him. "All this pudding you've acquired - you've sat behind a desk too much."

"I do get out," he said, as my vagina accommodated him as much as it could. "Condom?" he asked, a little late.

"Not necessary. I get regular check-ups and you can't make me pregnant. By the way, who's Annie? You mentioned an Annie a while back."

"Online."

"Oh, I see. So when did you last fuck a woman?"

"Quite a while back. I was married, sort of. It was consummated. 2013."
"When did you fuck Cheryl?"
"2009 and early 2013 with her divorce done. This feels surprisingly good."
"Adam. The children you did have. Did you three use the clinic in Serninsea?"
"Mind your own business."
"You will answer me." (I demonstrated I could squeeze my drum of a vagina.)
"It was a gift, like I told you."
"Adam. If you and I are going to get it together, as I'd like, I need to know."
"Really? Is that what you want? I was rather expecting this was a one-off."
"I want another man."
"I'll ask them first. Surely you agree to me asking permission."
"Sure."

I reduced my grip and intensified the rhythm, and tickled his balls, and he raised his hands to feel my breasts, and thus a second time he spurted inside me. As I raised myself up it nearly all ran out of my left side.

I came off the bed, and bent down to kiss him on the mouth.

I said, "Get up Adam and you can go home. Leave your underpants off."

I sat on the bed, still naked, contemplating. He went in the bathroom and had a very audible pee. As the toilet flushed I went in to see him dressing. Naked, I put the seat down and had a pee myself. I then applied some toilet paper, including a second set of sheets up my left leg. I flushed the loo, got the dress back on and followed him down the stairs and handed him his cleaned underpants.

The journey was silent. Arriving near to his own car, I turned, kissed him on the cheek and said, "I'll see you again."

"Maybe. Good night, reverend."

"My very own private dick," I joked at him.

He got out and closed the passenger door without further comment. I drove back to my house with some aggression in my driving.

Morning Call from the Bishop (Saturday 8th June)

The morning after my encounter with Adam, the telephone rang, and I said aloud, "What the fuck was, is, what day, what time is...?" With the receiver up I said, "Hello?"

"Bishop John here, ringing unfortunately bright and early. I'm not disturbing your breakfast am I?"

"Bishop John. It's Saturday."

"I know. How is Keith?"

"Keith is just fine. He is in Harwich, part of his management job that also takes him there. Back tomorrow. It's my day off."

"Tell me about your sacrificial understanding of ministry."

"I must... I put myself out for others."

"On the model of Jesus, yes?"

"Yes," I said. Receiver in one hand, I was now hair brushing with the other.

"So how do you make a judgement about whether to answer the door to someone?"

"Really? Whether it is, er, oh, safe to do so, if late at night."

"But if you knew the person at the door, you would answer it."

"Has she complained? Mrs. Eris knows I've said - what we've all said - about respecting our private lives."

"Yes, but you put your entertainment of a friend above the potential needs of the parish."

"What? What friend? If she'd have needed me then she could also have rung via the telephone. Now I really must..."

"No, she wanted your advice on a letter being sent with a CV for her son and it had to be in the post this morning. She did ring on your door but thought you might not want to be disturbed, as you had a friend present."

"Do people still send CVs in the post? What friend?"

"I think they do, with hand-written letters. I have no more to say on the subject, but I will ask your training vicar to offer you some advice on the balance of these sort of things. Just letting you know. You knew who she was; you should have answered the door."

"Oh, yes, this could be useful, Bishop John, your 'some advice'," I said with a touch of sharpness of speech, vigorously brushing my hair.

"Indeed and I do wish Keith was more active again in the Church, supporting his wife."

"These are his decisions," I said. "Anyway, thank you for ringing..."

"There is something else. Despite the short notice I want as many people as possible to go and hear an exciting Canadian theologian who is calling at Wytham on her journey down from Scotland. Well, our Bishop, Derek Imperial, is very pleased to have secured her visit to lecture us on Reinvigorating the Church at the Cathedral, one of the series of lectures in which the Bishop himself will teach. Unfortunately we couldn't quite get her for Lent. I'd love her to see some real parish life as well. So I'm hoping someone - perhaps yourself, but maybe someone more local in Wytham - can show her something, well, local. Pity we are so far east when she is pausing overnight and heading for London and returning to Canada. I don't know how much is possible, really."

"You didn't say who."

"She is the fiery redhead Gretta Cox-Jenkins."

"I think I've heard of her. Wasn't she some independent and became Anglican?"

"No, not Anglican. She might be described as a high Lutheran these days, in Canada. Yes, she was ordained independently, as a bishop too, but she's a Lutheran priest now, as the Lutherans don't recognise ecclesiastical independence and she did compromise when they ordained her priest. She retains her academic post. Lots on Queer Theology, Urban Theology and also Church Management, much of it semi-sociological. Contextual, of course. But this is apparently urban theology applied to the Church institution. So there are echoes of the conference where you met the Bishop of Margate."

"And the Archbishop and others."

"Of course."

"Interesting, bishop. I'll hear that lecture."

"I don't want to compromise your day off. Goodbye and God bless."

"God bless you bishop," I said. And once the phone was disconnected I said further, "What a creep and what a cow - reporting me over a bloody covering letter for her son!"

Anyway, I placed my hairbrush down and headed out of bed.

Later over breakfast, in fact, a call came on a Saturday from the Reverend Kenneth Osis, my appointed counsellor.

"Can we have a chat soon?" he asked "Long needed."

"Is there any reason for this?" I asked back. "It is Saturday today."

"Not today. It is your day off. There might be difficulties with parish life and possible underlying matters affecting them."

I agreed to this, for Tuesday, but the bishop must have been on to him and Osis would be fishing for information.

As a result of all this I rang Helen Eris using a very pleasant voice and she said that her son had sent the CV off by email and that she was sure it would be all right, although she didn't know about these things. "He told me he'd scanned the handwritten letter."

I asked her, "Were you upset that I didn't answer the door? I was very tired."

"No, curate, it's only that when I mentioned my concern about David looking for a job that the vicar said I should contact you, as maybe your husband might have looked at it. Oh, the vicar was having a meeting with Bishop John."

"Right. So you came around here."

"A little later the vicar rang me and he suggested I called in person, for you to look at the document. So I did. That's all. You only live around the corner."

"Yes of course. I was lying in bed."

"I understand that, Reverend Jupitas. I just went home. David sorted everything out."

"Did I upset you by not answering?"

"No. You are, after all, just around the corner, Reverend Ju..."

"Call me Linda. Nice to talk to you, Helen. I was talking to a chap who remembered you from school dinner times..."

"Yes, Reverend Linda. I especially remember your husband."

So, she wasn't going to call; they got her to call. She accepted the point, if passively, that I was simply tired.

I was thinking over Adam's experience of females, and realised I hadn't really examined him regarding the foreigner. The foreign women I knew was Yootha, or Agota, but she was ten years or so younger than us. He must have known her. She wasn't here alone: she had a mother. There was also, still, the oddity of the pregnancy before fathering one each with Ann and Labhaoise.

Diana suggested that I go shopping with her. I said yes, and would also buy groceries as Keith would be back during Sunday.

In her car I said, "No, Diana, I cannot tell you anything. You know this."

And, after some more probing, I had to say, "Diana, you should stop trying."

Plus, later, after the actual shopping, I said, "Good attempt, Diana, but I am not biting."

As a result of this probing, she came back into my curate's house. We stripped off naked. I told of the restaurant with Adam, but her continued focus on Patricia and Arthur meant she missed out on asking if there was any more to Adam and me.

Sat down together, I showed her some of my pelvic exercises. "It is all having an effect. I am getting more regular, disciplined. There are moments going backwards, but I keep up the exercises."

Diana found my game of Coppit, where we each controlled three colours. I bought the board game when at Bishop Querceto Theological College for any kids in a congregation, but I saw so few and there were none now. Diana showed me that by flooding some of my men by so many of hers, that she could pick me off one by one. She won easily. The lesson was not to get lost in a hostile crowd.

After Diana had gone, I sent a simply encrypted message for Ann Dromeghda, with the password 'deut3268918 sent to Adam. Before encryption, the message read:

*Was he not your lover who protected you,
Who forgave and established you?
For Adam's portion made your child born,
Labhaoise's her allotted child as well.
You found him in a seaside school,
And in a business start - a new enterprise...
You must be mindful of the rock that begat them,
To not let go of he who changed your life.*

Narrator: Keith Telephone Calls Puzzle Cheryl (Sunday 9th June)

"Good morning, Mon Cheryl," I said to my future wife, as we intended, in the morning.

Yes, here we were on a third morning, and with Linda's blessing. I turned myself and rose up to look down on Cheryl, who returned her gaze quite satisfied at the situation. I'd be going home to Linda, but 'home' would hopefully change within weeks or months.

This was our valuable time. I told Cheryl that I believed in providence. She asked what that meant. It's a sort of good coming to good people under the protection of God. Yes, I said, we were good people. And yes, I did still have religious beliefs. Surely she should expect this, after all I was brought up with a certain culture of churchgoing and belief, and I did not neglect this despite my disappointment at not being selected for ordination training. She said she always knew that I was brainy and thinking about things.

I told her, "Julie Vaughan said there was a young man snooping about when I was last here, before the inspections. Do you believe her?"

Cheryl wondered why she would say otherwise.

I responded that if the young person is the person I think she saw, then he was supposed to be a trainee magician. "But I didn't detect anyone," I said.

"You wouldn't," said Cheryl. "Do you believe in magic?"

I said religion and magic are different. I told her that I said the Creeds with due diligence through my upbringing and student life, so she asked me what are creeds. I realised that I had little in the way of a hook to even begin this conversation. She really had no idea about religion. She was the perfect secular person. All that mattered to her - and it suited me - was that she was a bit fuzzy from orgasms, as midday arrived, when we got up. We ate in a leisurely fashion. The plan was to go shopping before I went home. We would look for a new bed. Cheryl's bed was, to be frank, a bit basic, and I liked a good bed. Ours in Serninsea was super-wide, and long. It cost us plenty, and it was comfortable. The bed was our most important piece of furniture, because it was where we rested and made love.

However, just before we were due to go, her landline telephone rang, and Cheryl, who seemed to want to know all my business, picked it up and answered it. It was Bishop Elizabeth Huett, Bishop of Tees, and assumed I would answer. So I took the phone from Cheryl.

I said I was in Harwich, yes. I said Cheryl is my partner to come. There were two items of news. One was that Yojana was doing very well with her and indeed could come on to the phone. Yojana was immediately making contacts to set up SMS branches, in Casnewydd (or Newport in old money) and soon in Aberdaugleddau (Milford Haven), and Liz had been impressed, so that two Welsh Anglican bishops would come on to the Confraternity.

Secondly, she had heard from Bishop Terry. Linda had gone to a restaurant dressed in the most revealing translucent white dress she might ever wear. (I did not reply although I knew it. It is translucence is set against the fact that there is little dark and light in Linda's skin.)

She was followed by George Wickenby. After a meal with 'Andrew' Magellan, she took him to her curate's house in her car. I corrected her to 'Adam'. The bishop, via Linda's training vicar, had an opportunity to get a person living close by to ring her doorbell, and Linda refused to answer. The bishop had already been on to it yesterday, as if the parishioner had complained.

I said, "I hope this person had actually complained then."

Liz said that Linda would be too embarrassed to check.

"Who was it?"

"Someone called Helen Eris."

"I lost my virginity to her."

Anyway, the bishop had told Colin Cromer that the woman was upset, so Colin might address Linda too, because Colin would take the parishioner's side.

"Then she'd better be upset," I said.

Later on, Linda drove Adam - she had it right after my correction - back to his car. She seemed to drive quickly back home.

The call ended. Cheryl asked me, "Who did you lose your virginity to?" (Linda would never have asked me this in that word-order.)

"At school. She was a dinner lady. She taught me a few things."

"Why is a bishop ringing you, and you telling her that?"

"Yes, it might have been embarrassing. It was the first thing that came into my head. The parishioner had rung the doorbell late and Linda did not answer."

"A bishop rings you to tell you your wife was with a bloke?"

"She happens to be a bishop. But yes. Which is good news for us. Until now, Linda has been faithful."

"I overheard his name. I had sex with him myself. About the same time - just before - I first had sex with you."

"Small world in these coastal towns," I said to her.

"Doesn't it worry you? I could have gone with him, not you. And he got married."

"Well, you didn't. So I will to you, years later."

"Anyway, he didn't have your confidence in the bedroom department."

The obvious question in my mind was why Linda had driven him, to take him back. Presumably his car was reliable. I might have to raise this later. Did Linda know that she was being followed and it might look as if she was alone, at least in transit? There is this trainee magician he employs, and he might have advised on how to move people about relatively unseen. There is a driveway at home and possibly she could have shielded Adam around the back for the back door into the kitchen. Alternatively, Linda might have done this to restrict Adam's movements - he can't leave to his own car - in case he tried to leave. Sutton is more than a long walk from Titansea, after all, and not much less far to Magellan's office and residence.

After fifteen minutes the phone went again, and Cheryl handed it to me again. "Your colleague."

Yojana came on. She said she was having a really good time. Yojana thought she was first going to Hartlepool but went to Middlesbrough instead. Elizabeth was wonderful, all to herself. She wasn't sure at first, but she had discovered things about herself she could not discover with me. She said she was envious of Fatima, regularly visited by Liz.

So, this call over, Cheryl had some basic questions for me. Why was I being contacted by some bishop called Elizabeth? Then, why was Yojana also contacting via her house phone number?

"Because it is out in the open now. I am with you."

"What did she discover about herself she could not discover with you?"

"Because of her tour around South Wales, looking for potential SMS sites, and Elizabeth Huett is a friend. Liz is the Bishop of Tees. Yojana went to Middlesbrough, for the first night, where Liz is based."

"What, like a 'special friend'?"

"Well," I said. "I don't know for sure. Not really."

"Who is Fatima?"

"The bishop knows her, a priest in Hartlepool."

"Is Fatima this bishop's 'special friend'?"

"She might be. I can see that being possible."

"I never thought Yojana is a lezzy."

"It's an interesting development. Yojana went to Middlesbrough and Fatima ministers in Hartlepool." (I thought it was useful that Yojana had not gone to Hartlepool!)

"Yojana Asthana is a Hindu. You told me that. That's not the same as a bishop."

"I know," I said. "It's suddenly revealing."

"What is?"

"Yojana, if she has a secret life."

"How far is Middlesbrough from Hartlepool?"

"They're not next door. Someone in SMS once said something like fifteen miles?"

"How does someone like Yojana Asthana in Serninsea or visiting SMS Hartlepool know a bishop in Middlesbrough?"

"I will have to ask her. I think you're right: it must connect via Hartlepool somehow."

Thus ended Cheryl's enquiries, as the focus turned to the bed, especially going around one store in Harwich. The store could get what we needed, and there was a king size version of what we wanted (or, strictly speaking, what I wanted).

Cheryl said, as we went back to her place, "If I give birth at home, it will be in our new bed."

Chapter 09 Linda Attempts to Turn the Tables

Narrator: Linda Pentecost: Goose (Sunday 9th June)

So my sermon at Pentecost was about the goose. There were no references to badges worn. I'd found and borrowed from a dealer a painting of a goose in flight, with geese in formation in the background. This was placed in front of the pulpit, which I then climbed up to give the customary sermon prayer introduction and pause before beginning.

It was then that I noticed Keith on the back row, back from Harwich. Interesting.

"We've all heard about going on a 'wild goose chase,' but have you ever thought that this might be the goose doing the chasing? Because this is what is implied by the goose as a symbol of the Holy Spirit. You know about geese. They fly in formation, and they're noisy. See the picture.

"We know all about the dove as a symbol of the Holy Spirit and peace, but for providence and vigilance the goose is another such symbol.

"The goose warns by its loud noise, and it can give you an unpredictable bite. Celtic Christians knew this. That's the point about the Holy Spirit: it is not always predictable and can seem to have bite. My husband once or twice pinched my bottom and moved away: he had goosed me! I doubt that the Holy Spirit was involved then, but you never know."

There was the odd chuckle: my husband was one of those who smiled.

"Wild geese are like the untamed, uncontrollable spirit of God. Christianity has always included the unexpected, and we've seen movements break away from official groups; theologians explore new ideas and return to old ideas, and inspiring saints like St. Francis - whose received instruction to build a church mean the people not a building. The goose symbolises such breaking out: spirit-filled people showing that the gospel cannot be contained and controlled.

"But there is more. The goose can sniff people out. Really, it smells our odour very well, and therefore symbolises knowing good and bad reputations.

"Why mention this? Well, Serninsea's name relates to Saint Sernin, the saint of this our church, who was killed by being dragged down the main street by a bull after he refused to worship Pagan gods. St. Sernin or Saturnin was the first Bishop of Toulouse around 250 CE and the basilica is also on the pilgrimage route to Santiago de Compostela - you know, the one with the shell. 'You can be sure of Shell'. We have an apparent connection to Toulouse, lost in unrecorded history but in a myth of a traveller. Simon de Montfort, known in the East Midlands, beseiged Toulouse in 1218, and a rock was thrown from the roof of Saint-Sernin basilica and killed him.

"Maybe it is the geese, common to here and to Toulouse, that really makes the connection. In fact Toulouse has one breed in two types of domesticated goose. The breed was first brought to England and Liverpool in 1840 by Lord Derby, and then used as breeding stock to produce a big bird. We have some of these locally, good for meat and down feathers. Unfortunately, some Toulouse Geese are forced to produce fatty livers for foie gras, but not geese here.

"Toulouse Geese contrast with wild geese because they don't like to be startled or rushed, and also they don't like a lot of rainfall. They are rather trusting. More standard, aggressive breeds can upset the rather gentle Toulouse Goose. Some humans in Serninsea are like this: cannot be startled or rushed, are trusting, and easily upset by bullies. And we stay in when it rains. In this part of the world, however, we have many more of the wilder kind of geese. So many people move into Serninsea, looking for somewhere to live. All geese, looking for somewhere, like our ponds, our grass and sand.

"St. Isidore of Seville wrote about the goose. He knew of the story that when the Gauls, attacking Rome stealthily, approached a temple dedicated to Juno, a sacred flock of geese woke up and alerted the Roman guards. The Roman army turned back the invaders and the geese had saved Rome. We might regard this as a bit of interfaith, these days: the goose is not an exclusive Christian symbol but, possibly, St. Sernin might have told them to shut up - who knows.

"The other useful feature of the goose is that it sticks with others. It is a collective bird. It's all about the flock. So, as a symbol of the Holy Spirit, it is the symbol of community, where the lead role is shared, as the bird at the head of the V formation settles further back in after it has done its stint, and where other birds attend to the misfortune of the individual, for example when a bird is injured. So, the V formation is advantageous for flying efficiency, and thus involves a group direction, and the collective sense is also about looking after the weaker individual. The goose honks to encourage the others along, all together.

"So next time you think of the Holy Spirit coming to the group, think of the goose. Our wild geese remind us here, and in Toulouse, about our mission. Although I would not say that a company of people being worshipful are being goosed... by the Holy Spirit. I'm sorry, I could not resist that."

It was a short sermon, but sometimes short ones are the best. Colin Cromer indicated his satisfaction, other than the "appalling joke" that had spoiled it. I had a sense that a short report would go to the bishop. I felt that the sermon was flat: I wanted to mention locals wearing badges, rather than staying out of the rain, but if a trivial matter (I felt) I'd given way and gave no clues.

It turned out that, as the least theological of my sermons, and the least intellectual, it was the most appreciated by the congregation, including the final joke, so said Mohammad McArden, and this made me feel a little frustrated. I had plugged a gap in my knowledge, however.

Linnaeus Hook, one of the congregation, said, on leaving, "If you go south of the River Thames, there is a garden where people still hang ribbons and messages all in recognition of the ladies of the night buried there: they were called 'Winchester Geese', curate."

"I've heard about them," I said. "Just the basic details."

"The burial site was not consecrated, but now folk hold a ceremony at the garden they resurrected there every month."

So in the course of shaking hands with the congregation, I shook hands with Keith. He did not mention Cheryl.

Colin came over. "Keith. Quite a surprise; you're very welcome."

However, Colin wanted to mention a Pastoral Letter from the Suffragan Bishop of Scredington, Julian Worsley. Keith said he would wait. So we went into the vestry and Colin showed it to me, adding that because my husband was present he would not talk to me about a matter that perhaps he should; he also wanted to be positive with me after the sermon.

Dear colleagues,

RE: A Pastoral Letter for clergy and licensed lay members of the Diocese of Wytham

Authored by Bishop Julian of Scredington with the full approval of Bishop John of Bolingbroke. The speech was also seen in advance by the diocesan bishop, Bishop Derek.

Those of you who attended the closed study day yesterday will know that I tried to address pastorally the issues relating to the ongoing management efficiency difficulties of the Diocese of Wytham. Please see below a summary of the speech delivered by me, Bishop Julian.

Over the months the two suffragan bishops, myself of Scredington and Bishop John of Bolingbroke, have received a large number of emails and letters and have had personal conversations regarding the ongoing investigation into the management of Wytham diocese. Bishop Derek Imperial has received emails and letters directly. A large percentage of these have raised concerns about Bishop Derek's office in terms of administrative competence and efficiency, as part of his responsibilities as the diocesan.

There has also been a good deal of rather uninformed chatter on social and other media. Whilst the comments raise legitimate concerns, including the debt level and reducing income, we feel that undue focus has fallen upon Bishop Derek for something that has long been structural. Bishop Derek is, of course, committed to Operational Guidelines and our Diocesan Vision.

My colleague John Bolingbroke and I assert that he expresses his charisma and learning with inspiring gifts and skills that are far more than we can expect. He promotes ongoing reform. Some even complain about reform itself.

Over the past weeks we as suffragan bishops have been in deep prayer - including together - asking God's wisdom as to how we can listen to the comments within the diocese, and find a way forward. We do not diminish or underestimate the importance of the issues facing all of us. Prayer assures that, through God's grace, ways forward will emerge. We must trust that God is journeying with us and has been involved in our dilemmas and disappointments. We may not know where the journey will lead us structurally but we must trust and have confidence in God. We can only move forward in relationship with each other and under God. This follows on from Bishop Derek's time in Lent in retreat.

Bishop Derek has been criticised for not making any public statement over the weeks and since as the Church Commission Report has loomed towards publication. This is a Church, and we really must allow our mothers and fathers in God to have space in prayer that does not involve public communication. After his retreat, the Bishop did join us in his full duties of announcing to us the resurrection of Jesus Christ Our Lord in the many services and events that are our central exclamation, and he has continued his work since.

The full report is called The Special Church Commission Report into the Administration of the Diocese of Wytham. We understand that it has been delayed for legal reference and final editing. In such anticipation the Bishop feels it is still inappropriate to comment despite the temptation to respond to social media and other correspondence. We suffragans agree with him, and support him. We ask that all in the diocese pray for each other and Bishop Derek; and that whatever concerns or issues people may have we continue to pray together as a diocese that God's will is done. Bishop Derek has nevertheless asked me to thank you for the prayers that he knows so many people in our diocese, across all our traditions, have been offering as he faces a tense and difficult time waiting for the findings. We know that these will be challenging and call for significant changes.

We suffragans are happy meet with individuals and groups across the diocese to discuss issues of concern. We are also happy to receive invitations from individual parishes as it is important to hear from both clergy and laity. However, we do not and cannot speak for Bishop Derek. He has a unique responsibility. We, the two suffragans, are offering a genuine listening exercise. So do get in touch.

In the meantime, we remain your servants under God and committed to your care and support. Suffragans do not have this territory or that: we each offer to the whole diocese as we move forward together in partnership, in unity, and furthering God's mission.

With all blessings

+ Julian Scredington

+ John Bolingbroke

Colin said, "I thought about reading this out. Does it actually say anything? I don't want to read this out."

"It's a bit long," I responded, "and also has a few stock phrases."

"It is on the diocese website. I think the Parish Website can provide a link. I suppose it shows that Derek Imperial is under a lot of pressure and the publication is coming. He may have to resign or retire. I wouldn't be at all surprised if we don't lose one of the suffragans, when what we really need is a third one."

"That puts the wage bill up more," I said.

"We know what's coming. There'll be less residential training like yours was, fewer paid curacies: we'll end up with even fewer clergy and many more volunteers. They'll advance the 'minster principle' of grouping clergy together to serve over a wide area. Anyhow, I will put tonight's sermon in the parish magazine. These are your days of relative freedom because, as a vicar, you cannot contradict the creed that follows - particularly in the morning Parish Eucharist. I'm looking forward to when you can preside at the Eucharist very soon."

"Ah, thank you Colin."

"Following on from your success at Margate, I need to tell you about the Wytham Region Conference to Attract Business, held in the Titansea Grand Hotel. I'd like you to not just support your husband out there, but show involvement in the local community, and therefore talk about something relevant to the community with a Christian perspective. And can you make it so that the business people understand it?"

"So a bit like when I went to Margate then on the seaside economy and community."

"Yes. The suffragan was full of praise for that. Do what you did there! But you have less than a week to prepare. Bishop John is presenting all about the Serninsea Cross brooch that was found by detectorists and has become an interest of his. He'll be discussing it under 'Cultural and Tourist Development'. So leave that subject to him."

"What was this other matter, Colin? I can take criticism."

"The bishop says Helen Eris complained when you didn't answer the door on Friday night. But she says she didn't complain when you were in touch with her. So the matter is closed."

I said to Keith, before we drove home in separate vehicles, that the bishop must be out to make trouble for me, because Helen had not complained. Keith wondered if he was doing it ahead of my ordination retreat, reminding me of my own duties, unless wires were crossed and there was a genuine misunderstanding.

Sexual Dream (Monday 10th June)

I found myself in the church, although to the sides there were vertical drapes like in a theatre. I was in the pulpit; a naked man was sliding up the outside of the pulpit vertically; I realised that I only had on a clerical collar and a very hairy pubic mound below, that seemed to be physically growing in bushiness. This was forcing me to stay in the pulpit, the congregation all looking on (and seemingly not seeing the rising man). I brushed the pubic hair downwards with my favourite hairbrush as if to stop it growing, but to no effect.

There, ahead, sat in a large throne-like chair, in the centre of the church, between the pews, and facing me, was Bishop John Barman, and giving me an intense gaze. Next to him, stood, hand on the bishop's shoulder, was Kenneth Osis, openly masturbating with his other hand, his heavy vestry garments pushed up.

I folded my arms as if to hide my breasts, but then I started stroking myself at the hairy mound and this did stop the growth. The male arrived at the top of the pulpit, now recognised as Adam Magellan. The bishop afar looked restless; Osis was more vigorous and took his hand off the bishop to point at his penis. My tongue came out as he did this.

Adam was solidly erect, so I climbed up and out of the pulpit and dropped on to his shaft, like in mid air, with gasps from the congregation - yet a long smile from the bishop and ever more vigorous self-action by Osis. But then, I wasn't on Adam at all, but found myself straddling the bishop, oozing all over his raised elaborate clerical dress and receiving Osis's penis into my mouth.

I woke up to Keith, Monday my day off, in a sweat, and told him to fuck me.

He asked if I was sure. I thought Cheryl must be changing his attitude to sex with me. "You've been dreaming again. Was it bad? Was I in it?"

"That's a point. You weren't in it at all."

"Perhaps, in your dream, I was with Cheryl."

"You must have been," I said.

"Who was in your dream?"

"While I can remember: Adam Magellan, elevating up in front of the pulpit while I was in it, the suffragan bishop, Ken Osis - all in a state of sexual excitement."

"Like you, then."

"It's more like fear. It's like they're out to get me."

When I went out I went swimming in Ingle Under Drain near Ingle Barrow. Here was a moribund church perched on a mound, on a site that was for Pagan burial. I stared at the place for a while.

I was sat naked on the inner grassy mound and pleased that my bowels had settled in the morning. Without realising it I drifted off to sleep.

A woman, perhaps sixty years old, was standing over me. "I thought you were a dead body dumped. You gave me such a fright. You have nothing on. Is it warm enough?"

"I'm sorry. I am a bit cold. It's a bit unseasonal today and rainy too."

"I have a coat in the car." She went over the dyke top and returned with it for me to put it on.

She told me to get in her car, and she drove me the short distance to my car, a swim away, where I was able to return her coat and put my clothes back on. We parted in a friendly way and I thanked her. She was called Lesley Pointer. I felt like I'd opened myself for more criticism, if I had been recognised. At least it was a pleasant sleep.

I decided to go to the local library, a safer and uncontroversial place to sit and contemplate, only to realise that it now shut on Mondays.

The Confessor Calls (Tuesday 11th June)

Reverend Kenneth Osis, my allocated confessor, came to my house by appointment. I was in a mufti selection of blouse and trousers that any woman might wear at this point.

I answered the front door. "Hello Linda, so good to see you. Meeting at yer 'ouse," he said. "The Holy Spirit has come; I hear that yer sermon were the best ever."

"And I perform on Trinity Sunday," I said. "Do come in, er, Kenneth."

"Ken. Now 'ave yer 'ranged yer 'olidays yit?" This little fat man reverted away from the Church-speak we all seem to absorb.

"I think I'll go to see the family just before the retreat," I said, "I had a short break with my husband and friend a little while back. Come through to the big lounge."

"It's not a bad 'ouse this, is it? They don't do things badly, like."

"It takes ages to get repairs done and necessities dealt with."

"Do you want me to pass that on?"

"I thought our meetings were confidential," I said. "Please sit down."

"Yer right, which is why am asking permission, like. But I can pass it on because I'm close to the control booth."

"Ah, I remember last time you made these references to the control booth and stagecraft. Are they acting metaphors or actual amateur dramatics?"

"Something you do need to know: your active suffragan bishop does admire you. With all he knows, he wants you in on the team."

"That's positive," I said, keeping quiet about negative thoughts. "Metaphors? Do you know anything about badges with a goose and a B on them?"

"Er, yes."

"So who wears them?"

"Actors."

"Metaphorical actors?"

"I think you'd be a good actor. I have got one. Look." (It was on his shirt under his jacket, well below his round clerical collar.)

"You are an actor. Where are the metaphorical plays put on?"

"If you are asking. I did an audition. I attended a rehearsal."

"You see, I'm told that the college has a drama group, and it puts on plays; there was an Am Dram group ten years ago or so and folded. So what do these badge-wearers do?"

"It's all private. Perhaps it is too early to put it on in public."

"So they are not metaphors. Identify the goose and the B."

"The gander or goose badge has a B on it. The ancient name of Bolingbroke; same name as the suffragan bishop. Do you want to be involved?"

"I can't act. I could take a look."

"Yes, but you need to be invited, and need to be prepared to act - at least. But I hear that at Bishop Querceto Theological College you could recite whole chunks of liturgy without having the book."

"Yes, I have a very good memory for words. I handle ideas, and I can remember what I like to read and what people say. But I'm useless at remembering names. Am I having a confidential chat with you about work and life, or is this some sort of pre-audition?"

He then said, "No. You would have to be invited. Can I pass this on?"

"I am curious, not because I want to act at all but because this is strange. You see, metaphor points to a something else into which it gives a very good parallel insight."

"Do I have the permission to contact the Serninsea Players?"

"Yes. On the basis of my curiosity only."

"Someone will be in touch, Linda. Let's get on to you as you, then. You, the whole rounded figure - mind, body and spirit. This is confidential."

"Go on."

"Contented sort of person? Frustrated? Eager? Annoyed?"

"Actually, all four."

"It is said that you visit the toilet too often and inappropriately."

"You don't worry about being too personal, do you Ken? Yes, but I have improved and will further. The rest is shared with my medical folk alone."

"I suppose so. How is yer marriage?"

"Fine, thank you, seeing as you ask."

"There is this suggestion it is not doing so well."

"Like the suggestion of how I shit?"

"Hmm. Do you have friends?"

"I have friends, some from school days. I have a fellow naturist friend. We meet at our mutual friend's house because it has a conservatory and it is secluded. We strip off and lie on sofas and chat. Or sometimes go to the gazebo in the garden."

He said, "You being naturist: like, if I were to say let's sit here with nothing on, you'd find that unremarkable. I'm not suggesting this."

"Well there's a time and place for everything. Yes, I am often naked, but I don't answer the door naked, and try not to embarrass sensitive souls. Not saying that you are sensitive, of course. Invasive, maybe."

"I'm only asking. Is your hostility part of yer family? Yer family has always been alternative, sort of."

"I don't see any notes this time."

"I read them, as updated; memorised the main points."

"On the farm, on a nice day, my family went about with nothing on. We're not masochists but I can take the cold better than some."

"You were a nude model."

"Yes?"

"Do you entertain male friends, you know, in a way others might find unusual?"

"I invite male friends in and show them my body?"

"Well?"

"No. When there are male friends, I keep my textiles on."

"What about parishioners?" he asked.

"I don't get my textiles off in front of parishioners."

"Your service to your parishioners. You are there for them. Our stipends are to make us available."

"If you are referring to Helen Eris, calling at my door, I have spoken to her. She came on the off-chance for advice. She knows it was too late in the day. I was tired. I rang her the next day, and checked all was well, which it was."

"You felt tired."

"Yes. We are available for others, but we are also entitled to our own time," I claimed.

"Who was he?"

"Who was whom?"

"The man you were entertaining."

"Who says there was a man I was entertaining?"

"The implication is that it was a man you were entertaining."

"There is no implication, and, by the way, if there ever was a man, it's none of anyone's business but mine."

"But that's not the case, is it, in a provided curate's house and with a stipend to be available for others?"

I thought: this horrible little man had been sent to do the bishop's dirty work.

I asked him back, "Do you have a girlfriend, or significant other? She wouldn't have one of these badges, would she?"

"The woman I was with does, actually. She is an actor."

"These badges seem to be everywhere, all of a sudden."

"She passed her audition."

"Ken. This house might be a 'tied cottage', but it is my home. If I choose to entertain a male friend, I am entitled to do so without permission of the landlord."

"Indeed, 'tied' is yer correct word. You 'an't got a landlord: it is the Church to which y've given yer moral commitments and statements of obedience."

It was time to create a test.

"As I know you better, now, I'd like to be without my pointless clothes."

"Oh. I see."

"Furthermore, let's deepen our talk by lying down on my bed upstairs, and just talking."

"And me?"

"If you want. You don't have to. If someone - one of these parishioners - comes to the door I'll grab my cassock and slip it over my head. Easy."

And there and then I removed my clothes. His eyeballs were bulging.

"Gosh. Ye're still very beautiful, like, a lot."

"What do you mean by 'still'?" (Had he seen me before?)

"Sorry. Er... Yer forty."

"Yes."

"The cassock," I told him, "is a fantastic garment because it hides what I reveal. Many a cassock is worn over just a bra and knickers by women clergy in hot weather: I just don't include the bra and knickers."

"Ye're... Ye're often seen in yer cassock. People associate it with commitment, like, but yer saying it's nakedness convenience."

"Yes. Come upstairs."

He followed me up the stairs but went into the bathroom, where he did undress, and this small, stocky, naked man appeared at the bedroom door and paused. I indicated the bed on the left side, as I was on the right.

"I'm nervous," he said.

"Lie down because I am resting and I want to chat. If I fall asleep, get your clothes back on and let yourself out."

"If I respond, you know, like, will it bother you?"

"No. Secrets," I said to him. "Tell me about secrets."

He did lay down to face me, and looked me up and down. "Are you aware, doing Sociology once, of the work of Georg Simmel?"

"Like the National Church was a triad with its Catholic, Evangelical and Liberal corners? Although the traditionalist Anglican Catholic is bust now so it's more like a dyad, and a dyad is more less stable than a dyad. The LGBTQ debate is a dyad too."

"Not that. His best work were secrets. Equivalent of Durkheim and all about suicide."

"Oh, right."

"Communication and about the self. Secrets allow us to be more autonomous; the lie makes life bearable. We can manage our presentation to others. The lie is integral, isn't it, to a relationship - so, rather than destroy it, it allows yer relationship to happen. And, with an intimate relationship, like, you can tell them whole without having to tell 'em all. See what I mean?"

"We are like novels in the management of narrative secrets."

"Yeah. And even sexual love, right - that opens us to the most intimacy, includes the maintenance of secrets, so that it can work."

"To a point," I said.

"And all the more necessary because, right, sexual love is more uneven than friendship. So you should give the whole self, but not all of the self."

"I've got that," I said.

"So, individually, you gain more autonomy and self-worth. But if you have the secret society, that reduces your autonomy and self-worth. The secret group, and especially the secret State, takes it away. The more there is surveillance, and the more there are operatives, the less you are your self."

"I can see that. You see, concentrating on this matter, it doesn't matter that you've got nothing on and I have got nothing on."

"I am trying to concentrate and avoid the obvious. You are still so attractive. You are attractive."

"Go on concentrating."

"Yer right. So, now, also, you have the community and association thing. So, right, in a village, or in rural society, which is community, there are fewer chances to maintain secrets. The lines of communication criss-cross from the same people. But in a city, with differentiation, isn't it, a modern economy, yer 'ave more chances of 'aving secrets, more chance of retaining yer autonomy. Far from being alienating, or having anomie, you know, it can be liberating. It is liberating to have secrets. Can I touch you?"

"No."

"Oh."

"This isn't sex. This is two people, grown up people, in and around this town, in our profession, having a conversation."

"But look, I cannot help myself."

"Naturists see that all the time. It is quite normal, especially among newbies and textiles."

"Can I attend to it please?"

"If you must." So he began and then he stopped.

"I won't. How is yer marriage?" he asked again.

"I've already answered."

"Problems?"

"You said before. Who is making the suggestion?"

"I don't know, and if I did I couldn't say."

"So we are not getting any further," I declared. "Well, you've done much better than before. You want me to attend an audition, so in exchange I would like you to see into my naturist world. So, for next time you come, I will ask my friend, my naturist friend, let's call her 'D', to be with me when I see you next. There'll be time to talk to me alone for confidences. Otherwise I want her here. Yes? That's not to say she will say 'yes' herself."

"Sounds interesting. I would like to come."

"Anyway, I am feeling tired, like I was when Helen Eris rang my doorbell. Have you said everything? Thank you for your lecture on secrets."

"Is this tiredness an illness?"

"No. I'll sleep and get back on track."

"I will get my clothes on."

As he did, I went down to the under-stairs toilet, for my urine needs and the hanging black cassock. I put it over my head for it to drop down, and he came down the stairs. We went to the front door.

I said, "Good bye. Go home. You can say I'd experience an audition. The rest, including the naturist invitation, goes no further: not to the bishop, not to my training vicar, not to anyone, nor to this peculiar badge-wearing woman you know."

"Rest assured. You might be wearing such a badge yourself, soon."

"We'll see you again very soon. Go home."

Diana agrees to Help (Wednesday 12th June)

I had been in touch with Peter. So, wearing my white cassock at lunchtime, I called in very briefly at Adam's. Adam was out all day. It didn't matter. It was Peter Marshall I wanted. On his computer screen was something to do with Unitarians and a reference there to Buddhism.

"That doesn't make sense to me. Is there something you'd have here that would upset an evangelical or traditionalist? I know it all does, but something to disturb their sensibilities and sensitivities."

"Neo-Paganism?"

"Perfick," I said

"Perfick?"

"Pop Larkin."

"The poet?" he asked. "'They fuck you up...' Sorry, Reverend Jupitas."

"Darling Buds of May. Print out a summary of the Unitarian position regarding Paganism, for a friend who knows nothing about them. I'll give her what you print out."

"There isn't a Unitarian position," he said. "I'll find some brief viewpoints or stances, and from neo-Paganism as well."

"Neo-Paganism? Yes, fine. Brief, though: she has very little time and possibly a short attention span. No, that's unkind. After all, she reads The Jacobite Gap Years novels."

"Remind me."

"About a physician Mary Douglas who, back in time, marries to become Mary MacKenzie or Màiri NicCoinnich."

"Don't know it."

I received three pages of printed notes potentially for Diana.

Peter said, "Adam was going to send a message that George Wickenby has been following you. I'm not talking out of turn. The Bishop of Bolingbroke has an account with Mr. Wickenby."

"That is most interesting and disturbing," I said. "Is he in tomorrow?"

"I wouldn't know and you shouldn't approach Mr. Wickenby directly anyway."

"Is Adam in tomorrow?"

"Should be. I'll check."

"He needs a reward for that. I'm off to see friends at the Café Albert on the sea front"

I left and headed around the block. In there, Diana, Patricia and I just slowly consumed coffees. I had honey and spray cream with mine, discovering that the cafe would do this (at a price). Diana received the three sheets of paper provided by Peter on Unitarians on Pagans and neo-Pagans.

I said to Diana, "So what I want you to do is have a personal profile that irritates this horrible little man. You could be one of these Unitarians. I'm told they still exist even in Britain. You and I will be good naked pals. I talked to him naked yesterday and said I would ask 'D'. That was all, Patricia. Naked chat. He is not one of us."

"You got his clothes off?" Diana asked.

"He was a bit nervous. He keeps saying I 'still' look good, and then says it's my age."

Patricia said, "You really are ridiculous, Linda. You are scheming."

"He's not pervy?" asked Diana.

"He is a clergyman."

"That's no guarantee of anything," said Patricia.

Diana said, "Okay. It's a dull life, this, without a bit of fun. I mean, there was this bit of fun when you Linda went to see Arthur and Patricia and, well..."

I stopped her by saying, "It's Osis and the bishop who are scheming. I want to set up a feedback loop where he sees extraordinary things that he cannot keep to himself. There's a peculiar group that wears these badges, and now he wants me to be able to wear one. I want us to hug, Diana, and we will hug him."

"Watch it Linda," Diana said. "And no family - I'll be a single woman, Dee. I am not hugging strange men."

"If we need a surname. Er, on there it says Joseph Priestley, James Martineau, Francis William... pick Newman. 'Dee Newman'. I knew about John Henry, but nothing about a Francis."

Adam Magellan called in at the Café Albert on the promenade and obtained a drink.

He said, "So you are being followed, and we were followed. Helen Eris seems to have been set up. I don't know why."

"It's these badges that Peter saw at the bed and breakfast. Adam, I'd like to see you again."

"Woo!" said Diana and Patricia together.

"Grow up," I said at them.

Adam said, "Wickenby will hire people."

"How do you know, Adam? Is it from Kathryn, Kathleen?"

"I don't give away my methods. So this is as you come up to this retreat and your ordination."

"Yes, I wasn't aware that undergoing surveillance was part of the preparation. I'm going to see my family first. I would like their blessing, for a change. Come with me to Wales, Adam."

"Woo!" said Diana and Patricia again.

"I can't. I'm busy. Isn't Keith going, for keeping up appearances?"

"In Wales? Fuck off."

"Right, well I'm going. I mean: to do some work."

"Not 'fuck off' to you, Adam."

"Woo," they went yet again.

"Shut up. See you soon, Adam. Right let's get this Osis pillock set up."

My confessor was thus told by text to meet 'us' at Patricia's, on a Friday as well, and given directions. The whole meeting must be confidential, I wrote; he could also speak to me alone.

Diana said, "Don't tell him stuff then."

Patricia nodded in agreement.

"Au contraire. We need to give him plenty."

"I am not posing as your lover."

"Let's make you, like Peter, a neo-Pagan Unitarian. I assume he is. You do spells and stuff like that. Your yoni is your power."

"My what?"

"Cunt, love," I said, to be crude. "Come on, it will be there for him to see."

Patricia said, "So what is this white garment you are wearing?"

"A cassock?"

"With a filthy mouth and devious mind like yours? Keith was flushed out regarding Mouldy by your devious means."

"No. It was straightforward telephony."

"Anything else has happened with you and Osis?" asked Diana. "I mean, you do have a track record."

"I do not have a track record. I stayed loyal. It was Keith who wandered off. Well, now I am free."

Patricia said, "You are not free. You are about to be ordained a priest. By the way, don't get into an acrimonious divorce like I did."

"No, I won't," I said. "Clean break."

Patricia went off to work, and Diana and I went to Patricia's house, where we stripped off and lay down in the conservatory.

"I want more information on this man," said Diana.

"Osis lives twenty-five miles out. He is round, stocky, small penis."

"Some people at college cycle twenty-five miles. I'm wondering if I have seen him in there, occasionally."

"He coupled up with some woman for a short time, who also wears one of these badges. On, er, a separate point (it wasn't), do you know someone called Laura Kingswood, Diana?"

"Oh, she's a college regular. She has a few issues, let's say. She is on some course or other most years. Why?"

"Nothing. Just asking..."

"So is this Osis like your bishop? He's creepy and wears perfume. I think he is devious. What did he say to that archaeologist lass? She wasn't involved in something he's doing? Why has he grabbed this Serninsea Cross brooch for himself?"

"I wonder if either or both twins have started to see these badges? Kathleen didn't mention it last time I saw her."

"Are they trying to say, 'Join the amateur dramatics!' to you?"

"Not quite. But there is one question, given his ability to keep quiet about Cheryl. Is Keith involved? He normally slags off the bishop, like you do, but I'm beginning to wonder. Just wondering."

Diana had a demand. "So tell me what happened with Patricia and her husband." (She meant when I helped them.)

"I can't and won't," I responded.

"In that case..." said Diana.

"So you won't help me?"

"Tell me! What did they do, and, more to the point, what did you do?"

"No, Diana. I'm testing Osis for his confidentiality, or lack of it, so don't test me on mine. I am not going to tell you."

"I'm scratching your back..."

"I'll operate on my own then, with Osis."

"I know," she said. "I won't help you unless you tell me about you and Adam Magellan."

"Oh, that's easy. I showed him who was boss. I wanked him, sucked him off and shagged him."

Diana burst out laughing. "I'm all yours then, dearie. I don't like this bishop and anything to undermine your lot is bound to be a good thing."

"Friendship does not rely on reciprocity," I said.

"Is that theological?" asked Diana.

"Sort of theological."

"You don't want us to be lesbians, then?"

"I thought you'd said not to go this far."

"In front of Patricia," said Diana. "I want some fun. Let's just entice his imagination. So he'll strip off with us; I have no family but you can say that you introduced me to naturism."

"Yes, we'll add to the deflection a real history," I said. "Spies do this successfully."

Diana said, "Oh, by the way, I'm going to be a part time receptionist at Wilkinson's Casino, downstairs."

"Best wishes with that."

"You don't approve?"

"I don't approve of temptations towards addiction."

"You and Adam. Is it like knowing him at school again?"

"I think he's a bit shy."

Diana said, "He married that Rumanian woman, and she ran away."

"You seem well informed."

"The mother of Agota, who changed her name to Yootha Ann."

"I once offended her. Adam will know all about that, then. I wonder what he really thinks about me."

She said, "So, after they were around for nearly two years, including Agota Annabella György on the neighbouring farm to you, Adam married Mirela Annabella György, Agota's mother, six years ago."

"Fuck!" I said, reaching into my bag for my hairbrush.

Diana said, "Leave it alone."

"Sorry, I shouldn't."

Diana said, "When people saw Jenny brushing your hair, in the classroom, they thought she was being affectionate. You've had this behaviour ever since."

"Sand in my hair," I said. "Like if grit is in it."

"Jenny," said Diana, being insistent.

"Maybe... Adam. We were sort of mentally cruel with him. We gave him pleasures, but we were in control. I wish he could come with me to Wales. It would give us some time to be normal, restore things. Anyway, there's no one else."

"You want some cock."

"I want to say Keith lied and I want someone I know."

"Not Ken Osis then."

"Shit, no. I like Jeremy Symes but he's well and truly taken."

The conversation came to a pause. When Patricia reappeared after work, she asked us if our scheming was fully planned. A lot would be left to the day, I said.

She told us to confine ourselves to the conservatory, garden and gazebo. No going upstairs with Osis. Patricia said, "I don't want my house turning into a knocking shop."

Diana responded, "Oh, that would never do. Or inviting a third party to have a good look, and a bit more."

So Diana and I dressed, and went home. I waited for Keith to return from work.

Sex at Adam's (Thursday Morning 13th June)

I was frustrated waking up Thursday morning next to Keith, and by Morning Prayer with Colin. I wanted something fresh and new. So, after ten minutes in the vestry's loo, I went to Adam's (via Jagjit and Gurinder Kapoor's shop).

Adam appeared. "Hold the fort Peter, will you. Would you like to come through?"

So I did. I said, "Hope you don't mind this cassock."

"Hope you don't mind the office - bit of a mess now Ann has gone."

"She cleans for you?"

"No, I clean for her - including the toilets."

"I spy a whiteboard and a blackboard. Not much on them."

"Show customers other people's business? Labhaoise said these would benefit me."

"You've got screwed up paper in a basket. Could be stolen. Going to offer me a drink?"

"Would you like to see my flat? It is upstairs."

"Lead on to your inner sanctum."

Upstairs had a sort of layout that needed rationalising - and where we ended up I could see the view down into the variously busy end-of-the-street to the double mini-roundabout by leaning on to his lounge windowsill.

I said, "It all needs decorating. And your bathroom is, well, downstairs and we are up here. Old fashioned windows: I bet they're drafty when shut. I'll open this because it feels stuffy"

"Yes to all of that," he said. "But I want to ask you a direct question."

"Go on." I got the window up higher than I wanted.

"I like you and to have sex with you, but can you stop treating me like shit?"

"Yes, is my answer. Push up my cassock."

I managed to lean over as a pair of hands acquired contact with my lower legs. The raised black material exposed my bare bottom. He gently slapped each inner thigh for me to widen my legs more and pressed my back to bend further. Oops, yep: then he was inside and nicely, and traffic continued to go by. People on upper deck buses would see me and might see in but I assumed not far, given the equivalent dark you would see of the cassock merging into the dim room.

"Gosh you really are tight," he said."

I recognised someone coming out of next door's front door.

"Hello Klärchen!" I said, and she looked up, as did the dog. "How's Dieter?"

"He's lovely," she said in her German accent. "He woke me up this morning really nice. He brought me his bone."

"That was good of him."

"And we had a nice time before breakfast. Why are you up there?"

"I'm visiting my friend Adam." (He was busy giving me his bone, as I stretched my neck out of the window.)

"We are meeting up with my friend Salome and Hendrik. I think we're going to have a nice time. We'll find a drain to swim in, all four of us, and then have a good shower back at home. That will be nice, Dieter, won't it? Goodbye for today."

"I often go... swimming in the Ingle... Drains."

"Yah. Bye-bye."

"Bye."

I somewhat slid back a bit while Adam continued his thrusting. I gripped the window frame but then raised my right hand up to the wall at the window side. He was working hard in me. His hands travelled up within my cassock up to my free breasts, and I was quite happy.

I said, "This is a new one on me."

He asked, "How do you justify religion, Reverend?"

"Go on. I think... I like the pastoral... and meeting people's needs... but I'm not sure if it's not all... the wrong way around."

"This isn't the wrong way around," he commented, about his activity with me.

"Grace, revelation, inner... conviction; it's a struggle... sometimes. Oh you are very good; keep up the rhythm."

There was a voice from the street below.

"Hello Reverend, getting some fresh air at the window?"

"I am," I said. It was Mrs. Gertrude Carter, one of our stalwarts. "You shopping, Gert?"

"Along the promenade. I want a birthday present for my nephew," she said. "Don't know what to get. A shop has closed down there; I bet its garden meets this property."

"I saw that there's a tenfoot behind," I told her from above.

Adam was still humping and I was trying to reject Newton's law again; I'll stay still and he goes further in, if he can.

"I'll try the high street."

"Best of luck," I said to her below.

"You're in the private detective's place isn't it?" said Mrs. Carter.

"It is - some business with my... husband's firm," I replied.

Adam said, "Liar."

I said, further, "I'm waiting for him to... come, Gert."

Adam said, "That's true."

"I'll be on my way, Reverend," she said. "God bless!"

"Bye. See you Sunday, I'm sure, Mrs. Carter."

Now Adam said, "Ah me kettle's boiling." He made a male noise, that outside might have been drowned out by the street traffic at the double mini roundabout.

"You steaming in me? Gosh yes. Detective Adam pumping in... some data, information, naughty... boy."

He said, "You're losing a lot out. I'll get a kitchen roll. In here somewhere."

With him released, my cassock dropped to just above my feet.

"It's down my left leg now," I said, still looking out of the window while I waited. "Is the left leg advantageous?" I asked, "Or is the right leg as probable?"

He returned and got my cassock up again and rubbed up and down my left leg with kitchen paper. I continued: "Must have been pure chance," I answered, for myself.

"Two quantum universes opened up then," he said. "You ask Peter."

"Really? Explain." (I knew the answer).

"One with sperm down your right leg, which we are not in, and one with sperm down your left leg, here. We are now fixed in the left leg universe."

I said, "The differences for the future could be profound. I'll write a film script: Sliding Labia."

Suitably rubbed with kitchen roll, I sat on his settee next to him. His television was put on, showing afternoon snooker.

He said, "I don't get it. You are slim, still, as tight as a teenager, as hairless as a pre-pubescent, your skin is as smooth as silk. How do you keep yourself so well?"

"I just do." I told him, "I'm going away soon. Twice. The family first and then a retreat. It's the big lead up to the ordination. I should be gloriously happy and expectant. I bet Jenny Masters was. Thing is, I've never felt so completely secular. I'm supposed to do a sermon that is orthodox. I can't do orthodox."

"I wonder if we will ever see Jenny," he said. "She's obviously been in and out of Serninsea."

I said, "I hope I am not a Jenny substitute."

"Oh no. You are unique. You're also shuffling about on your bottom."

"Well, I'm wondering if she will come to my ordination. She likely knows Christine Vine, so perhaps I will see the said Christine as well."

"Ah, but will you get to your own ordination if you feel so secular?"

"Gosh, I don't know. Keith will be there; he did promise."

"Shall I come?"

"The ordination?" He nodded. "You could, somewhere left-off perhaps."

"Left off the invites?"

"Position in the cathedral. Change the subject. This is not a job, but listen. This confessor says to me about being near the centre of decision making, and uses these theatrical metaphors. Then I see people wearing these badges. You tell me that we are being followed. I do not think this is a theatrical drama group that does everything in private."

"So what's your investigation strategy?" Adam asked. "Diana and you setting up one of its badge-wearers?"

"Something like that. 'What's Osis telling John Barman, the Bishop of Bolingbroke?'"

"The question implies a range of answers, and the strategy is how to answer the question and the methods construct the process."

"Clearly the bishop has put Osis on to me and said certain things. He knows, this confessor, that we were together."

"The fact that somebody watches doesn't mean they see. They have to interpret and often miss things. Believe me. It may be an assertion."

"So my strategy is to create a conversation and happenings loop. My method is Diana and me as naturists. She is going to have a religion that causes him to want to evangelise her and with any luck desire her. Then I wait for the loop, for the bishop to act in the knowledge that Diana is interested and in an odd religion."

"There's a flaw in the method," Adam said.

"What?"

"Well, why should it concern the bishop? And Osis already knows, so you can't measure the feedback."

"Everything concerns the bishop. Plus, the bishop might want her 'at the centre' too and perhaps she starts seeing these badges."

"Thing is, if Osis is excited by naked women - crumbs, Linda! - then he is likely to keep it to himself. If you think there is some clandestine group then you ought to investigate the group."

"But it is secretive."

"You have to have a strategy, see, to find a secret group. All groups meet, all leave traces, and these days, even with security measures, they have electronic deposits."

"So, if I can ask, with all your work, have you ever heard of some group with these badges that have some leadership elements?"

"Nope."

"I'll try it my way first."

"I've a question for you," Adam said.

"Go on."

"Are you a psychopath or a sociopath?"

"You serious? Adam!"

"Yeah. Serious question."

"Serious answer then. Hopefully, I am ethically trained enough or have sufficient idealism that any psychopathic tendencies are controlled."

"A psychopath is very personal in ruthlessness; a sociopath doesn't give a shit. Psychopaths are more calculating. A sociopath blames others and can be quite chaotic."

"Gosh. What do you think of me?"

"I bet no one else asks you this, Reverend Bode?"

"Try the Reverend Linda. 'Hello, I'm the Reverend Linda, soon to be the psychopathic priest of this parish.'"

"I'm a parishioner?" he asked. "Come for coffee, vicar, and don't give a shit."

"You were so busy exposing my bottom that you forgot to give me a drink, you sociopath."

"You still have quite a trim bottom. Big tits."

"I can whip this off and suffocate you with my tits."

"You left the window open, sociopath."

I got up and shut it.

He resumed. "Well, I think you're exciting and interesting. There's no love in what we have done, is there?"

"Love?" I asked.

"What is love?" he asked. "So we've established that our after-restaurant meeting again wasn't a one night stand. Is this then, likely to go on? It must have been your cassock that turned me on, like fucking a female vicar."

"Please. Not a fetish. Not sure about love and Keith. I might have had Obsessional Love Disorder when a student."

"You getting OLD now? Anyway, I have a secret to declare," said Adam. "I mean, if we are going to have some sort of relationship, you'd better know. You remember the one you called 'Goat', ten years younger than us?"

"Don't embarrass me again. Diana told me that you were married."

"Technically I am still married."

"What do you mean 'technically' married? Like technically I am pregnant?"

"Are you pregnant?"

"No. You are or you are not."

"I am still married, to Yootha Ann's mother. She now lives in Slough. I hardly talk to her."

"So I am having to add this technicality to my list of sins - fucking a married man."

"She worked for SMS, mother did, and here got a new created job as Translator and Administrator - I think that was its title. She speaks Hungarian, Rumanian, German, French and English. Fantastic, really. I wasn't long at all out of the police and she was one of my first jobs, for indeed SMS. I mean we were married fast and then separated fast. It helped her achieve respectability, place, stability."

"You tell me her name."

"Mary. Mary Ann. She uses Magellan as well, still."

"She can't be our age because Agota, Yootha Ann you say, is but ten years younger."

"Yootha Ann is multi-linguistic, without the French and German."

"What would she think about you and me?"

"I can get in touch and ask her. We had an eight months of marriage, and after she moved on there was the prospect of me going to Slough. But I was getting the business going."

"How come a Rumanian ended up in some out of the way place like this?"

"Funnily enough, it was an SMS advert for Harwich and yet she ended up not going there but coming here. So she was in this 'out of the way place' and looked for friends and activities, and her other attempt at a bloke was a big flop."

"What activities; who did she meet?"

"I ought to keep that to myself."

"Why? I would not be number two would I? The We of Me, could I be?"

"The We of Me?"

"Suzanne Vega."

"I did say that I hardly speak with her. With her daughter too, both from abroad, she wanted a loose arrangement even with marriage. That's me in a nutshell. There is no coal on the fire, and if you can detect any warmth it is room temperature."

"It's was warm in here before I opened the window."

"Cooler now."

"And what does she think of Ann Dromeghda?" I asked.

"She thinks nothing of her - she is a business partner, as you know."

"Who had your child, as did Labhaoise."

"Like a business partner too, but friendly."

"You being married is all right by me. After all, I'm a sociopath and don't give a shit."

"I've got this job on."

"Another woman?"

"No. A male manager in a DIY store and it's a peculiar one. He is my client."

"So, Mary she is called."

"Mary Ann Magellan, who was Mirela Annabella György, and before György she was Ardelean. Agota Annabella György became anglicised as Yootha Ann George but she had a short marriage too, in Reading, after following her mother south. Aysher is her married name she's used since living in Reading."

The coffee drunk and my cassock down, I got bored with the snooker on television and so made my excuses and went downstairs, leaving Adam to see out a game.

I said to Peter, passing, leaving, "He's still married."

Peter said, "Never seen her."

"Look, I must go. Trinity Sunday and I must preach on it."

"Complicated stuff," he said.

"Tell me about it," I replied.

Emerging outside, I didn't think Mrs. Carter would report me, but a paranoid thought was that she had passed by below on the bishop's initiative. What could she report? That a sociopath clergywoman was fucking a married man when married myself? That'll do nicely.

Titantsea Businesses Conference (Thursday Afternoon 13th June)

Nicely penetrated by Adam and lunch taken at the promenade's Café Albert, I joined Keith at The East Foss Regional Conference to Attract Business, held in the Titantsea Grand Hotel in the afternoon in its downstairs meeting room.

This hotel had seen better days but it was one of those big enough to hold gatherings and had meeting rooms. It was also usefully at Titantsea, where many businesses were located.

We had written our different presentations, so Keith, going before me, was already at the front.

Adam Magellan himself had left the televised snooker and was in the audience on one side with Ann Dromeghda again but also there was George Wickenby further over. I first sat provocatively between the two investigators, hoping to pick anything up. After all, the one on my right had been following me, according to the one on my left.

"Spilling any beans to an old colleague and friend?" asked George, across me. He then said, "Mrs. Jupitas! I have heard so much about you!"

"Really. How so?"

"Putting business in the direction of Adam Magellan. Wife of the chap at the front, there. Your bishop goes first. I know that he likes to be in the thick of it locally."

"Yes, I'd better change position and join him." So I went to the front centre.

So now, from my right, we had an unknown (to me) clergywoman, the bishop (stinking of perfume), Keith and, ah, a happy Yojana Asthana. He did seem familiar with her. They all said hello.

Bishop John's presentation was a short one on the apparent discovery in the ground by detectorists of the Anglo-Saxon Serninsea Cross brooch. He had been asked to look after it. It was an item of immense local value that could be an attraction once the research was done and if a proper and secure place could be made to display it. It was a Christian symbol from the past to the present.

"This area does not have its own museum or art gallery, and surely now there is the reason to persuade funders and the local authority to provide a cultural centre to attract more visitors, even if it relied on local artists and metal-detected finds. This could be done by giving the library a new lease of life and offering multiple functions.

One of the Wickenby twins raised her hand. I turned and saw not only them, but Diana as well. I waved.

"Ah," said the bishop, "an archaeologist who doesn't do religion. Kathleen Wickenby - yes?"

"Not present day religion. Why don't we invest in a metal detector assembly plant? After all, since this brooch was apparently found we have people crawling all over the fields in the marshes. We won't be able to do proper archaeology soon."

"Good ironical point, yes. Give my best wishes to your sister. I don't want to be patronising but we do need to encourage local talent to get involved. It's a pity you and your sister are not involved. No, this seems to have been a fabulous discovery; there's a place for everyone, including metal detectorists. What we have to do is establish the worth of this discovery. You could be more on the inside, you and your sister."

Strange comments, I thought: rather personal and direct. 'Inside'? 'Involved'? This followed a pattern. Were they now being targeted? After all, they are involved, in archaeology. The smelly bishop sat down and Keith got up.

Keith gave a short presentation on the dock and how better storage facilities might lead to more land traffic. He said that nowhere in England is really isolated except for having inadequate roads like here.

He called for dual carriageways throughout Foss. He talked about his pet imaginary project of his - an M16. (A year back at home he would mark out routes on maps and sometimes on the home computer. He contacted the Council and to the Department of Transport.) He told us that the eastern M16 could link to the M11 going south, and there could be an M17 connecting Norwich and Wisbech to north of Nottingham. The M16 north could reach the M180, use the A15 and A63, to have a further M16 to reach the A19 and at the A168 be complete as an alternative to the A1.

The tramway was becoming more than just a tourist attraction. He also wanted a restoration of the railways, that here would serve the dock. These projects would attract business.

Keith now sat down well back near George Wickenby. My presentation came next using notes to pad out.

"Just in case you are puzzled about the same surnames," I said, "he is my husband!"

I suggested that we have to promote ethical businesses, but why the Church should be against a significant casino development. (Colin had told me that the bishop was opposed, and so was he.)

"We're all interested, theologians and economists, and business people, surely, in having life and having it more abundantly. The point about business, even before we consider ethical business, is that it should add value. So imagine that we can be rational, like the economists say, and that we all operate with measuring marginal utility - the more we have of something, the less each extra unit consumed gives us in benefit. Diminishing marginal returns: but they are still positive up to an equilibrium. We buy what we want at a price to an extent where that marginal utility equals our marginal cost, or the price paid. We make things that way too - marginal costs in production up to the price received. We also do this in marginal indifference to other goods or services, consumed or produced. Now, this so-called utility is ultimately psychological and therefore a whole objective system, keenly displayed in maths, is actually subjective-in-the-mind. We want life more abundantly, and yet we know that it has an equilibrium of efficiency for every technological level.

"But what about gambling? Suppose gambling is an addiction or craving. An addiction is like a perception of negative utility in a vacuum before we start. It needs filling. Psychologically, utility is not provided by doing the activity, but to fill a perceived loss of utility prior to consumption. This is craving, and the absence soon restores itself.

"More rationally, alternatively, previous losses we hope to overcome, but we forget that gambling has no history. Every throw of the dice is the same, new, odds."

I think this audience was with me. Ann Dromeghda, who did once teach Economic History, seemed focused on my words.

"Some things we consume and we are given positive enjoyment. That's fine. So long as, when we go away, we don't undergo a prolonged sense of loss when we then don't have that something. Because all the addict ends up doing is finding the gap again and paying out to fill it. But, rather like inflation, the gap gets subsequently bigger the more it is fed.

"When you have a hit, like gambling, you perceive the utility going in, but the pleasure is transitory, and the actual utility then reduces. In the end the costs are such that you cannot fund the desire for plugging the gap."

I stared directly at Adam.

"Being like inflation, demand is to plug the loss. The solution, as with inflation, is to take the negative utility on the chin, to stop it, flush it out and never go back. Unfortunately, unlike with inflation, the goods are tainted rather than the money, and so consume again and the inflation kicks off again. Indeed, the gap to plug can become so severe that the victim can no longer judge the price paid - the desperate addict will still pay. Rationality is then but transitory: longer term rationality contradicts short term apparent rationality.

"Because, it's like a history-imprint. There is hyper-loss of marginal utility: every return to addiction and the solving of the addiction becomes more futile.

"But remember those indifference curves. The consuming addict often steals and then deprives someone else of their utility. What happens is that they take away the higher marginal utility of others to get hits of diminishing returns themselves.

"To produce a rejuvenated rebuilt Titansea Casino may raise profits locally but there is no actual value added going on. Indeed, it facilitates the negative utility gap and absence of long-term rationality of the addict.

"But let's ask beyond the addict. What is the utility generated for the non-addict? In someone who can still behave to an equilibrium, the total utility is tiny. It is perhaps social, and a little bit of excitement, or watching the wheel go round in roulette or the holding and playing of cards. I suggest this is quite trivial. But it risks sending many into addiction, into the loss of equilibrium as a craving sets short term rationality into contradiction with long term rationality. We cannot offer jobs and employment, or local development, on the basis of such negative utility. I assert that a successful gambling operation relies on negative utility elsewhere and it is not adding value, but transferring on the basis of someone's misery.

"It's like when people say that arms spending creates technological innovation. No! Just do the technological innovation. Develop pleasure or utility far more directly.

Another strategy is to raise the entry level, that only those who can afford to lose a considerable sum actually gamble with a desire to win. But, like minimum alcohol pricing, we are accused of denying pleasures to the patronised poor who supposedly can't control themselves. It's like the feudalised capitalism we see these days: a circulatory elite economy rather than a mass economy as Keynes recommended.

"So leave the casino alone. It actually helps to go past a steel door and in through the far steel door. They're unwelcoming. Don't let it advertise. I saw a clock when I went into the casino recently, and I don't want a rebuilt casino that deliberately excludes clocks. A new one, to pay for itself, would have to use all the tricks of the trade, and those tricks encourage negative utility. It would not be economic expansion because there is no added value."

My talk received a dutiful round of applause.

Then this fantastic presentation of a woman, with her shiny brown flesh (bare legs that glowed), jet black hair, and revealing yellow dress, stood to speak.

"I'm Yojana Likhsha Asthana, thirty-five, and I lead the re-renamed Interdependent Standards Unit at Systematic Measuring Services. Hartlepool, Felixstowe and Harwich have one, and there might be ones at Casnewydd and Aberdaugleddau. We are actually becoming more integrated across the sites. Not all administrators are boring people," said Yojana, "and I would like to explain why we can be more positive about ourselves. People ask, 'What do you do?' and there is an assumption that what you do is who you have become.

"This reminds me of jnanamarga in Hinduism, combining with karmamarga, which is works. Jnanamarga is an intellectual self-knowledge, your identity as a person coming to be one with the Other.

"On the one hand, I am an administrator where I check those who check things. Mr. Keith Jupitas in Compliance is one of those I check. He checks things.

"It's mainly mathematical, because it is measurement. There is no knowledge in measurement - we just measure. But there is, because the knowledge is in the procedures. We make and follow rules.

"Rules have to be obeyed, because they give certainty. This is the certainty that what (a) says it is is what (b) finds it is.

"The coffee houses of the early City of London succeeded because of 'my word is my bond' - and woe betide anyone who did not do what they promised. Promises were everything, and allowed borrowing, lending, trading: credit to hold things before the purchase was made and credit was fulfilled.

"But now things are run by systems. We are cogs in wheels that work because the cogs are measured. It's not then what sort of person is attracted to this work, but what sort of person does this work produce?

"This is why, in a job like this, I want to express myself. I still want art and music, and I want human contact. I have been told about a German man called Weber who thought all work would become routine. A lot of people have work like this, and get drunk! Many get addicted, and we've just heard about that. My religion says find yourself, express yourself; my religion before interference by outsiders also understood the purpose of the erotic contact in finding the self.

"The routines of life cannot turn you into the cog in a wheel if you look outward, if you have a wider interest or hinterland. So work providers, to attract quality labour, should be leisure providers. Fortunately, my employer understands the importance of pleasure in leisure, and encourages us to get together and experience ourselves outside the cogs. We interlock in other ways.

"I also have another string to my bow. My family runs a guest house. Maa Skelter sounds like Mama Shelter but isn't. 'Maa' is a Hindu title, as in Maa Durga, and 'Skelter' means to get on with it with a leisure reference. Let's not shy away from the fact that we see people who love each other, and we clean beds of semen and other fruits of love. We add to their experiences through hospitality.

"Look at the Khajuraho and Konark temples with their erotic imagery, and of course there is the Kama Sutra. Kama, as deity, is the first-born cosmic desire for getting creation out of the primaeval chaos. Shiva was meditating, but Kama caused Shiva's passion for Parvati and as a result Shiva turned on Kama to burn him to ashes and turn him into Angara, the bodiless. The bodiless gets about more easily, and puts desire into our bodies. Thus Kama means desire, passion, longing, pleasure of the senses, or the aesthetic enjoyment of life.

"All I am saying is that we have the necessity of precision but we can beat routine through the pleasures. Thank you."

Then a clergywoman in a suit went to the microphone. "Interesting, so far. I am a Christian deacon. In fact, I believe I get ordained priest at the same time and place as the Reverend Jupitas. I am a volunteer; I don't get paid, and I didn't do residential training. I am Christine Vine."

I thought, she was the one in the bank at the time of the robbery, with the identified Jenny World. I was reminded too of the woman at the prostitute murder scene who wouldn't show me her face.

"Listen: the reason I am here is property. Safe as houses, we say, but prices rise and fall, and interest rates; here prices are less than regionally, and regionally is below the national average. I recently purchased some ten properties from a woman in the audience here, Ann Dromeghda, and her partner Labhaoise Vlahos (who's busy with property today). They started by doing one up, and moving on, but I now have ten times their portfolio. Georgie Smith, a UPCC minister, here since the 1980s, got one of mine from one of theirs.

"What they do in property is buy and renovate, and never invest more than the price ceiling. What I do is rent, particularly to sex workers and put them online. I own Goosechat, and it is sex, but prostitution will be with us forever. I work with the police, contributing to the social good. It is safer online.

"Yojana made reference to her faith. Mine involves a strong sense of the subset Social Gospel and indeed what she would call Moksha and I would not. 'Feed thy sheep' has multiple meanings, setting people up for entering the Kingdom, we'd say, under the guidance of the Church. A chap called Reinhold Niebuhr was practical and pragmatic when it came to institutional sin, so we have to work with what we have got, turn the negatives into social positives, sometimes resist, but build life. As it happens I do take from the rich and facilitate the poor, many of the latter being in Serninsea. The Reverend Linda Jupitas referred to having life more abundantly and Yojana Asthana about fulfilment. Properties are like bodies: we live inside them and through them we aspire and attract. Enough from me. Thank you."

Other speakers wanted tourism allied more to business, such as conference space for events like the big electronics conference soon coming to town.

"Klärchen Sisse, I am called, and I lecture at Foss Upper Coast College." I smiled at her. She spoke about the benefits of free movement throughout Europe, such as young people travelling by rail easily, and having a European Pet Passport.

Councillor Gethin Layne said, "To attract such leading events we need leading facilities and it does mean a better presented casino, Reverend, along with a theatre that used to be there, and better entertainment facilities all round. You miss out the point that in a tourist town, people come and go and have not the time to develop their craving here. We've got this one good hotel, but it needs investment, and we need at least one more. Your husband is so correct about travel infrastructure and what is missing."

I nodded back. He had a point. So I called out, "But I am a parish deacon, and my concern is the local population and all year round use."

Another person, Michelle Rowland, said that new processes would need so-called artificial intelligence that would make many redundant and still being paid, but: "Artificial intelligence as it exists relies on extracting our data as regards preference patterns that it then tries to manipulate."

With the presentations over, I went over to see Diana (and kept my back to Klärchen - partly because Keith had once asked for her name and address and I didn't want him remembering his requests.). She said that my presentation made a lot of sense but the casino premises needed modernising. She gave some personal cards to people with a website address for viewing her CV for more employment.

When Christine came across to Yojana, I also said hello. "South of Foss, my parish base," she said to me, and not only will we be ordained together but we will be in the same retreat."

"You were in that bank."

"With my friend and colleague the Reverend Jenny World, yeah. The police responders were so far away that they got away."

"You were very brave," I said.

Then Christine approached Yojana and took from her bag a white badge. Christine said to her, "So, here is mine. The W is for Wippedsfleet and the image is an elephant. So yours is a B and a goose. Local."

"Excuse me," I asked, to muscle in. "What do they mean?"

Christine said, "Listen: it's all about identifying ourselves to one another, when we need to. We went through auditions and we are a pool of involved people. Cultural and expressive. My badge is from Ebbsfleet; I am from Rainham. Now I have a training parish based in Wytham diocese but we don't need to get new badges: in any case, I am backwards and forwards to London. See you in an hour, Yojana. Bye Linda. I've got two properties to inspect and London beckons tomorrow. Then I'll be back."

Puzzled more than ever, I went and said hello to this Kathleen, freed from the bishop. "You disagreed with Bishop John about metal detectorists."

"Far more than that," she said. "Sorry, but he's a creep. What has the Serninsea Cross brooch got to do with him? He seems to have taken possession. He's not an archaeologist. He seems to want Kathryn my sister and me to join him on some basis, but why should we join him? What is he anyway?"

"A bishop," I said. "Did he show you a badge of any kind?"

"No."

"Oh," I responded. "Peter, your magician; he's a good chap."

"Especially for Kathryn. You were right about the casino," she said.

Well, that was something. She went out of the hotel.

Keith said he had a meeting and I should go home on my own.

The perfumed bishop, however, approached me and criticised me. He said, "Linda, dear: you could have mentioned God."

Not wanting to usurp his authority, I did still reply, "I referred to 'having life more abundantly' quite clearly."

"But we have a unique opportunity to put our faith into the public square." I thought back to his speech, as in pot and kettle. Then he said, "Why couldn't you have said something along the lines of Yojana Asthana?"

"Because, to start with, I'm not a Hindu, and, secondly, I tackled addiction and she tackled desire."

"But," he said, "she, who is secular, referred to her faith, and you, in the Christian clergy, virtually ignored it. Something else," he said. "Be careful. Let me be helpful. A woman discovered you asleep and naked at a grass bank of a drain and this news arrived at my door. I have not told Colin. He has enough on his plate."

I saw this not as helpful but as a direct threat. So indeed I was being followed.

Over five hours later Keith was back in the bedroom complaining that meetings should be chaired better and not go on and on.

I said, casually, and without evidence, "If you're fucking someone, you can admit it without consequence."

"Yes, I suppose I can," he responded, and got into bed, went on to his side with his back to me and fell asleep.

The Confessor Meets 'Dee' (Friday 14th June)

Colin Cromer knew that the confessor was seeing me on Friday afternoon, but he knew nothing of my intentions. I arrived at Patricia's, so that Diana let me in about 12:45 pm.

Her bell rang just after 1 pm. I went to the front door in one of Patricia's dressing gowns, and said to Ken Osis, "We're both ready. Come to the lounge, undress in private; you can use some of Dee's flip-flops she brought." In there I said, "You see that out there, nice and circular? It's good for chatting and looking out."

"And a lovely inviting woman inside. Are yer ready yet for Trinity Sunday?" he asked.

"Yes."

"Anything I need to know about first?"

"About my preaching?"

"No. Now."

"Behave in a mature and responsible naturist way. The towel is to sit on."

"Gosh. I'm nervous, Linda. Can you wait for me?" he asked.

I did, and looked at him as he disrobed all his clobber. He settled for bare feet and I said nothing. My gown came off. So he walked behind my hanging hair, back, trim bottom, long legs, big feet in my flip-flops.

I said, "You shake hands; no hugging until you know her better."

We arrived at naked Diana, and he looked her up and down, from her thickening bush to her good head of same coloured brunette hair.

"Good afternoon, Dee." He shook hands as instructed. "I'm yer Rev' Ken."

"Hello you Rev' Ken," said Diana. "Do you 'rev up' then?"

He smiled. I said, "Sit there and relax, towel first." We sat on a bench that went in a semi-circle around the gazebo circumference, and he was in between us.

"You meet like this here normally?" he asked.

I replied, "More often than not back in the conservatory where there are two parallel settees, so we lie down on them and discuss. We get warmth from the heating in the house when it is a cold day and view the sky. Sometimes we come here, with the door open in summer. Let's shut the gazebo door today. One day Patricia might install a pool; that would be nice."

"Or a jacuzzi just outside the conservatory," said Diana. "That would be really good."

Having shut the door, I said, "No secrets between us, Ken: no clothes for no secrets. Do you remember telling me about secrets?"

"How can I forget?"

Diana looked at me. I noticed that he was looking at her more than me. She was more curvy in body than me, longish hair but not as long as my natural blonde.

He said, "I didn't want to take advantage of yer flip-flops."

I said, "If your feet get cold, sort of get them up on to the bench."

"If you did that..."

I said, "Ken! We're naturists. It doesn't matter a jot. Anyway, let me introduce you two better. Dee, this is the Reverend Kenneth Osis of my Anglican Church. Kenneth: Dee is like me, naturist and religious, except she is rather Pagan and Unitarian too."

"Unitarian?"

Diana said, "Neo-Pagan and Unitarian Universalist, to be precise."

"That's a funny mixture," Ken Osis said. "Unitarian? Are there any of them left? Where do you meet?"

I spoke for her, "There's a place in, er, Wytham (I'd no idea if there was or not), but the main thing is the Internet."

"I'll 'ave to 'ave a serious talk with yer some time, Dee, like. I've a Baptist, like, ecumenical colleague who goes on about them as they disrupted the Baptists. Are they into New Age then? I thought they just preached against the Trinity and undermined the possibility of salvation. Fancy hearing that every week."

"Di...ee: tell him."

"Er, New Age? Dunno. Neo-Pagan," she said, not knowing the connection. "Witches and fairies and funny things at the end of the garden."

"Fairies at the end of the garden? Gosh. They really must have changed. I suppose ghosts and all sorts. I'll ask my colleague. I thought they were supposed to think their way out of belief."

"Lots of different influences, these Unitarian Universalists," said Diana, trying to act as Dee. "So there is Christianity, Humanism, Buddhism and Paganism, and I am neo-Pagan as well. I think."

Clearly Peter's three A4 sheets hadn't told her enough - a bit like when I try to present Religious Education through bullet points.

I said, instead, "It's a really nice house and garden this; I mean some business acumen has gone into acquiring this. Pat... is married and has children, and Dee, here, you have..."

"Two. Oh shit," she then said.

"Problem?" asked Ken.

"Something I forget," said Diana. "It's Okay. Obviously I know I have two children."

"And of course I have none," I said.

He said to me, "Nor me. I do know you can't have children, though you have never said why. Your husband first said so when he candidated, and you have confirmed it since."

"Yeah yeah."

"Do you want to say why? You'll have told Dee why," he said. In fact I had not told Diana the details, which was why she looked at me.

"Dee and I have been close for a long time," I added.

Ken said, "I won't press it. Though I'm a bit worried, because I can definitely see people in the distance."

Diana said, "Oh, they are detectorists and the odd walker. Or wanker."

"So," said Ken, ignoring her wordy addition, "this is whereabouts the Serninsea Cross brooch were found?"

Diana said, "If you listen to those Wickenby nieces, there is no reason to find anything like that here. It would be out of place."

"The bishop talks it up," said Ken.

Diana responded, "The detectorists have never found anything supporting such a find in the marshes. He's out on its own."

"Here is a puzzle," said Ken. "Sutton-on-Serninsea. Sutton means 'South Town', so why is it north of Serninsea?"

"Because it was Sutton-in-the Marshes, originally," I replied.

"I like this," he said, "sat here with two lovely ladies without a stitch on and having a normal conversation."

This was what worried me: a communications loop needed spice. We paused.

Ken asked, "How does Keith your husband respond to all this?"

I replied, "Keith has always understood Dee and me."

She said, "Linda introduced me to this. No one else here knowingly goes to a club."

He said, "Jeremy Symes... Oh."

"Not with us and not now with me," I said.

"Of course. If Dee knows everything, can I ask then if there's a contrast between this happy female-female naturism and yer marriage?"

"Rubbish," said 'Dee', helpfully.

I replied. "Keith is my strength going towards ordination."

Ken then asked, "Do you know about the 'not answering the door' incident, Dee?"

"Yes."

"I sympathise because I really don't think clergywomen should answer the door at night."

"She was tired, that's all. You may as well say Linda and I are the basis for a rocky marriage."

"Why so?" Ken asked.

I wasn't sure where she was heading.

"Well, as a Unitarian Universalist I am in favour of polyamory. So there."

This warmed things up. I had not read those three sheets closely enough!

"Are you metrosexual?" Ken asked. I'd no idea what this meant in this context.

Diana said, "We're not active lesbians, reverend. But as a single woman - albeit with two children - I will happily take a boyfriend who has a girlfriend and her boyfriend might be mine as well."

Rock on, Diana!

"Are you in a relationship?" he asked her.

"Just because I'd do something doesn't mean I am doing it. And, also, if the other person wants monogamy, then it's respected and that's it. If I put my arm around Linda, it doesn't mean I have a sexual relationship with her."

"Have you ever?" he asked.

I said, "Kenneth. Don't be so nosy! We are just mates. But what she has done, and what I have done, are for your imaginings and our own private lives."

"Our conversation remains confidential," he said.

"I'm pleased to hear it; it's essential," I now said. "But if Bishop John thinks my marriage is in trouble, then he is very wrong."

"Their marriage is solid," said Diana.

"Thank you Dee," I replied. "You've always got on with Keith."

"Known him a very long time. He was with your sister: he must have preferred you."

(Hang on, was she speaking as Dee, or as Diana? I knew the rumour.)

Ken said, "I cannot discuss what we know about Keith. But Dee is fresh to and I must say, Dee, it is disappointing to hear that you are religious in how you describe when you could join our eucharistic community.

"We like you, Ken," 'Dee' said.

"Linda. I must tell you more. I understand Dee has said you were tired, and you have denied that you were with a man. Dee is either misinformed or covering up for you. Sorry, but you were seen with a man at a restaurant. It were - was - an Indian restaurant. The man came back to yer 'ouse with you. You both went inside. So you could be having an affair, Linda. Dee, your eyes are looking up to the roof of this gazebo. Are you shocked or frustrated about this?"

"It's none of your lot's fucking business," 'Dee' said. "Yes, she was with a man, and he is a friend. She does have friends, you know. What you forget is that I was in the restaurant as well. I certainly know who the man is. He was discussing SMS business with Linda and me. And did these people who saw Linda also see me go separately to her curate's house?"

"Oh, I don't know anything about this."

Dee then said, "You see, Reverend Ken, Keith Jupitas is in SMS. It is a very sensitive matter for him, with all those check-ups."

"Oh," said Ken. "They'd not finished?"

Actually, I thought that this was rather clever. Surely this would get back to the bishop. Now I could raise the stakes! "Loose ends," I said. "Remember, Ken, everything depends on this meeting being confidential. You have made an oath on this: this meeting comes under the 'seal of the confessional'. I abide by this and so do you."

"Adam Magellan," said Ken. "You entertained Adam Magellan."

Diana tried to follow through: "Yes, one of the town's investigators. He was involved. Check it if... No, you must not."

"I am reminding you, the Reverend Confessor Ken." I asserted.

"Yes," said Ken. "Can I ask, then, why is a wife of an employee still discussing SMS business without knowledge of her husband?"

"Well, have you heard of their Independent Inspection Unit, the one that checks if the checking is robust and uncorrupted?"

"Yes. 'Interdependent', they now call it." (He was clearly well-informed.)

I needed to continue with this. "Well, from time to time wives and others do a job with investigators to test out the robustness of the operation. And they had an annual test, sure, but it went on further into legacies."

"I'm sure Keith and Yojana have finished all that," said Ken.

"Finished what, Ken?" I asked. "You seem to know them well, when he is secular and she is a Hindu."

"Yes, I probably do," he said. "Look, I won't inform Keith or Yojana but what you say cannot be true."

"Why not, Ken?"

"They had finished; there was no legacy. The firm had evaluated everything and completed everything before Adam and you were at the restaurant. It cannot be why you were with Adam Magellan."

"Both of us, I told you," Diana said, as Dee, or as a lying Diana perhaps.

"Would you tell me how there were three of you?" asked Ken.

Diana adjusted her story. "Okay. Linda knew she was being followed, so I was already in the restaurant, Ken, and I didn't come out until later. I got to Linda's and went in round the back. Don't forget: Keith was away that night. I'll tell you what we were discussing. We were discussing SMS involvement, but in how they were following Linda, along with the group that has these badges - like you have a badge, Ken."

I was thinking: he must now tell them they were getting it wrong. It would come back to me, 'corrected'.

Then I stood up and faced Ken directly, fully frontal, hands on hips. "Come on Ken. You wear this badge, and I now know Yojana has this badge, because she compared hers with the Reverend Christine's. And I think the bishop is involved. I worked with SMS, and Adam did his investigating, and now we three - Adam, Dee, me - think SMS are in on this. I know that my husband has been having an affair with Cheryl Mould, as Adam Magellan did discover much earlier, but there is ongoing SMS activity and something also between my husband and Yojana."

I looked at him carefully. This reference to Yojana had worked. He said, "This is getting very uncomfortable for me."

"Oh, do tell," I said.

"This is not SMS but a group called The Worshipful Company of Serninsea Theatrical Players."

I sat down. "Seriously?"

"Seriously," he said.

"Is my husband involved?"

"I don't know the ins and outs of all this, but a lot of what you are saying cannot be true."

"Ken, we know that you have a lot more information than you are letting on."

"I think you have tricked me into saying more than I ever intended, or should have yet, via something that wasn't true."

"Ken: I remind you that this conversation - this that is happening now - is under the seal of the confessional."

"As you've said several times. Look, I'm in an impossible situation here. I hear everything and can say nothing. Can't we change the subject? Because we are all trying to conceal things. In fact, I am beginning to wonder at the point of it all. I'm just in the middle, having to keep my mouth shut."

"Ah," I said. "You're like a go-between. Well, rest assured, Ken, Dee and I are not Dumb and Dumber, you know."

"Evidently."

"As I run up to my ordination, something odd is going on, and clearly more is to be revealed. So, there is something you haven't said 'yet'. Is it your job to say it? And when it is said, Ken, I will be ready."

"The seal of the confessional runs both ways," he said.

"Not quite," I said. "Laity are not expected to understand."

"Dee?" he asked.

She said, "Don't panic. We'll keep the conversation to ourselves."

He said, "I'm reassured. Linda, I'd like to speak outside this seal of..."

"No, Ken, you must keep confidences. I'll be ready."

"Then let us change the subject."

'Dee' said, "Okay. New balls... Sorry!"

"Em, can I," asked Ken, "talk to my Baptist friend about your Unitarianism and Paganism, Dee?"

"No," she replied. "I don't want him criticising me."

I thought, that was a shame because it might have generated something interesting. So I said to her, "You can take criticism. Let him talk about religion only to his mate."

"Really? Oh, go on then," said Diana. "You can tell your Baptist mate that I am one of your out and out heretics. But that's all."

"Thank you," he said. "The bishop is so uninformed," he repeated.

"Not the bishop," said Diana.

I said, "Look, let's really change the subject. The last thing we want is for you to be uncomfortable in our presence. We want you to relax, Ken."

"Yes," Ken said. "Good idea. What topic can we cover?"

"The pastoral letter. The diocese is heading for a crash."

"Oh yes," said Ken. "That pastoral from Bishop Julian is very serious, like. I'm sure he is right to call upon the guidance of the Holy Spirit. We believe in that Dee, even if you don't - if you don't mind me saying."

"No," Diana replied, looking a bit fidgety. She pulled one leg up to the curved bench; she looked at him look at her and face away again, and she put her leg back down.

I suggested that things could unravel at the very top, upon publication, and Ken seemed worried, saying that there are people who want the report published, and there are others who don't want it published. He referred to the lack of competent management, the waste and the bad administration.

"What about the Suffragan Bishop of Bolingbroke?" I asked. "Does he want it suppressing or revealing?"

"I don't know," said Ken. "I honestly don't know."

"But he's at the centre, the control room, Ken."

"Please don't," he responded.

I said, "Perhaps he's only at the centre in the, what is it, The Worshipful Company of..."

Diana completed it: "Serninsea Theatrical Players."

"I think I must be moving," said Ken.

At which point, Diana pulled up both her legs, and his eyes did move to look between them. Diana started laughing.

"What are you laughing for?" I asked her.

"Oh what a tangled web we weave," said Diana.

"I know," said Kenneth. "I feel very bad about this. I don't think what is happening is ethical. I really want to be going, ladies."

"Not ethical here?" I asked.

"No. In general. In the Worshipful Company. You will be contacted."

"Oh," I said. "We should have changed the subject properly. What about this Baptist mate of yours? What does he say against these Unitarians?"

"My Baptist colleague told me all about Jonathan Edwards clashing with William Ellery Channing in America. Edwards was a Calvinist and Channing was a Unitarian. Have you heard about them? He preached on them. I hope your liberal approach, Linda, is not influenced by Dee's William Ellery Channing."

"I don't know about... who?" asked Diana, from real ignorance. Her legs were back up.

"I thought every Unitarian would know about William Ellery Channing. According to my friend."

"Well, I don't," said Diana as Dee, looking down at herself and twitching at her pubic hair with her right forefinger.

Ken said, "And, em, oh dear, Sunday you have your sermon on the Trinity itself, Linda. Hope it is orthodox."

"It is Ken, written to preach what the Church teaches."

Suddenly we all lost focus. I notice he was trying to ignore Diana, with her looking at me while playing with her outer pubic lips.

After referring to the the garden and trees he then said, "I need a toilet."

I said, "If it's a piss, water the verges."

"The verger?" asked Diana, sniggering.

I said, "Ken, go out, face away from us, so we won't see anything and piss on the verge over there."

With him gone, I said, "Diana, we need to soup this up a bit. Show him a bit more."

"What do you think I've been doing? He was going to say something."

"I'll ask about his recent woman."

As he came back into the gazebo, now with my left ankle on my right leg, and surely about to say again that he wanted to leave, I said, "Dee, Ken here has been having the pleasure of a new girlfriend."

"That was personal," he said. "But no longer."

I stopped myself from saying she was linked to this group. I wanted him to stay, not go.

It was Diana who said, "Sit down, Ken; you seem to be handling a few issues."

"I'd like to be, er, friendly."

Diana said. "I'm just Linda's mate. You back in the market, Ken?"

"I really must be moving." Ken stood up.

Diana crossed her legs to mirror mine. "This bishop: sounds like he's got a database," she said. "And an ego like some actors perhaps?"

"Sorry Dee," he said. "He might get things wrong but you have him wrong. He is very pastoral, very progressive, in touch with the community, knows its economics, its networks. He's close to the diocesan. I know the top is inefficient. He's at the control booth, directs the... Oh it doesn't matter. It does not matter. I'm fed up with this."

Diana told him, "I was at that attracting business conference." She put her leg down and her forearms over her knees. "He is creepy."

"No Dee, no. Does he really give... that impression?"

"Spying on our activities?"

Diana was now rubbing her breasts. Normally it might be one way to make an impression as a naturist when you fancy someone - not as if you can put something on nice and revealing, is it? She was playing a dangerous game, here.

The Reverend Ken then said, "Well, most interesting to have met you both together. Another time too, I hope. Different circumstances, maybe? Shall we go back? I'd like to dress and prepare for my next appointment."

Diana then shocked me, going way off the script. "You go back with him, Linda. I'm going to masturbate."

He said, "Excuse me; excuse us. Maybe see you again. Enjoy your, er..."

"Sorry, I'm feeling a bit randy between my legs," Diana said, recklessly in my opinion.

"Come on Ken," I said. "She's a man-eater, that one."

Walking across the garden with him, he was being led by his sexual excitement meter and he kept glancing back until indoors. I stood in the lounge while he dressed. When he looked out he saw her wave.

I emphasised to him again, "She says you can talk to your Baptist mate about her religion - and that's all."

"I know. But I can contact Dee?"

"For now, contact her only through me."

He became a clothed clergyman again.

"You have a very wonderful friend," he said. "I'm just so sorry that things are getting conflicted and difficult."

With Patricia's dressing gown on I saw him to the door and he left.

As I went back and dropped the gown, Diana had come into the conservatory and was sat down. She said, "What a creep! I bet he wanks himself off tonight."

"I thought you'd gone off your trolley!"

"I can handle him."

"What if he's a stalker?"

"I bet he's never been in a theatre in his life. He's in a masons-like group, and, Linda, they want you to be in it. That's what it is. Worshipful Company, right? Insiders. And what does all this Channing mean? Never heard of him. In fact, I hadn't a clue what I was supposed to be on about. This Baptist chap might tell him I was talking bullshit - for all I know."

"I'm not sure what will loop back," I said. "So they are going to invite me to join. He ought to be able to tell them."

"No, he will keep it to himself. My bet is he is under pressure to report back, but the visible strain on him says he won't. So I just gave him something to look at. He won't tell them even about that."

"He did give us the group's name."

"Yes, he's jumped the gun - trying to be honest within confidentiality. Therefore he'll say nothing to protect his mistake. You don't need to find this out any more. Secondly, they will approach you anyway. Let them choose their timing. Just be aware."

"We were successful, then."

"Yes. Don't give me that look or shuffle. You are the one person I know capable of anything. I bet Patricia watched while Arthur shagged you. What I did and said is nothing compared with what you do. Keith and Lucinda were at it and it bloody well runs in your family."

"Diana. What is the matter?"

"I'm not telling you any more. I already observe the confessing sealworld." She did some seal-like clapping motions.

"We haven't got a Sealworld," I said. "I think you are starting to fantasise - Dee."

And so we paused. We were even half dozing in the conservatory until an alarm clock went off to remind us to clothe and leave before any inquisitive inhabitants started coming back.

However, Patricia came in just as we were going out..

"Good time with the visitor?" Patricia asked. "Did he get his togs off as well?"

"He did," said Diana. "But he is another creep, like her bishop. And she is scheming and it will bite her on her exposed bottom."

Outside, with Patricia inside and the door closed, I said, "More like he'll bite your bottom."

"Ugh."

And so Diana and I went our separate car-journey ways.

Chapter 10 Ordination in Doubt

Narrator: Keith Two Bishops Meet Keith (Saturday 15th June)

Bishop John Barman wanted to see me in the Blue Diamond Club in Titansea after lunch. Linda was out; I told him she was with Adam Magellan. Elizabeth and Yojana were somewhere else in the building; he'd seen Elizabeth earlier.

The BDC had a shared ownership between Terry Barman and Sanjay Bunker; the Red Diamond Club or RDC in Felixstowe was a shared ownership between Jonathan Eyre and Sanjay Bunker. Christine Vine wanted in on both, but so far her offers had been rejected. Sanjay Bunker wanted a Green Diamond Club or GDC to open in Hartlepool, but the council didn't think it was the sort of place wanted in Hartlepool's rejuvenation, and Elizabeth had suggested that Middlesbrough was more desperate and willing. Jonathan wanted to establish the Pink Diamond Club in Margate, Brighton or Worthing, but could not decide where.

I had a simple meal at the BDC with Terry Barman while a naked woman and a naked man gyrated in rehearsal alongside on stage for a show.

The bishop said that Linda, her friend and Ken Osis had all been viewed starkers in Patricia Rhymes' garden thanks to powerful binoculars used by George Wickenby or hired associates. Terry knew that Linda had now seen Ken twice recently. This morning Ken Osis refused to tell the bishop what had been said in the gazebo. Nevertheless Terry Barman said he sounded conflicted and unhappy.

I said I couldn't think why Diana de Groot might be introduced to Ken. The only equivalent male naturist in the area was Jeremy Symes, and he had his own problems. Linda and Diana might well have been up to something, but Linda was not going to tell me.

The bishop said he was minded to introduce a Clergy Discipline Measure to Jeremy Symes, should his wife expose his affair, but he wasn't going to do the same to Linda.

The bishop also knew that Linda had been seen looking out of Adam Magellan's upstairs window at Upper Road. She was engaged in conversation with Mrs. Gertrude Carter (I knew her) at the time, who was on the street below. He had received this information second hand.

I said that there was no doubt about it that Linda was screwing Adam Magellan. Terry Barman considered that he might use the information, but he'd had his fingers burnt recently over incorrect information that then gives the game away.

The two on stage stopped dancing. Then Elizabeth and Yojana came through, and Yojana got on the stage to do a striptease dance for the three of us. The music was suddenly loud and prevented conversation. Yojana ended her dance with a masturbatory element, but Elizabeth gestured her to join us, and so the music stopped as we clapped her effort and Yojana came across and sat naked next to Liz, receiving her kiss.

Resuming my conversation, I said that Linda and I were being civilised but she wanted her freedom, as with seeing Adam.

"Seeing Magellan is one experience," said Terry Barman, "but her freedom is to be submitted to the Confraternity under our bishops' direction."

Liz said, "She is a clergywoman and has made ordination vows of obedience. Well, we've been in touch with Jonathan and have decided it is time to intensify our move on Linda. We still have to retain the group's secrecy."

The key moment was her priesting, after which she could not refuse to be recruited. She would then be the arm of the bishop, according to Catholic theory, and must follow the demands of Vanguard Confraternity bishops.

I said that there was a possible purchase on her given Colin Cromer's particular dislike for Adam Magellan. About six years back or so this Rumanian woman had presented herself to the church choir that still functioned then, getting close to Colin, but after doing some SMS business she ended up marrying Adam Magellan. It was a marriage mainly for her convenience, but it upset Colin Cromer. I added that I remembered the choir and her arrival; I did not realise until they'd left the area that her daughter worked on the Youells' farm next to the Bodes'; Yootha Ann did not go to the church.

And then, what should happen but Colin Cromer himself contacted John Barman by his mobile phone! One of the congregation had suffered a fall, outside Adam Magellan's place of all places, and she was inside our mini-hospital waiting for tests (a clinic with some beds). The fall could be more serious than it appeared and they might subject her to mental tests. It was normally his day off, and Linda's too, and Linda had her mobile phone off. Did the bishop know of any available clergy? Colin Cromer was asking.

I said, quietly, "Tell Colin. Tell him who she's with."

"I happen to know something that might annoy you," said Bishop Terry. "The Reverend Linda is having a day out with Adam Magellan, and it is a social day out. Her husband is concerned. I am considering whether she should in fact be ordained priest."

I could hear much of the reaction. It was on the lines that she was out of control. Colin Cromer said that she has so much to learn, and simply did not seem to be doing it. He even said, and I was amazed to overhear that it was, "a pity her husband had not been ordained," because I'd have known my priorities.

Liz said, afterwards, "We can put that right if you reapply."

"Would be difficult in Harwich," I said. "I do want to join Cheryl."

Terry said there was no mistake over training Linda. Her sexual talents were required.

I told them that Linda did not want me to go to Wales, where she would visit her family directly before her retreat and ordination. Indeed, I did not want to go either as I had never liked her parents and they had never liked me.

Yojana commented that my family had been respectable.

"They were but my mother was odd, in private. Into my teens she would tell me to wash my nether regions and often made sure herself that they were washed. She used to say that dogs could smell urine and I should not sit in respectable company with dogs sniffing at my crotch." Only by the sixth form, I said, had my mother stopped interfering with my sweaty areas at the top of my legs.

I thought that Linda might steal Lucinda's new Welsh husband; after all, throughout their lives, they used to take what the other had enjoyed. Indeed, Lucinda accused Linda of stealing me. That wasn't true, as such.

Terry wondered if I could go there and wander off with Lucinda again and create more rivalry. The more Linda was unsteady, the better for her flexibility.

"Fraid not."

This bishop himself mentioned prohibitive expense if Wickenby observed the farm. I said it was a remote farm, up a long private road, with security CCTV. But unless Linda did 'steal' Dyfed, Lucinda's husband, there'd be nothing to observe.

Liz agreed. His efforts ought to concentrate on the retreat. What did he have planned?

Terry said that the ordinands get paired off, so he would pair her with Christine. There were interviews front and back; Terry might try and disturb Linda further there but, obviously, did not want heightened doubts to threaten her ordination. Also, for afterwards, he'd been in touch with Gretta Cox-Jenkins to test out Linda, prior to us moving in on her: he'd given Gretta a profile of naturist Linda that she could use. Gretta might start something of a Confraternity in Canada, he thought, except her position was complicated: she had been a bishop in the Independent 'wandering bishop' sense. British law and Church law now prevented people saying that these were pretend bishops.

Terry Barman was, however, concerned about Christine pushing her sacrifice and service theology on to Linda. The new bishops were attracted by pleasure, and so should Linda.

Liz thought Christine was bishop material, evident by her thinking influence, and thought that pleasure and pain weren't so far apart.

I pointed out that I would end up as one of the SMS visitors to above the casino, coming from the south, so with less to contribute.

I said Linda was gaining knowledge about the group, and of course Magellan was likely to get interested.

Liz said that we had to move forward. Christine had deliberately shown her variant badge and Yojana revealed hers. Ken might have introduced the cover name of the group. Everyone had to communicate with discretion.

Before we parted I gave the three a kind of speech. "I've never loved her, you know. I say I have, but now she has found out about Cheryl, I don't think I ever did. She was a good and willing shag at university, and a support, and I've supported her back and respected her privacy. It was just my inability to make a future that kept me with her and then the prospect of ordination. I was successfully tempted by her sister again, but she's repulsive. I had sex with Linda's friend Diana, and nearly with Patricia Rhymes. When I was not ordained, and she was, that was always going to be the end. I'll just stay in the curate's house for my convenience, but I can move away even if in Serninsea. I don't care what she does with Adam Magellan. I view him with contempt. The thing is, the orgasm indicates the divine spark, and I want as many of them with as many women as I can. And I do fancy Cheryl like a comfort blanket, so long as she doesn't become irritating."

Liz asked me to stay with Linda at least to ordination, and Terry said until they could trap her and give her no options, and have her working inside the group. I would not be asked to mentor her. Stephen McPhail was likely to have that task and Terry would initiate her.

On more general matters Terry said that The National Church Report into the Managerial Efficiency of the Diocese of Wytham might result in the fall of the diocesan bishop and he'd like to work himself into that position. He'd need to be a step in front of his suffragan colleague, Julian Worsley.

Yojana said Middlesbrough and Wales had been very good, but their shared 'strap on' relationship wasn't sufficient to tempt her to transfer to SMS in Hartlepool.

I said, "They may ask you to move to South Wales."

Liz said she stayed with Yojana last night but had to travel back to Middlesbrough today to do her Sunday diocesan duties. With that, I left them for my private gathering with two friends.

A Park, a Garden and the Hospital (Saturday 15th June)

I'd already sent Adam a message that this masons-like group (Diana) was apparently called The Worshipful Company of Serninsea Theatrical Players. Adam had replied that he would be free Saturday, this being my half-weekend off. (Monday off made up for working on Sunday.)

Adam, alone in the building, came downstairs. "Okay, I could do with a break for my birthday, so no more on the religious nutters."

"I've not brought you anything."

"You've brought you!"

"Aw, that's nice Adam."

"Ann approves of you."

On the front door step he said that Ann and Labhaoise had bought the empty next door property (the northern one with a double garage attached) quite some time back, and had presented the news as a surprise for his birthday. They had acquired a change to business service use (but allowing accommodation). So he signed today with Ann to merge the properties. His business would still have to buy it.

"Not exactly a birthday gift, then."

We went out from the town in my vehicle.

"So where we going?" he asked me, as I drove more or less south out of town.

"Somewhere local: Caffen Park, and not the car park but the B road just about where the woods are. There's a pull-in there, and not a lot use it, so there should be a space."

"Opening more of the Caffen Line is good, using the extra grant," he said. "The workfare lot and others will be down there finishing off. It needed a brand new link line - single track from the branch to the fragment of mainline. It's a fascinating project."

"Yes, but I'd rather not look at that today. Just sit where we can look, eat, and chat. And then we can go back to my place or yours. I could give you a birthday treat."

The B road went from Upper Park near Serninsea to the edge of Caffen Park, and we turned left, past a car park, and right. Where we stopped in a little indent off the road we looked east, with a wood behind us and the view back towards Serninsea and the coast in front.

"Dogging," he said. "Behind that wall and beyond."

"Not here, I don't think. The favourite haunt is Carr Wood," I suggested.

"Ah, it goes on in several places," he said. "I should know. I've viewed people."

"I didn't know you were a voyeur."

"It's called investigating. The people who avoid their wives, that sort of thing, or wives who drive to have some husband-free fun."

"You're the expert. Anyway, it is lunch-time so I brought these sandwiches."

"Aha. So we are not getting out of the car. We're not going down into the woods today, where you can be sure of a big surprise. What have you been doing lately?" he asked me, as if I was some sort of stranger.

"Most recently reading and writing about the Trinity," I said. "I want some of it to be extempore. Tomorrow we celebrate what few understand, and I'm not sure I do either."

"I bet that will be riveting."

"I fear it will be bogged down. I lack communication skills."

"Right, a little bit of insight - even training - for you around messaging."

"Sounds relevant."

"There's a wall around this parking spot. What does your phone say about the grid reference?"

I looked. "It's TF 493 797."

He said, "Do us a favour, as it is you. So in my pocket is a tin, and in this tin - hang on - is a piece of yellow chalk."

"You've got white as well in there."

"Take the yellow one. It's a very old method, this, as I can't use electronics in this case. In my other pocket is a little plastic pouch where you can see some paper content inside for a friend. Here we are. If you can find a gap in that wall where you can push it in out of sight, push it in, and make a vertical chalk line very close by. If it won't go in anywhere, bring it back."

I went out with the items and looked, and there was actually a missing part of stone and mortar. In went the pouch. I made the yellow chalk mark.

"How does the person know where to go?" I asked, having got back behind the wheel.

"Because the message I'm writing now is a coded grid reference for finding the message itself, the first six words of which reveal the number grid reference and the next one or two letters are usually TF or, rarely, SK. So, hang on..." He was writing. "I've put: Food Nine then send night selection to feed. The fact that nine is Nine helps not hinders. I want this to be understood, so I won't ask Labhaoise to translate it into Irish Gaelic, which I do before coding for really secure messages."

"Here's your yellow chalk back, chuck. Er... What's the future, Adam? That's what I want to talk about. When Keith leaves me, for Harwich: well there's still your Rumanian wife. I'm divorcing."

"Is this some sort of proposal? By the way, she and Yootha became British."

"Only I'd like us to be more close, more together, more of a mutual comfort, even if it is looser, more unconventional and under the radar."

I wasn't sure why I wanted to partner up so quickly. The advantage was convenience: that I knew him already and I liked to have someone on tap.

"This view is boring," he said. "I know where to go for a view that might be more interesting."

"I'll drive there then," I said, "once we've eaten these."

"Well, no, I've three sarnies left so let's have them there. You've three left as well."

"Eat them here!"

"Are we arguing already?"

"No." So I drove off. He directed me south, until I took us into Caffenmere village itself. I turned left into the B road at the shops area, over the main road, and then right at a minor road to pause after all at the opening tram stop on the line extension.

"The Caffen Line, it is being called, throughout," he said. "Naming it all after these posher parts. Drive on Bode."

"Huh," I muttered. So we proceeded further down this road, and at a junction he told me to turn right, so that we were facing north east. And we were close to a hedge and a gap of a gate, over which in the fair distance was the back of a large house. So this was its large garden of lawns and clumps of trees. You could have put a garden party and tennis courts in it.

"Do you know what that is?" he asked me.

"Nope. A big house at Caffenmere. Edge of Caffenmere."

"This is the residence of a certain Bishop John Terence Barman, who suggested successfully that they call the new tramline the Caffen Line. The obvious name was Ingle Line."

"Or Serninsea Line or the Sernin Line," I said.

"Well yes, but they wanted a distinctive name."

"Sernin is distinctive. How many places in England are named after a Toulouse bishop, for goodness sake? Adam, what are we doing at the Bishop of Bolingbroke's back gate, me with you, when he has had people spying on me when I was going out with you?"

"Sandwiches now. Keep your eyes open. If you see a bloke as tall as you coming up his back garden, so to speak, then we'll scarper."

"Was that a euphemism, Adam?"

"Get your baps out then."

"That doesn't work either. They're sliced."

"Have you got any milk to drink?"

"Not if you mean in my baps."

"Not having had any children."

"They're redundant except for sexual thrills, Adam. Fancy living in that bloody thing. I bet he has loads of parties and receptions, and dodgy goings on in there."

"Never had the pleasure to investigate," Adam said. "I read the other day that some women can teach their bodies to express milk without having had any children."

"I've had enough of tailoring my body to meet male requirements. By the way, Diana thinks he and they are running a kind of masonic outfit. It must be for mutual advantage or something. Christine has a badge different from all the others I've seen. So there must be other branches."

We sat there, eating and looking at the bishop's garden.

All of a sudden I had to say, "Oh Adam, put it away! Do you not know where we are? Adam! This is a public road!"

He said, "I'm trying to prevent needing a piss. If I don't do this, I need a piss."

"Adam!"

"All right, I'm getting out to find a place to pee."

"Didn't you go before you came out? I have to have a dump before coming out."

"I referred to my bladder, not bowels."

"I can pee without shitting, Adam, though I can't shit without peeing. It's so easy for men."

"You're such a model of femininity, reverend," he said.

He got out (todger returned under cover) and wandered around. Oh no, he went through the gateway and behind the hedge of the garden boundary.

I let the window down and called out, "Adam! Adam! That's private property! And not only private, but it's my effing bishop's!"

The sound of him going now did nothing for my resistance. How does this happen? One minute you're perfectly content, and next minute you suddenly need to go. Now I was looking around. No access behind anywhere to anything useful, except through this gate left open.

Out I got, and he was finishing as I joined him. "Bastard!" I said to him.

"What - have you come for something?"

"Yes, the same thing." Down my trousers came, but, oh, how could I do this keeping them dry? "Hang on to me," I told him. So his arms went under my arms to hold me, allowing me to stick my bottom forward and just piss. And this was some jet I did, into the bishop's hedge.

He said, "Someone's coming."

"What?"

"Oh no. It's a tree in the distance."

"You fucking bastard!"

"Your parents should wash your mouth out. Oh no, they wouldn't."

"Good job I don't need a shit," I said.

"You've no knickers. Again."

"No. Come on, let's get out of here, and let's drive away."

So we got into the car, and I did drive off.

"You've never been into the bishop's?" he asked.

"No, actually. And I hadn't seen his place from the rear."

"That's a relief," he said. "Seeing his place from his arsehole."

"Let's go to the coast," I said. "It's not so far away."

Funny how often after a pee the first thing you do is drink. I had some peach flavoured water in my door pocket, so we shared it. The best way to go was to Caffemere, along the A road to Ingle Park, then down the B road to Inglemire and then well south past the area of Ingle Under Drain to come up the coastal road among the dunes. Parking, we walked past Ingle Barrow to gain access on to the dunes over the hump on to the sand. And this is where we sat, viewing the sea and a few people and the odd dog being walked. Houses for the well-off (like the McPhails) were a little way north.

"Stay overnight tonight?" I asked.

"Is he in Harwich?"

"No. I want to make a point. You are my partner now."

"I can't do that! Anyway, it's something to discuss."

"He openly sees Cheryl. We can use the second bedroom."

"Last time I saw him it could have come to blows."

"I want it to come to blows," I said, "But only inside a bed with you."

"You are filthy, Linda."

"Look, he and I made an agreement. He stays around as if with me until even after the ordination. It's you and me for the future, Adam."

"Are we?"

"Why not?"

"You made that Mary Ann respectable, so why can't you make me respectable - in public?"

"Because I'm still married. I'm not a respectability service."

"you were once. I really fancy getting all my things off. I don't care Adam, though I do hope that the bishop didn't have some back gate security camera hidden somewhere."

"Otherwise he has a nice video of you pissing while I hold on to you."

"Oh, I'd do a theology of that," I said.

"No idea what you are on about," he responded. "

"The theology of Georges Bataille?"

"Never heard of him. I've heard of Nora Batty. Keep your clothes on - there are people about."

"French. A bit unusual, 'The eye', as in the seeing thing, 'and I', as in me, and rather a lot on body fluids and excreting, spherical and near objects inserted in vaginas that are a bit squishy. I mean, if you'd fancied a boiled egg I could have kept it warm."

"Oh lovely," he said. "Theology? I might come to that sermon - not. Peter would go. Linda: we don't match, really, but we kind of get on. I grant that you are also curious: investigating this badge-wearing bunch. But really were are both misfits. A shared memory, too."

"Perhaps, like Nietzsche, I should thrust out alone."

"Well, that was quick, you and me."

"I tried to introduce Nietzsche's Ubermensch, without naming him, back in Lent. I got told off then."

"Taxi driver, was he?"

And with my blank look he stared towards the sea with nothing more said. So I unzipped him and carried on doing what he'd started before.

"Keep your clothes on," he said again.

With some distant people gone, I added a bit of mouth cover for extra effect. It had the intended effect. "All right now?" I asked him, finding a tissue in my pocket to wipe the blobs on exposed flesh.

"Fancy fish and chips?" he asked. "Those sarnies were fuck all. Sorry, but they were."

We walked back. I said, "Come on, be brave. I'll get three fish and chips but you stay with me overnight. Or we could stay at yours."

"You don't want to stay overnight in my bed. It's a bit grotty."

So it was into Titansea and heading towards a good fish and chip shop. However, on the way, Adam switched on my mobile phone and found that I had received a text, and it was from Colin Cromer. It was very unusual for Colin to text anything. So Adam read it.

Gertrude Carter admitted to clinic hospital after fall in street. Having tests. Know it is weekend but can you visit?

I diverted to the small hospital and clinic in Serninsea. She was alone in one of the four small wards (two beds per ward). I reckoned that it didn't matter if Adam came in with me, and he knew of this long-term resident in town. But when we arrived, and came around the corner, Colin was with Mrs. Carter. This meant that Adam had shown his face.

"Everyone," I said. "This is Adam Magellan." I said to Adam, for cover, "I'll take you to my friend's when the visit is over."

"I can go," he said, more nervously than I'd expect. (I should have been the nervous one.) "But thank you for your assistance so far."

"Wait! I won't be long."

Mrs Carter said, "Hello Reverend Linda; hello Adam; I've been a bit unlucky. How are Mrs. Dromeghda and Mrs. Vlahos?"

"Fine, thank you."

Colin said, "Gertrude here was walking along into Upper Road around from the promenade and you fell on the pavement - one of those slabs sticking up. Near your business."

"Sue them," said Adam.

"Gertrude was brought into our little A and E and they think there could be more to investigate. Look, I'll go for an hour," said Colin to me, "and then I can come back, hopefully. No, don't you come with me." With that, Colin left.

"Did you see what I did?" asked Mrs. Carter.

"Yes," said Adam.

"What did you do, Gert?" I asked her.

"I asked about Ann and Labhaoise, and not about... Oh, does she know?"

"Yes, Linda knows," Adam said.

"And not about Mary Ann. Colin was very close to Mary Ann and then Adam married her. I'm afraid she took fright at being a clergyman's wife."

"I can quite understand it," I said, and then wondered why I'd said it.

Gert Carter said, "She was seen as 'foreign'. People are unkind. You must have been kind," she said to Adam.

Or disinterested, I thought.

He replied, "She and Yootha Ann wanted to live in this country - goodness knows why. Marrying her helped her feel more secure. You know all about this, don't you Gertrude?"

"Yes, young man. Her daughter found no one locally. She still left our area because marrying you made her situation worse among the gossips."

He said, "Less messing about for her now we're leaving the EU."

I asked her, "Are you walking all right?"

"I'm not unsteady on my feet," she replied, "and not in my head either. That pavement," said Mrs. Carter. "Do you remember, curate? You were leaning out of that upstairs window talking to me. That's where I tripped. Today. I looked up again and went over. When we chatted, reverend, I could see you moving. I'm not losing my marbles and I won't tell."

I said, "We were going to get some fish and chips but came here directly."

So what happened is that we sat with Mrs. Carter for some time, including seeing a doctor who came with x-ray results.

The doctor said, "It's a lot better than we feared. It looks black and it will be black down your upper left leg, but you are very lucky. You must have good bones. You're in good working order."

"Yes, doctor. I was telling the happy couple."

I said, "Mrs Carter lives alone..."

"The other minister has already contacted a relative to come over to Serninsea."

"Oh good," I said.

Doctors never stay long. She was off in a flash.

And indeed this woman relative arrived, over from Wytham, introduced as Gabrielle Edwards, who said we could go if we wanted, and she would stay until Colin Cromer returned, due then in about ten minutes.

Mrs Carter said, "Thank you for coming, Gabrielle. This our curate and it looks like she is entertaining a new partner."

I said, "No, Mrs. Carter, I am still married. Adam is a friend."

"Push and pull the other one," said Gert. "Last time I saw Keith in church, you two were distant."

"I'd like to say you are very perceptive, Mrs. Carter, but I think this time you are reading more into this than is the case. I'll no doubt see you very soon. Come on Adam. Bye, Mrs. Edwards."

Out in the corridor Adam started laughing.

I said, "Hey shit face, she knew you were humping me. And that fucking weirdo woman with the dog: she too must have known you were humping me."

"My female neighbour? Is she weird? Ah, the Reverend Cromer," Adam said.

Colin had been coming along the corridor.

"Her cousin has arrived," I said.

Colin said, "Share the same great grandparents, lost in time. I'll just say a quick hello then."

So Adam and I got into my car, me paying a hefty parking fee (I put it on my expenses), and then we went for the fish and chips - three portions.

"Colin is going to read me the riot act," I said to Adam. "You are coming to my place because I am not going to take his shit for nothing."

"He hates my guts."

Along the way with the grub, Adam said to me. "See that bus stop there. There is a fence behind it. If you stop here, I will get out and put my little reference message behind it. See, I have the chalk and I have a drawing pin in my little box. The chalk will say I've left it. The pin is for picking up something left for me. Let me out here, drive up and park, and I'll get back in further up."

So I paused, while looking. These are the days of CCTV! Does this method work these days? Then I drove two hundred yards or so further up. It meant he walked in a straight line.

"That's a camera," I said.

"Behind me. I didn't need to turn around."

"You've received a message?"

"Yes. And I left the grid reference in the form I wrote it. So there's a pin in and a chalk mark. The message is in the package you left at the grid reference, in that wall."

"What does your message there say?"

"The client is ready to meet me."

"And what will the client find back at the wall?"

"Actually, where to meet me, when, and how to travel."

"Adam. This is a crap system. You're on CCTV, and anyone could work that grid reference out."

"Peter has said similar. Let's go and eat these fish and chips."

"And then I am going to fuck your brains out."

Narrator: Keith Visit to Helen and Stephen (Saturday 15th June)

I received an invitation to visit Stephen and Helen McPhail down at Ingle Barrow.

"It's all going very well, from my perspective, with Cheryl, Yojana and Linda. You're likely to mentor Linda," I told Stephen, who smiled.

Helen said, "We don't think everything has to be under the Confraternity. We two fancied using some of your expertise. But first, come to our playroom."

The lighting had been altered, Stephen demonstrated, but also he had a new contraption he had made in the forge and a woodwork room. It was a double A frame device, where an A at each end in metal-supported oak held a high pole and lower polls between them with attached chains and a central plank that could move up and down.

Helen stripped off and did a demonstration, with Stephen using velcro attached wrist cuffs attached to chains to raise her arms and then attaching velcro ankle cuffs to widen Helen's legs. He used a winder to raise the plank to apply pressure to her vulva. The person could be pushed long the plank, with a burning sensation, to be whipped or anything else.

"It can be used to give pleasure or apply discipline," Stephen said.

She said, "With the velcro cuffs you're totally powerless."

I said they didn't need my expertise here.

"Not this," said Helen, having her wrists and ankles released. "Linda can take a penis right down her throat but I can't, and you altered her anus. And seeing as you are here, Stevie can lie on that chaise longue and fuck my vag, and you can press down into my arse.

"She doesn't get many chances, even at Worshipful Company events, to have two males at once."

So there was I really forcing my rod the wrong way through her sphincter and down her tube and feeling, through a thin membrane, another man's penis on mine. We tried to alternate the in-out for Helen's pleasure.

Helen actually enjoying this movement (many wouldn't) asked me to tell when I first approached Linda's throat.

"Obviously, I remember it well. It was 9th November 1997. Deng Xiaoping had died, Agnes Gonxha Bojaxhiu went heavenward, Diana Windsor was dead, Isaiah Berlin had departed somehow; er, Tony Blair was vertical and kicking politics, Yeltsin was barely vertical, Clinton had a part of him nearly vertical. Aqua's annoying Barbie Girl was number 1." With that, I shoved hard.

"Crumbs," said Stephen. "Barbie Girl was number 1."

"I remember these only because of Linda. I had a gift-wrapped cloth bag of items, but I only revealed each item as needed."

Not sure I liked feeling his manhood below mine.

"I said to her that everyone has a pharyngeal reflex or laryngeal spasm, and this prevents the penis going too far into the mouth. But with training, this could be overcome. There was also another sphincter or valve in the anus, and with training again her anus could be an alternative vagina."

"Like now," said Helen.

"No. I've just pushed it in, no more. Her anus is wide and responsive.

"I first investigated her gag reflex, using my finger. So she 'opened wide', as my mother also put it, and my finger went in slowly and then she jerked back."

First thing was for Linda to take deep breaths as my finger went in.

Stephen said, "Let him repeat it on you."

So we three disconnected and naked Helen sat on the chaise longue with her mouth open. I started moving my finger in and out of her throat, and she should keep breathing.

She did gag and choke, and coughed stuff up. Nevertheless, I was keen to replace my finger with my penis, despite it having been in her bottom. She coughed up saliva, but this and phlegm or mucus was good for lubrication. As I tried this out, she was in fact slightly sick (as Linda had been).

"I did get her to lie on her back."

Helen's head was also over the edge. As with Linda I could get to her throat in a straight line from her mouth. Helen produced a lot more saliva, as I went in and out very slowly.

As with Linda, I asked Helen to inhale as I slid out, and exhale through her nose as I went in. Then I also suggested the precise opposite! I said to Helen as to Linda that it was about gaining control.

"One of my presents was a long vibrator. Trying to humm like it does takes it in further. Singing is another option."

I said the aim is for Stephen or anyone to ejaculate down Helen's throat without a second thought.

"I also gave Linda a silicon based lube, a shorter vibrator especially for prostate and perineum stimulation, and a bar speculum.

"Now if we move forward to Friday 2nd September 2016, things are very different. It was the day Linda began at Bishop Querceto Theological College. I helped her move in."

"Number one was the otherwise forgettable Closer by The Chainsmokers, I think, and Muhammad Ali had died in June not long before the UK voted to leave the EU.

"I was able to fuck her in the mouth without her producing any excess spittle and with no threat of throwing up. I remember we fucked to a CD from 1979 of Led Zeppelin's In Through The Out Door.

"Linda did, however, have to be careful with her food and not letting sperm go down into her lungs. She was also just beginning to have toilet difficulties.

"So there is a down side?" Helen asked.

"When her arse had become so flexible, yes."

At that time John Barman and Elizabeth Huett together had their revelation, shared with Jonathan Eyre, and intellectualised by Christine Vine. Christine was beginning non-residential training."

"I learnt about women producing prostate specific antigen and prostatic acid phosphatase with small amounts of creatinine and urea. When back in Serninsea I came to regard these liquids as divine signs because the Skene's glands are God's glands.

Helen said I'd achieved a great deal with Linda and, masturbating Stephen and me, wondered how we had met originally.

"I'd been to a lecture, Thursday October 8th, 1998, Saint Keyne's Day. I stopped this tall first year student with long blonde hair, because I was sure I'd seen her before. However, I dragged up the name 'Lucy' whilst seeking for a longer name.

"I was told instead that Lucinda was this girl's year-older sister. She hadn't gone to university. She preferred the agricultural life after sixth form.

"I admitted to Linda that Religious Studies and Applied Mathematics was an odd combination. One of her A levels was a largely descriptive and diagrammatic Economics but at university she avoided the mathematics in Economics alone. Instead she started broader Social Sciences. Responding positively to religious issues in A levels Philosophy and History, she thought she'd try Religious Studies. Thus she was a year behind me and thought I could help her."

Stephen said, "Explains a lot."

"I suggested that she could apply her Religious Studies by accompanying me that very evening to the Chaplaincy.

"She told me that she wasn't really Christian but added, 'I could come for a sneek.'

"And so in the evening she came and got bored listening to middle class students speak respectfully to each other. On Sunday 11th she tried the Anglican Eucharist, sitting out regarding the core ritual.

"Free of my family's criticism of her family, I couldn't exactly turn down the prospect of seeing the slightly younger, similar one, in the buff.

"It meant nothing to me that stripping off had to be mutual. This was in my student flat that Sunday evening: first view of her fabulous tits and hairless fanny. I said to myself, in the bathroom, 'Gimme somma that!'

"I realised that I was her reference point for home and so it was important that we met more often and naked. So by November 9th I knew I'd want to change her body and we started having sex.

"Just to say that the Legend of Saint Keyne, located at a well in St. Keyne, Cornwall, is that whoever drinks from the well will gain the upper hand in marriage. I drank that water in 1995 on a family holiday, as did my parents. In 2018 my mother and father separated and both left town for Norwich and Thetford respectively."

History told, there was another hour in the playroom of two males and one female.

Adam Stays Overnight (Saturday 15th June)

Adam was behind me. Keith was home and in the front room, the door open. Hello Keith. What did you do today?"

"Just went into Titansea. Back fifteen minutes ago."

"Tea tonight is fish and chips. And there's three of us. If you like, we can leave you in peace because, just as you now go and see Cheryl, he's staying."

"I'll eat these on my lap here. Microwave them a minute and bring them on a plate."

"You and me to the kitchen?" I asked Adam.

This is where Adam and I went. "I'm going to strip off. I don't want grease on my clothing. Join me?"

"No, not with him here."

"Put the heating up there to 22 will you? I'll microwave his first, back up to hot."

Stripped off with my clothes taken to the larger lounge, on the leather-effect sofa, I returned to the kitchen to get Keith's out of the microwave and add Adam's, to then take Keith his food on a plate plus vinegar and salt to the front room.

"Thanks." He shook the vinegar bottle for effect, and gave it back.

Back in the kitchen, with Adam's food released from the microwave, and mine put in, I said, "Come on, get them off. He's seen it all before."

"He's not."

"Adam! I don't care what he says or does any more."

Adam gave in to my severe stare and his clothes went on the floor. When my husband came into the kitchen with his emptied plate, with Adam picking up his clothes and using them as a shield, Keith asked, "Do we all join in?"

"Up to you," I said. "I'll bring you a cup of tea when we're done."

"I noticed the radiators are busy. Okay." He took his stuff off, in front of us, but dumped his clothes in the larger lounge, like mine, and returned to the smaller lounge.

Adam said, "And we all thought your parents were weird."

I put the kettle on and we ate our fish and chips. Without washing up, I made the tea and took some to Keith. I poured our tea and sat opposite Adam at the table to stare at him some more, but with a smile this time. I got up, to put our plates to the sink and ran my hands down his greasy plate.

"Beats washing up," Adam said.

I took a swig of tea and then said, "Swing round on your seat. Open your legs a bit, Adam. I'll do you 'Church and Steeple' again."

"Here we go," he said.

I got a rhythm going; I let him emerge through the gap between my fingers and thumbs, and to extend the stroke the pressure between my hands was maintained all the time.

He said, cleverly, "Hands together, church and steeple, look inside to see no people, just one growing cock again that should be on the weathervane."

"A bit of architectural ecclesiology for you."

"Never heard it called architectural ecclesiology before," he said. "I don't think this cock can crow three times," he added, "unlike when I was a teenager."

"Ah, well, we can hope for miracles."

I went back around the table and did the washing up while Adam sat there looking at my bare arse, which I wiggled at him from time to time, whilst humming.

I went to Keith, who'd finished his tea drink. So, taking his mug, I told him, "We're having an early night. We'll use the second bedroom."

"No," he said. "I'll go in there. I might make the second bedroom mine until I go, unless you want in between Adam fucks."

"I'm hoping that we can stay civilised."

"I might need an extension, and you may need to grant me that extension."

"Why?"

"Happily married?"

"Once I get ordained they can't unordain me. So we have our agreement. If you want to negotiate an extension, present your case. But not now. I'm busy with him."

"But, regarding this agreement, can't you wait until you're ordained before bringing him back here?"

"No. And he'll be coming again. I'm striking while the iron is hot. You and I are finished, Keith; we start the fastest divorce ever the very next day after I'm ordained. There you go."

"Yep. Shame but yep."

"Good. We agree."

I collected Adam from the kitchen. "We'll use my bedroom. He's going in the other one."

"I need the bathroom," he said.

I said I did too, and followed him in. "I'll hold that for you."

"What?"

"I said I'll hold that for you."

"Why?"

"Because I don't want you peeing on the floor."

"I'm not going to pee on the floor."

"Just let me hold it, and start peeing. Adam! Do as I want, Adam."

I got my way. I stood alongside, held and directed as his pee came out at an angle and missed the water, until I adjusted it.

I said, "I'll shake it when you're done." I also applied some tissue paper.

I flushed the loo, and sat upon it.

"What are you doing? Oh no: you're taking a dump."

"Adam, stop being a wimp. Learn to be intimate and know me. Put your hands on my shoulders. Adam, come on, help me by putting your hands on my shoulders."

What Adam didn't realise was that I once did these things with Keith. After six months with him and for nearly two years he often supervised me when I took a dump. And here Adam complied. His hands were on my shoulders as I evacuated my bowels.

I did, though, let him escape and wiped my own arse. I entered the bedroom, after washing my hands.

"You did this with him? I am not him."

"No, you are not. Because at times he used to wipe my arse. He often washed my arse, he stretched my arse... He entered my arse. I was in love, I thought."

"I am not a substitute for him."

"Adam, I don't want him any more but understand my issues. Now then, we've had fish and chips, and I did have greasy hands, if no longer, but let's try again the 'batter him up' method. I'll go under and over your testicles and then using a rising and falling hand grip to come down again, over and under. All right about that?"

"Yes." He asked me, "Do you ever remember a commentator of rugby league called Eddie Waring?"

"Up and under? This is up and over."

This carried on until another warming up method was tried: "Time for the fruit basket now." This involved use of my cleavage and my breasts as the fruit basket.

Beyond the masturbation manual I got on top of him so that he could view me during bumping and grinding, breasts moving and hair falling. It allowed him to play with my small nipples. I was perspiring (odourless) through effort.

Nevertheless, I know he was keen to get as much penetration as possible, so I got off the bed and touched my toes. I gave him the choice, but he still took the shallow route. He put in some effort and started to sweat himself (with me smelling this). Then I felt him licking my bottom, which was progress, and he sucked on my right buttock and finally bit it, right where I sit too.

"Don't bite! Suck, but don't bite," I said. "My skin is sensitive."

The best was back on the bed side by side, because that allowed a much more intimate one to one spooning, of the body and person. And we had plenty of time.

As he'd sucked on my arse cheek, he now sucked on my neck intensely. I said, "Oy, I told you that my skin is very sensitive. It has to stay smooth and undefiled."

I always prefer it when a chap can finish on the job within the premises. His seed was thrust into my inner purse; many a chap does like the visual of it running out, even if the animal in him might wish it to stay in.

He said, "I'm surprised I managed that with Keith in the house."

"You've done very well."

We fell asleep, and we had a long time in bed.

Until... My telephone rang, and I disentangled from Adam to attend to it.

"Bishop John here. Seemed a bit slow."

"Yes, sorry."

"Woke you up, yes. I'm just ringing around early Sunday before the action begins and I thought, for a change, I'd like to offer you some praise. I hear that you had a day off yesterday, but made yourself available to visit a hospital when one of your parishioners had an accident."

"Oh? Oh right, yes. Yes, so I should."

"Don't sound so surprised. I like to encourage my clergy."

"Your clergy?" (Oops, it was a mistake to say that so openly.)

"Quite right. Correction. Our clergy. I'm not a diocesan."

"I had my mobile switched off for the day. I just happened to put it back on."

"Well, it was your day off. You provided necessary space for Colin to attend to other pressing matters. I understand she is all right, Gertrude Carter, having tripped over near that investigator you know. But well done. I must go."

"Good morning, Bishop John."

With the receiver down I asked Adam, "How much does he know?"

"Trouble is, people play along to find out more. But the simplest explanations are usually correct."

Keith called out that he'd get himself up later. Yes, I had to be up and busy.

When I went in the loo, I saw the mark Adam had made on my neck. It was probably low enough to be hidden by a clerical collar. Thus I remembered him biting my arse.

Rapid breakfast, we had, and I almost bundled Adam into the car, dropping him at his place via a route avoiding the church, and then arriving at the church from the wrong direction.

Trinity Sunday (16th June)

I had asked Adam if he'd come to the church. No, he would not. The mark on my neck was quite red and I tried to conceal it. My bottom was stinging a bit.

I was, for a big change, delivering the sermon for the main Eucharist service. Let the curate, the deacon, preach on the Trinity. I was the sermon's creator, incarnate holder, and deliverer. I was all three of those persons, but it didn't mean I was any good at it. It was all about the Son being sent by the Father as if on a mission, in John's Gospel as in chapter 3 verses 16-17 but also 7:28-29, 8:42 and 17:3.

Colin sat there as I climbed the pulpit. I saw that Peter Marshall and Ken Osis were in the congregation at the back, although they did not know each other. My right buttock did not help my lack of confidence in my ability or otherwise to communicate, as it kept distracting me and I kept scratching it through the cassock. I did have notes to assist me.

So I was telling them, "The danger from the Father telling the Son what to do - the Son being obedient - is subordination and patriarchy. The Son represents the Father and then the glory is but for the Father. Em, unlike in the creed, in which the Kingdom has no end, and where the son is eternal, Paul says the Son returns to the Father. Indeed, the Son returns to the Father is not the Trinity. There is a contradiction here."

"I look at it like this. A royal ambassador in a foreign court receives lots of affirming rituals, but everyone knows they are recognition for the King abroad. Devotion to the Son is devotion for the Father. But what if the ambassador is in the King's family? Maybe not."

I could see that Colin was not pleased, but he'd been cold with me from the off. I kept on creating problems for myself.

When preparing, I'd simply thought, 'What on earth does any of this mean?' Does it concern the congregation? Probably not, and certainly no one outside. But I had a problem because so much biblical material contrasts with the creed and the Trinity after all. The biblical presentation is not exactly about being co-equal and co-eternal regarding the Son, the Spirit, and the Father.

"It's not that 'In the beginning was the Word' gives equality either, between sent and sender, because this refers to the beginning and not eternity. In Arianism, God's first act is to create the Word or Son that makes the world. But that inequality was ruled out by Nicaea the Council. That's a Church council, not a local authority.

"Also, how in the Bible is the Spirit a different personality of God? And the Bible never refers to God the Son. So..."

As I glanced back, Colin had put his head into his hands.

"Let's try and see what's essential. I start with Jesus personifying God's character." This sounded weak.

I added, "There's much coming and going and descending and ascending that is like the godly side, and the sent and presence, which is the human side. But this sounds Gnostic and is reducing the all important humanity of Jesus."

Everyone's eyes looked glazed over. Even Peter looked puzzled. This was a Bernard Cribbins' hole.

I said to the twenty or so, still digging, "So the interpretation could be this. The Father," I said, "trusts the Son. There's the idea that the condition of the Son's obedience was like the flip side of the will of the Father. It kind of allows for more equality between them, and perhaps it does. The 'will' is a form of obedience, on both sides. Plus the Spirit - mustn't forget that - is itself a paraclete slave, slave to the whole will and obedience. So 'The Father is greater than I' could be less about behaviour and more about being and source expressed as 'will': but, no, the Father's life in the Son could still be Arian. Hmm - just think that the Son could never send the Father, the being of the Father cannot come from the Son."

This was a truly terrible sermon; like a walk through tangled weeds. To get out of the mess I decided to say, "So, in essentials, we distinguish between the economic Trinity, the social Trinity, and the Being Trinity. The first is what they do, or modes - or the error of modalism if taken as everything. Modalism: that is where each person of the Trinity is just a job to be done. The second is behaviour and obedience: that Jesus is the human contact of a social deity. But the Being Trinity is belief in rather than doctrine about, where all was rounded up, so to speak, where the Godhead simply is, where divine love flows between the three versions in equal measure and without any restriction including of time before or after. That's how I square the circle, or circles.

"The Trinity is the Christian insight, our contribution to the world of religions. So the Hindus have the Trimurti, but it is not supreme, whereas ours is, and therefore attempts, like John Hick's, to have a 'Real' to unite the religions, above our Trinity, must be wrong for us. I hope this makes some sort of sense. Perhaps not."

I felt utterly depressed. I knew when researching it that I should avoid doing this doctrinal stuff for Trinity Sunday, tying myself in knots, boring everyone with incomprehensible irrelevance, and simply losing more belief via rotten expression.

Once out of the pulpit I told everyone to say the creed. When I sat next to Colin, I said, "Sorry."

"A lot to think about," he replied, dryly. I heard him mutter the terrible words, "This has got to stop."

Colin's sermons were so much simpler, so much more straightforward. 'Something happened in our experience,' or 'something to reflect on biblically or in tradition,' he'd indicate. Once he'd said: "A person died at the crossing in the High Street. You will all have heard about that. Our Reverend Linda and I were there, attending to people. The driver was Polish and a gave chance for some people to be xenophobic again. 'He does not know our roads; why is he even here?' And what of the death - a pointless death ending a life? Our Gospel tells us nothing is pointless..." And he explained why.

After the service, Ken Osis came along to Colin Cromer and me.

I said to him, "Hello Kenneth, I'm afraid that was probably my worst sermon among some pretty bad ones."

"No," he said. "My Baptist colleague struggles with the issue of authority between the Father and the Son. I have a Lay Reader doing mine today. Do you mind, Colin, if I have a private word, just for a minute?"

"Use the vestry," said Colin. "Tell me when you've finished with her. I have much to say."

Inside Ken asked, "I mentioned the Unitarianism of Dee to my Baptist colleague. He thinks that if she does not know about William Ellery Channing, then she is probably not very committed. Dee is not here?"

I said, "No. Obviously she doesn't come to my services. She might have gone to Wytham. I don't know."

"I suppose it follows," Ken said. "Being a bit of a heretic, if a bit, well, casual. My Baptist friend thinks she needs my intellectual attention. I hope I can meet her again; I hope you can arrange something."

"Perhaps not," I said. "She's sort of evaluating things."

"If you can, though. Let's go back out there," he said.

Colin was with Peter Marshall at the door. "Apparently this chap," said Colin, "reads a lot of Unitarian websites."

Ken said, "Not you as well!"

"Who else?" asked Colin.

"My friend Di-ee," I said.

"Diee?" asked Colin.

"Dee," I replied.

"Don't know her." Colin and I shook a few hands at this point.

"Yes, I know her," said Peter, very helpfully, after a long gap. After all, he'd provided Diana with the information, but he didn't know her. Perhaps he should have briefed Diana directly, instead of giving me sheets of paper.

Ken asked him, "So have you heard of Channing, em...?"

"I'm Peter Marshall. Yes, of course, but he is a bit old school."

Colin said, "Linda. You know Peter here and you know this Dee. Sounds like they are influencing you, when you should be preaching them the Gospel."

Ken said, "Absolutely."

"Peter," I asked, "do I express to you the virtues of believing the Gospel?"

"You do," he said, again so helpfully, "but I am not persuaded."

"Nor Dee or Diee, I suppose," said Ken.

Peter said at least I struggled with the issues. So all three clergy wished him well. Ken also decided to go, and so we two clerics shook the hands of the rest.

"On the dole, he told me," said Colin. "Gosh."

"On a scheme," I said. "Peter is not counted as unemployed."

"An internship, then," said Colin.

I said, "No. The tax people go after them, but the government gets away with its own schemes, and then they are not counted as being unemployed."

Colin then asked me, "Who is Dee?"

"Short name for Diana, my friend."

"Let me think. Diana de Groot."

"Yes."

"He met Diana."

"Yes."

"Is she having marriage troubles?"

"No, and neither am I."

"Well, regardless of that, I'll give you an opening piece of advice: Kenneth Osis is a delicate man. I don't know why he was chosen to be a confessor. He lacks ballast. His family has a history of suicides. His woman trouble is continuous, because he is one of life's failures with relationships. So my advice is to treat him gently and treat him with business-like neutrality. Don't involve your friends."

"Thanks Colin."

"I'll leave those clearing up to make their own way home. Can you come with me to the vestry please?"

"Yes, sure."

Inside, he asked, "Are you having an affair with Adam Magellan?"

"No I am not. I have had to see him from time to time; he is an old friend, of course."

"Your phone was switched off, yesterday. I rang the bishop to see if there was another clergyperson available, waiting for Mrs. Carter's relative. The bishop knew you were with Magellan, and what I saw confirmed the implication of what he said."

"Has he got it in for me of something? Why does he keep having people follow me?"

"I think your guilt might be making you a touch paranoid."

"Colin, if you knew the half of it."

"It's the half I don't know that worries me. Are you having an affair with Adam Magellan?"

"I've already answered. Accept my answer, please. But clearly going out with Adam has confirmed that I am being followed. Why?"

"Are you mentally all right, Linda?"

"What? Why is he feeding you with information about me?"

"It sounds like you are paranoid. So what is that brown mark on your neck?"

"There is some sort of sensitivity."

"I haven't noticed it before these last days or indeed at all."

"The downside of my smooth skin is it reacts very easily. In fact, if I cut I am in more danger than most."

"The doctors know this?"

"Yes. Since teenage days they've known for sure."

"So you have to be careful?"

"Especially. Do you know, a new toothbrush can damage my flesh?"

"Linda. You were also scratching your bottom in that pulpit. What happened there?"

"I don't have to say."

"Is it related to your, well, need to 'go' so often?"

"I don't have to say!"

"I'm fed up with this. I ask you an innocent question and you raise my suspicions. Anyway, stop treating me like an idiot. I'll ask you for a third time. Are you having an affair with Adam Magellan?"

"For the third time, no."

"Twice, I think. All right. You've denied my question three times. Let me give you some advice. You are putting your ordination at severe risk. I don't think you paid enough attention to preparing that sermon. You did not pay sufficient attention to presentation. You are not thinking straight. You are distracted by something, and you were showing all the signs of distraction yesterday. No, do not deny that. I gave you prime spot of the sermon for a significant day and the return to Ordinary Time. Your sermon was terrible on every level."

"I researched the information, Colin."

"Information," he said. "The bishop tells me that you must train. He so compassionate towards you!"

"He was when he rang."

"So why are you accusing him?"

"Ask Adam Magellan then. That's why I was with him. He was telling me I am being followed."

"And he says you will have to give sermons, as a priest, assuming you do get ordained. And the bishop is entitled to give me information about you. I am worried that you are going to ruin this my parish. Monday after your ordination starts my holiday. Surely I'm entitled to a holiday. I'm wondering if to cancel. You see, the one person I do not want to see in this church is Adam Magellan. That includes when I am away, if I am away. Peter? He is very welcome. I am telling you to stay away from Adam Magellan."

"Surely I can choose my friends? Surely the parish church is open to everyone?"

"Take some advice for a change. That would be a change. You are a married woman about to be ordained. Now go home and be back on time for the lay reader who'll tell you something like what you should have said, and with less training. Just go home, Linda, and prepare for your future - if you have one."

"Here's what you would have won!" I said, as soon as I started walking away.

"What?" he called out.

"Bully."

"I am not a bully, Linda."

"I meant... You can't beat a bit of... It was a programme, gets repeated a lot. Jim Bowen."

"Linda. You are drifting and you're out of control!"

Back at the house in the lounge and seeing pointless television, naked, I was dragging the hairbrush through my hair. Clothed Keith had a wry smile at my anger. Soon I had to return for Evensong. I'd slip my cassock over my head and add a collar. I put the brush on this seat, looking for my cassock the one time it wasn't hung in the downstairs loo.

I remembered I'd dropped it in the front room, off in a huff as soon as I'd shut the front door. So now, with ten minutes to go, I grabbed it and the ripped off collar.

Carried back to the lounge, I did something while looking at the TV screen and holding the bundle: I sat on my hairbrush, and its spikes penetrated my right buttock, particularly where Adam had bitten me.

As this brush went back a long way, many of its plastic spikes had lost the little balls on top of them that smoothed their contact with skin. It could be fierce on my scalp - under my hair. When I sat on it, the precise angle meant at least one of the buggers went in. And boy did it hurt.

I bent over and asked Keith to look at my arse. He told me that the teeth marks had produced bruising and there was blood after this hairbrush penetration. Three spikes - three! - had gone in.

Keith said, "You ought not to put your finger on it. I never bit you because your skin is so sensitive. Remember when I did once smack your bum? It was like my hand print was photocopied on it in red. That plastic thing has spikes like nails. Why do you keep it?"

I turned to him and started crying, so he held me. I asked, "Do you smack Cheryl then?"

"I shouldn't discuss what Cheryl and I do. I bet that submissive Adam Magellan loves whips and chains."

"No, but he has a ball and chain," I said.

"Really? Has he chained it up to your leg? Is there a bruise around your ankle?"

"I mean he is married."

"That's right. He never divorced."

"You knew?"

"Mary Magellan. A Rumanian. They called her 'The Vampire' in the church before she ran off into his arms, via doing a job for SMS. She was from Transylvania. Black haired. They imagined her flying out of her Lord's castle and turning into a human in Britain."

"It's supposed to be a church."

"You get racists everywhere. She was the undead. Well, I can see that now, married to him. Let me check your neck. It is bruising as well. Have you two looked in a mirror? I suppose vampires never divorce, they just turn their partners into the undead as well. I'd be careful if I were you, taking his semen even if you can do nothing with it."

"Yes, you've made your point. Fuck off, Keith." I walked away from him. He was not compassionate, and neither was the bishop.

Evensong was a frosty affair of avoidance. A lay preacher had a go at the Trinity, and preached simple doctrine. As soon as I could, I drove home. My arse was burning hot.

Friends Comment (Monday 17th June)

On Monday, after a half hour gossiping with Gurinder Kapoor, I went in the cool conditions towards the inner town cafe that Patricia, Diana and I frequented. It was renaming itself to 'Bytes' with new online facilities.

At the cafe, I said to my friends, "I'm going off ill tomorrow. I'm not ill. I'm fed up. Colin Cromer has told me to stop seeing Adam. It's not just the rift between them over Mary Ann, this Rumanian who found Adam when it seems Colin and her got on so well. It's that I am still married to Keith and I keep being followed."

"Are you being followed now?"

"I don't know. I don't care. Keith is in the second bedroom now. I missed the spontaneous fuck. Men could waste me. That's how I feel. I don't know if I want to get even or give way to power."

Diana said, "The best thing is for Keith to leave altogether. But just stay out of trouble. Go back to your job, take your holiday, get ordained, and tell Keith he has got to go."

"Sad as it is," said Patricia, "she is right."

"We've come to Ordinary Time, but things are not ordinary," I said.

"What's Ordinary Time?" asked Patricia.

"The hum-drum of the solar calendar, week by week, up to Christ the King," I said. "I know it means nothing to you. Doesn't mean much to me either. Tradition. I wish I was a rich woman."

Diana said, "I bet Cheryl likes it traditional - if no longer the wild child."

I said, "He'll like her domesticity. I assume all this - I might be wrong. Perhaps he is reworking her. Come to think of it..."

"She works," said Patricia.

"As an updated typist," I said.

Diana put it: "Uhuru on Star Trek was an updated telephonist."

Patricia said, "Cheryl works in a progressive company."

"What? SMS?" I exclaimed. "They are not progressive. They are not! Just look at their social events. The women look like tarts. Cheryl dresses like a tart and yet she is domestic bliss."

"Diana then said, "Well, perhaps she's not - she could be a whore in bed. It is a good combination, if you can do it. A domestic in the kitchen, a whore in the bedroom, and put on the glamour in public."

"I thought he wanted a whore at all times," I said. "I gave him that. Trouble is, Colin Cromer also thinks I am a whore."

Diana said, "By the way, that Ken Osis has been sniffing around the college. I hope he isn't on to me. There's something really strange about the people you know." Diana added, "However, I'm starting to include me in this assessment."

I said, "You're both, in fact, very ordinary."

Patricia responded: "I'm not sure about Diana, but definitely sure about you. You're not ordinary at all."

Diana responded herself: "Well, I've never invited Linda into my bedroom..."

"Hello," said Patricia. "What have you told her?"

"Nothing." I said, "Once I get ordained, who cares whether I am weird or not?"

"Your beliefs don't fit, but there may be some other basis for you having the job," said Diana.

"The pastoral?" I asked.

"The pastoral can be too personal in your case," Diana responded. "But I can see that. I can't see the rest of it."

I said, "My views are on the more investigatory side, investigating the doctrines we are supposed to defend. I deal with them by examining them."

"Anyway, it's your day off, so d'you fancy joining me later?"

"Yes," I replied. "In Patricia's Bat Cave."

"Were you in Patricia's cave?" asked Diana. "Was Arthur in..."

"Diana!" Patricia interrupted.

At that point I simply got up and walked off. I went to Adam's, where Ann and her wife Labhaoise were in the reception room.

Ann said, "Go upstairs. We told Peter to take an afternoon off. Sod the government's schemes. Adam should relax too. We'll be down here if there's any problem."

"Why should there be a problem?" So I went upstairs.

"Hia," He said. "I had a think about you..."

"Oh shut up and give me a fuck. Adam, I want a fucking, in what ever way you like."

"You can open the window if you want."

"I'll stick my stomach on the arm of your sofa."

He was quick. As he wiped my leg, he remarked on the state of my right bottom cheek. It was fast becoming rather nasty looking, a big red area and the red marks going towards becoming a developing head. "It might need antibiotics."

I asked him to come with me to Diana's. I said he would have to remove his clothes with us, because this is what we did. He refused. He would do some work instead. So I walked off and left him upstairs, and he didn't follow me out or down at all.

Ann and Labhaoise asked me to come in to the reception room. I said, "I have my afternoon with Diana. We always take off our clothes and chat about friends, life, the universe and everything. I asked him to come with me. Don't blame me if he does some work instead."

Ann said, "We want you to be good for him; we want him to be happy. Labhaoise and I will have to discuss this. And we gather work is dodgy for you."

"Think what you like," I said in an offhand way, and walked out. I couldn't understand it, as if they would decide the matter. And Adam had stayed upstairs, as much from their deliberations as from mine.

Quizzed by Diana (Monday 17th June)

So, on this cool, now wet day, inside Patricia's conservatory, I said, "He fucked me and I walked out."

"Did you have a row?"

"If he wants a relationship with me, he should take an interest in my life. I wanted him to come here because, apparently, Ann and Labhaoise demanded Peter and he have the day off. And now they are going to discuss together about me making him happy."

"Sounds like these ex-teachers are still running his life."

"He had said Ann approves. Perhaps she's not so sure. I'm furious with everything and everyone at the moment."

"Relax, Linda," Diana told me.

This was good advice, until my phone buzzed in my bag. I ignored it. It buzzed again.

"Ken Osis here. Are you with Diana? I know she is called Diana. I know she has a family, married. I've abandoned all counselling and confessing roles, including yours, with a message to the suffragan bishop five minutes ago."

"OK, bye then," I said, and silenced the phone, and switched it off.

"Was that our previous visitor?"

"Ken Osis has resigned as my confessor. And others. He won't be bothering me again, and, as for you, he now knows you are married and unavailable."

"He might stop your ordination - you leading him a merry dance."

"No, he won't. He has too many secrets to reveal. Anyway, are you and Patricia coming to the cathedral?"

"I think we're both working."

"Bullshit. It's on a Sunday. Just be honest with me."

"Why are you shuffling about on there?"

"Because my arse is hurting like hell."

"Show me."

I got up, went very close to Diana, and bent right over with my trim arse in her face.

"Ugh, it looks nasty. And so does that red patch."

"Ha ha," I said. I went to get a cushion to make things more tolerable, to put more weight on my left buttock.

"You're as mardy as your bum. It's looking rare and black over bull's mother's, noo?" Diana said, in a rare visit to local speech. "Kelchin' such a lot!"

"Noo the moo."

"This pastoral side you claim. Isn't there a belief side? Surely there is. Let's try you out," said Diana. "Are you willing to answer?"

"Go on if you must."

"Was Jesus born of a virgin?"

"Of course not," I replied.

"His biological mother, then, didn't compose and sing The Magnificat that was in that service I once attended."

"Now you are being really silly," I replied.

"But you are silly masquerading as someone who appears to believe these things," said Diana. "So, take this idea that he died and came back to life. Presumably you believe in a spiritual resurrection alone."

"I don't think I do," I said.

"What, physical? 'Hello! It's me. I popped me clogs but I'm back.'"

"I thought you wanted a sensible conversation."

"Does your boss Colin Cromer know your lack of stance?"

"I could not give a shit what he thinks. He thinks angels sing in the choir eternal."

"It's in the job description: 'People who believe unlikely things wanted for job in Church ministry.' That sort of thing. What about the Boss?"

"What, God?"

"I mean Barman."

"As they say, just because you're paranoid doesn't mean they're not out to get you. Anyway, Derek Imperial is the boss - supposedly."

Diana asked more, "Is there actually anything you do believe?"

"I believe in the worth of human beings, and indeed developing empathy for conscious beings. Yeah."

"What about that funny Jesus chap you all worship, or only some of you."

"They shouldn't. Technically, through him - Christ, that is."

Diana further said, "So this Jesus chap then. Presumably he might not have existed either!"

"No, I think he did. There is some independent evidence and there are sayings."

"Something to go on, then," Diana assured me, in a funny kind of way.

"Well there were different Judaisms and in one sense he was closest to the rabbinical. He didn't reject participating in the Temple, in the animal sacrifices, however. But he was particularly messianic, chosen, and he pointed to God."

"Weren't the rabbis all against him? I don't know."

"No, it's shite. There was healthy debate about the spirit and real meaning of the Law. So there was that and then the expectation that God would sweep all away and the Kingdom of God would come. A messiah would appear, and Jesus pointed to a messiah coming."

Diana again. "Jesus saying, 'Hello! I am the Messiah. I am the Son of God.'"

I said, "Definitely not. I think he thought he was important in nudging God to start the process, as in the suffering servant. There is an issue of Jesus's ego, his own sense of his self-importance in this."

"Like Son of God?"

"That's a term for any devout Jew. He must have had a huge ego, even if he restrained himself."

Diana carried on, "I'm just trying to help you: to see if you actually fit into any part of the job description."

"Better than The fucking Jacobite Gap Years."

"Oh, I wonder. But didn't your Jesus actually visit his mates after his death, in the sense of when you do Easter? Do you remember Easter? It wasn't that long ago. I mean, remembering it once a year. Perhaps you're a Buddhist, if you don't like ego. Ergo."

"I think the primitive community, the core, were disappointed but still expectant, and they were bereaved holy men and women seeking and seeing signs and wonders and had meal rituals with a place at the table for the return. Beaten people want a hero, and the options had narrowed. Once he was dead, he was either the Messiah to be resurrected, or he was nothing. And they expected something."

"But this Paul chap, like who was he banging the drum?"

"Paul also thought all reality was coming to a conclusion in a short time. Like I said, the seder meal left a place open for Joshua. Now Yeshua was the only route for them to God in doing the job."

"Yeshua?"

"Jesus."

"What about the simpler, 'Oh look he's there!'"

"Even today some bereaved people see their dead, though those actual accounts are all theologised into the early Church. When you read it."

"I don't. All I've learnt has come from you, perhaps Jenny a long time back, and other nutters."

"Goodness me, I'm evangelising my friend!"

Diana said, "Really? Clearly, it's all relative to that time and it's a sort of kilter and rammel now - if you are right."

"But you are tackling the issues," I replied.

Diana said, "But I'd want you to say he is the messiah or Son of God, rather than something like, 'He's a really naughty boy.'"

I said, "Okay, I admit defeat."

Diana added, "Your bottom. That's real. Let it come up to a big head and go down of its own accord."

"That's what I've been doing!"

"You might need antibiotics," she suggested.

"I hope it goes down and heals properly."

I shifted to face Diana, who was on her back looking up at the sky and only occasionally looked my way. I told her about passing messages, chalk and sticking in drawing pins.

She said, "Your religion doesn't stick in pins."

"Not as a whole."

"It's about honesty, Linda."

"I am bisexual, Diana."
"For God's sake, Linda. "Do you believe in God?"
"Sort of transcendence. Doesn't matter. I am bisexual, Diana."
"We've had this out before. I am not interested."
"You want me to be honest; I am being honest, Diana."
"Linda, no."
"I was told, at least once, that you fancied me, Diana."
"Stop it now, Linda. You're out of control. Get a grip."
"Do you get a grip, Diana?"
"Yes, with a man, my husband. And you have Adam, now. Well, if they approve - according to you."
"But you don't approve, Diana."
"You're welcome to him."
"Did you really fancy me once, or twice, or often, Diana?"
"Linda. Stop this now. Now! Look, have a good holiday, and have a good retreat - whatever that involves..."
"Gaggle of women. Best behaviour. Unless one of them fancies me, Diana."
"Women like geese?" Diana asked.
"I'd better not say that, given those badges," I said. "Although one has an elephant on it."
"Geese are more appropriate, given those Winchester Geese. Do have a good ordination. Don't let it go to your head."
"I'd want it to go to my head."
She then said, "I understand why you did what you did with Ken Osis, I mean before, but you could have ended his phone call more nicely."
"Ken Osis and Adam are delicate types. They're all wimps. Contrast them with Keith: what Keith did to me. Keith is a strong man."
"Come on," said Diana. "It's nearly time, anyway. It's time you went home. Let's get dressed."
We left ahead of Patricia and her children even arriving.

Narrator: Keith Linda's Thanks (Monday 17th June)

I came in from work and Linda had been back from Patricia's with Diana. "Come back to my bed tonight," she told me. "I want you to do what you used to do: I want you to hurt me, do you understand?"

"Really?"

"Yes. No embarrassments tonight. Think of when we were students. Do what you did when we were students. I will too. Yes? We'll go early. Yes?"

"And we stay in the same bed?"

"Of course. You can do to me what you'd never do with Cheryl. Something to remember me by."

So we had tea. I asked if she'd seen Adam Magellan lately. Yes she had, and she'd had sex with him, but it was quick, and unfulfilling, and bizarrely Ann and Labhaoise were deciding if she was acceptable to him. I said that he had been dominated by women all his life, although one, his actual wife, had walked out on him when it was convenient.

Linda then announced that she was not going through with the ordination. She'd spoken with Diana, and, "I've had a deconversion experience," she said. She realised she believed in nothing.

I told her not to lose heart and that loads of candidates get cold feet as it arrives. They've been to theological college, and much has unravelled. "Colin Cromer himself survived that but made so many mistakes early in his ministry. Go through with it, and the ceremony itself will give you a boost. That's what they say."

"You're so kind," she told me. "You're the one person who has offered me support."

If 'done' they cannot then unordain her and she can still walk away, I told her. There is a wastage rate and, as in any profession, people find that they are in the wrong job.

Of course she did not know that I was acting on the spot for the Confraternity, who needed her to get ordained.

She said, "You must be cruel tonight. I want to feel it. For one more time, I want your power, Keith. And thank you for keeping my most essential secret of all."

"I said I would, and I have."

So the time came for us to go to bed and both of us had already undressed downstairs. She wanted a shit and so did I, so I told her to wait, taking up a kitchen roll. When I was done she was called upstairs, and she sat on the toilet. I put my arms on her shoulders as she evacuated, and then she presented her bottom to me by bending over.

I cleaned her, with lots of roll used and several flushes. "You are a dirty dirty girl." But I was concerned about this enraged spot growing on her right buttock. I told her to wait and not to move from presenting her bottom. Downstairs in the kitchen I found the first aid box and assembled a fresh syringe and needle. I found a plastic bottle with a lid to unscrew and removed its final amount of peach flavoured water. Using large scissors I cut the bottle in half. Back upstairs, in an airing cupboard next to the bathroom, I acquired a loo roll and hid the assembled syringe within it, concealing behind me the cut plastic half bottle.

So I asked her to leave the bathroom and show me her bottom some more on the bed. She thought I was going to wipe her arse further and make her really clean.

Instead, and without her seeing, I took the syringe with its sterile needle and jabbed it into the rising sore. She SCREAMED instantly, and leapt off the bed, and screamed more, and looked at me crouched with wide eyes as she cowered in the corner of the room. She screamed again, because she was in agony as pus and blood ran from her buttock. I simply placed the plastic half bottle with screw thread under the bed.

"Keith. I'm sweating, I'm shaking. Keith it hurts so much, it hurts so..." She was, too. Her face was wet with sweat and tears and, leaning on her elbows, her hands were visibly shaking.

I said, "You're not a student now. Come out of the corner. If you don't, I'll come and get you."

"No, no. No, no, no..."

I thought this was promising for the Confraternity, because she was encountering different experiences.

So I went over to her and grasped both her forearms, and pulled her towards me from the corner, and then transferred this to holding her around the waste with her head pointing behind me. The upshot was I got her on to the bed, looking down on her bleeding arse.

"You've got watery blood running out of the spot. Hopefully, that's released it. I'll wipe it with some of this tissue." I did that but it kept weeping. I pushed toilet paper into her anus, and wiped it. "Dirty girl," I told her, although, actually, she wasn't any more.

Now I released the plastic half bottle, and started to screw it into her anus. Once this would hurt her, but she just accommodated it, even I pushed it further in.

"Hmm," I said, dissatisfied. "Will you stop shaking?" I went to a lower dressing table draw, and took out a metal object with two tongues coming from a horizontal bar with ridges and a winding device. I asked if she remembered this.

"It's a bar speculum. Keith, it is still hurting a lot."

I yanked out the plastic bottle to a small effect and then inside her anus this bar speculum got her wider and wider. Now, in the past, she could only manage so much at a time, but here I just pushed the device to its limit. I used my fingers to pull her vertically. Anyway, I could get four fingers in and go very deep. But I left the device inside her, and I shifted myself so that I could look directly at her bottom, and the light from the ceiling shone deep inside. I wasn't satisfied, so I told her not to move, or I really would hurt her, and went downstairs.

I came back with twelve new pencils from a box with a rubber band around them. I placed these, graphite first, erasers facing me, into her anus and used them to gyrate around. She was gasping and yelping as I did this, while that bloody sore kept weeping out.

"Bloody hell!" she gasped, as I worked the pencils, so I took them out but there was no blood or shit on them. So I removed the speculum, and pushed them in again, now as far as they could go. When she gasped a little, I took them out again.

So I had her get on her back, and lifted her legs up. I took one pencil, eraser end first, and pushed it into her vulva, going below her urethra, and pushed it as far as it might go.

"Work your nipples."

She was pinching her own nipples very hard. So she was joining in. Okay, so I tried a pencil, pointed end, into her urethra. It caused her to gasp. I rapidly pushed and pulled the pencil, and then withdrew it completely. The result was she had an instant short pee. I think it was nervousness more than anything. She looked at me with spaced-out eyes fingers pressing as instructed. So the best thing was to grip her breasts with my clawed fingers, over her hands, and enter her purse hard in the traditional way, thrusting hard and fast, and I ejaculated fairly soon because I had been genuinely excited. I let go of her breasts with my nails having left a strong impression.

With my sperm running out of her, I asked her, "What do you say?"

"Thank you, Keith."

That was enough, and I lay on my back, although it was not enough for Linda, who became like an animal and took me into her mouth to try to bring me back, which she did with some violence. So I went on top and gave her a throat fuck, and I came a second time down inside her neck.

Linda said, staring at me with a wild face, "You can't do that with Cheryl. You don't need to go with Cheryl. You're a fucking bastard."

"You're wrong, you tart. She is having my child. I am moving on, but part of me moving on is that you get ordained. You get ordained and build that life. And as for Colin Cromer, he'll be gone in two years. The man is going to retire and you can take his place."

"Can I ask..." She swallowed. "Can I ask you a question, Keith?"

"Yes."

"Have you slept with Yojana Asthana?"

"Of course."

"I was beginning to wonder, recently."

"I am weak willed," I told her. "She came on to me."

"Adam found no evidence you were sleeping with her."

"That's because he is stupid."

I went on to say that with a baby I would have responsibilities. Linda said that I was welcome to stay at the curate's house until I needed to leave.

Then she asked me if I would go to Wales with her.

I said I wouldn't, and she knew why. Going there two years ago was generous enough from me. "Go back to work in the morning and get ordained."

"We talk to the book in Morning Prayer. It's no effort; I may as well go. I was going to go off sick."

"We have issues to sort out with a road haulage company."

"Thank you Keith; thank you for everything."

She started shaking again, so I left her alone for half an hour, thinking she was perfect.

Declaring for Cheryl (Tuesday 18th June)

Linda prepared our breakfast before we went to our workplaces. She said that her bottom was now lethal in its pain.

Before we went out the front way, she said, "I might have misled you with my real wishes last night. I want you to find your future with Cheryl. I really wish you the best."

I confimed, "Yes. Cheryl is my woman now. It's just frustrating when I'm not going down there. Move my job or something similar south and it's sorted. As for you, going on holiday first, your family might be pleased if you did chuck it. Only because they do crystals and patterns in the sky with birthdays."

"It's mother and Lucinda who do crystals: no one else."

We went out to our cars and she checked that the front door was locked.

I said, "I have a prediction for Aries: the stars and planets will not affect your day in any way. But don't let them persuade you not to get ordained. So am I in the same bed as you tonight, until you go to Wales in fact?"

"Yes, unless Adam stays over. Then please use the other bedroom."

"Sure. Well, I'll be picking Yojana up this morning so I'm leaving the same time as you. I'll send her a message so that she waits for me. Let's go."

"Be honest with me, Keith. You haven't stopped fucking her have you?"

"In this new morning it's more than my life's worth to say; let's put it like that."

"That'll do. See you tonight, then, Keith," she said to me, as we got into our cars.

A little way along I stopped the car and rang Jim Wilson. I said, "As a fruit, she is lower hanging." I described events, including her mental switch into a submissive frame of mind, and the spot like a boil that I made burst.

His only criticism was that I hadn't said anything theological about the flow of her pus and blood, but replied that I couldn't because I had pushed the line of lack of interest in the Church and even the faith.

Narrator: Linda Ken Osis Confesses Details (Tuesday 18th June)

I received two letters at the church itself, each with a first class stamp.

The first letter opened told me that on the 18th June the Roman Catholic Church - the Western Church - celebrates The Feast of St. Marina the Monk. The letter stated that in Lebanon in the 5th century Marina became Marinos in order to enter a monastery with her father, and later the pious man became 'Abba Marinos'. But, on a trip away, an innkeeper's daughter accused Marinos of fathering her child, and he was ejected and eventually sat outside the monastery to nurture the child using goats' milk from shepherds. Upon death, her female phenotype was discovered, the innkeeper's daughter confessed her wrong accusation and became penitent at the tomb of Marinos. I showed the letter to Colin Cromer.

He asked, "Why has someone sent this to you?"

"I don't know. The envelope says it was posted in Whitby, first class."

"An interesting story but I wouldn't preach on it. It would raise suspicions. Is that the idea?"

"Colin: I'd hope you'd know better."

"You are very female."

"Thank you."

I wondered who on earth would post this from Whitby? Did anyone really think I was transgender? No! The gossip that circulated was usually about me as a wild girl on the farm. So I was puzzled.

The second letter was local, and all it stated was: McGuffie1982. So when home I used this as a password on an email linked download, and it worked.

Please pass on my apology for telling it this way but my client's car (and mine) could have been bugged. Bolingbroke Geese badges refer directly to Suffragan Bishop of Bolingbroke John Terence Barman. Geese could refer to prostitutes, but Yojana Asthana is one of the wearers. She is very close to Keith Jupitas, despite his affair with Cheryl Mould, and KJ is monitoring his wife Linda for JTB partly via YA at least prior to her ordination. Ken Osis is used to pass selective messages to LJ from JTB. KJ receives his information via YA.

I read this with some alarm and confusion, particularly that Yojana was critical, until I read the text below it. It was obviously from Adam.

Linda. This was the message you left in the stone wall. My writing is guessing. It might be good guessing, but it might be wrong. That you made the message drop will create confusion if we were followed (I don't think we were). It still shows that I am investigating the group, although I am not. I then left your grid reference, in the full sight of the CCTV. I know he has contacts. The grid reference note was picked up by George Wickenby and put back. George went to see the message at the wall and replaced it as well. George now has a 'bird camera' on a tree nearby to detect movement and take photographs in daylight and dark. George will want to know who picks it up. Can you ask your friend Diana to pick it up? It might or might not be credible, but it should stir things regarding Ken Osis, having met both of you.

Blimey! I contacted Diana by ordinary telephone. I told her I had to collect a secret message, and it would be safer if she collected it, because I was being followed. I told her where to find it. She might collect it today, or perhaps at the weekend. Diana said she'd go now; she was intrigued and it would not take long. However, when she called in, an hour and a half later, she wanted to read it as well. So we read it together, me as if I had seen it for the first time.

I said to Diana, "I think it is speculative. Adam is making some connections."

Diana said, "So there are SMS connections via these badge wearers, and Yojana is not in the religious group but is a key person."

"Could well be," I said.

"And Adam is investigating. Are you screwing him or offering him business?"

"I am screwing him. Keith is uncomfortable in his presence but we accommodate."

"This Ken Osis," said Diana. "He is no longer your counsellor. He knows who I am. Let's get him to join us, and see if he can now spill some beans, and let's see how he reacts to suggestions."

"He and I still operate under the seal of the confessional, if one of us demands it. Keith is at work, now, and I am soon to go to Wales."

"Let's take advantage now of his irritating curiosity."

"All right, Diana. Are you free now?"

"Yes. Tell him I am with you at this curate's house."

"Right. Here goes. A text message."

Fifteen minutes later his message said he would come straight away. It would replace his reading time that had replaced a counselling session.

So Diana and I stripped off, and I asked her, "What have you done?"

"I wanted it gone. I got it waxed. So I am like you. How often do you go?"

"I think you ought to go once a month." (I was guessing.)

To answer the door to Ken Osis, my cassock was on, and it came off in the hallway once he was inside. He went in front towards the larger lounge, which allowed Diana to come out of the front room quietly behind me. The result was we both watched him undress in the hall and he then saw her with some surprise. I took his clothes with my cassock and laid them down in the lounge.

Diana asked, "How did you find out about me, Ken?"

"You were identified," he said, looking at her crotch.

"How? Who?"

So I said, "It is because I am being followed, isn't it Ken? Sit on the sofa."

Diana said, sitting down on to a leather-effect chair, as I stayed standing, "We know more than you think, Ken."

"I don't doubt it. That has always been the risk."

I said, hands placed on my hips, legs a little apart, "Oh, really, Ken? How do you know that was always the risk?"

"I can't say. But what you know, what you are supposed to know, carries the risk that in fact you get to know more. And you are, after all, seeing Adam Magellan. Your training parish priest is very concerned. Although this is no longer any of my business."

"Maybe not," I said, "but it is what you know that I want to know."

"Anyway, Colin Cromer should be pleased that you two have stayed together. Leave it: I'd hoped I'd be coming for some other conversation. You are beautiful, Diana. You've had your wotsit done. It looks lovely."

Diana said, "Thank you Ken. I look like Linda now."

I said, "Remember our chat on my bed? We could - all three of us - lie on my double bed, you in the middle, Ken."

Diana looked at me rather severely.

"Naturist rules, Ken, on your back, and absolutely no touching with your hands. A bit like we did before."

"Like before?" asked Diana.

"Pure, nice chat, very relaxed, a little intimate but in a nice sort of way."

"How is your bottom?" he asked. "It was very painful, I heard."

"What do you know about my bottom? I've been concealing it from you since you've been here."

"Well, em, you've shuffled about in church. I was told these things."

"I think we should go upstairs," I said.

So as we went upstairs, me first, Diana last, and Ken between us, he said, "You do have some boil on your bum and it is terrible. I really hope Keith and Adam haven't been too cruel."

It was almost as if he considered it part of the sex I was having with them. Into the bedroom I told Ken, "Lie on your back, exactly in the middle of my bed. Go on."

Diana asked me quietly, "Are you sure?"

"Making sure we succeed. You lie to his right, me to his left."

"I think you're mad round the head," she told me.

We lay there and nothing was said, Ken looking side to side at us. He broke the silence by asking, "Has Connie Wilson invited you to go shopping yet?"

"The wife of Jim? No. Tell me more."

"Oh, I'm out of touch. Maybe after your ordination then. I'm talking out of turn. She is a formidable woman. Very cold, though."

"Who told you she would invite me to go shopping? The bishop?"

"No, she did."

"Interesting," said Diana.

"Will the bishop know?"

"She is close to the bishop. But I don't know."

"She certainly talks to you," I put it to him.

"You and Diana have really voluptuous bodies. I love feeling your heat and both sides! You two are not cold."

I said, "Thank you Ken, but I am not convinced that what you have just said is naturist talk. You can praise our bodies but I get a hint of excitement." Diana raised herself, looked at his knob and stared at me.

He then said, "The woman I mentioned once before to you, Linda... She dismissed me. Don't you two dismiss me, please. I know you were hiding Diana as Dee. I'm pleased you are seeing me again since I found out, but don't dismiss me."

"We welcomed you, Ken. Do I know this woman who dismissed you?" I asked.

He paused, and stayed silent.

Diana asked, "Is she the very same Connie Wilson by any chance?"

He paused again. "Yes, Diana"

"That's really interesting," said Diana.

"Ah," I responded. "She's drawn you in, and dismissed you. Very cold. And she, like you, has got a badge?"

"Yes."

"It figures, Ken."

"Yer training incumbent Colin Cromer said a while back he thinks you could lack sympathy."

"Have you broken confidentiality rules, Ken?" I asked.

"There was that incident with the Polish driver and pedestrian. You showed little emotional reaction."

"Ah. I have had an ethical training along the way, which redirects what might be a, well, sociopathic tendency."

"You're bang on there," said Diana.

"Isn't that at all worrying?" Ken Osis asked, looking directly at me looking at him.

"What exactly?"

"To self-identify as sociopathic?"

"What would you call it?"

"But yer could be sympathetic and trained to cope. Is this all right to say with Diana?"

"Yes."

"You two share secrets."

"Ken, is Connie Wilson a sociopath?" I asked.

"She might be a psychopath," he said. "And Reverend Jim too. Diana, none of this must go anywhere. Can I look at you Diana, just a minute?"

"Get up via the bottom edge of the bed and have a look at her," I said to him. "Stand over there and lean against the wall." He went and stood near the wall. "With your back in contact with the wall. Look at her. My friend has always been so attractive. Now look at me."

"What are you doing?" Diana asked me.

"Opening myself up so he can have a look at me."

"Linda! I knew it."

"Do whatever you like. Nothing, if you prefer, but I am showing him some of the pink stuff."

"You're mad."

"Show him yours," I told her. "It is only flesh. See, you can't resist, Diana, just touching yourself."

"I'll get you for this." She pulled herself open.

"Stay back and leave yourself alone, boy! She's a good girl."

"I thought you'd become submissive," said Ken.

"With whom?" I asked, wondering if this was about Keith and me. Come back Ken. Come back now. No touching. Confess to us, Ken: what happened with Connie?"

Diana muttered, "You're evil, you are. Look at what's happening."

"I'm not evil," said Ken.

"Not you," Diana replied. "I don't know where you got 'submissive' from, Ken. She's hardly being submissive."

"I can't say, answering you both," he said. "I'm not evil but I've been a fool. And I'm getting erect and cannot help it."

Diana said at me, "If you can do it with Arthur, you can do it with him. This is how you are, how you always were."

I said, ignoring her, "Connie. Is she a naughty naughty woman, Ken?"

"My God," said Diana.

He said, "She is that way."

"Naughty with you, Ken?"

"Yes."

"Would she want to be naughty with me, Ken? Like, after shopping?"

"My God," said Diana again.

He said, "Accepts lesbians."

"Bloody hell," said Diana.

I said, "Ken, people are accusing me, but you, a priest, has had sexual relations with someone else's wife, the wife of another priest, and with her consent. It wasn't with his consent, was it? Was it?"

"I've told you far too much already."

I said, "What do you mean, 'Accepts lesbians'?"

"For an evangelical, it's unusual."

"Who does?" I asked further.

"What is going on around here?" asked Diana.

"You see, he must accept lesbians as well as she if Connie might make a move on me."

"Presumably," he said.

"You know, Ken."

"I've told you before, I don't like what is happening."

"What is happening, Ken?"

"I'm going, that is what is happening."

I put my right arm on his chest, and pressed down.

"Ah, no," I said. "We're now getting somewhere, so you stay. Ken, Is it a burden for you to hold on to so many secrets, with so many different people?"

"Yes, frankly, and why I stopped."

"You come across as a bit of a worrier to me."

"I tried to make that a quality of counselling. I still have my own confessor. It came with the role, originally."

I did remove my arm from him. "Do you offload your secrets to your own confessor?"

"I can't," he said. "I can only say how I feel in general terms, talk in non-specifics. It takes time to receive counselling when you can't say your anxieties."

"Ken, I will masturbate you. It needs attention. You are a nice chap."

"I knew it," Diana said, "I think I might be going."

"You were the one who mentioned Arthur," I said, "and I am not asking you to do anything."

"That would be nice," said Ken. "Please don't go, Diana. Linda might become cruel as well."

Diana said, "He's right there. You really do frighten people, Linda."

He said, "I meant like Connie."

"It's all coming out," I said, "because it is going to come out, and out of there, Ken. I am not cruel. I like men, Ken, and I like women too. Give me permission."

"Please," he said.

"I'll perform, I said. (I chose that word). Diana had a fixed stare to the ceiling. "Did Connie Wilson talk about 'getting near the centre' with you? That's right. I'm a bit moist, Ken. Touch me there."

Diana said, quietly, "You bastard."

"Yes, she did, Linda, early on. You are nice and damp."

"Are they connected? Her sex with you and the AmDram that was all your talk?"

"Please don't make what we are doing conditional on talking about that."

"You can put your finger in, Ken. She wears a badge with a goose and a B on it?"

"Yes."

"But the Reverend Vine. Her badge is a W with an elephant."

"Different group."

"Mmm. It's not AmDram though, is it? Diana said it was like the masons. Is that right?"

"No. I can't talk about that."

"No?"

"No."

"Do you want to put that in me, Ken? Well, Diana, you could be more useful than just staring at the ceiling."

"I am astonished."

"Stroke his back, Diana."

"I have never, ever... Oh, what the fuck."

"Ken, your thing may be a bit small but it is just right for me. In it goes."

"This is ridiculous," said Diana. "We were supposed to use so-called 'naturist rules'. These aren't naturist rules!"

"Fuck me and talk, Ken."

"I cannot tell you more," he said, getting a motion going. "I have given an oath. I can only tell you... what I am allowed to tell you. I know you've put up with a lot. Your bottom..."

"Hang on. It's not good enough, Ken. You get out of me and go up against the wall, again. Go on. You cannot continue in a woman who says no."

He lifted himself from me, and I made hand movements for him to go against the wall again.

"What are you doing now?" asked Diana.

"You might want to go home. So, thanks Diana. See you. I'm getting somewhere here, and I intend to get there. I have under my bed a cut away screw thread from a water bottle."

"Why?" Diana asked. "Was this for him? Was it for Adam? Was it for you?"

"Keith used it on me. I have washed it.

Ken said, "He was cruel; please don't be cruel to me."

"Nah. It didn't have much effect in me. It will in you. Go home, Diana."

"No."

"Ken, you are shaking. You are not allowed to shake. Bend over. Well bend over towards me! If you don't, well, I'll make you. Diana, go home."

Diana was sitting up. "What the hell are you doing?" she asked.

"How I was trained by Keith," I said. With him bending slowly towards me, white in the face, I gripped Ken's waist with my left arm, and turned him somewhat from the wall. "Now we can either do this with my grip, Ken, which won't be the best, or will you show me your bottom?"

"No," he said, my arm still around his waste, his bottom away from me of course.

Diana said, perched up, "I'm not going to stand for this. Let go of him."

"You will tell me everything Ken, one way or the other."

He said, "I don't know what you are doing; you're hurting me already with your grip."

"Aha. Have it this way."

Leaning over him, still gripping him, I placed the screw thread at his anus with my right hand and, looking over his arse, started turning. He started yelling. Diana was at first, transfixed, her eyes bulging as she looked.

I said, as I screwed it in, "Ken, you filthy filthy man. Don't you wipe your arse properly?"

With these words of mine, Diana got up, clenched her fist, approached me, and punched me straight in the face. I shuddered backwards, releasing Ken. She was ready with her other fist, so I raised my arms in surrender before shifting backwards, slightly losing and regaining my balance.

Diana turned from me, and although I felt like kicking her, I didn't.

On his knees now, she put her arm on his back. She said, "Come on, stand up. I'll take it out of your bottom." With it still in, he walked awkwardly. She took him out of the room and into the bathroom.

I said to myself, "Bastard. He's not going to tell me any more now."

I could hear her say, "Your bottom is hurting, isn't it. She is a nasty woman. I'll wipe it gently."

At the bedroom door I shouted across to the bathroom, "Well, he is a dirty bastard!"

I sat on the bed, and they seemed to be taking some time - the screw thread must have been removed.

I heard her say, "Here we are, Ken. Oooh, out it comes; oooh, lots and lots. Look. Let's get the tissue paper."

"Diddums!" I called out, rather aloud.

Diana came in, her upper legs glistening with white opaque liquid. "If you carry on, Linda," Diana said, "I'm going to get the bathroom scissors and stab them in your arse, and then you'll know all about it."

"It's already been done."

"Keith? Adam?"

"Keith."

She returned to the bathroom. I heard her say, "There we are, Ken: all cleaned up off my legs."

"Ah, that's nice," I said more quietly.

"Come on Ken," she said, "Let's go downstairs; you can dress and take yourself home. But this has to have been the last time. Do not come back here again: leave her alone. She is very dangerous."

"This is the only time with you?" he asked.

"Yes, Ken. I am married."

I said, "Yes Ken, no Ken, three bags full, Ken." I followed them down and went and sat in the front room. A clothed Ken let himself out, not speaking to me.

A minute later Diana came in the room, still naked. "Do you want to fight me then? Come on. I've got fists."

"I noticed. You hit my jaw and it is bruised."

"Anyway, you've found out what you want to know. They have sex with each other, in this group."

"So what?" I asked, vaguely.

"Well, when you get your shopping invite, you're more than capable of going along with it and finding out some more."

"So I am."

"Blimey. You might even join them. Let me just look at that. I'm not going to hit you. Show me your bottom."

"You're mad at me."

"There's a lot of stress about. It sounds like Keith was cruel with you. Osis seemed to know."

I said, "He's adding two and two. Keith won't be part of that group."

After a pause Diana kissed me directly on my lips. "You're really far weltered. Try and sort yourself out. I'll see you later - after the ordination, probably." She went out of the room and back towards the larger lounge. "Ordination? Hah!" Soon the woman returned clothed, opened the front door and said, "You'll be all right." She closed the door with a whispered "Bye!"

Compassionate Diana realised that something had flipped in me and I felt quite disturbed.

Chapter 11 Wales and Temptation

Narrator: Linda Arrival at the Family Farm (To Thursday 20th June)

Tuesday night, Keith had returned to normal sexual activity with me. He made me orgasm and immediately wished me the best for the ordination - almost like a blessing. On Wednesday night, Adam returned to my bed with news that Ann and Labhaoise had approved of our relationship. Well, how reassuring. I had to make myself orgasm.

I was in the church for the Thursday morning service. Colin, despite his recent chill towards me, wished me the best for my holiday and then retreat. He would see me at the cathedral.

My bum hurt while driving, so I played myself a number of Steve Hackett tunes with that long-haired chap singing, and me singing along, including Cinema Show. I thought I could use Take a little trip with Father Taresius for next year's Lent. After all, I had raged like the sea and gave like the earth.

The car took me into deepest mid-Wales, finally down the longest narrow road one might find, with Llyn Clywedog and an old lead mine some miles off. My family were farming in a changed landscape for them. Four years it had been since their move to the hills, same time as setting off on my vocation. I'd been here with Keith two years back. It matters when your family don't like your spouse, because it forces a decision to defend the marriage and defend him. Earlier, around Serninsea, they didn't like me marrying Keith with what was his vocation then.

It was the first time I'd seen cats' eyes marking out the long private drive up to the farm. Along the increasingly muddy drive stood a figure I did not recognise wearing a sandy-coloured overall. I asked, "Is this the farm of Leonard Bode?"

"Uhstad Bodaod Bacshog," it sounded like. Ystad Bodaod Bacsiog. Rough-Legged Buzzards Estate.

I knew the responsive word and said, "Diolch."

(The name came from our Buzzard farm name in Serninsea Marshes; buzzards were seen on our east coast and not in Wales, and this was an attempt to sound like Bode.)

So I carried on driving over this hill crest and, oh yes, that was my father, bollock naked, except with wellies on.

"Hello daddy."

"Pity you can't drive with nothing on. Getting warmer now."

"Yes daddy."

"See you in a few minutes. Do you like the cats' eyes? Great for when it's dark. Local authorities are daft to get rid of so many, but good for us here."

The farmyard indeed followed, consisting of the now farmhouse family of my dad called Leonard, my mother and his wife called Elizabeth or Lilibet, and my younger sister Leila. In the annexe lived eldest sister Lucinda and husband Dyfed - pronounced 'Duved'. (Larry, our older brother, was never part of this farm and lived in London.)

Every roof other than the barn had solar panels across them, and there were three wind turbines. Vehicles were scattered about and my Ford Fiesta added to their number.

I got out. By the kitchen door to the yard on a bench was my hanging breasts well-fed mother, naked, peeling potatoes, and alongside her was Leila, naked, being lazy.

I sat down with them on my left bum cheek only. I'd taken my own wellies but sandals as well for some outside and inside use. So sandals it was. Hello to them. See them shortly, after I found the downstairs loo.

On my reappearance, Leila told me that she was attending college, studying hairdressing. She'd also learnt Welsh further than our parents and Lucinda. I said there was over-supply of hairdressers in Serninsea and I hardly used them, but I might use one for the ordination. Mother groaned.

This all round nakedness was simply their normal. Warming air was drifting up the valley.

My mother was rotund, not wholly obese, gone grey on top and mousey-brown hair around her crotch. Leila had a bikini line from her trips to Mid Wales and North Wales beaches. Lucinda was as bald and hairless as me because she shared all my characteristics.

My mother asked me, "How is Keith?"

"I've some bad news. We're separating. He has found someone else he wants to live with, in Harwich. I know, you don't need to say it: you never liked him."

"Still doing what he wanted to do?"

"It's too close to pull out."

"It's never too close to pull out," mummy said. Leila started giggling.

My all-round hairy father was walking up the farmyard in his wellies with a sheepdog. I must have missed this accompaniment before. Daddy said, standing, "He was all right, Keith, but not with all that claptrap."

I thought I'd push my luck. "I wonder: would any of you like to come to my ordination?"

"Definitely not," said my mother. "We thought we'd brought you up away from the establishment, with some different insights into this world of ours."

I said, "Mine is an alternative insight; it is these days."

My father said, "It's establishment."

"I'm fairly dissident within it, you know. But I'm saying: it's almost despised now because it can't handle sexuality very well."

"No it can't," said my mother. "So why are you bothering? Anyway, why are you separating?"

"He has been having an affair, a woman he knew back at school. We've been drifting apart really because I became a deacon and he has been in this measuring job. Two years he has been seeing this Cheryl."

"Is she that lass Cheryl Mould?" asked my mother.

"You remember her."

"She had a right reputation. Her mother wasn't much better. I knew her mother at school. Her mother was a bully."

"Oh."

My father said, "This Keith became so full of theology funny talk. His mother used to interfere with him."

"You've said so before."

"He was a mummy's boy."

"These days my Church can be quite diverse. For example, some priest guy wants to pick up Pagans and have a church within a Church, like all sorts of old rituals. So it tries to reach out."

"Bollocks," said daddy, who pointed at my bottom for the benefit of my mother and then walked on with the dog, going off to higher fields.

"Lucinda is away seeing a friend," said mummy. "Have a coffee."

"I bet that's deliberate." I said. "I'm coming here: she disappears."

"She said you can stay in the annexe. Their spare is a bigger bedroom than their own. Get up and let me look at that."

I did so.

"This is snided out with stuff. It's wosserer than most. How did that happen? Do you know?"

"My new boyfriend bit me and then I sat on my old hairbrush; then I agitated the skin."

"Why don't you get rid of it?"

"Because it represents my continuity."

"Last time I saw it it had lost many of its little ball-ends and some of the spikes were bent."

"Entropy, mother," I said. "It can never go back to being like it was when I bought it."

"Don't be so clever with me. Dyfed's tried to get Luce to have a better view of you. Boyfriend, eh? You don't mess about. And a clergywoman."

"She still resents me and I'm forty now. It's ridiculous. By the way, I continue to go to the further Midlands club - Bever Wood."

"Keith's heart was not in it," said mummy. "Plus he was lukewarm about you: he only married you when he wanted to do your ordination. I liked Saxiclite - you met a lot of friends there and Luce is with one now."

"I don't mix with Saxiclites these days. I'll check out the annexe."

"They wouldn't want to mix with an Anglican vicar," she said. "I suppose your new boyfriend is an Anglican - probably some vicar."

"Not at all. He is an investigator. See you soon."

"Not George Wickenby? He's a perv and twenty years..."

"Not him. See you shortly."

Encounter with Dyfed (Thursday 20th June)

A man came into the annexe. I jumped back but did not cover myself. "Who are you?"

"Dyfed. Rwy'n byw yma." (His first name was pronounced 'Duved'.) "Dyfed Cadwaladr, at your service, madam: Lucinda's fifty years old husband I am."

"I thought you were away, visiting..."

"No no, Luce is visiting, isn't it. I'm here; so are you."

"Surely there's a spare room in the farmhouse, then, for me?"

"No no. Not how they are using them. There's a second bedroom in here. I'm in one, you are in the other."

"I noticed two. Am I in the right one? The furthest?"

"Yes, that bed is made up for you. Peid a poeni." He started undressing, to nudity, and took the clothes into their bedroom. Returning, he said, "I never took my clothes off like this before marriage. Ah. Rwyf mor noeth â'r diwrnod y cefais fy ngeni."

"Sorry?"

"I said I am as naked as the day I was born, isn't it."

"Well, yes, that's partly the idea in this family."

"Duw. You look so like your sister. You have her dimensions as well. But, er, she does not have that big mark on her bottom rear."

"No, it is a nuisance. So she is visiting her friend, and you are not."

"She is in Normanton-on-Trent, isn't it."

"It'll be that Saxiclite mate of ours. She got closer to her when I was at East Midlands University. Rosie Callow. Tell me about yourself, Dyfed."

"I am a furniture shop owner-manager in Llanidloes, our town nearby, and happy that I now have oversight of shop space I can use for tourists."

"You'll want something to eat; I could eat something."

However, at this point my mother knocked on the door and asked, "Do you want something doing about that bottom of yours?"

"I don't know."

She then said, "Well, while you decide on that, why don't you make yourself useful and prepare some tea for Dyfed? He'll show you all the equipment."

He then said, "Lovely, modern open plan it is, as you can see, but traditional furniture too we put in here."

"They rent this from us," my mother said, and promptly left us and went back to the farmhouse.

"Your sister," he said, "I don't know why she has a small opinion of you. That's why you weren't invited to the wedding."

I said, "Never heard a word. No idea when. That's the extent of it."

"20th April 2018. She was a daddy's girl, I gather, indeed. But she's on HRT and you are not - Lucinda and your mother told me that: your mother learnt from her mistake. Luce says you take everything she's had, but not the HRT."

"Daddy gave her much more attention than me when forced to take HRT and had a vaginoplasty. Thing is, more immediately, Dyfed, what do you want? I am a really crap cook."

"A cheese-topped fisherman's pie," he said. "I'm having a shower, now I am home from work."

"Yes, okay. Grated cheese on a potato and fish mix. Fisherman's bake."

"The fish is in the freezer, mae tatws ar yr ochr; mae caws y tu mewn i'r oergell."

"Cows?"

"You could use those cheese squares in the fridge. Hwyl am nawr!"

Next time I saw him with the cooking well advanced, he was dripping wet and rubbing himself with a towel. Hmm, a dripping male body and not a bad one.

"Luce once came into my shop and wanted furniture and she got me as well."

"So she now has a husband that I had."

"I can do something about that on your behind rear."

"It's been a bloody nuisance. I can reach it but can't do anything about it. Two mirrors I need to see it. My husband stabbed it for me but it weeped and has just become worse."

"I know," he said, "I'll get a sewing box and some items. I'd like to do it you know."

"Again?" I asked.

"Duw, once is enough I hope."

"Again for me."

He arrived with a sewing box, a candle and kitchen roll. "It all depends how you do it."

I looked around, and found my (culprit) hairbrush. I'd brought with me (of course), and wanted my long hair straight and smooth before lying down as his patient. Out of this sewing box he produced a large and he said sharp needle. At least this time I knew what the operator was going to do.

The kettle had boiled already so he boiled it again and poured the water over the needle. Dyfed took a nearby box of matches and lit the candle, running the needle through it. He asked me to lie on my front on this old kitchen table, presumably from his shop. My bottom was facing up, my breasts squeezed by weight, my head unsupported.

"Now this will hurt," he said.

He gathered up my bum boil with his other hand and inserted the needle straight into where I'd wanted to get at it myself and he kept pushing.

I SCREAMED the bloody annexe down. The fact that I knew it was coming this time didn't take away my desire to scramble straight up the walls and hang from the ceiling.

"Duw, what a lot of pus! Let me gather my hand round this and get some more out.

He put that needle back in and turned it around too, like at an angle, and said, "You know, it's yellow and white, but a lot of deep deep red blood now."

My legs were shaking; I was shaking. He must have blown a volcano.

And then I thought, that was wonderful. After all, it had been with Keith's effort. Yes, I had suffered shock with Keith and became scared of him, but Dyfed had now done the same and I felt like wanting him all over me.

Mummy came in, half way through a subsequent mention of food, and saw what was happening. She stood and stared. "Use your finger nails to drive it all out. No, I have them - you don't. Let me."

So, now my mother went deep into the skin with the protruding nails of her index fingers, and pushed into the blood and pus from below. My mother then walked out of the annexe laughing. Dyfed brought over some kitchen paper.

He was squeezing at the lump and wiping pouring blood with the said kitchen paper.

She was back. She said, "This is witch hazel gel, Dyfed; rub this into the remains. After you've had your tea, put some more on. And can you get me some more from town tomorrow? Shouldn't really use it in open gashes," she added.

"Fuck me! Don't then," I said.

Off she went again.

He said, "Anyway, what this does now is ooze a lot and later like clear pus but that's not pus and we'll get that out as well." He was still wiping my bum cheek. Piece after piece of kitchen paper was covered in blood, becoming more watery. "And sit on folded kitchen roll if you don't mind, when you sit, eating our food."

"Put some antiseptic on it at least," I demanded, and he went to find some within the annexe and put it on neat with cotton wool. Wow, that hurt as well.

I got up from the table and he was fully erect. I decided to ignore his desire and return, uncertain at first, to the food preparations, thinking I ought to wash my hands first and did so. So he came to the running water as well. My arse was throbbing now.

I was serving tea, but he came over and wiped upwards on my left leg. When he touched the boil area with paper it hurt.

I turned around and he was semi erect.

"Sorry but I am excited. You are like your sister. Luce doesn't like it that you don't take HRT."

"I can't help that."

After food I said, "I hardly watch TV. We have a local TV station. It's not bad for some local announcements, and some local adverts for shops, but it's rubbish for anything else. And they've taken repeating programmes to a frequency never seen before. It is shite."

In the course of this Welsh viewing, with me sat on sheets of kitchen roll, and me doing pelvic exercises, he asked to see my bottom several times. Clearly he was getting excited from me. I told him to sit closer and he shouldn't be worried.

Then there was a telephone call from my sister to her husband and he told her I was staying in the other bedroom in the annexe. She did not even ask to speak to me, so I ignored her. Later he rubbed in some more witch hazel gel.

I said to him, "It should be quite possible for mature adults to be naked with each other and not have to think they must resort to sex."

"It's possible I suppose," he replied. "Let me see all of your bottom."

Dyfed in Town (Friday 21st June)

Friday morning, I made the breakfast. He was holding my waste from behind and was saying my bum might be improving but was unsure. He rubbed in more witch hazel gel.

"You are so like her," he said.

"But I'm not," I replied.

Suited for work, Dyfed even kissed me goodbye. He drove off. I thought I'd go and see him at work, and see the town.

The daft thing was the warmth and having to add clothes. So I drove into Llanidloes according to instruction (no sat nav). "Hello," I said, walking into his otherwise unoccupied furniture shop.

He said he'd show me the other shop acquired so cheaply, and added that now most of his furniture sales were not done from the shop customer at all. So he was quite happy to walk down the town with me - Back in half an hour was placed on the door. There was a Arts Centre and Fitness place nearby and he could exploit these with some sort of shop tourist connection. Gaming machines and even roulette was possible, via complex licensing.

I said, "No, please; we have a casino in nearby Serninsea and it can't do any good." He said he could sell Pagan, Buddhist and Hindu trinkets in the town for the tourists by generating a myth of an ancient mystical past. He might combine the shop with limited refreshments. He also was thinking of what else he could do with the furniture shop, even though it was now the only furniture shop in the area. He said that sometimes the furniture he sold never even came to the shop at all: imported via Felixstowe and Aberdaugleddau he delivered directly. I told him Felixstowe was very near to where my "estranged husband" wanted to live in the future.

I had something of the hots for this chap. I had a very rare visit to a pub with him. The Duke of Burgundy, it was called, with a butterfly logo, and I drank a pint of lime and soda water.

"What's the local tippie in your area?"

"A brew called Thedde. Pale ale produced by two sisters."

The question was this: should I steal something else of my sister's, as she saw it, or should I stop the cycle? I should resist. After all, I was getting ordained in some days: just because I was outside my usual environment didn't mean I should behave differently.

Then I thought, I had been behaving differently. I'd undergone a lot of stress recently, and things had been spiralling downwards. Now was a chance to stabilise.

At the farm and in this town, I didn't feel like a deacon at all, never mind the priest I was to become. I mean, who was I? We walked back to my car, and he gave me a hug. I'm not usually one for hugs. Back in the car I brushed my hair. I wanted the conquest of my sister's choice, but I knew I should not, even if I was losing my husband and my sister still had hers. I drove back to Ystad Bodaod Bacsiog.

My older sister claimed that he was yet something else I'd taken from her but she got her own back when I'd returned from university.

I cooked a meat pie and veg for tea. Actually, mummy had prepared the pastry and indeed had the meat to fill it and did that part too. Really, my cooking was warming up! The thing was, his hands were free and easy with me, which he may have confused with naturism, and he rubbed in more of the witch hazel to my actual great pleasure. But, when it came to it, he went to their bedroom and I went to the extra one.

I did masturbate and think of him, and thought of his rock solid erection in reaction to my screaming and flowing pus and blood.

Walk with Daddy (Saturday 22nd June)

Saturday (third day, second full day) we didn't have breakfast together. Dyfed wanted to start early and eat in a town cafe; so I went and had a rather hefty chucky and checky and more with mummy, daddy and Leila in the farmhouse. Leila was clothed because she was off shopping.

Daytime then and I was in the farmhouse. I wondered why I wasn't staying there. Upstairs was this enormous bedroom and it had an ensuite and a walk in cloakroom, and these were all Lucinda's. Even though she lived in the annexe, now, she reserved these rooms for herself. Leila's bedroom also had its own ensuite and that alone was as big as a bedroom. In fact they'd expected Leila to have moved out by now, but she hadn't. There was a spare room for Larry. Mummy and daddy had their own double bedroom and huge ensuite and cloaks. I had no room. Anyway, I made use of Lucinda's reserved toilet. I just put my presence in her shit house.

So afternoon came again. My father said he was getting used to everything to do with sheep. I heard him say, "Come up and see my hilarious sheep."

"Why? Are they funny?"

"What are you talking about?" he asked me.

"Well, presumably they have characteristics that make you laugh."

"Stop being a pie can."

"You said, 'Come up and see my hilarious sheep,' so..."

"No! Stop being so smockravelled. Come up and see my hill areas sheep. They are sheep..."

"Oh daddy, something we never had in the marshes."

"Wazzuck! Like to come up the hill to see the sheep? I'll get the dog out and we can go."

Interesting that the dog, Arthur, did not live in the house.

So two naked humans, except for wellies for me and boots for him, plus the dog, went out of the farm and upwards. Father described the ground as a bit 'slape' or slippery. We rose up and walked along a hill crest to find some sheep.

He said he had learnt much about dog handling - neighbouring farmers had been very helpful these past years; this was quite a change from the predominant but not completely arable farming back at Serninsea. I told him that there was more emphasis there now on reversion to wetland and there may be an environmental and visitor land use centre. We might have a seals place. In uncertain times it was unclear how it would be funded.

"Daddy?" I asked him up there, looking at sheep.

"What?" and he simply urinated in front of me, rather like the dog had done several times. He used to do this back at Serninsea Marshes.

Even before he'd finished his forceful piss I was asking, "Why were you closer to Lucinda than you were to me?"

"You only thought this," he said, "about Luce."

"She had 'cuddle time' with you, even as a young teenager. You didn't have cuddle time with me."

"She had what you went through but your mum did differently with you, you know. She was our first. We think we made mistakes and mum were snotravelled. I didn't have cuddle times with Leila either," he added.

"Leila's had none of our problems. What was cuddle time, daddy; what did you do?"

"Cuddle time was a nice time for her. That's it."

"Larry thinks..."

"Larry wasn't there."

"No, he wasn't. And I wasn't."

"Anyway, Luce polished my boots. When did you ever polish my boots? I'd come in from the marshes, and she would polish them to reflections. And she washed my clothing - made a point of it. Even my underpants, when I needed them."

Now I needed a pee, as we were walking on. With him ahead, I squatted, but I was peeing when he turned around.

"You've never stopped being jealous of her," he said.

"I was envious, daddy," I said, looking down. I stood up from my pee, dripping a bit. "I was envious because I wanted what she was getting."

"I cuddled all my daughters. I'll cuddle you now."

"But not cuddle time."

"Yeah. Luce had surgery. You didn't. Have you had surgery since?"

"No."

"Anyway, mummy doted on you. You didn't have surgery thanks to your mum. Why are you asking all this now? She doesn't get cuddle time now because she has a husband."

"Indeed. Coming here, I'm feeling the absence of Lucinda - and now she has a husband who is a very nice person."

"Ever thought she was envious - as you put it - of you getting married? Fortunately Luce found that local man."

"So you don't have cuddle time with her now."

"Of course I don't, me duck. Do you want a cuddle now?"

"Yes. Why not? Give me a cuddle now."

"OK, come here then. You might be 40 but I said to Luce once or twice, 'You're never too old to have a cuddle from your dad.'"

I squashed myself into my daddy, and felt very good about it. He ran his hand down my back. He kissed my forehead. I held on to my daddy.

"Why have you gone erect, daddy? It's pressing into me."

"Thinking of things. Sorry. Bit cleggy, aren't we?"

My dad released me from his arms and his penis pointed rigidly to above distant hills. He now used his arms from our viewpoint to show the extent of the land holdings. We walked on further, until some large stones were jutting out of the soil and grass, enough to sit on them. He'd gone soft again but then he farted. He said he was following in the footsteps of Andy Goldsworthy, an artist, in trying to make shapes with his sheep folds.

He said, "See that barn, right over there. The dog and me are going over there and we've got some fence repairs and to get the bloody hill areas sheep on the right side of it. You might want to go back now, unless you want to work."

"Yeah. I fancy a long bath. I might use Luce's ensuite - that bath is very large and right in the centre - yet she has also the annexe."

"I'm sure she won't mind you using it. Me new mucka Sion Jones should be coming: if you pass him on your way back tell him I'm going to Ty Ichaf and then that fence nearby needs repair."

So I went back the way we'd come. An aircraft went overheard fairly low - I wondered where to and from - and I looked up.

This farm labourer did approach, in overalls. He gave me a head to toe look. I said to him, "My father has gone to Ty Ichaf."

"Very nice to meet you at last," he said in his thick Welsh accent. "'Bout time we did that fencing," he added. "So you are..."

"Linda. Linda Jupitas. I stayed around the east coast when most of my family moved here."

"You've got an elder brother in London as well."

"Yeah. Larry Bode."

He said, "Leila wants to move away, but is now at a local college. Nice lass. I hope she shows interest in me. I can't imagine Lucinda moving away now that she has moved into the annexe. The previous occupants started bed and breakfast in there ten years back. Sometimes they accommodated six people in there, before your folks moved in. Lucinda is older than you, isn't it?"

"By a year. After she was born, they had me quickly."

"Your dad says you and Lucinda are their 'special daughters'."

"Yeah, but Lucinda is a bit more special. She was first."

"I'd better be going," he said. "Very nice to meet you, wrth gwrs, and I can see the likeness between you and your sister in a number of ways."

Yeah. I know what he meant. More than just our faces: being tall, hairless body, large hands and feet, lean hips, long legs. I walked on back.

Once he'd gone ahead far enough I had to squat again for more than a pee. And when back to the farmyard I went into the farmhouse and was told I could use an airbed outside in a suntrap if I wanted to sunbathe.

Yes, but a bath first, and with just warm water. I usually showered at home.

Funnily enough for a naturist I was not a sun worshipper. I'd stay behind glass, like when at Patricia's with Diana. But I was being different here.

So after lying in Lucinda's bath and contemplating, and realising the whole was a wet room (the bath could spill over), I was later naked in the farmyard when daddy, his pally worker and the dog came back.

"Oy!" I said to laughs as the dog licked me in a sensitive spot. I recoiled, I think, because of assumptions about Adam's neighbour.

Minutes later Dyfed returned, driving in from his Saturday opening. I said hello but not much more.

He got out of the car and said, "Oh hi Linda. I've done some shopping. How about cauliflower cheese?"

"I'd thought of a good curry, but nah," I said. "Your idea is better. I should not eat curries."

"O Duw, keep it simple," he said.

Soon he was naked again and looking closely at my bottom inside as I stood with these simple ingredients.

I asked him, "Is Lucinda a good cook?"

"Luce has come on leaps and bounds," he said. "Of course I accept we won't have children, but I didn't want any anyway."

I had not asked that. I said, "Well, I think I'll make this my last night tonight. I only came for a brief break, and see if any of the family would be at my ordination. I've enjoyed meeting you but I don't want to queer Lucinda's pitch."

"No, stay longer, feel free," he said. "Your bottom is still seeping a little. There is a head on it again, but only a bit. I'd like to remove it really."

So for a second time I was front down on the old kitchen table in there.

"It only needs a little prick this time," he said. (I needed a 'prick' of any kind, I thought.) "It's nowhere near as angry as before."

It didn't matter. When he put the needle in, I could have hit the ceiling. I more than yelped. This was the third time now my bum cheek had received a severe pricking.

Now he was back in with his fingers, pushing out pus mother style. He was just enjoying this. "It's good; you've done very well," he said.

Now he was rubbing my shoulders, and moving his hands down the sides of my back, like some dry massage. And his hand brushed my anus and pubes. Naughty boy.

He went off for some disinfectant, and when done with it he said, "I'm going to leave it now - well, witch hazel a little later."

The box cooker was one that pinged and switched itself off. So we ate at the table where moments earlier he'd pierced my arse, although I was finding it difficult to sit.

He explained that, "Sometimes we go over to the farmhouse and all have a meal together. Your mam is such a good cook. And their one worker, Sion, he sometimes stays for meals, though I have a problem with him"

"I met him, yeah. Why?"

"Because I believe he and Lucinda had more than a walk up into the hills."

"He fancies Leila."

"He can cachau bant. Twll tin."

"I'd better not enquire," I said. I changed the subject. "When north of Serninsea we used to have a farm shop, and I worked in it for some years. It wasn't a lot but better than being on the dole. I take it there's no point having a farm shop up this remote valley."

"But I said to your mam to open a stall in the market if they do more with this farm. If I open another shop, we can put some possible produce in there."

After tea the television was awful, and the news was depressing. Nothing was right regarding Europe, America, Russia. Dyfed liked the journalist Huw Edwards, whereas I just wished he'd say things more efficiently.

I said to Dyfed, "Nationalism is rife: the god of ethnicity, language and religion. When religion went into the vernacular, nationalism got a boost; people combined their tendency to tribalism with national boundaries."

He looked dumb - daddy would say a 'wazzack'. It did not stop Dyfed leaning on me on the sofa. He was clearly stroking my shoulder and down my arm.

But I thought I cannot. At some point the war with my sister had to stop. "Thanks, Dyfed. I feel much for you. I'm separating from my husband and I have a boyfriend, and you are Lucinda's husband. Her surname is now Cadwaladr."

"Even though she was and is a bit free and easy herself."

"Yes."

Then we had a problem with a butterfly getting in. We were jumping about, and having fun trying to catch this thing. He did get it and we released it and I wanted to capture him.

Of course I slept in the other room overnight. In the morning I said, "This brush was never Lucinda's. It was always mine. I've kept it ever since."

He said, "I like long hair. Luce's hair is long as well. Pity you're going. She's back overmorrow."

"I am going tomorrow, and see you in the morning," and I kissed him directly on the lips for some seconds, and he pulled me in to him for my breasts to squash on his chest.

I looked at him.

"If your dad can do it with Luce, then I can with you."

"Yes, it's very innocent," I said.

Bever Wood Club and Surprises (Sunday 23rd June)

I'd seen to it that Dyfed had a good breakfast. No, I was not going to a Welsh Anglican church, or any other for that matter. Then I did something particular. My father had gone into town, probably to see his mates in The Duke of Burgundy, and so I found his boots. I polished them, and put every effort into shining them. I left them in the window for the light to bounce off them. I said to mummy to say bye to daddy for me. I kissed Leila as well, and asked them to tell Lucinda that I missed her.

"What do you think of Sion Jones?" I asked Leila.

"He wants to get into what he can see."

"That's your decision, of course."

Before I went, mummy gave me a supply of witch hazel for my leaky bum and put a plaster on it because I'd wear clothes. I assured her I now had a strategy regarding my apparent incontinence.

My final kiss with Dyfed in the annexe turned out to be a longer one than the night before and my prostrate gland was very busy wetting me where I wanted to be dryer.

He gave me a CD for the journey...

Before I could change my mind to stay and fuck him senseless, I drove off. The Cat's Eyes' music included the wonderful tracks: The Duke of Burgundy, Coat of Arms and Requiem For The Duke of Burgundy. I felt so sad, hearing them several times, and became almost depressed. I was thinking of Dyfed; I just had desire.

And then there was daddy. I'd approached him about cuddle time. That was progress. He'd given it an innocent interpretation, or as innocent as possible. Larry had once said that father was fucking daughter, and I never wanted to believe it because I loved daddy and thought Larry was a brute.

So instead of driving directly from Wales to the convent in Wytham, I had a night in my naturist club. My membership meant that, if there was a room, I'd stay there like in a gentleman's club of old. Serhat and Judi Ahmed were coming to the end of their notice. I whipped my togs off and after dumping all bags in my room and dumping in the opposite room I went for a swim in the indoor pool.

Still so close to midsummer, here I was with the sun coming through the glass roof and wishing I could stay. It was bright and warm and the day was long. All you have to do to join a club is sign and demonstrate through nudity your membership. You also join the national body. But why not some sort of ceremony, if not quite laying on of hands?

The objection was what Marx had called superstitious authoritarianism, and groups with excessive ritual were giving way to more rational and democratic type arrangements. Eric Hobsbawm once wrote about ritual in his Primitive Rebels book. It came out before the 1960s - well before my time.

Having had my swim I went via the shower to the outdoors and the sunshine (if cooler - we are hardy types), and said hello to some folks I knew.

And then I spotted a familiar face: Jeremy Symes. So I couldn't quite forget our profession and its superstitious entry requirement.

"Hello," he said. "She's left; I'm on an enforced leave and I have to see the Bishop - Bolingbroke, of course - who seems to have everything devolved to him these days."

"Tell me about it," I said. "I remember Emily's concern. I'm sorry about that."

"I'm not sorry," said Lindy Peacock, walking up behind me.

"Nor am I really," said Jeremy. "It was inevitable."

"Hello Lindy," I said. This was a second recent hug with her, on her initiative (but none with him). I said back to Jeremy, "I know John Barman is busy this week. He's made a point to be at the retreat: interviews, teaching, the lot, by the look of it."

Jeremy said, "There's a church in Church Warsop, Cuckney. Did you..."

"You went there?"

"No, I'm having a Sunday out."

"Well, so am I," I responded.

"Except you are getting ordained as a priest. You should be more enthusiastic."

I said, "I'm surprised I'm not suspended. I can't preach for toffee, and I'm continuously in trouble at work for getting things wrong. So, Jeremy, have you ever heard of a group calling themselves The Worshipful Company of Serninsea Theatrical Players - they go around wearing white badges with a black 'B' and a goose image on them."

"Absolutely not. I'm not interested in the theatre."

"I don't think they have anything to do with the theatre. I think they relate to the bishop, somehow. Something is going on," I said. "I can't make head or tail of it. Perhaps I will find out more soon. Have you heard of the Reverend Christine Vine?"

"Er... Wasn't she one of those involved in the bank robbery - stood up to the threat?"

"Yes. But that's all?"

"I've heard she owns some property."

"Right. She gets ordained too. I was going to say that my marriage has had it as well. Keith has found someone else, who lives in Harwich."

"We know," said Lindy.

"Really? We are supposed to be putting on the appearance of normality."

"Unlike Emily," said Jeremy.

Lindy said, "We know because your husband is here, and he sure looks intimate with a woman. She is called Cheryl," said Lindy. "Mole," I think. As in Adrian."

"It's Cheryl Mould not Cheryl Mole. I'm surprised he is here; I am more surprised that she is here."

"Lindy said, "Presumably, you don't want to meet her."

"No, I think I can, this side of knowing. A school friend, she became his colleague, and began an affair. I found out and we had it out and we've sorted it out. She's more for him than I am."

"You are remarkably calm about it all," Jeremy said.

"I am puzzled, though. I thought my husband was a reluctant naturist, only following me along. It explains why he did not want to come and see my family in Wales - well, partly. I am going to lie in the sun. If they turn up, I'll say hello, but I am not going to seek them out."

I applied some sun blocker cream and Jeremy and Lindy helped with getting some on my back and bum, noticing the spot that was at least starting to go down now.

I recognised his voice, saying, "Hello Linda." I opened my eyes, and looked up at these two naked folk, both holding towels, but he was doing the concealing. It was Keith and, indeed, Cheryl Mould herself. She did look like she'd looked after herself recently even without her clothes on. She had a full growth of pubic hair - most interesting, given my husband's intimacy with my vulva.

I said to her, "I think I need to congratulate you, Cheryl."

"What? Seriously?"

"Genuinely. I hear you are expecting. No sign yet, obviously."

"Thank you."

"You don't need it but you have my blessing."

Jeremy and Lindy were still alongside (I didn't know!). Jeremy said, "Now this is impressive. How to do it?"

So I turned to him and said, "Well, what other way is there to do it? We all move on."

"Appreciated," said Keith. "We've just come from a group of people playing Pope Joan. Was that your fault, Jeremy?" Keith asked.

"Yes, got some card game varieties going. Actually, it is my set; they have carried new popes high to check the undercarriage since Joan. If popes were naturists, it would solve the problem."

So here there were five: four having affairs and me. Adam Magellan would have made six. I explained I had come from the farm a day early, after receiving reluctance about my ordination from the family. (I didn't mention escaping Dyfed.) Five with our towels went to dinner, together.

At the table I said to Cheryl, "It is a long way from Harwich."

Cheryl said, "It's my holiday and I wanted to try this, and he is a member and so we came here."

"I told Cheryl it was just possible you might be here," Keith told me. "Break up your journey from Wales to Wytham. How is sister Lucinda and the rest of them?"

"Luce went to see a friend."

"And how's her marriage?"

"She left him behind. I stayed in the annexe with Dyfed."

"She must have changed; she must trust you."

"Well, if you mean what I think you mean, she had every reason to trust me. And him."

Cheryl said, "Is it like I used to be 'the other woman' - but I'm not now?"

"There was nothing untoward," I said, "but, no, you are not now."

"Linda. I would like Keith to move to Harwich, if there is a job there. I don't want him to take a lesser job, so he might have to wait. But there are all sorts of rumours going around about Serninsea closing," she added.

"Better not discuss those," said Keith, "and, in any case, I don't want to discuss work."

Cheryl remarked, "I like this going about with nothing on. I wanted to see if I could do what you two have done."

I said, "Being here suits you. You do look lovely. Not that it is a qualification, but you should have no body image fears."

"She's less nervous than me," he said. "Her towel is purely functional."

I wanted to be positive. "Come here again or another club nearer Harwich when you are fully pregnant, Cheryl. There is nothing lovelier than a fully pregnant woman, naked and confident, glowing."

Keith then said the words I wanted to hear. "I'll be in Wytham for your ceremony."

"And me," said Cheryl. "He wants to show me the historic city."

"Oh yes. Do come along as well. That would be good. You do know it is the last time I want Keith to act as my husband."

"He is your husband," said Cheryl."

"Well, we'll separate, perhaps under the same roof while his job is in Serninsea. You'll know all this. Keith and I want what will be a good divorce after appreciating a good partnership."

Departure & Arrival (Monday 24th June)

Before I went, on Monday, Cheryl found me and had one more thing to say: "I love the way you look. I said to Keith, 'I'd like to shave like that,' but he doesn't want it." She added, "I like it here. We could all come again some time in the future."

"There'll be a club near Harwich. Join it. I'm about to dress and go now. Is Keith around?"

"He's somewhere. You want to see him?"

"Nah." At the reception I was asked by Lindy (standing in?) if I would be the model at the art group meeting. I said I would but I'd rather get going, even though it was possible to do it and arrive in the evening. Then I changed my mind. I would do it if it didn't involve deliberate photography.

The only reason for my restriction was because of the ordination and being a priest: once photos are taken, they can end up anywhere, including Anglican land. I then wondered if those pictures were connected with the AmDram mystery.

So I did a number of quick and long poses, and found it rather tiring.

This was the point of my departure. I bumped into Jeremy, who wished me the best, and I packed my luggage, got dressed, with a bye to Lindy, and went to the car.

I drove directly to Wytham, presenting at the admission desk in The Anglican Cenobium of Saint Deyanirah, where the retreat was being held. I was asked by a Sister (not Pope) Joan to hand in my mobile phone, to be returned when we left. This was to ensure a religious attitude of no distractions. Sister Julianne took my suitcase and my I took my shoulder bag - to be kept with me at all times - to my cell bedroom, on a corridor of six of us. Once deposited, in my room with just a sink, a bed, a bedside cupboard and a wardrobe, I went to the bathroom as needed. I was determined to manage my bowels.

Returning, I recognised Christine Vine, in black cassock, in one room, her door opened. I smiled, but I went directly out for a walk into the marginal countryside at the edge of Wytham. I so wanted to remove my clothes outside.

This retreat was a women-only gathering, with men staying elsewhere. Dress code was black cassocks, as if we were near to being nuns. So, when back, I undressed and put mine on over my naked body. We went to dinner, where a Mother Superior Morana asked us to eat in silence; we then proceeded to Compline, and then were told to return to our cell bedrooms to pray before lights out. We would be allowed to put our own lights out, but early rising meant recommended early sleeping.

Me being there was surely crazy.

Chapter 12 Retreat and Ordinations

Narrator: Linda Christine Vine (Monday Evening 24th June)

I was sat naked in my retreat cell bedroom. I was not praying, but thinking how I could get out of being ordained, and what else I would then do in life. I gave up thinking, and started to masturbate.

There was a knock on the door, so I reached for my black cassock, and put it on. In came Christine Vine, also in her cassock, with black shoulder bag, closing the door behind her.

I was sat on the bed, and the blonde (like me) sat alongside on the bed, and we shook hands.

"I am Christine. We've met. I bet you put that on to talk to me. I hear you are a naturist."

"You are right. There are times and places for being naked, and now isn't one of them."

"I just thought you might be more comfortable without it. Listen, I wanted to meet you properly."

"Yes. We may have things to discuss. So you're not a full-time deacon?"

"A UVM, but I am based at Wheaton. It's north of Eslaforde."

"Unpaid Voluntary in a wealthy an evangelical area?" I asked. "Are you one of their evangelicals?"

"Eslaforde gets a lot of London money, including Wheaton. I have a different theology. Prosperity theology or anything like it is detestable."

"So what is your secular job? You buy and sell..."

"I'm an escort."

"Pardon?"

"I am an escort."

"I heard you. What do you mean, you are an escort?"

"I give men and women hospitality."

"Yeah, I know what an escort is, and I know what they do, but I'm asking why you are a deacon and will be a priest when an escort."

"For a start because I am a Christian, and I believe I have a calling for ministry, which is what I do now in the secular world."

"Yes, but, I thought, with all the jobs the unpaid priests might do, being an escort is not one of them. Anyway, you deal with property."

"I do that as well, assisted by the money I make as an escort."

"Look, I'm very pleased to meet you but please equate these with me: how you can be a priest and sleep with people for money? Presumably the bishops don't know this."

"Both suffragan bishops do know this. I equate these because I reject Augustinian theology."

"Original sin?"

"Listen: the body is an original blessing. Surely you agree, being a naturist."

"Actually I do agree with you - on that. But, er..."

"Sex is a good. Sex is an energy that is positive, however it comes about."

Surely you agree with that, Linda?"

"Well, yes."

"Give me your hands," Christine said. "Please." I did so. She lowered her head and raised each hand to her nose. She inhaled through her nose each time. "Not sure. You've been masturbating?"

"So what if I have?"

"You must have a very delicate odour."

"The Reverend Christine!"

"Well, it shows that at a time of contemplating you are generating sexual feeling."

"I was - in private. I am here to contemplate, as you said, and presumably end with me being ordained."

"But the reason you were masturbating, working your clitoris, no doubt, and inserting your fingers, was because you were contemplating not getting ordained and whatever else you could do."

"Are you some sort of mind reader or something?" I asked her.

"I masturbate when I want to relax, or have been frustrated."

"Or presumably had a bad fuck from a client."

"The best act after bad sex is good sex."

"Well, what I want to know is: you may want to be ordained, but how come you've got through the selection process?"

"Because I had support from the Bishop of Margate, who has some influence as the Archbishop of All England is often otherwise engaged. I know the Bishop of Folkstone acts as well for Rothach, but, well... Listen, the advice was to move particularly from Ebbsfleet to the Diocese of Wytham, where a great deal is delegated to the suffragan bishops. Then the interviewers approved my training."

"As an escort?"

"You said I deal in property. What they also didn't know is that many of my properties have call girls in them. I get them off the streets; I work with the police. I don't earn from their prostitution, I earn from them paying rent."

"And you have a white badge, with a W and an elephant."

"Let me show you it. I have it in my shoulder bag. Here."

I held it; I looked at it. It was a simple, straightforward, plastic badge. "What is this for? What does it mean?"

"It means if I see a badge like this, or one with a B and a goose, or an H with a black stag, I know I can rely on the person. The W for Wippedsfleott is for my area; the group effectively stretches from Worthing and Brighton through to London and Ebbsfleet across Kent. The operative bishop is at Margate. The H is Hereteu, sometimes Hasland, although the Suffragan Bishop there, Sarah Deimos, has nothing to do with this. The diocesan has an H and Stag badge: Elizabeth Huett, Bishop of Tees, even though she is based in Middlesbrough.

"Tees of the Diocesans. She is involved?"

"Yes. Listen, I have a bra and knickers on, only, under my cassock. It is quite warm in here. Do you want to undress?"

"That's what pisses me off. I come inside, it's warm and I put clothes on."

"Take it off."

I pulled my cassock over my head. So I said to her, "Take your underwear off as well."

She did this but came and stood in front of me. Her breasts were moderate, her pubic hair managed and blonde. She'd never been pregnant - but there were marks. She said, "Actually, I've nearly said what I wanted to say. I will just mention about authority. What do you understand about authority? What is it to be a priest?"

"We are an arm of the diocesan bishops. Christine, you have marks on your body."

"I'm pleased you've said what you have about bishops: you follow Catholic theory."

"Of course. Priests do the Eucharist ceremony in place of the bishop; the bishop cannot be everywhere."

"I am so pleased. The point is, Linda, that we have a crisis of authority, but also with Augustinian theology. Eastern Orthodoxy doesn't follow original sin; Judaism doesn't see it either. Protestants were very strange, by and large, in taking it into their systems, but then they are full of errors."

"Have you been beaten?"

"Are you listening to me?"

"I'm listening."

"I'm going to bed very shortly. We need a vanguard, Linda, and we have a Vanguard of bishops who know where we need to go, and remove the sexual distortion from our very ecclesiastical bones. The badges, Linda, identify the Vanguard. We are also moving into the Welsh Church, acquiring bishops in South Wales. Linda, your task coming up as a priest is to obey. You agree with us on sexuality and it makes you a very important person. You do not believe in original sin, and you do believe in the body. The body is essential to being Christian."

"Yes. Bodily resurrection and so on."

"Absolutely. Listen. The Vanguard bishops are wise bishops, but they are wise because they follow inherited and developed apostolic theology. However, wisdom isn't the essence: it is essential that they are bishops. We have our debates but they decide. The marks you see are evidence of me being sacrificial. They are a sign but few have them."

"Sacrifice and service are at the core of it," I said. "Though I'm not sure about those marks."

"There are various ways to do sacrifice and service," said Christine. "But you bring joy to my ears."

She put her hand on my head, almost like she was blessing me.

"You seem by appearance to be very smooth. Your pubic area is so clear, and that tells me that you are someone who pays good attention to your sexual presentation." (I stayed silent on that.) "You must advise me some time on achieving that level of beauty. Our bodies are theological, Linda, and are to be used in service. Our brains - our minds - are our bodies, and please don't talk about the soul as if it is something disconnected."

"I don't."

Christine was putting her knickers back on, and her bra on by fastening the rear clasps at the front and swinging the bra around. "There is a direct relationship between ecstasy from God and sexual ecstasy. These are very old ideas, Linda. The orgasm is therefore its very essence." Her cassock was back on and she restored the collar.

I said, "The bishops interview us tomorrow."

"Two ordinands at a time are interviewed in separate rooms. I look forward to seeing you tomorrow, Linda. We are all stuck with each other; how will we survive with no mobile phones until Sunday?"

"Easily," I said. "Sleep."

"See you tomorrow. You can resume what you were doing before I interrupted you."

"Maybe not," I said.

She went off, and so many questions had been answered. But I had no way of telling anyone else. So, instead of masturbating, I did some dilating and pelvic exercises - could be similar to masturbating - and went to bed.

The Retreat Opening Interview (Tuesday 25th June)

From Morning Prayer in the chapel we moved to the dining area and had a silent breakfast. The crockery and cutlery were cleared away by staff. The diocesan Bishop of Wytham himself, accompanied by his wife Louise Imperial, came in and welcomed us all. They'd already been with the men in the monastery for Morning Prayer and breakfast. The suffragans were still there. He told us that the retreat was for preparation in prayer towards our transformative moment, when we would become Eucharist-presiding "servants of God in Christ" and to be at the service of others for evermore. Then the couple left. That was quick!

A little later Christine came across to me. "Listen. I have told you a number of things in confidence. Remember, a vanguard approach to our Christian witness requires confidential approaches. We select people, naturally, with compatible stances. What I should say is that there is a very broad theology, from Liberal to Catholic to Evangelical, but we all agree on the basis of bishops' authority, confidentiality. Oh, here they are."

The two suffragans came in together. So we had a presentation at the breakfast tables from the Bishop of Scredington, the Right Reverend Julian Worsley. He told us roughly what the "shape" was for the rest of the week. Lots of services, private prayer, moments for theological reflection, conversation, some talks and, importantly, interviews. There would be an ecumenical element to the week, especially on Friday. This Tuesday morning was for our initial interviews; the men would get theirs in the afternoon. The interviews, two happening at any one time, with final interviews at the end of the week, were to be private and not to be discussed afterwards by any of us to each other or outsiders.

So we were in a lounge to wait around, with interview rooms off it, and Christine was mingling. People started introducing themselves to each other. I think my outsider sense was because Serninsea was out of the way and there was a core Wytham and nearby group of women.

Coming over Anna Ozga said she was evangelical; Deborah Wilkinson joined her and used the same label.

"I'm more liberal."

They both pulled their faces. So I made an effort to move. Cait Williamson said that her chakhras were in harmony and her body was felt to be in balance, but the layout of the room disturbed her. So she was positive about the body but I wondered if she was in the right religion. She sought harmonic patterns and Jesus was the prism that distributed the white light into many colours. The Eucharist connected your body to his body and improved your spiritual sight. Crumbs. Perhaps she liked church windows? Oh she did: both plain and coloured. I think Christine might have approved of her positivity about the body.

Another called Ruth Forbes seemed quite orthodox but animals mattered, and her main debate with herself was whether to admit animals to communion. She said higher animals probably did sin, socially, and if they did then they needed salvation, ought to have the sacraments, and would be restored to glory along with human animals. This had an internal logic to it.

The more Catholic types carried with them the all-important Common Liturgies book. I overheard Christine say, to one, "Sacrifice works because sacrifice comes within the bosom of the Church. Everything must die, must actually die, for real liberation to be realised."

However, while sitting again and getting bored, I was called over by John Barman for my interview. And he was in this small room and behind a desk, stinking of perfume, and he asked me to stand behind the seat.

"Why should we ordain you at all?" he asked me.

When I breathed to attempt an answer he shook his head vigorously and I paused, starting to clamp my bottom.

"Let me cut to the quick. You have over the past months been having an affair with a local investigator and old school friend called Adam Magellan. He was with you when you refused to answer the door and your upstairs light was on. You've lied denying that. Your work with him and Systematic Measuring Services has been highly dubious at best - lies told again, I suggest. No, I am speaking; do not interrupt. On one occasion you were seen almost hanging out of his upstairs window, by that nice elderly woman who was later in hospital. You weren't exactly looking at the view. At the same time, your husband has been seeing a woman who was his friend at school, and work colleague, and is now staying with her and intending to be with her, if he moves to Harwich. Furthermore, although he won't tell me anything I ought to know, you and your friend have teased the Reverend Kenneth Osis to extract information and no doubt fed him with nonsense to the extent that he resigned from the role I still want him to perform."

I was going freezing cold and starting to lose my balance, still clamping my bottom.

After a pause, he asked: "What do you have to say for yourself?"

"I have nothing to say for myself."

"And I know that you have just been on holiday. You have seen your parents in Wales, where they live now, and you bumped into Jeremy Symes at a naturist club where you met your husband and his affair partner, and clearly greeted them as if you completely accept their relationship."

"Is he your spy or something?" I asked, starting to shake.

"Who?"

"The Reverend Jeremy Symes."

"Ah, well, for his behaviour, which is not unlike yours, I have suspended him. Clearly you and your husband have come to some agreement, and you are acting as if you are still married, presumably until you get this ordination done that we cannot then reverse."

I was shaking even more now, and had to grip the back of the seat in front of me with both hands. But then, I thought, I'm not having this.

"Did my husband tell you all this?"

"With your shabby agreement? Are you pleading guilty? You don't realise..."

"Guilt regarding what?" I asked. "What you saw from your 'control booth'?"

"Got it in one. Were you a material part in the break up of Jeremy Symes' marriage? You were cavorting naked with him when his wife came in."

"It was entirely innocent and if you know so much then you'll know that."

"And so tell me about meeting Kenneth Osis. What did you, and you and your friend, do to tease him so much?"

"There is nothing to tell about Kenneth Osis and me or about my friend."

"I beg to differ."

I paused. Then I said, "I differ also. I differ in that I am going to my room, to get my luggage, and I'm going to my car..."

"And is this what you are going to do: for your misdemeanours just outlined you are going to throw away a whole life's orientation of service for others?"

"Hey?"

"You see, we take the bad as well as the good. Let's take your naturism. Apparently, you changed your naturist club membership: you moved to one even further away from Serninsea - from Saxiclite to Bever Wood. That's good."

"Yes I did."

"But what worries me is you probably believe in your Pagan naturist interest more than in the faith to which you are about to seal your life's commitment."

"That's... Pagan?"

"Apparently I've heard it said that you regard naturism as second nature. Well, if you do, undress."

"I don't believe I am hearing this. There is a time and place for everything. I said that to Christine."

"Christine has spoken to you?"

"Yes."

"I want her to accompany you but she's had no authority to speak to you beyond chit-chat. What did she say?"

"She described the group, about which you lot have been dropping hints for a while now, telling me how compatible I was with its purposes."

He paused.

"Well, your reaction pleases me."

"What?"

"Your... You heard what I said."

"Are you having a rethink as to how to address me?"

"So the good news is this. Let me put it like this. Do you know why Jeremy Symes was suspended?"

"I can guess."

"Because he made a public spectacle of himself. He so upset his wife, and carried on with... What's she called, Lindsey Poldark?"

"Lindy Peacock. You obviously don't know everything."

"Whereas, in your case, not even your training incumbent really knows of your continuing indiscretions. This is good because you have tried to keep up appearances. He thinks your denials may be true, that your dallying has stopped."

"I'm not so sure about that."

"At least you admit to them to me."

"No, I admit nothing; I said I am not so sure that he thinks my denials may be true."

"You see, no one is perfect, but we need people like you, who can both transgress and keep the transgressions in the crossover, or the wings."

I looked at him. This was staggering. I decided to do something counterintuitive, especially as I was having to resist my lower reactions. I took off the collar and removed my cassock over my head, putting it over the seat back in front and laid the collar on to the seat itself. (I wasn't wearing underwear, as ever.)

"What is this about?"

"I've undressed. You told me. Now you see me."

"Yes I do. Presumably, nothing to hide. Stay like this then."

"What, outside as well?"

"No, in here."

"Oh. Do you enjoy my body?" I enquired.

"It is one of God's greatest gifts. I see that you obviously give it attention."

"In what sense?"

"No pubic hair."

"Oh dear, oh dear."

"Someone like yourself should be one of the ordained. You should be ordained and be on the team. You can, as we put it, stage things, act roles, and inhabit parts that others cannot."

"Oh? Prompting the actors, perhaps? Bishop, can I have a badge?"

"Ah, the badges. Well, people who commit wear them. Turn around please."

"Is this some form of casting?"

"You could say that. Talent spotting, although that's left to others"

So I did this.

"Trim. And a noticeable spot on your arse." Then he said, "Turn and face me again. Come and sit down. Put the gown and collar on this desk. Hmm."

"Would you like my legs open?" I asked him.

"I don't think it is necessary."

"Would you like to look into my cunt, Bishop John?"

"Sit down with your legs together and stop being silly."

"Are you going to strip off?" I asked him.

"No. I am interviewing you, not you me. So, to resume: you have shown discretion and control, and you have shown this when I have telephoned you as well. You have your nudity interest, by which you are so obviously unembarrassed. You have also shown theological sophistication when preaching, and I like that."

"Even I think I am shit at preaching, Bishop."

"So I want this week to work for you and I want you at the cathedral. Meeting Christine has my approval, by the way. Work with her."

"So you said. Are you going to look at her naked body as well?"

"I hardly think it will be necessary. She has a mission to prostitutes."

"I know."

"She was brave during that bank robbery. She is skillful, like you. Well, get dressed now. This interview, like all others, is in strictest confidence."

"I bet it is."

"Be discreet, as you have been. Don't tell everything to Christine, and definitely not about this interview. Theologically, she is a bit rigid."

I was now stood up, retrieving my collar and cassock. Slipping it back over me I asked, "Are you suggesting other pairings?"

"Possibly. There will be pair activity on Friday. You do yours with her. I have watched your progress carefully. I think I am impressed. I think we can work together into the future. I'd even like to see you get your first own ministry in the eastern area of Wytham diocese. So benefit from the week and the good outcome at that cathedral - your second beginning. See you around. Go now."

I stared at him and said, "I am astonished. Perhaps Christine and yourself should co-ordinate better."

"You might be right, there: but, remember, I am a bishop and she is a lowly deacon. Though I think she is destined for high office and, for that matter, so are you. Interview over. At the end of the retreat, you will be interviewed again either by me or Bishop Julian."

I left the room staggered, and just wondered what the next woman would hear. I needed the khasi, best one on my cell floor away from everyone.

Sitting, I reflected that for everyone else, if perhaps not Christine, this retreat would be quite normal. Christine Vine was being interviewed by the Bishop of Scredington. I wondered if he was in on this or not.

For before and after interview, there was a rolling programme of trying out meditation in a room with seats and cushions placed around its walls. Arriving there and joining in, one effort was purposefully walking around the room, whereas another was sitting with breathing exercises (I combined this with pelvic movements), and another was to concentrate on a candle in a bowl in the centre of the room. Meditating drew some resistance from some, but Sister Julianne led us in what we might do while keeping in mind the Spirit of God.

I went to my cell-bedroom where my hair took a pounding from my dangerous hairbrush. The lunch was bland and the afternoon was tedious, and nothing of interest happened with anyone. Piety and seriousness was on display afterwards, whereas I was bored and not a little angry.

These bishops had vanished. What would they do regarding interviewing the men? Were any men being lined up for special treatment? I did see Christine and she was dutifully silent about her interview.

However, I had to speak to Christine. "These interviews, Christine, are confidential. Well, abusers need confidentiality. I won't say what he said, but he did everything to undermine me and then the opposite."

"I hear you," she said. "Being a bishop does not guarantee competence."

"You are all stitching me up, aren't you?"

"Don't make me any more furious than I already am," she said.

"He is bad cop and you are good cop, but perhaps he has forgotten that you are good cop."

"Listen: I think he has forgotten a number of things, like the whole point of it."

"But you said you have to accept the bishops' authority, and he has authority over you."

"The dilemma has struck me for some time, Linda. The fact is the authority structure is correct."

"You are a lowly deacon and he is a bishop."

"That is true."

"You and I could rise to high authority, Christine."

"If you are leaking what was said in your interview, then you are breaking confidences."

"I'll shut up then," I said. "But you and I are supposed to get on together here. You already know that we do."

"Linda, please, keep your eye on the goal. Listen to me. We both need to be ordained, and you and I will get along very closely. I already like you a lot, and this does help, but the point is God."

"I am going to consider further whether or not to collect my mobile phone and drive away fairly soon."

"If you do, it would be tragic. You have so much to offer: you are the future, Linda."

"Am I?"

"Yes. Evensong. Are you coming?"

"No," I said. "I will be at Compline."

"Your absence will be noticed."

"Along with everything else, recently, it seems."

"Let me talk to you about that, some time. There are other things I want to mention."

"If I am so wanted then I will skip Evensong and he will still want me, won't he?"

"See you at Compline, then."

So, what did I take from that? She thought he had been crass, and had handled his discoveries about me badly. And he thought she had acted out of turn, beyond her station. It's the old one where they weren't singing from the same hymn sheet, and indeed I wasn't singing at all. I went for a walk. They did at least allow us to go outside.

Later on I was in my cell bedroom again, actually staring out on a sky residually light at 11 pm. Every emphasis was on going to bed early to get up early, whereas I normally drifted into the night and got up later. There was a knock on the door. So I slipped on my cassock and unlocked the door. I had expected Christine but it was Bishop Barman.

He asked me, "What are you doing?"

"I was staring out of the small window here looking at the view. Street lights, you know, until the grass grows again and the trees resume reaching out."

He closed the door. "Let me see."

As we stared towards the window, he put his right hand on my right shoulder, and it started to slide down my arm.

"What are you doing?" I asked him.

"Just a gesture of being friendly, supportive."

"I like to think of us as in a limousine. There's a front seat and a back seat but a window in between."

"I saw you naked. Why not give me a hug?"

"Though we are riding together, we must remember our places."

"But lots of clergy end up hugging: it is a sign of affection."

"I'm not the hugging type," I said.

"I discover you to be cold and not amenable," he said. "I once wrote about clergy being more intimate with each other. Do you not want company for a short while?"

"No she doesn't," said Christine outside. "You go too far, Bishop Terry."

"These could be useful words when I'm walking out of this cell. I forgot to mention Margate earlier."

"We know she impressed Bishop Jonathan," Christine added herself.

"Oh God," I said. "Please go, both of you; I like my own company."

Christine just used her eyes for him to leave. She shut the door from the outside, and I locked it from the inside. Even in convents we should sometimes lock the door.

A Drive (Wednesday 26th June)

It was a dream if only because I was interviewed by three bishops in the parish vestry, all crammed in. I'd prevented Derek Imperial from getting his seat in the House of Lords, Julian Worsley said it was my duty to support my husband and John Barman wanted me to stand naked in the middle of Wytham Cathedral and allow people to grope me.

Thus, when I woke, in my convent cell, I went to the loo, dressed into mufti, started packing, and as people were getting up I went downstairs and placed my luggage at the reception. With no one there I rang the bell, and Sister Hilda came. I asked her for my mobile phone as I was leaving. She said she had to go and get it from secure keeping, but when she came back Christine in her black cassock was with her.

"Listen. Can we talk? Linda, please, can we talk?"

"I want to leave. I don't believe what I should believe; it's all castles in the air."

"Can we talk, perhaps in your car? Give her the mobile phone, Sister Hilda. Let's take your luggage to your car. Sister, can you wait until I come back? I'd like to talk with Linda before she goes. Can I sit in your car, Linda?"

"If you must. Then I will drive home, and I will make plans to vacate the curate's house. I'll probably move to Wales."

She sat in the passenger seat, and I was in the driving seat.

Christine said, "Listen to me. Let's go for a drive. Just into the countryside."

It was less than five miles once on a B road to reach Christine's base, Wheaton. So we walked into the church, as she had a key. She locked the door behind us. Walking to the pews, she bowed to the altar table. I did not.

"Sit!" Sat alongside me on a left-side pew mid-way down, Christine said, "Let's just go over what we agree about. Original blessing, and the body. Right?"

"I don't know any more. I came here having lost belief."

"But you haven't, have you, because you still have touchstones. Do you want to be secular, out into the cold world?"

"Keith went there."

"No he didn't. Keith is still theological."

"When he admitted that he slept with Yojana, I thought he could well be in your group, but didn't quite believe it and I cannot understand how she can be in your group. She is a Hindu."

"Because the group is generous. From a Hindu perspective, she celebrates the body and blesses the body. And so do you. She comes within the group because Catholic is another word for Universal. Tell me, do you not think that the Church should be a properly ordered vehicle that gives way to the breaking out of the Kingdom of God?"

"It's all a kind of theory, Christine. That's the trouble with it: castles in the air. Don McClean sang it:

*"Tell her the reasons why I can't remain:
Perhaps she'll understand if you tell it to her plain."*

"Linda, in societal and cultural terms I am a platonic postmodernist. Describe this to me."

"You have a view of perfection but it lives in a kind of relativist place."

"From the outside. I'm trying to see it how you see it. We have structures and authority. We keep and live within those, to realise what they offer. And that realisation - whether it can happen - is a form of hope. Is this not so?"

"Yes. You'd hope the theory is true."

"I have heard, Linda, that your theology is very liberal. Colin Cromer has about given up that you can be orthodox. He wants you to be be centrist in terms of inherited Christianity. Perhaps he is in a bubble. Linda, I'd accept all your arguments about historical uncertainty, but the issue is purpose in the context of authority. Listen: this is what the Vanguard stands for."

"Maybe.

"For I can not be part of her 'Cocktail-Generation Partner's Waltz,' Devoid of all romance."

"Oh no, it is romantic too. Linda, tell me: are you a bisexual?" Christine stood up and faced me from the side - the pews in front prevented her from standing in front of me.

"Yes I am."

"Listen. I am a theosexual. Do you know what that means?"

"You're God?" I answered, looking up at her.

"No no. My body, my vulva, is in the service of God." She touched her crotch area with the flat of her hand.

"Blimey."

"Don't say 'blimey', Linda. I am Christosexual and a Spiritsexual as well. Look at my face." I did. "So let's take Yojana Asthana. She is theosexual as well. She is, though, Krishnasexual. She opens her vagina and the universe is in there. Raise your head to me. I will kiss you."

"I suppose your lips are theosexual." She kissed my lips very gently.

"All of my body; all of your body, Linda. Stand up and come with me into the aisle."

She did have a magnetic presence. "What are you doing?"

"I am, quite obviously, removing my collar, cassock and my underwear."

"Christine, this is a church!"

"Listen. It is the best place to do this." And she continued to nudity revealing blonde, fluffy pubic hair. "Stand by me and I will remove all that for you."

"Are you mad...Well, you are obviously serious. What do I care now?"

I became naked too, in her parish church. "Don't worry. No one can get in. We'll take our shoes off as well. Bare feet."

Our clothes on the nearby vacated pew, and shoes removed; she held my hand and we walked up the aisle towards the altar table.

"Listen to me. This is stone," she said, approaching. "It's four vertical slabs and one slab across the top. It will easily take our weight." On arrival, Christine removed the cloths, revealing the slabs.

"You are kidding me. Christine! You can't do this. It is completely sacrilegious!"

"This is precisely what it is not. Face me."

I did not know why I was even doing this, but her hands on my waist meant using my hands and arms to push myself up and drop my bottom on to the cold slab. She then picked up my legs and swung me over so that I laid on the slab.

Now the woman climbed up herself, and pressed her body over mine.

"Christine, what are you doing? You can't do this."

"Widen your legs." Having licked her right hand fingers, her right leg made my legs widen, and she was working on my clitoris. She said, "This is the most sacred thing we can do."

"Oh shit. No no, I can't respond."

"You are and you will. Open your mouth a little. "She quickly sent me into a dreamlike response, with accompanying kissing. This was a woman highly skilled in the act of slowly and persistently working me so that the sensations went through my whole body.

She said, in between kissing me, "We are Christosexuals, Linda, you and me, and you are not submitting to me but to God. As you come to orgasm, think of God, think of Christ, think of the Spirit. For thousands of years, men and women have been married to the Church, and ecstasy has been in the name of the Lord."

Now she escalated my sensations, and I was very wet, and simply through her fingers and touch she sent me over the top. I shuddered, vibrated, and I said, "My God, my God."

Christine kissed me and held me. "Listen hard. We are children of God, Linda, and you must give your life to God. The Spirit entered your vulva, Linda, and you are now purely a woman of God."

We lay together on the hard slab, and eventually sat up, got off and stood together. Pausing at first, she replaced the cloths, and she held my hand walking together back down the aisle. It was like marriage. She said, "This is not a relationship with me, but with God; now let both of us become ordained priests, and I will help you with your task ahead. I will mentor you, Linda."

Thus we dressed, with shoes back on, and left the church, locking the door from the outside.

Behind the wheel I paused, and breathed out. Christine said to me, "Well done."

"All right. We'll go back," I said. "But may I ask you? Do you have a personal view of John Barman, or are you not allowed a personal view?"

"Hmm. I think he is crass. But there we are. His overall purpose is right, but he is crass."

I thought she was being honest. So driving back, I said, "I suppose you know what happened between me and Jonathan Eyre. I just fell for him."

"Well, he is skilled. At that time people had wondered about your potential place in the group. But we heard about your time in Margate, and with your response we knew that you believed in your body. Your husband had promoted you and recommended you all the time since he came to us. He was and is right. He never lost his faith: he is quite theological. Your place, Linda, is indeed in the Church and now you have given yourself to God."

On arriving back, I handed in my mobile phone again to Sister Joan - I had not used it - and took my luggage back to my cell bedroom. I stared at the white walls, and placed my hands together in prayer.

Lectures

I went back to the meeting room for dining. I was present alongside Christine, for lunch, and continued to be alongside her for the first Wednesday talk. (The men elsewhere had theirs before lunch.)

In came the Right Reverend John Barman and the Reverend Kenneth Osis himself. John Barman told us that Ken had resigned from his counsellor role, that he wished he hadn't, but he was still able to talk on the priest's diary writing for self-evaluation.

It was hardly original stuff. Ken said that the diary had to be secure and completely private, and we might want to disguise who is whom. It should be an open-ended A4 book with time given to write. The diary is like having a counsellor or confessor: it should involve reflective writing, writing with a spiritual attitude. Also every priest should have and preferably choose a confessor, a confidant with whom to discuss all the ministry tensions. Nevertheless, the confessor is not entitled to hear confidential details from pastoral encounters, only directly the emotions of the person himself or herself.

I acknowledged Ken. He said he was pleased to see me, but he didn't know anything about me nearly leaving. He departed, and later a Bishop Niall Ifan came in, Suffragan Bishop of Casnewydd. Bishop Barman introduced him.

In a strong Welsh accent - harder than Dyfed's - he told us that Christ as a source for pastoral practice had to be checked against biblical criticism and the historical Jesus. And tradition should not have its own way, when the Spirit moves us to new insights. "Science and the rigours of history teach us more about the self past and present. 'Did Jesus really do this?' This has to be a question for all our normative assumptions. And tradition was new, once.

"However, we are not Pelagians, intending to pull people up by their own efforts. Pastoral theology is a method based in revelation and tradition about service and sacrifice, and the confidence to serve, and the confidence of giving one's whole self to the other. The biggest 'other' is God.

"Christian pastoral theology should not be abstract but rooted in the real, as in the Incarnation. It should also be rooted in a sensual practice, and I say sensual advisedly. We have the duty to be closer to our - I hate the word - clients, in a consensual more intense pastoral relationship than the secular counsellors. Why?

Because we ask the client to engage in prayer and a prayer that involves the all of us."

Bishop Barman said that Niall Ifan was staying with him, and he'd also given this lecture to the men. For the bishop, consensual meant that closeness but that we did not 'Lord it over anyone'.

Afterwards, Christine got into a chat with chakhras-promoting Caitriona; Megan Bentley joined them, the latter interested in liturgy. I came alongside as Christine spoke. "Listen. Sex workers give all. They die to themselves, to try to carry on living. But what if we at least guide them? The Church, as perfect peace, perfect ethic, must organise and create a place where we replace their dependency on drugs, which is a cry of help. Why can't the Church get more involved? Get rid of the pimps!"

Cait called this a risky ministry.

"Christianity a such a sop, the way it is misapplied," Christine declared. "The Church must be involved and say, 'We will be with you in your pain and your redemption.'"

Anna Ozga came along and said, "Jesus actually died on the cross to save us; they can be saved by believing in Jesus."

"You completely misunderstand," Christine said. "We realise truth, through the imaginative freedom we are given, to say that we can apply the narrative ethic that was in the cross and in the transformation of the resurrection."

Cait said, "You make it all sound like a novel."

Christine said, "This is irrelevant. You say, Anna, all they have to declare is Jesus saves them and that will do. It won't. It is almost the opposite. As soon as you want, you've lost; as soon as you give up everything, then you receive. You have to give yourself, and give even more. All of it. For the hell of it, and let heaven decide itself. That is Christ on the cross, and you do it, and the hope is transformation."

I said, "I agree with Christine." Christine looked at me and smiled. I said, "We are servants that do and doing matters from priestly availability."

Anna said, "One word: works."

"Yeah, it works," sneered Christine, in a positive way.

After the Eucharist and evening meal we had visitors for a further lecture. Bishop Derek Imperial himself was doing the honours.

"We are pleased to have here the Reverend Alan Lindsey, accompanied by his sister, professionally still a General Practitioner, the Reverend Doctor Andrea Lindsey, originally both from Dorset, and her new husband, the Suffragan Bishop of Sumorsæte, Lynton Plimpton. Alan's latest book is available on the tables at the back. Alan, please tell us about the isolation of theology."

"My brief lecture is the basis for my new book on sale, where it is all developed in some detail. This is the sort of lecture you should have heard at theology college. Before I consider the isolation of theology I'll consider when it was not. By 'isolated' I mean where other disciplines ignore theology even while theology draws on them.

"Take the friendly Middle Ages. The revelation in the Christian message and its absorption into new and standing institutions was the basis for knowledge. People lived by saints' and holy days across the agricultural calendar, and often in Europe the monasteries organised the economy and the welfare system, at least here until Henry VIII abolished them as a power base and resource and this led towards local government welfare.

"The Bible was the teaching action of God. It guided doctrine, it guided knowledge. What you did - how you lived - was reflected in the Bible itself. The Bible was a means to describe reality. But it also described oneself in relation to God. It still does these things, but it was more easily seen to do these things in past times.

"And then there were the people, the community, the koinonia. We were never individuals in the sense that we have become today, but part of the interplay of the community. We are to this day still tribal, with in-groups and out-groups, but in this admittedly idealised past - but for a few - we were all one big in-group.

"The danger was that this became a cloak to wear rather than being an encounter, and this is what happened in the Victorian period. Throughout industrialisation, and throughout the rise into greater consciousness of alternative explanations for reality, there was still a Christian consensus even based on the cloak. But identity and how to know your being are not the same. And you become priests at a time after that cloak became worn through and eventually fell off. I am a priest and you become priests in what are 'interesting times' and hostile times for us.

"The working class were never churched, and the middle class fell away afterwards. What were intellectual ideas challenging the Christian view of reality became ordinary ways of thinking. If we have a problem then it is solved by technology. We became practical humanists.

"We are forced into theological strategies, because we are devoid of a cultural place. Perhaps that is a good thing, but being devoid of a cultural place also means a difficulty with communication. How are we to set up a culture-free argument, or at least the most culture-free we can manage, treasuring and witnessing the revelation we have as knowledge?

"The point here is not that we have given up on knowledge, or faith, but that the cultural base and ordinary thinking practice has moved on such that we have to communicate differently. This is the place of what is called dialectical theology. This means pitching opposites against each other, within the world of the text.

"Clever and not so clever lay people will say that biblical texts disagree. And you might say, yes they do, and accept this. The danger here is individualism. Another approach, possibly individualistic as well, is a lectio divina approach that you simply read and read again and then get moved by the Spirit. It might need people together and some discussion to overcome individualist inspiration. Or you might say there is a higher principle across the texts - for example as people do who are for gay inclusion. The danger here is a cultural Christianity, even imposition. But it is not a new method; Peter Abelard, who died in 1142, aimed to get agreement from texts that did not agree. Bernard of Clairvaux did not like it, and got Abelard condemned. A third approach is working one text against the other, just as they are, and this is the dialectical approach.

"The Reformation produced a right wing and a left wing, and the left wing, some being Socinian, relied on reasoning from direct reading. And the National Church had its latitudinarians, and some Arians, and even Socinians from over in Poland, via the Netherlands. All these movements were assisted by the printing press.

"After the Reformation and its left wing came the Enlightenment. Reason beats the guidance of tradition - you might arrive at a collective reasoned position but you might not. Well, to enchant reason we had Romanticism and even the Oxford Movement leading on to Lux Mundi: didn't these run to the rescue? No, because they produced little but the ambiguity of symbolism in a gloss of religion. That's why so many ran off to the tough institution: Rome.

"The beauty of the dialectical approach is that it does not deal in such external reason. It stands within the kerygma of the text, and seeks to uncover the text, by pitching it against itself.

"Reason gives way to faith and this is how it is done. The transcendent God comes through the text bashed against itself: via its opposing forces.

"The key person here is Karl Barth. Look at his Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans, from 1919, if you get the chance. He opposed religious culture. We are sinful and need the judgment of God. He might have said: religion is human, bottom-up whereas faith is encounter, top-down, and often unpredictable. Religion is syncretistic, but faith debates the opposites into self-revelatory stances.

"Nevertheless, this carries a freedom of enquiry, and was done by Barth regarding Christ, and of course how the Church receives revelation. But what if the Spirit is so examined? What freedom we would see there!

"From the perspective of the world, it is postmodern, because it occupies an imaginary space permitted by the plurality of culture; but, from the believer, we are within. Some make a similar argument for the Church, but Barth never would, because of the danger of the operation of a bottom-up religion.

"However, the price of this theology is its continued isolation because it is so exclusively self-referential. To join the debate, you have to be an insider and learn the language first. For a parish priest in a National Church - one that must engage with the culture - this may be too high a price to pay. My book expands on this point further. Thank you"

I made the point in plenary discussion that Karl Barth was as much cultural as the rest of us. "He had a time and place in world events and culture, and represented a point of intellectual change after a crisis of liberal theology. No one can escape this; he would not have produced this theology a hundred years earlier. The New Testament itself represents a time of Roman occupation and a cultural cusp between expectant Jews - of which Jesus was one - and Greek culture more generally. Paul was essential because he was cross-cultural, otherwise Christianity would have stayed a Jewish sect."

After a few female gasps, Alan's response was that this carried the danger of extreme historical relativism from which no Gospel could come, "...and I am sure you have faith that stands in contrast to such a position."

I responded, "Faith means trust, and trust comes from critically examining the truth no matter from where it comes." The diocesan bishop was nodding at me vigorously before I had even finished.

Christine also spoke. She said, "Listen to me. Barth does not have a sufficiently robust view of the Church. After all, the Church wrote the New Testament and subsequently developed tradition under the guidance of the Holy Spirit. The essential Church writes the scripture from the standpoint of perfect peace, and it becomes the resource to guide us simply because it is the source. It is an institution, but just because it is outwardly human does not prevent it being divine. Is this not the divine and human Body of Christ that it - the Church - declares?"

His reply was that Christine's stance time-travelled to the Middle Ages; but now: "This needs you to be cut off from everyone intellectually, claiming a Platonic delivery of perfection, and the historical evidence is against you, as evidenced also in the contradictions in the biblical text that show a diverse Church."

I declined a purchase at forty-five quid, but some, I think, felt obliged. Christine could afford it, but did not. Anyway, I was willing to attend Compline, and go to bed.

The Explanation (Thursday 27th June)

Thursday came, hairbrush tapping in my hand on sitting on my bed. I dodged my way in a towel to the bathroom toilet, but didn't (as usual) need the shower room.

Outside, Anna Ozga was also wrapped in a towel and said she wanted to write to Colin Cromer, to consider going there. "Do you know the address?"

"The Vicarage, Saint Sernin Parish Church, Greylag Road, FO12 2QZ. You want a job there?"

"Won't you be leaving? Isn't he retiring?"

"There might be a lot of competition. It is a single church parish - compare that with Serninsea Marshes' eleven. Anyway, there's no announcement."

I asked Christine, after Morning Prayer and breakfast, "Do you believe in resurrection then, like the one resurrection, or it as general and begun; was it appearances, or thought to be, or literary, or something else, or nothing, or the tomb, or what?"

She said, to this, "What does it matter what I think? I teach what the Church teaches. With that cross, death showed its universal significance, and life follows. Some indeed call it the kerygma: the heart of it, the claim of it."

My only response was, "Oh, I'm a bit more pragmatic than that."

She said, "Listen: pragmatism is a secularist ideology. Instead one should land in the bosom of the organising Church where that kerygma is proclaimed."

She asked me to come to her cell bedroom. She had her own cross on her bedside table. First she took off my collar and cassock, and her own, and her underwear to her blonde hair below.

"Are you seducing me - again?"

"No, but I will kiss you. Look at me." She kissed me. "You approve, don't you?"

"Of course I approve." My collar and cassock came off.

"And of being theosexual?"

"I like the concept."

"Then sit with me as I have information that you need to know." Her right hand pushed my left breast up "I first draw your attention to Luke Chapter 8 verse 17 by reading it from my New Revised Standard Version:

"For nothing is hidden that will not be disclosed, nor is anything secret that will not become known and come to light.

She released it. "What we have is the Principatus Theocratic Confraternitati admissis in Ecclesia Anglicana Nationalibus. This means the Confraternity of the Theocratic Principality of the English National Church. This is the name of the vanguard group into which you will come. We have a working name, in Serninsea, that helps keep it autonomous and secretive for as long as necessary. This is the Worshipful Company of Serninsea Theatrical Players. This name was Ken Osis's idea, and other groups have adopted their own names. Now you understand the theatrical metaphors."

"I knew it wasn't about the theatre; I knew sex was involved - somehow."

"Well, the metaphors and name, like having talent scouts and actors, came about because the Casino in Serninsea used to be a theatre with a proscenium. And above the casino, that used to service the theatre, is where the group has many of its meetings."

"I get it now."

"I will mentor you, and one of the bishops will initiate you, because you will be a priest. If you want a female, I suggest the Bishop of Tees, Elizabeth Huett, and if a man perhaps you'd prefer Jonathan Eyre, since he has had sex with you already."

"Initiation is sexual?"

"Of course it is and must involve liquid exchange and mutual orgasms. Personally, I don't like the initiation within the Body Eucharist. I want this Body Eucharist to be our standard service, but in fact we practise the standard Eucharist. I'd like to write a 'Mass Turbation', where 'turbation' is as in the mixing of sediment. The Body Eucharist involves a physical exchange of fluids and so you must have regular gynaecological health checks."

"It would have to involve my own gynaecologist."

"The group needs to remain secret, and this is why we have our own, but I'm sure there can be an arrangement. Why do you need your own?"

"Special reasons that I do not share."

"We do allow for essential personal, pastoral and commercial confidentiality, but beyond these, we expect your openness within the group. Ken Osis, for example, never told us anything of his counselling, although the bishop had you monitored, and him. We did know that he met you and your friend Diana."

"I was being followed."

"We have to be sure about your lifestyle. You are gifted, Linda. So at your initiation you can have sperm, urine, spittle or menstrual blood transferred from a bishop, whatever suits you."

"Not shit then."

"Well, I think we should, but no one has done this and it is not offered. We had a Buddhist who was too advanced for us."

"A Buddhist?"

"Yes, of a group similar to ours, but rather more seeing the body as disgust and yet how sensation is transitory. Our theology is more redemptive. You see the difference?"

"Certainly."

"After you are initiated, you'll become an initiator. I will be as well. We rely on females from Hartlepool and Middlesbrough - actually, where Elizabeth is based - for our females."

"I had no idea."

"Indeed not. I won't give names of participants yet, beyond those you can guess and have seen wearing badges and the bishops I have mentioned."

"Jenny World, my dear friend, is one."

"She is. Listen: she is a true servant of God. You will become friends again. And the other thing is participating in the orgasm, and participating in the sexual based experience of serving and sacrificing. You understand?"

I said, "I've already involved Ken Osis sexually. Diana did more than me."

"I suspected so, but, Linda, that is pastorally confidential so you should say no more. He has not."

"I'm sorry. Of course. I should have said nothing."

"Keith will be at your ordination, and that's important for the outside world, and indeed someone like Colin Cromer, your training vicar, because he is completely uninvolved and unaware of the Confraternity and its Vanguard existence. He is an innocent abroad."

"At home, more like."

"Have you any questions, Linda?"

"No, but what you describe is known in sociology as 'superstitious authoritarianism' - a concept that applies to an indeed 'vanguard' group that is secretive and protects itself through initiating rituals."

"But this does not need sociological explanation; it is purely based on what this group is about: original blessing, and the blessing and service with sacrifice of our bodies with one another. We commune with God; we try in the Body Eucharist to orgasm because that orgasm is the vision in ecstasy of the Kingdom of God. We exchange fluids, but we receive the revelatory experience through our sexual receptors."

"That's Mauss."

"What mouse?"

"No, Marcel Mauss, the anthropologist of gift-exchange, like how to understand the Kula Ring in the Trobriand Islands: material sacrifice for spiritual gain. The equivalent is that sex is a form of material giving for the hope of love. I get that."

"But, listen again: we don't come at this from the outside but from the inside. Your clitoris is your means to experience first hand a vision of the Kingdom. It is the original blessing made real and received. The man has his penis and ejaculation. Come on, let's reclothe as there are more lectures to attend today, by the Suffragan Bishop of Bolingbroke and by the Suffragan Bishop of Screddington."

"You don't want to give me or receive an orgasm?"

"I do but there isn't time. This is what is wrong. We should be having sex, not listening to some speculation. I'm afraid it will stay wrong under this Bishop of Wytham."

"I thought you believed in the authority of the Church."

"Oh, I do. The Church as pure, when it is pure, but here is the corrective role of the Vanguard. Let's dress. When I mentor you, we will have a lot of sex; I'll take you to the heart of heaven and you'd better make sure I get there too."

"Wow."

Our collars and cassocks were back on. In recognition of me, she didn't first put on her underwear.

"You're on to something here. The drafts and openness are much better between my legs. I'll probably keep wearing a bra, though - but not now. Let's go."

Suffragan Bishops on Authority

The diocesan bishop, we learnt, was entertaining yesterday's contributors, including the one who had lectured to sell us his book. We had the suffragans.

Bishop Julian Worsley of Screddington kicked off. (Bishop John was then with the boys.) He said all sorts of introductory words before stating: "When you think about it, the theology of culture and the theology of the body's biology are one." We necessarily understand our bodily processes through language and culture. "This means the body is understood theologically using text.

"This is not to compromise science," he said to us, "into some weird non-realist construction that is somehow made up and contained within language. Rather, it is to say that science is not limited by description but wrapped up in meaning. You can still say that the body's primal concern is to be a parent and arguably a grandparent via the sexual act. Being a grandparent makes for successful homosapiens - two parenting generations allows one to be productive. But this cannot be the whole purpose, or be simply it. I would venture further that the culture of sacrificial and serving are part of our biological success. We give up and we renew, and on that we can turn to scripture and tradition."

"Is he part of the group?" I asked Christine in a whisper.

She said, "No," just as quietly.

I wondered why not.

When he had finished I had a more positive question. "I'm a naturist and when I thought theologically I knew the body had a theology." (This created some stares.)

"Naturism is a cultural act," said the bishop

"But I'm saying something about its reality," I said.

"You'd better explain."

"Flesh changes, flesh withers, flesh isn't always glamour, and it is real. But the flesh joins with nature and the environment..."

"Ah," said Bishop Julian, "I would warn against Eden interpretations of naturist behaviour as an inappropriate ideology from environmentalism."

"Hardly Eden is it? But it's definitely positive," I said to stares and muttering. "We can say, 'This is me: there is no other than me, but do not misread the body surface as all of me.'"

"Explain that," he commanded, with an almost irritated voice.

"Well, for example: a transgender person attempts to correct a misreading, a cultural misconstruction deriving from original appearance."

"Sounds like a Pagan and Buddhist view to me."

Christine said, "You're saying, bishop, that the Church is our directive culture, and provides its context of the withering."

"Absolument," he said.

Caroline Small lamented, "No."

"Let me explain, now for Caroline and Linda. In the wider world, we live in supposedly postmodern times. What that means is that the old, secular, Enlightenment view, has given way to a plurality of views without necessarily an ordering principle (as within the Enlightenment). So this is our chance as a Church to reclaim the public space, and reclaim the cultural interpretation. In our theology the body is grounded in ecclesiology, grounded in revelation."

Caroline Small actually stood up to say, "The Eastern Orthodox say there is one revelation, and that is tradition, whereas we say there are three, scripture and reason being their own sources."

"They are not independent," said Bishop Julian, and we are entitled to emphasise how they are interdependent and interact - especially in the context of responding to the postmodern challenge."

I noticed soon afterwards Bishop Julian and Christine talked and left together. Perhaps she would attempt to recruit him.

Thirty minutes later, Bishop John's whiff of perfume announced his presence.

He was soon saying: "Kant is the great subjectivist route of faith, and is ahistorical; set against that is Hegel and the route to an ever higher collective spirit as an historical process. Hegel builds and builds so that the Kantian jump to it can last longer. Hegel is social but the price of Alan Lindsey's focus on text as text, and others on tradition in the postmodern setting, is too high: we are cut off. If revelation remains other, and the world is sinful, then faith is dangerously Gnostic; I always thought Karl Barth was dangerously Gnostic. The alternative to both of these approaches are Schopenhauer's 'will' that's dead in the water and we can do nothing with it.

"John Henry Newman is interesting, here. He moved from a developmental position that was Anglican, rejecting accretions, to then justify what Rome added on and thus gave a Roman Catholic position - whilst, really, he never stretched to its absolutism. But - and here's the rub - he did that change to objectivism via a subjective jump, even though he denied it. Everyone, surely, makes a subjective jump of some kind, unless you have such a very large theory of revelation indeed as some do right down to the available parking spot when you turn up and are lucky."

He looked at me. Was he thinking of Helen McPhail and me going shopping?

"The trouble then is that revelation slips into magic, and supernaturalists ought to avoid magic because of unethical and me-me implications."

Christine said to me, "Utterly inadequate." She spoke up, "Are you advocating Hegel?"

"Wait and see. There was a strong view in the early Oxford Movement days that English civil society was a delicate even failing beast, held together in a feudal-inherited regime of Church and State, Whigs and Tories. The Whigs had won, of course: the Tories were post-Whig after the elites had changed the monarch. Our Scottish Anglican brethren were slow to adapt, Jacobites against William! The capitalists were a new thing, however, wanting freedoms in trade to replace mercantile privileges, and used an Enlightenment ideology to boot. Kant, perhaps, Locke certainly. The people of emergent denominations were largely middle class and wanted reform that might well undermine the old regime, using the toleration of William and Mary, and Anne, after previous failed attempts at comprehension. The older dissenters were the pushiest, really. While John Henry Newman jumped to the more authoritarian ship, his brother, Francis William, also a one-time evangelical, became ever more liberal in dissent and indeed lost his Christianity.

"It's interesting that F. W. chose a pure Hegelian spirit, and J. H. chose a Church of power; and we Anglicans should choose neither. All right, Christine? We say that we pray and let our liturgy act as a regulative filter, using our interlocking authority system, and thus we obtain our Church as society. We have rules and regs, of course, and Holy Scripture, but the characteristic is to listen to our liturgy. But, oddly, we are comprehensives under a State regime of toleration. We became a throwback at a time of toleration.

"We are not slaves to scripture, which has various views within it, and about it, nor even to the Church; but we take the whole as a basic defence: our authority system is credal and people say the creeds, and we listen to them too; I'm actually with J. H. Newman on this: that for the mass of the laity, it is enough that they do not set up counter-statements of their own."

I noticed various people shuffling, perhaps rather predictably: identified evangelicals and some Catholics. Many had blank faces.

"I'm sure the diocesan bishop could develop my points."

(Ah, I thought; he was matching himself with our diocesan in his theological speculations.)

"The relevance here is that I take the view that all priests are indeed in situ for the bishop, not just in the Eucharist but in preaching and indeed ethically. But we are not Eastern Orthodox, one of autocephalous Churches and bishops in and out of communion with one another.

"All I would say is that the more precise the revelation, in historical moments, the more is the need for leadership, for priests as arms of the bishops. That's it."

Caroline Small, sister of Cadenza, said, "We've had nothing practical or contextual, nothing about actual ministry."

Imogen England said, "No Richard Osmer."

Caroline asked, "What, the House of Games man? Smash a picture of a theologian into a question about congregations?"

Imogen said, "Not Osman. Practical theology. About context. In a congregation."

Bishop Barman said, "Our lectures this week have not given instructions on how to do ministry. You had these in college and as deacons in your parishes. We are encouraging you to read, think and stay theologically informed. The diocesan bishop lays a very high value in creating an ordained theological force. But, whilst we may inherit comprehension, we cannot deny that toleration means there are others.

"And so what I'd like you to do, tomorrow morning, is to let you out a bit, into that wide and wild world, perhaps in pairs or threes, and see, as Anglicans, what other denominations or groups are doing. Beyond the Friday coffee mornings, I've asked one or two others to have their churches open and people gather, so you can go inside in your cassocks and look around. Look at the architecture; ask how people are loyal to where they are, if they are. This time avoid Anglican churches. Oh, and one group should go and see Rabbi Maurice Neptune at the small meeting place the Reformist Jews use - I have the details about my person somewhere. Contextual at last!"

I thought about seeing the rabbi, after the school encounter. I'd go for pot luck instead, with Christine.

The bishop said, "We'll follow these visits with discussions, and connect our theology to ecumenism and possibly the secular urban space. Always theologise on what you have seen. And each and every one of you will be attending your second interview in the afternoon."

At which point Cadenza Small, sister of Caroline, stood up and said, "We've had no female contributors, no female theology, no feminist insight, not a thing."

"Well, find it on your travels," said the bishop. "Do interpret from a feminist theological stance. Over to you!"

With Bishop Barman's lecture over, Christine said, quietly, "Come with me."

I wasn't sure what to expect, but I asked if she wasn't sympathetic to Eastern Orthodoxy authority, given all that she has said.

Not yet answering, she took me into the convent library, and there were a range of books that had Christine's approval - all Catholic in stance, Anglican and otherwise.

"Yes," she said, eventually, "But he only made a passing reference to need, so the more the need, the more the authority. I think we can turn the Western tradition to make it more Eastern - goodbye to Augustine's ethics, emphasise the Church while allowing the Scripture and reason its own revelation still, but we are a vanguard."

Asked to go to her cell bedroom, she removed her cassock to her knickers only and asked me to rub cream into these red streaks across the front and back of her body.

"Why?" I asked. "Who did this?"

She said they reminded her of the need to sacrifice.

I asked, "Do nuns here do this?"

Her only reply was that nuns do have relationships: Sisters Martha and Joanne had an ongoing lesbian sexual relationship, for example. She didn't answer my question.

I attended services and ate with others, and retired to read about the Oxford Movement founders.

Meet the Unitarians in Wytham (Friday 28th June)

We were 'let out' on Friday, the fourth full day. Christine and I took a bus into town in our cassocks, collars and shoulder bags.

"My breasts are stinging today," she said.

"I can attend to them again."

"What makes you aware of your body, Linda?"

"Do you really want to know?"

"Yes, I do."

"Needing to have a shit. There you are: I told you."

"Evacuating is a sacred act, Linda."

"You are kidding me."

"Not at all. It's a matter of holiness. Focus and meditate when you lose what you have made. We all look back at our shit. You should wipe your backside, or spray it, with a gentle prayerful attitude."

"Christine: wiping my backside with paper is a burden. You really are bonkers."

"Why do you mock me? Don't mock me, Linda. Some see a connection with giving birth."

"And God is present at both, you'd say."

"Of course. Why do you even ask this? Linda, if you think otherwise, then you are 'bonkers', as you put it in your disparagement of me - and of God, more importantly."

"I hear that some women giving birth have an involuntary shit. God must be doubly pleased."

"Will you give birth, Linda? I won't. Anyway, we have a church to find."

"I hope they have toilets, then."

"They usually do. Let's get off here and walk around."

Here was a random search for some chapel, having seen male ordinands already in one that we passed. Eventually, there was a place with an open door set back with a coffee morning notice outside.

Christine asked, "What's this place?"

"Perhaps it is one the bishop asked to be open for us. Landview Road Chapel 1672 is hardly informative."

Through this porch and opened plain door we could see maybe twenty people in total sat about and at a stall. People were serving and consuming teas and coffees and a small selection of cakes and biscuits. In the gloom of the porch we saw a poster - You grow when you think freely. We paused, outside, looking in.

I said, "Oh, it is Unitarian. So they do exist and meet in Wytham."

"I think it's of some Victorian Ecclesia isn't it?" Christine assumed. "They must keep it going here. I don't think the bishop arranged this one."

"1672 is not Victorian! Never heard of Unitarians until I met my friend's apprentice. He looks at their webpages. They might be Pagan now."

"Really? Well, obviously, I don't know," she replied. "Weren't they the ones who did social and educational stuff in the 1800s and probably died out?"

"Clearly, we need to ask. Something interesting to report," I declared.

So we in cassocks entered. Inside there was this ginger-haired and bearded thinnish chap with a few others at a table, including a black woman with an American accent. This chap stood with an open-necked ordinary shirt collar up and came over to us.

There was a space with individual seats, and four rows of dark shiny pews at the back left.

"What's the origin of this place?" I asked. "I mean 1672 is ten years after the Anglican Prayer Book, the original."

"It's not the original," he said, in a highish pitched voice, rightly correcting me. "English Presbyterian Puritans they were: those who fell out in 1662 from that Prayer Book and waited for toleration for themselves. An indulgence from James II allowed them to open in 1672. As he spoke, there was some disagreement on the table whether they were then Unitarians, but the dominant voice was that they weren't then."

"Well," I said, "if you were Puritans then you were definitely not Unitarian, surely nothing like Unitarian. And anti-Pagan."

"Quite a change," said Christine. "Their ecclesiology must have become unhinged."

"And you are clergy?" another thin, white-haired, elderly chap asked, introducing himself as Colin Petty.

I said, "We are Anglicans on walkabout, looking in on other church life. We are both about to be ordained priests in the Anglican tradition - thus the garb. Who's on that old photo?"

"Sir Roy Fultz. A former trustee. Very dour, very serious. City Mayor."

"Oh right."

"This is my first appointment as minister." said the younger redhead. "At one time our liberals and yours influenced each other. Read Wigmore-Beddoes, published in 1971."

Christine said, "Up to five minutes ago I thought you were nineteenth century."

One keen bulky middle-aged man replied, "We were Unitarian by the nineteenth century; the Magyars were able to be Unitarian from the later 1500s, helped a little by the Turks being strong nearby."

The minister identified him as Adrian Moore, and added, "For all your history, he's the man."

A younger woman said, "All the coloured glass here is from the nineteenth century, and they turned the church around by ninety degrees."

The minister added, "Very factual is Joy Smith. There was once a three decker pulpit, but a smaller one ended up at the side and a table took central position. And your Oxford Movement was distantly involved, or rather romanticism. Ministers were then often very learned and perhaps aloof, but it is not like that now."

"What, on both counts?" Christine asked. "No longer aloof, no longer learned?"

"Often."

"So did you train to be a minister?" I asked. "We are Christine Vine and Linda Jupitas."

"I was here first on a placement. Charley Darley. We have a college based at York."

I noticed that his trousers were rather tight and frankly stretching as if on a female. I said, "I'm confused about these influences on to former Presbyterians."

"And there were also Unitarian Methodists in Lancashire, and Unitarian Baptists in various places."

I asked, "Is that why, historically, a Baptist, like one known to a colleague of mine, might be hostile?"

"Historical legacies rumble on," he answered. "General Baptists went Unitarian, many then merging into the Presbyterian stream."

Christine asked: "Would there be a Lutheran phase, or something like that?"

"No," he said, scratching his red beard. "Calvinist, Arminian, sometimes Reformation-style Arian, then Unitarian."

"Worldwide was that?" I asked him.

"Nope. Lutherans among the Icelanders in Canada. The Icelander Lutherans were liberal and Canadian Lutherans more mainline. So the cultural Icelandic Lutheran Church in Canada became Unitarian. These Hungarians in Romania: their bishop went from Catholic to Lutheran to Calvinist to Unitarian."

I said, "Keep the Bishop, change the Church."

We were handed coffees that were luke-warm and easy to swallow and no payment required.

Christine said, "So it is still alive." She seemed to be wandering off.

He said. "Alive enough to keep going."

"Nationally?" I asked.

"Very diminished," he said, "but still a coverage of sorts. And the Internet, of course. Americans do much better."

"And what does it stand for now? A particular inheritance of Christianity? Denies the Trinity? What's this Paganism someone I know sees online?"

"Well, still liberal Christian, but also Religious Humanist, Eastern, neo-Pagan: the Church changes as individuals join us with whatever they bring."

I said, "I can't see a liturgy working like that."

"We're flexible," said the older white-haired man.

Christine was stood staring at the windows and walls, some stones with statements about their illustrious dead, the more portraits.

A different woman came up, saying, "We were hoping he might be our minister, and we were quick," and walked away again."

The minister said, "That's Rose Barnes, our Secretary. The trick is to encourage each person with their own search, and we can discuss each contribution."

I asked, "What do you actually say in the pulpit? Does what you say go?"

"It's not for me to impose," he said, "or anyone else."

Christine, now looking back at us, quipped, "Well presumably you think something. Or what does your Ecclesia think?"

"The Church," he answered, "is creedless. So the seat of authority is the individual. You can use general terms, but it gets more difficult to use some terms that derive specifically from Christianity. We don't do the Lord's Prayer anything like as often as we did."

"What you say seems anarchic to me," I commented.

Christine agreed, speaking away from us: "It completely follows the secular normative."

He responded, "You can guess that my 'contextual theology' reflection is rather different from some other students in mainline denominations, if any are mainline any more. Scratch those individuals and they don't affirm as they do on the surface."

"That is so," said Christine from afar. "They affirm but continue to negate."

I asked, "Well, put it another way then: where do you get your theology from?"

He said, "Some of it is inherited, like forms and words to use, and you see this in the debates from the 1960s, say, which we shared roughly (if using different emphases) with other Churches, and some of it comes from social sciences and the arts."

"Exactly my point," said Christine looking at another stone.

"So," I was drilling further, "the Victorian period and then the 1960s and maybe 1970s? There was a counter-reaction on our side after that."

"I try to use feminist and green and more philosophical liberal non-realist theologies. Doesn't always suit our inheritance. You'll know the work of John Hick - a different kind of Presbyterian! He does suggest a high theism beyond religious packages, but we can also cut into and join up parts of religious packages."

"Hegelian theism," I said. "One of our bishops rejected this in a lecture yesterday."

"What about postliberal theology?" asked Christine.

"Not identity theology. Some do, inevitably."

"Oh dear," said Christine. "I don't understand why the Radical Orthodox label themselves so: a definition to affirm by continuing to negate. Just a mild criticism."

"Ah. Are you Mediaeval?" he asked across to Christine, rather perceptively.

"Hmm," was her first non-reply. Then, walking back towards us, Christine said, "The Church is ageless until the parousia. I do believe society has lost mutual obligation and duty. What I have serves you, what you do serves me. God wants that."

The new minister said, "I do know a postliberal minister in our denomination because he's an atheist and wants to use Christianity and philosophy - a very university type - but it imposes a definition and limits plurality. So, in a way, our conservatives do have their own versions of post-liberal conservatism, with a hyphen. Postliberals, without a hyphen, and the Radical Orthodox are about maintaining frozen definitions. We allow change, by individuals."

I was getting confused at this point.

"You've not got any cake," said Colin Petty, pointing at me. "Let's fix that. Doreen!"

The minister then said, "Let's just say that 'post-liberalism' with a hyphen ought to include the liberal as it moves on, not its rejection from the line of inheritance."

Christine said, standing close, "Hey, what about subordinationism? That's like touching on Arianism - doesn't it deny the Trinity? - and that's evangelical."

"I've preached on that," I said. "Rather badly."

A black youngish American-accented woman said, "That's all angels on the head of a pin stuff - and no hyphen is involved. Hi. I'm Meg Richards."

I asked her if she was visiting, if she connected the British and Americans.

"No, Lovey. I'm from Boston, location of the King's Chapel: Anglican in origin, liturgical, Arian in theology, or old fashioned Unitarian at least. Minister James Freeman revised the Book of Common Prayer along Unitarian lines in the late eighteenth century. I went to a more regular Unitarian church in the city. Plenty of choice. I lecture here in Engineering."

"There are Anglican theological and institutional connections in England too," said the minister, "But earlier chapels like this were preaching boxes, and later more elaborate chapels were European and clearly not Anglican, until they did copy the Anglican."

"You were always Unitarian?" I asked.

"United Presbyterian Congregationalist. They have breadth but not enough for me. I have a friend who comes over from Serninsea, a UPCC minister: Georgie Smith, growing her hair a bit longer these days."

"Is she liberal?" I asked.

"No. But she is rather ignored by her own folks in the Presbytery."

Christine mused further, "There is some doubt in our system, but perhaps you're specialists."

Charley said, "It isn't a system. Doubt assists mystery. Individuals can't know it all."

Christine kept pushing, "Listen: if you allow individuals to make it up, then presumably some could be trinitarians."

"Yes. Sure."

"That wouldn't be Unitarian," she claimed.

"Yes it would," he said.

I asked, getting more confused, "On what basis?"

"That Unitarianism is an evolutionary, largely subjective faith."

"Evolving where?" Christine asked. "It's just this secular terminology over and over again."

"We evolve to wherever. Doreen Sharp, my love, where's the cake?"

"Come on!" I said. "Not the cake - sorry. I mean, come on you're not standing for anything."

"We do, because people make positive aspirations with hopes and fears: about humankind, the interconnectedness of life, making a community."

I said, "There's no mast - where do you nail your colours?"

"What colours?" asked Christine.

"Rainbow," he said. "The ship still moves, but we discuss our progress. There's many a corner of activity and the captain goes around and brings the crew together - if there is a captain. We land, we explore, we get back on the ship."

Doreen, a silver-haired woman, arrived with two plates and chocolate cake. "Sorry for being slow."

"You weren't," the minister said.

We placed down emptied cups and saucers to a table and took the plates with cake, both of us expressing our thanks.

She asked, "Do you believe orthodox things like you are told to believe them?"

"What about the sacrificial, giving up, losing all?" Christine asked the Reverend Charley Darley, neither of us giving Doreen an answer. "Presumably sacrifice is a worthless activity."

"We still take risks," said Charley.

Doreen was waiting for an answer, so I said to her, "I think we represent what the Church believes. It is and will be our job."

"But do you?" Charley asked. "All the supernaturalism and the dogmas?" Doreen took the cups and saucers to the kitchen.

"The importance of everything having to die," said Christine, "within the bosom of the living Holy Church."

"The atonement?" asked Charley.

"What do you mean by that?" I asked.

"You tell me," he said. "I don't believe in it."

"I mean, well, he's a model for self-sacrifice," I said.

"No, no: he's supposed to be unique," said the minister. "A model stands for something bigger."

"Unique enough for me," I said.

Christine was looking up and down our conversation partner.

He asked, "What's 'unique enough' when it's at home? The Trinity; fully man and fully God, the incarnation and resurrection?"

"Well, hang on," I said.

Doreen Sharp, rejoining a table, said, "They say what they are supposed to say."

"Why hang on?" he asked. "And on to what?"

"You have to unpack it."

The American woman asked, "Why do you carry such heavy suitcases in the first place?"

He said, "Go on then, unpack your suitcases in front of us."

"Em..." Suddenly I had to gather a position. "Yeah. Em... So Jesus, like, gives us a clue to what God is, and in his full humanity he shows us God, and then just add in the Spirit, which is like the dynamic motivating bit..." I wanted my hairbrush, but not in their sacred church.

Christine started to walk away again, eating. I took a bite.

"No," he said, "It's supposed to be uniqueness, not a clue. I'll go with clues: because I and you and all of us have full humanity so we also show what God is, perhaps, and God is already dynamic and moving - so we can change the terminology to Holy Spirit."

"Well I agree with that," I said, "But... There is a but. Er, Christine?" I filled my mouth with cake.

Invited to help me, she turned around and said, first swallowing, "We don't achieve God. God achieves us. We don't unpack terms; we receive terms. We don't even have to open the suitcase."

Yet another old chap said, "A bit useless carrying a suitcase that you don't open."

I said, "I do open mine, and I do sort out the clothing."

The minister said, "One item of clothing is the resurrection, Linda, and so can you tell me how Jesus defeated death? He did die I take it?"

"That's the contrast received," said Christine, drifting away again.

"Yes it is a contrast," he said, "but give me the science or history or what makes all the difference regarding Jesus."

I said, "That's ridiculous. There is no science or history to it - you can't do that."

"So it is not real then! Actual death has not been overcome. There is no miracle, no backbone, no uniqueness."

The American woman said, "I have heard many American Episcopalians wriggle like this."

"We're dealing with a story," I said. "The 'what' is in the story."

People were smiling. "A novel, then?" Charley asked.

"No," I said, "because a community - there you are, a community - grew up around the belief that he was the incarnation. Well..."

"That he was the messiah, and the saviour figure for Gentiles."

"Yeah, okay, we agree."

"No we don't," he said, "because they were just beliefs, culturally set."

"Then we do," I said.

"We don't," said Christine, who had received a folded leaflet from a man and opened it.

Charley said, "I'm talking about a man who died, who supposedly regained consciousness in a transformed body, who therefore had defeated death, and was ascended afterwards."

"So we are talking about that," I said.

"No, you are supposed to be affirming that," he insisted. "Remember, it's your job - you said so."

Christine responded, "What else are we supposed to talk about? We are the talkers. Listen to me: this is the centre of our talk."

Charley said, looking about and finding a biscuit nearby, "But we also add anything else, too, that constitutes positive religious stories."

Christine said, "Wasted effort. The one strand guides."

He said, mainly looking at me, "But uniqueness implies that this did happen. Did it happen? Do you as individuals think it happened?" He bit off half of his biscuit.

The American woman said, "Here's my video camera in my cell phone. Take it with you going back in time. He's resurrected and meeting his disciples. Video the scene."

I paused, with cake that I finally finished and swallowed. "No," I said. "Not with a video camera. I don't think it did happen like history or biology. It's not about video, it's about text."

Charley said, "You try to eat your cake and have it, except you can't. You two chose to eat it."

"Very tasty too," I said, regarding the chocolate cake still tasting within, as he swallowed the other half of his crunched biscuit.

Christine agreed, "That's true, very tasty. But what difference does a useless thought enquiry make?" She had finished her cake as well.

Doreen came and retrieved our plates from our hands, with dual thanks given.

Charley, biscuit consumed, looked directly at Christine and stated, "I bet you do know the difference. You do know." He then looked at me. "Well you know. You know it didn't happen. Human brains rot fast."

"They do. Yeah it didn't happen biologically so, sort of, what did? Shit. Gosh. Oh, I'm sorry for my language in your church."

"So, to be human," he said, "his brain must become incapable and rapidly."

"Because," I said, "if he did die and then regained consciousness in some reconstituted body then he's not actually human any more. I see. So resurrection could be a kind of imprint to be picked up."

"What?" he asked.

"Speculative physics - like at the edges of black holes regarding information."

"Very speculative," he said.

I said, "Well, there is no historical method - means - to say he is unique. It is just a doctrine to proclaim. But there is theoretical science as a kind of parallel thought experiment. Oh, she doesn't..."

Christine said, "Follow the transformed witnesses to the Christian revelation and proclaim that."

"Proclaim it if you want," Charley said, "But I don't. And because I don't, and I want to be positive, then I proclaim a lot more. I'm not forced to be narrow."

"I want to be positive," I agreed. "Look, er, we'll look around a bit more and look at some of your stuff."

"Take some leaflets," he said.

"Better not," Christine said. "Nor you Linda - not where we're going. But thank you for offering me this one which I shall give back."

The minister said, "Well, look around at the Victoriana, an unchallenging activity."

"I'm not chicken! So what's the difference between you and the Reformist Jews?"

"Judaism doesn't handle and deal with the New Testament texts." He then said, "I've met Maurice Neptune, the Reformist Jewish Rabbi here. The Orthodox do have rabbis debating, questions, plurality. Remember The Dignity of Difference? It came from Orthodoxy. Unitarian Universalists in the USA do interact with Liberal Jews a lot, and we did here on issues like equal marriage. But that Bishop was accused of being too like the Jews, by Faustus Socinus."

"The historical one you mentioned?" I asked.

"Yes: in the 1500s, in Transylvania."

"What, vampires and that?" asked Christine, with a smirk.

"You'd love that!" I quipped to her.

Charley pointed out, "We're referring to Hungarian ethnic communities. In Hungary the Austro-Hungarian regime quashed all the chapels. The Transylvanians hung on. 1660 and Jesuits forced those other Unitarians out of Poland: incredibly nasty."

I remembered something from the retreat talk. "Do you know anything then about, er, Newman, the brother of?"

"Francis William?" he asked.

"Yes, that's him. F. W.."

"Yep. He was a theist, a vegetarian when it was pioneering, and important with the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. He didn't believe in the moral superiority of Jesus."

"So was he one of yours?" I asked.

"For the most part. Started as an evangelical. His brother went Catholic and he went liberal."

"That's interesting, Christine."

"Sort of," she said.

"Hang on," I said. "Someone mentioned someone called Canning and was it Eddie?"

The American woman said, "Channing was one of ours. Jonathan Edwards, a Baptist, was opposed to us. Edwards was a predestination type, Calvinist, and it offended Channing and his idea of a loving God. But Channing went further and created a Unitarian Christianity in a sermon in Baltimore, and about two hundred Congregationalist parishes became Unitarian as a result."

"When?" Christine asked.

Our from abroad informant said, "1819."

Charley said, "We came from Presbyterians, Americans came from Congregationalists. And Congregationalists in the US didn't like the Anglicans. But, as you've heard, the first Arian-Unitarian Church in Boston was Anglican. The first named Arian-Unitarian church here was run by an ex-Anglican, in London. So there you are. Do please take some leaflets, if privately."

"You wanna shut your eyes to it all?" asked the American.

I replied, "Not that: we're being interviewed by one of our bishops. We're getting ordained. Who ordained you?"

"No one," Charley said. "We go on a Roll of recognised ministers."

"Lay ministers?"

"Not quite: professionals, perhaps. Nothing unique about us either."

Christine said, "We become representatives of the bishop - like an extension to his or her arms. And they might be gesturing us back now. We ought to be off."

"Oh, gosh," said the minister. "We're too diverse for you. Good chat."

"Sorry about not looking at your windows," I said. "Can I borrow your toilet before I go?"

"Through there."

"Thank you Charley," said Christine. "I did look at them. I'll wait for my colleague, if I may."

Once back, we gave our goodbyes. Everyone speaking had seemed remarkably well-informed, although most did not speak.

I said to Christine, outside, "They know their stuff, but I can't see how it works. It might have done when this Channing was pulling Christianity apart but not when it's anything and everything or nothing."

She said, "They show the danger of your theology. You were but a rice paper from them: you both accept the same theological epistemology."

A bus approached that would get us back, while I was brushing my hair.

"You're attacking your hair, not brushing it," Christine told me. "Don't faff, I have both fares here."

I put my brush back into my bag. "Tell you what, it's something to report," I declared.

"By the way," she said, "he had some tight trousers there. He had a camel toe instead of a camel tail."

"You are lowering the tone, Christine."

"I bet he's full of tattoos: to compensate for his weak voice."

"Christine. Where's your theosexuality now? Concentrate on him being thoughtful. As I said, plenty to report."

"You're reporting that it doesn't work," she said. "You'd better say so clearly."

"Seriously, I can't think he'd say much week by week in his sermons. Good thoughts and apple pie or, rather, good cake."

She said, "They can't really be sermons, can they?"

"Not like the Reformist Jews: they have a tradition. They'll have sermons: sermons from stories."

We got on the bus, and sat together.

I said, "I like them. I like their ethos."

Christine said, "I think I need to take you in hand."

"Christine," I asked, "would that please me or disappoint me?"

"You are so subjective," she replied. "Perhaps a few lashes would underline objectivity."

Presentations

So we arrived back at the retreat to start discussing, like other pairs, how to give our presentation. The Right Reverend John Barman was in charge of this, but the right Reverend Julian Worsley was listening. The ecumenical element came from two Methodist ministers, the Reverend Denny Mullins and the Reverend Celia Coggan, and one Spaldwick United Presbyterian Congregationalist Church (UPCC) minister, the Reverend Sasha Dein. All three wore trousers. We had females to respond!

The Reverend Deacon Christine Vine said to me, "We'll emphasise that it has lost its Christian anchor and we don't think it can work."

I responded, "But there were obviously people there. Let's present a united stance." Yes, I had to be careful in suggesting any sympathy or agreement.

Folks kicked off. There were a number of pretty obvious ecumenical commentaries from those visiting the Methodists, Baptists and UPCC.

I pricked up my ears when 'Chakhras Cait' of the UPCC visitors said that Serninsea was part of the Presbytery but the Reverend Jeremy Wass never travelled over there. Sasha Dein smiled.

I was more interested in the three who'd descended on Rabbi Maurice Neptune: Anna Ozga, Caroline Small and Deborah Wilkinson. By now there was a habit of applause after each presentation.

Anna said, "We visited the meeting place of the Reformist Jewish er Schul, I think they call it. Well we think they are like in-betweeners, so you have super-orthodox, Orthodox, Reformist and Liberal. Oh, and there are Conservatives and then there are those who would reconstruct or something."

I kept quiet but I looked at Christine Vine, who looked at me.

Caroline Small said, "We think that the Reformist and the Liberal come from America and have come over here, certainly they are big in America and a lot of their theology comes from there."

Struth. Talk about error! Then Deborah: "We think of Judaism as giving way to Christianity, but obviously Jews stay loyal, although it is no longer united. So we pondered, 'What roads are there to at least some acceptance of Jesus among the Reformist and the Liberal?'"

I was getting annoyed and looked at the bishop. He noticed me. Plus, when were Christians ever united? Hadn't she noticed the groups as portrayed in the New Testament?

"And we directed a lot of questions about Jesus to him." Deborah continued: "We find it odd that they just regard him as a kind of wandering holy man among others, which is hardly what happened. He was a... tsaddick or righteous man who represented a nuisance to authorities, and a crucifixion was like decapitating a movement. But we said the movement continued and grew, whereas he said the perhaps main Jewish side of it died especially with the further actions of the Romans. But then the Jews didn't accept the Messiah. He said many Jews through experience became distrustful of messiahs - well no wonder Jesus didn't get through to them and doesn't."

I thought this gloss of hers was shit and possibly offensive. What did she study at college? How can you get your Christianity foundations right if you don't do at least a little bit of reading on the varieties of Judaism?

Anna took over, "At least he was prepared to consider the possibility of Jesus. The resurrection, he said, should have been general and widespread, and the fact it was not gave rise to his 'severe doubt' that there was any such regarding Jesus himself. The messianic tradition heralds in rapid change, and our Paul believed that too, he said, though Paul was making his Gentile appeal."

Caroline added, "We said 'we believe' and he said that was good. There was a bit where he said the Jewish authorities, not unlike compliant Britons, were aiming for stability under Roman rule, whereas we see them as collaborators in killing Christ - but not to say that of all Jews, of course. That would be wrong."

My blood was heating up; this was Christian bullshit and I wanted to say so.

Deborah now: "There was something in his use of time too. You know we have the solar calendar and the lunar calendar, like the Muslims have the lunar calendar and their year shifts backwards. Well the Jews must always have a clock daily calendar too. This is because everything in years can be placed on the clock.

He said yes everything can be in the twenty four hour clock. Like this year could be a time."

The bishop looked at me. Christine next to me said, "It's a joke! He was pulling your leg. Did he tell you the joke about the synagogue garden?"

Anna took over, "No? But he said, 'Give my best wishes to your Bishop Terry Barman.'"

"Ah yes, my middle name. Thanks back to him. What is the joke?"

Christine said, "I'll leave the rabbi to tell it. A Reformist synagogue garden starts to get a makeover. No I won't tell it: go on!"

Anna continued: "All right. Christians down the ages haven't been very good at persuading the Jews to convert. We didn't do it by persecution, and he referred to some key dates like half past three, no er 1492 - that doesn't work - or the nineteenth century pogroms in Russia that gave rise to demands for a State of their own. Oh, he said Britain once considered Uganda as a place for Jews to have a land of their own, but the British actually weren't keen. Is that a joke?"

I said to them all, "It's not a joke."

"Er," said Bishop John, Terry, or whoever. "You've read about this stuff, Linda?"

"Uganda was considered."

Anna again: "We wondered how that would have worked out; Jews were travelling themselves to the Middle East and did so quickly when Germany became cruel to the Jews. He said about Jewish theology post-holocaust and some of it is rather atheistic or naturalistic because the supernatural theology has to justify God either not acting or having Hitler as an agent of God, which seems very strange. But then the Jewish God in the Old Testament is cruel."

"Do we have to?" I asked.

"Have to what?" she asked back.

"Have recycled Christian-biased myths."

"God is different in the New Testament. He said about someone called 'My-dinner-ease', like our Thomas Aquinas or even Hooker, and then about recent ideas. But why would we take theology or philosophy from the Muslims? He said some of them overlap with our theologies."

"Because we had the ignorant Dark Ages and then opened their libraries," I said.

Deborah said, "We are loyal to the Church Fathers and the Bible that has all salvation in it, and still he said that was very good of us - but obviously not good enough because he won't use the canon like we have of the New Testament. Anyway, that was it."

Applause followed, but not by me and only a couple of claps from Christine.

Christine said to me, closely, "What a load of absolute shit."

The bishop said, after some rather positive comments, like seeing a Jewish branch from our perspective (surely that was the error!), "We have a critic, a negative critic." He looked at me.

I said, "Reformist Judaism isn't a simple liberalism of Orthodox Judaism. The Orthodox have people who debate, and so do the rest."

Christine said, "Listen. She's right. Anyway, I've met Maurice Neptune a few times."

"Yes you have," said the Bishop.

I had more: "It's true that within Reformist and other branches Judaic laws can be revised. Sometimes the Reformist, Reconstructionist, Conservative, are more loyal to what they maintain than many Orthodox, who can pay lip-service to the whole pile of laws that remain. There there might be parallels with Catholics and Orthodox Christians 'carried' by their Churches, and those more discerning and committed choosing their Church. Positive interfaith attitudes stretch right across all branches, and such as The Dignity of Difference comes from the Orthodox. Jesus as messianic is indeed a problem for Judaism, if only because active messianism failed to materialise anything and has led to repression. We forget that we are inheritors not of the Jewish or Gnostic groups but the Hellenistic that contains only traces of the other two."

Anna said, "Perhaps you two should have gone. You seem to know enough about it."

Deborah then said, "Well, we are Christians. And the resurrection was followed by Pentecost and the Church, and saving through faith. Surely we believe that."

Christine said, "I've met Maurice Neptune and done the history. The Reformist tradition comes from the Enlightenment and especially a Germany that was identifiably progressive into the mid nineteenth century. After some Jews had compromised with Christianity; the Reformist was a synodical movement re-examining traditions and looking for the core essences in respect of biblical research and modernity. And, from a Jewish view, and not mine, Christianity is an inferior religion because incarnation compromises the purity of the Jewish concept of God."

I liked her. Go for it babe. Probably I was in love.

The bishop said, "Well, study is one thing but thanks to you three who engaged in conversation, one faith to another. And whilst, yes, Reformist Jews and all Jews are entitled to view Christianity from their perspective, we are entitled to view Judaism from ours, so long as we learn from our mistakes in the past."

There was a lot of head nodding, as people do to those in authority.

"Well the people we've not heard from regarding their own encounter are Linda and Christine here. Both of them tend towards the intellectual: why, I suppose, I asked them to go together. And you'd better be accurate! Off you go, or, rather, where did you go?"

Not fancying to talk immediately, I looked at Christine, who said, "We stumbled across a Unitarian chapel."

"Oh dear," said the bishop. "Is there one?"

She continued: "Obviously. It was having a coffee morning open to the street. We spoke with its minister, and he and they were very well informed. It changed a lot from, mainly, what was Puritan. What would you say Linda? Rational and Romantic religion, and free to follow subjective insights? Ethnic Hungarians were the first Unitarians."

The Bishop of Bolingbroke said towards Bishop of Screddington, "Not ecumenical, is it, when stumbling on a group of heretics?"

I said, "The main identity was changing views and now diversity, not a theological assumption derived from the name. Unitarians can even be Trinitarians! The chapel noticeboard didn't exactly shout out their denomination. So they have become, er, Christianity inherited, and also Humanist, Eastern, Pagan."

Caroline said at us, "They're not Christians, and they mislead people if they think they are."

I responded, "Well, as I said, a variety of stances, apparently, and not having a collective creed. Is that right, Christine?"

"A sort of via negativa of doctrine. Absorbs the zeitgeist."

"Surely something identifies them," said Megan Bentley.

"Landview, isn't it," said Bishop Julian.

I said, "Yes, Landview Chapel 1672. Charley Darley. He is the minister."

"Charley Darley, pudding and pie," said Jayne Bowland, an ordinand who confused that with being a comedian, and well worth ignoring.

"Carry on, I suppose," said Bishop John.

"He's female to male transgender."

Some started chuckling, led by Jayne.

I said, "I don't know what's so funny. They do have a history, changing themselves, thinking, being diverse. I suppose the question is of maintaining some sort of institutional memory for continuity. Well, you may not like it but we are giving our summary."

Christine said, "Listen: if I preach, I represent the Church, while they represent themselves..."

"Or," I said, "the Church is the diversity of all of them." I thought I'd at least try to impress the bishops. "I asked about the brother of John Henry Newman, and Francis William was indeed a progressive thinker in their movement among others."

Christine came in there, whereas I wanted a response: "So 'Dah-vid' was a bishop in Rumania. He kept chopping and changing his position."

Bishop John Barman said, "It's just based on heresy, from beginning to its end."

"What was he?" Christine alongside asked me.

"Em: Catholic, Lutheran, Calvinist, Unitarian. 1500s."

Julian Worsley said, "Bit of an odd and unstable bishop if you ask me."

So I said, "Well, I suppose it has its own integrity - like Reformist Judaism."

"No," said John Barman. "Reformist Judaism is a tradition integral to religious observance. What you met is denials of core beliefs. Outside the Church, heresy leads to denial leads to drift. Do you concur, Bishop Julian?"

"Yup. Absolutely."

Christine said, "Reformist Judaism is selective about the Bible."

Then Bishop John asked his suffragan colleague: "How does it relate to organisation theory, in which you have some expertise?"

"Well, like this I think. Churches can be charismatic, that is forward-thrusting and under powerful influences of individuals; or they can be traditional, that is decision-making based on traditional sacred forms and looking back. Healthily, we need something of both. The new and the old. There is a danger of drift to bureaucracy, and thus we have to acquire Saint Paul's insight of many parts to the whole - across as well as top-down. But what you two describe has individuals all over the place: human relations in organisation and authority, or lack of it, has nothing of the divine in it at all."

"I would raise an objection about using secular organisation theory," said Christine. "With humility to you, I am surprised."

"So long as it fits in with Catholic theory," the bishop reassured her.

"Anglicanism includes Reformed Protestant," I said.

"In a constrained way," said Bishop Julian. "It was never Henry VIII's intention."

"Let's pursue this," I said, given I'd heard this basic material from university Sociology. "Institutional memory is vital for any institution, and thus reference to traditions, and therefore the liberal turn can be part of individuals cohering over time. Whether they do..."

"Sounds like you approve," said Anna. "Like: are you in the right place, are you one of us?"

"That's a bit personal," I said. "I do know a young talented chap with Buddhist and Pagan views who goes on a Unitarian website. I don't know much else."

Bishop Julian said, "I hope you have had opportunity in your ministry to persuade him of the error of his ways."

I continued, "Seeing as you are plastering me with the same brush, we are also selective about the Bible and there is no one Church doctrinal line in the New Testament, no doctrine of the Trinity either." (I needed my hairbrush!)

"Baptism in the Father, Son and Holy Spirit," said Megan.

Christine was looking at the ceiling.

I said, "It's late in Matthew and the economic Trinity at best. Come on, we know all that."

Deborah said, "But the right biblical approach leads to supporting the doctrine, and that's what came about. You do sound like one of them, or a Reformist Jew."

Christine said, "Individuals interpret the Bible all over the place: simply by individuals reading it."

Maggie Ashdown, who I'd noticed often in prayer, declared: "It depends if you are a believer or not, for then biblical study supports doctrine. Pray in our fashion and prayer defines your belief."

The bishop said to me, "Presumably you agree with Deborah, Linda. You must agree with that."

"I don't think they rely on the Bible alone either."

"Well they wouldn't," said Anna. "They wouldn't bother, obviously. But we do. Or perhaps you don't."

Christine at least partially came to my rescue: "Linda can speak for herself but she too thinks that there is some core that has to have your loyalty. Mine is from Mother Church. I also conclude that they don't understand the sacrificial. Atonement means nothing to them."

I astonished people by saying, "I'm working on what the core is, yes."

"Well," said Bishop Julian, "best of luck with that. The conclusion here over all is we are not the only ones, and that the Methodists, Baptists, UPCC all have their place. You even use liturgy in Spaldswick."

Sasha Dein said, "We reject bishops, but Reform theology in The Book of Common Order for Worship tackles the same issues as Common Liturgies."

The Bishop of Scredington decided to conclude the session. "So, there we have it. Once we were hostile to other denominations and faiths but now we can be friendly and seek ecumenical and interfaith agreement. You can, beyond your groups, carry on talking about what you've encountered and what is distinctive about our approach, and speak with our minister guests. And don't forget the Roman Catholic Church and Orthodox."

These two bishops left us.

Denny Mullins came over and she said, "Keep it quiet, Linda, but I agree with you. We have everything to learn and nothing to fear. Charley has undergone a lot of struggle."

"Do you share any ecumenical arrangements with Landview Chapel?"

"No, and neither does Georgie Smith from your neck of the woods."

However, the rest of the people were looking at me, as if I shouldn't have said what I did.

I had arrived believing nothing, and, after my attempt to leave, Christine had lifted me somewhat. Now I was thinking of staying as a Reverend Deacon again. I was among a bunch of tribalists.

In the evening before bed Christine arrived at my room in her nightie only, to tell me to get into bed. She removed her nightie and already some marks were healing. She got in. There was mutual warmth and flesh, and she worked her fingers through my hair.

"Don't worry about today. Listen: those ordinands are ignorant. I have a high Church doctrine approach, but I still have to learn about the others and describe accurately. People prefer to make assumptions and play the person and not the ball."

"They're heretics but rather nice heretics," I said. "I liked Charley Darley. He was well-informed."

"We and he had three vulvas, Linda. Thin, deliberately, and small breasts pressed in."

"You reckon?"

"And your body is lovely and warm. My breasts are still tender. You and Keith didn't have children. Why not? I can imagine those breasts delivering milk to new life."

"Didn't happen. Why not you?"

"I have often thought I should have a child, but I give myself to the Holy Cause."

"Can you give yourself to me?"

"I want to get all of my hand in."

"I said you cannot do it."

"I have never failed to do it. Is that cannot or will not?"

"Please, Christine: either way it is no."

"Again, you are denying me. I will ask you a third time."

"God knows my secret."

"You do have a secret, eh? I'm trying to think what it is, knowing that you cannot be transgender. They're so brave having him as a settled minister. I want to look at you, carefully, in detail."

"Please stop it, Christine."

"I'll leave you now."

"You are going to make me cry."

"You have my unending love, Linda, but it is only possible because it comes from the Holy Spirit."

I said to her, "I want you to make love to me."

She placed her finger just inside my vagina and removed it to taste her finger on her tongue. "Hmm. Sweetness. It's so tight but is it actually tight?"

"Stop it!"

"Yes. Your sacrifice tonight is to do without."

"I do have a clitoris, Christine."

"Then you can still bring yourself to orgasm, when I have gone. If you do, praise God. Sometimes, Linda, we cannot have what we want. But it is vital that you do get ordained, for without that you won't be able to make the offerings that count. Remember, I am also denying myself the beauty of your body. By denying, I give."

"You don't have to go. I want you. I want you."

"You must not want. Interview tomorrow. Don't mention the Confraternity: it's not part of this. So sleep well."

Christine got up, dropped on her nightie and left, and I felt a shattering unfulfilled desire. And I had the agony that my breasts could never, ever, give milk.

Interview (Saturday 29th to Sunday 30th June)

The men were interviewed yesterday evening. We were being interviewed in the morning, two at a time, and then in the afternoon the bishops were away to churches for the ordinations to the diaconate.

After Morning Prayer and breakfast it soon came to my interview with the Right Reverend Julian Worsley.

This time I sat down from the beginning. Yet this bishop started with a shocker. He said, "If you want to pull out now, you would be treated with the utmost credibility. You do not have to go through with this. It is quite respectable to continue as a deacon." Then he stared at me, with wide and unblinking eyes.

I simply paused. My beliefs were blank and I was now being associated with a group of heretics through apparent sympathy. However, Christine last night said I must go on, and there was my coming place in the Confraternity, which I was not to mention.

"Your response?" he asked.

"Er, no," I said in my weak delayed reply. "I would not, well, I don't. No."

"No you don't what?" he asked.

"No, I mean: no, I want... to be ordained. Surely."

"What on earth were you doing yesterday morning?" he asked.

"We went into a chapel holding a coffee morning."

"A Unitarian chapel. Tell me, how did you defend your theological position? I assume you did defend your theological position."

"I don't see how theirs can work," I said. "A minister, if they have ministers properly, can't really say anything."

"Presumably none of them defend the Trinity."

"We asked about that in the chapel and individuals can."

"You defend it."

"What, the chapel?"

"No. Defend the Trinity."

"Now?"

"Now will do. You were invited to preach there last Trinity Sunday and you are enthusiastically going to evangelise the Trinity."

"I did that at St Sernin's. It wasn't very... Well, we believe that..."

"That won't do. I want you to actually make the argument, not describe a position. Make it."

"Not a contradiction?" I asked.

"Pardon?"

"As in the Monty Python sketch. He comes and pays for an argument and all he gets is contradiction."

"Oh dear. You were the one being paid. Like Judas, possibly. If you like you can tell me what you said on Trinity Sunday."

"Em, Okay. Er, I've forgotten what I said now."

"Presumably you can still defend it with a click of my fingers." He clicked his fingers.

"Er... The biblical account is one that demonstrates that God works through Jesus, and did so consistently in his life and service, in healing and preaching and teaching, that he surely must be identifiable with God, and after that he joined back with God in the non-earthly sense so that we are motivated by God and through prayer with the Holy Spirit."

"That's no good. That's not the Trinity."

"I could give a more biblical..."

"You were the one who told us that the biblical account does not give us the doctrine. Let me help you. We say the Trinity is the correct interpretation. Why?"

"Help me?"

"You want me to help you?"

"No, you said you were helping me but that wasn't helping me."

"I am asking you for the correct interpretation of biblical findings. Rather late in the day, I grant you, but I would like you to open the gate."

"Er, because it brings out the, em, biblical account in its fullness. Yes, that."

"I'll try it your way in then. Isn't it history? The body died, the body rose. History? The Spirit descended. God acted in, what, history?"

"Are you more conservative, Bishop Julian?"

"What's that got to do with it?"

"Em, well, we have historical clues and probabilities but you won't find the Trinity there."

"Why not contact Reformist Rabbi Neptune and ask to be part of his synagogue? Better than these Unitarians, surely: there's a consistent position with him. They have female rabbis."

"No, because I do refer to Jesus and use the New Testament and can interpret its questions, its directions. Although I would like to meet him again and have a good exchange of views."

"You would argue with Jesus?"

"No, with Rabbi Neptune. Though that would be fascinating."

"You don't seem to be answering any of my questions. I'll move on. You came to this conference on Monday. You weren't at church on Sunday. Perhaps you went to Landview."

"I didn't go there. I booked a holiday: to see my family before the retreat. I went to my naturist club."

"When every other candidate was in church. You have heard of Sunday? It comes before Monday."

"It was important to see them, clear my mind, be mentally ready."

"That's the function of this retreat," he said. "Everyone at your church is saying, 'Yes, we wish her well, but where is she?' You see the problem here."

"It was agreed."

"Only because you proposed the timing. It's just your lack of commitment. Well, let's move on again. Your husband is Keith Jupitas. How is Keith?" he asked.

I wondered if that was it, suddenly, regarding the theological examination. Had I passed? Was it good enough? Hardly!

"Er... He's well."

"He supports you? Bishop John tells me he doesn't attend very much at all. He used to be helpful to Colin Cromer, your training incumbent, and now you are alongside this vicar of the parish pretty much alone."

"Keith will be at the cathedral."

"I should hope so. But does he support you and your Christian ministry? There must be some doubt about that, seeing as we are forever talking about doubt."

"Yes, but he is in lower management in Systematic Measuring Services and is quite busy."

"But he still could turn up on a Sunday, at least. Once a week! But he doesn't, apparently. Ministry can be a two person activity, and normally the spouse needs to give full support. I remember that he was turned down for ministry."

"Bishop John is single. You are..."

"You're evading again! It's not about us, it's about you."

"I'm sorry. You are confusing me. I find Keith so loyal and supportive," I said.

"You say - maybe he says - he is loyal and supportive," the bishop stated. "But where's the evidence for the rest of us?"

"He is at home," was my weak affirmation.

"According to Bishop John, he is supporting you after a fashion. Anyway, referring to the interviewing panels. Too many people, I think, regard the interviews with the selection panel as the final stage. It isn't, as you can see this week. Those on the panels who interviewed both of you thought you were the sharper one, according to Bishop John. Did you deliberately correct Keith's mistakes?"

"I don't know what they were."

"His answers lacked get up and go, apparently," said the bishop. "Someone who does have get up and go is Jenny World. I heard from Bishop John that you know Jenny World. She was from your neck of the woods, wasn't she? She is coming to the cathedral."

"I knew her at school," I replied. "I'd be delighted to see her."

He said, "She's evangelical. We like a good spread. Around your neck of the woods she could be one of Jim Wilson's merry men."

"Or woman."

"Thank you for pointing that out. She could join you all and be prophetic. Do you think in your ministry so far you have lacked the prophetic?"

"So is she thinking of..."

"And your colleague here, to whom you seem to be attached at the hip: Christine Vine is intensely theological. She proclaims the Church as the vision of peace, reconciliation, service, and not to mention sacrifice. You don't."

"I thought we were discussing me," I said.

"Yes we are. It's the contrast. You have nothing prophetic; you are all over the place. Answer that."

"Well I am more pastoral, priestly, perhaps: I like to listen and be available. I like to analyse, discern."

"But this is so 'social work' and so passive. Why not instead get at those Unitarians for being so wrong?"

"I've only just noticed them. In a meeting place, like."

"Do you see my difficulty here?"

"Can I help?"

"It's not my difficulty, is it? Tell me about naturism and Christianity. Pagan naturism. Bishop John thinks you could be somewhat conflicted."

"Roots in Germany. I'm not conflicted. I'm not going to frighten the horses, bishop."

"It interests me that you have this alternative idealism."

"Family," I replied.

"Sun worship. You have no problems with the body beautiful. You heard my talk."

"I have an accepting attitude. I have little interest in the sun; but I did sunbathe when last with the family before coming here."

"Naked. Among your mother, father, sisters, brothers."

"Yes, of course. It's what we do. Mother, father, one sister, brother in law, last week."

"I said biology we understand through culture; culture we determine according to tradition and revelation. You don't say this."

There was a knock on the door. Bishop Julian said, "Come in? Ah, Bishop Derek! Do come in. Ah, the Reverend Lindsey as well."

"Who is it we have here?" asked the diocesan, Bishop Derek Imperial.

"The Reverend Deacon Linda Jupitas, who is a curate at St. Sernin's at Serninsea, Bishop. Her training incumbent is Colin Cromer, who's been there - gosh - a long time. I rather think that Ms Jupitas has been his last great task."

(Crumbs! 'Has been' he said, too.)

The diocesan said, "Oh yes, Linda Jupitas, and a most excellent candidate too, Alan. I hear nothing but good reports about her. She must have read your books."

(Hey? I hadn't read any of his books. Jeremy Symes had offered one. But what were these good reports?)

He went on, "I don't mind saying that you impress many with a keen, detailed, theological mind. Very close to the subject, works matters out critically. We need more like you, like Alan here, right in the heart of ministry."

"There is an argument," said this suffragan Bishop of Screddington, "that we need more lay theologians, where they are freer to examine doubt, uncertainty and a wider range of theologies. Bishop John says we need them in the auditorium as well as right in the proscenium."

"Oh I do hate these theatrical analogies he occasionally uses. Do you, Mrs. Jupitas? I sometimes think I am in the Big Top like some isolated ringmaster whom no one really notices. I need to write more, like you, Alan."

His suffragan said, "I was merely talking about the need for more lay theologians, Bishop Derek."

"No doubt that is true," said the diocesan, "but here we have a deacon to be ordained, and I think we need critical theological insight at the heart of ministry, to be a resource to serve and lead others. I've heard the odd recording of your sermons sent to me by Bishop John, with your deep thinking; I've been told of others. They are all quite impressive and, no, I look forward to seeing you at the cathedral."

"I was just saying about Linda's somewhat naturalistic background."

"Indeed. I hear that you actually take your clothes off in selected company. And you are dedicated to the cause. Yes, we have so many clergy that do this, so secretly, and some on holidays only, and are not as dedicated. I like dedication. I like those who can reach out to folks with whom we don't normally make good contact. You see, so often there is no one who can connect with alternative communities. Well, now we have such a person."

(Hey, looks like I'm in! I was thinking.)

"We were going over her husband Keith not being accepted."

"I think we made a mistake over him. Bishop John regrets this now. I would encourage Keith to try again. Now he has secular employment, he could be a worker priest indeed. We need married couples like that. We must admit our mistakes. I have prayed about this, with this diocesan investigation and report coming along."

The interviewer said, "I suppose, Bishop, we are worried about propriety."

"But," said the diocesan, "every evidence is that she has shown pastoral intelligence. She doesn't exactly whip 'em off in the street. She's not sort of naked under the cassock, are you? You don't flaunt it. But where you do it, you can engage them in discussion."

(He was wrong. I was naked under the cassock and collar.)

"Can't even be naked in the back garden," I said, adding a smile. "It's overlooked."

"Quite," said the diocesan. "Restraint. But what an opportunity! And even without this, we need intelligence and discernment. Well, we'll go and see who Bishop John is interviewing at present. See if I know of them as much as I have heard about you."

He went.

Bishop Julian said, "Well, it seems that he approves of you. So does my suffragan colleague, frankly, and the diocesan responds to what Bishop John sends him. So it's two more years with Colin. Do you get on with him?"

"Yes. I like him. Tells me so often that I am doing well." (I wasn't above lying.)

"His support for you has been weakening, by all accounts. But, with Bishop Derek saying what he just has, we hardly have any choice. Anyway, Bishop John is worried about you but has a soft spot for you. Something like that."

"I'm sorry that you seem to be so sceptical about me."

"Hmm. Bishop Derek in the manner of Bishop John has encouraged me to consider the theology of the body, as you heard. Give me your theology of the body. You must have thought about it."

"Yes, of course."

"Of course."

"It is our temple, but as it exists - not as idealised. And this includes the mind. Sometimes the mind says the body ought to be different. If the mind is clearly sorted, the body may have to be modified. I would support what that trainee minister Charley Darley was doing. I have no hang-ups about my body, bishop."

"Well, you look like a standard female to me."

"If you say so, bishop. Is that relevant?"

"It avoids conflict with some. So, let's conclude this then. Do we think you are ready?"

I gave a reply, "I hope so."

"I'll let that go. Are you excited about the Cathedral?"

"I am, yeah," I said, coming out with a more needed reply.

"Read this aloud so I can hear it," he said. A paper was passed to me, which at first I read through silently.

I, Linda Jupitas, do swear by Almighty God that I bear true allegiance to Her Majesty the Queen, Defender of the Faith. I will pay true and canonical obedience to the diocesan Bishop of Wytham, the Right Reverend Derek Imperial, and his successors, and to Bishop John Barman, Suffragan of Bolingbroke, and Bishop Julian Worsley, Suffragan of Scredington, and any other bishop set in authority over me, in all things lawful and honest: so help me God.

"Say it," he said.

"Who wrote this: is it standard?"

"This one is for you. Bishop John especially wants you to read this. Read it to me."

"I, Linda, do swear by Almighty God that I will pay true and canonical obedience to the diocesan Bishop of Wytham, the suffragan bishops, and any other bishop set in authority over me, in all things legal and honest."

"That was a bit truncated. But you said the essentials. So you do?" he asked.

"I do what?"

"Affirm what it says, as it is written."

"I just did. Yes I do," I answered.

"And you do live a godly, ethical life?"

"Yes." My fingers were crossed.

He then said, "What you will tell us at the service tomorrow is this: that you, Linda Jupitas: do so affirm, and accordingly declare my belief in the faith which is revealed in the Holy Scriptures and set forth in the catholic creeds and to which the historic formularies of the National Church in England bear witness; and in public prayer and administration of the sacraments, I will use only the forms of service which are authorized or allowed by Canon. You'll say that and mean it?"

"Of course."

"You'll feel different," he said. "Want to feel different?"

"Others have said how different they've felt after ordination. I did becoming a Deacon. They felt the power of the Holy Spirit upon them..."

He paused and looked at me directly. I looked at him. Did he think I'd descended into cliché-land or something?

"Then I wish you all the very best for the day. It'll be wonderful," he said, "a day like no other and you and everyone will beam their smiles."

"It is exciting thinking about it," I said. "I have a future mission."

"You do? Well, why didn't you say so earlier? Never mind now. Come to it humbly and let the ritual happen and deliver. Don't expect; just let it happen. God will look after you."

He stood up, so I stood up. He pushed out his right hand, so I shook it. And yet, when I left him, I felt a darkness descend.

I sat back in the large room among the others, brushing my hair, going over the interview, and I felt worried and puzzled. John Barman had given good reports upwards to Derek Imperial. Was this related to the Confraternity?

After some time the diocesan bishop walked towards me, shaking his head, with Alan Lindsey, and now the Serninsea Ings Rural Dean, the Reverend Grant Trapp. The Diocesan, on seeing me, gave me a warm smile. Gosh. I had no idea he so supported me.

They all paused. Grant asked me, "Missed you with running after so many. Did you say, da di da: revealed in the Holy Scriptures and catholic creeds and stuff, da di da: historic formularies and all that about only our forms of service, you know, and also about obeying Bishop Derek, the other two, and so on including their successors?"

"Yes."

"Good enough for me."

"And me," said Derek Imperial. "Move on squad!"

Christine went to see John Barman. She'd sail through.

When Christine left her interview only some ten minutes on she came past me and chucked her white badge, with the black elephant and a white W on it, at me and it bounced off my cassocked chest.

"Hey!" I picked it up quickly.

"Listen. You have it. I'm done."

"What did he say?"

"Bye, Linda."

I grabbed my shoulder bag and ran after her: she was in a rush. She called back, "You don't know the half of it. He's in it for himself."

Christine banged the bell at the reception. "Phone!" She said, "You wait here: I'll get my luggage. Ten minutes."

I said, to the back of her head as she went, "I'm staggered. You can't tell me to go through with it and not do it yourself. Oy!"

I said to the arriving Sister Joan. "Christine is leaving. She wants her mobile phone."

"So it's not you again."

"No! The diocesan wants me ordained, and so does at least one suffragan."

Christine appeared with her suitcase, and shoulder bag and looked at the nun holding Christine's mobile phone. "Listen. He didn't care about where we went yesterday. Those Unitarians. His opposition was just a performance for the benefit of the others. To use the Osis lingo, Linda, you're watching the play and missing the stagecraft."

Christine took her mobile phone.

I followed her to her car. "I'm really sorry about this," I said, as she didn't look at me.

Anna Ozga was now behind me. She said, as Christine put her suitcase in the boot, "Of the two of you, we thought Linda here would have gone."

"Actually, the diocesan has a high opinion of me. Oh, Christine!"

Before she got in the car, she said, "All the best with tomorrow, Linda. Love you, a lot. Love God. Bye." She got in and drove off.

"Joined at the hip," Anna sneered. "Are you a lesbian as well?"

"Fuck off," I told her, very face to face, using my available Christian charity.

In my cell bedroom I was pulling at my hair with my hands. I gripped my brush; no I must leave my hair alone. What of the Confraternity now?

I missed her. Theosexual or not, she had taught me a lot. The night was just black in the cell bedroom. I was becoming full of doubt and worry.

My lack of deep sleep was why I could remember this dream on Sunday morning. The Bishop of Screddington took me to the apron of a theatre, jutting out into the audience, and stripped me naked, and told everyone to look. They were told, "She isn't even who she appears to be." I had to sit, legs apart, vagina exposed, and these lights were focussed right into me, the man directing the lights being the Bishop of Bolingbroke.

Screddington said, 'This woman is an actor. She is a fraud. She is wearing a mask for a body. She hasn't even got a cervix! Her breasts will never produce the milk we need. She fails to believe in sacred evacuating.'

Christine did not appear in my dream, but as I ran away from the theatre into a flat landscape with cut drains and raised banking, a naked redhead appeared with a canvas and said she would paint and then seduce me for the glory of God and that I would become, immediately, like her, a cosmic bishop. Except, I woke up at that point.

I started my preparations for submitting to ordination at the Cathedral.

Narrator: Keith Christine Coming? (Sunday Afternoon 30th June)

I had arrived outside the cathedral as a final act of supporting my wife. However, Terry Barman almost physically dragged me to meet up with Jim Wilson, Connie Wilson, Ken Osis, Jenny World and Fatima Tamuz (well attached to her young daughter Akemi).

He said, "Christine walked out. Unless she turns up, she won't become a priest. It's disastrous."

Connie asked whether she was receiving any calls, and whether she was at Wheaton, in London, at home in Ebbsfleet, or with parents in Rainham?" Terry did not know. Her phone was switched off and landlines did not find her. He said the woman recently acquired a helicopter and pilot.

I asked Bishop Terry what had happened, and he said he interviewed her and did get on to Confraternity matters. Christine told him that he was incompetent. She claimed that she had secured Linda, whereas he'd have lost her, seeking pleasure for himself, a charge he obviously denied.

So I said, "Linda is effectively recruited, then. The thing is, the last good sex we had showed me how tough she is, that if she resisted we'd really have to lay it on."

Jim Wilson said, "Indeed."

But Ken Osis said, "We shouldn't think on these lines if Christine had reported her secured. That means she's theosexual, Christosexual and Spiritsexual. We welcome her in."

At this point Maurice Neptune joined our huddle, as he'd come to see Linda get ordained.

The bishop told us that Christine had decided herself that she would mentor

Linda, whereas he'd said this was a decision for the bishops, and she knew it. Terry even thought that Christine might have poisoned Linda's mind against him. Christine had told him that he was a "buffoon" and his lecture was terrible, a display of ignorance. He'd courted the popularity of the mob against Linda, letting everyone attack her over a Unitarian chapel visit. Linda and Christine both concluded these chapels could not function successfully, but Linda was dangerously sympathetic. He knew Christine would help to secure Linda, which was why he'd wanted them together.

Jenny said that she would still like to keep her own distance from Linda.

Maurice asked if we had we ever thought of inviting Charley Darley into the Confraternity group? The trainee minister was a female to male transexual and could offer (unspecified) unique services. After all if he and (absent) Yojana could join, Charley Darley could be initiated.

Connie stated that Christine had become too big for her boots and that, as Linda was going shopping with herself, she'd test Linda's responses - especially if Christine did not return.

We nevertheless agreed that if Christine turned up now we would get her ordained. This had been the Confraternity bishops' decision. She might come at the last minute.

I also asked if we could now talk freely to Linda about the Confraternity and we could, to slowly introduce the participants.

It seemed that Christine had seduced Linda a number of times, so I said, "She'll have fallen for Christine like she did for Jonathan. She's like that."

Ken said we should not forget Linda's friend, Diana, but some of us thought he was wishing for his own pleasure: Diana de Groot had no management position and no position in any religion. Ken said, "I wasn't on Confraternity business when I saw them, and I object to being followed."

Bishop John then said, "You know that the Confraternity must come first."

The group dispersing, I met Linda, arriving with other women outside. She'd had her hair done, but was otherwise in a straightforward black cassock and collar - plus shoulder bag.

I welcomed her, gave her a kiss on her cheek, and said, moving her away from nearby people outside, "I hear that Christine Vine has disappeared. I hope she comes."

"So do I. You're an arsehole, Keith."

Asked why, she said I was a member of the Worshipful Company of Serninsea Theatrical Players, and that it was under the Confraternity. I agreed. She said that I could have asked her to join, knowing that she affirmed the body. I said it was not up to me; I was asked not to talent scout, as we called it.

"You have lied to me for years."

I told her that I had no choice about keeping silent.

"You lied to me about Cheryl, and you lied to me about screwing Yojana."

"I didn't lie to you; I didn't tell you. Yojana is in the group. She isn't here."

"I know, and you let Adam Magellan conclude you weren't screwing Yojana."

"I wasn't screwing her; she is, what we call, theosexual - and so am I. The Vanguard is the way forward, Linda."

"You lied about that! You led me to believe you'd lost interest in Church and theology. You stopped attending church and yet you're in this Vanguard!"

"I - we all - must protect the Vanguard group. Yes, it was a stance, not attending, but I couldn't raise Colin Cromer's suspicions too obviously in this direction. You know via sociology that vanguards are often secretive."

She said, "Superstitious authoritarianism - all the secret rituals. Well, Christine was going to mentor me. I do hope she turns up. Something's gone badly wrong, unless this is another scheme you know about."

"It's not a scheme. If she turns up, she will be ordained. Linda. I'll support you here. I support you personally, but mainly because you will be an asset for the Vanguard. You know that."

"Well, don't expect to fuck me just because I'd agree to join Christine. Some say Christine will come. Barman has said to some ordinands that she is stroppy and often comes back."

I responded that Christine often fails to obey authority.

"He's just responding to the mess to the ordinands. If the leadership is wrong, and she is right, the whole thing will be wrong. And I'm not sure I'll be interested."

I asked her not to say that. There are other men and women she'd enjoy, like the McPhails, but it is about service and sacrifice as no doubt Christine had told her. I said I did not have anything like the influence Christine has had. She had a lot of sex with you at the convent?"

"She's wonderful."

"Specifically theosexually, Christosexually, etcetera?" I asked.

"Christine has it all worked out. I agreed with her so I decided to join it - even if it includes shits like you."

"Christine is only one of us."

"I know that. It doesn't look like she's coming. Colin is coming: say hello."

Cheryl was keeping her distance from me, so that Linda and I were the visible couple. Linda gave a concealed low down wave in Cheryl's direction, and Adam Magellan was approaching Cheryl.

Narrator: Linda Ordination & After (Sunday Afternoon 30 June)

I told Keith outside the cathedral that he was an arsehole for conducting a marriage of lies, and I intended to join the Confraternity Vanguard, having had sex with Christine on a theosexual, Christosexual and Spiritsexual basis. Of course, I used this in part to conceal my personal warmth (or the hots, more like) for Christine. I saw Cheryl and Adam, keeping their distances, and I waved at each of them in a way Colin Cromer did not notice.

Colin Cromer welcomed us. He said to me, "It will be a wonderful experience because through ordination you will be transformed by the Holy Spirit and guided to be naturally more effective. I'll be around for photographs afterwards. But, on Monday, I'm off to the Lake District. I'm not going to miss out on my holiday."

"I won't do anything you wouldn't do," I assured him.

"No, you won't."

With him going in, Keith asked me about the interviews. "John Barman's was most unusual, knowing everything and praising my propriety in public; Julian Worsley was hostile; but Derek Imperial came in saying I'm just what is needed intellectually."

"Hope he survives the investigation and report, then. Oh, yeah: after you left Bever Wood, that Emily Symes turned up, and very unpleasant she was, and was going to report everything going on to your suffragan."

"I'll go over there and see Adam."

"Is that wise?" Keith asked. "I'll come with you."

So I walked over, with Keith, as others were walking in different directions outside pressing the flesh, so to speak. We were all using Mr., Mrs., and Ms for introductions in case anyone overheard us.

Adam said, "I've had an interesting conversation with Ms Mould out here about a certain trip I took to Harwich long ago, and Cheryl insists she never saw me, but..."

Cheryl said, "It's all worked out for the best."

I asked, "Is Peter Marshall present?"

"No and I didn't stop him from coming," said Adam.

I then asked, "Is Diana here. Keith?"

"No, and I didn't stop her from coming."

Then I heard a once familiar voice: "Oh - it is Adam, er Linda, and I recognise Cheryl Mould."

"Hello Jenny," said I. "And who is your friend?"

"This is Fatima Tamuuz, vicar of my parish, and Akemi is five. I have been her curate since ten years ago, after Judith Short."

Adam said, "Hello Jenny, after so very long."

"Hmm," she said. Jenny's eyes widened as she spoke to me, for the first time in years, "I've come down here to see Anna Ozga get ordained. Linda, you've been on some journey. I was told you were being ordained priest today."

"Yes. I have discovered a lot, lately. Is Christine coming?"

"I doubt it," Jenny said. "So why are you here, Adam?"

"For business and old friendship reasons."

"Are you a Christian then, now, Adam?"

"Er, no."

"That's a shame. I say that's a shame."

Adam said, "We discovered your whereabouts at Hartlepool after the bank robbery. You and this missing Christine were very brave."

There was a pause, and I could see Jenny's face crease.

Fatima said, "Jenny. Let's go inside and find a seat. Anna is probably inside. Be excited for her."

Jenny surprised me, really, when she suddenly said, "Right, well bye Adam, bye Linda, and perhaps you'll continue to leave me alone." And off they went.

"Oh dear," said Adam. "Some issues, I think."

"She had a funny turn there," I said.

Keith said, "Adam and Cheryl: do sit together in a corner inside."

I said, "Yes. Let's go in. My husband and I are going to join my colleagues."

In fact, both Keith and I went to the loos. Reunited, I asked Keith, "Why would Jenny know Anna Ozga?"

"She was a lesbian charismatic who saw the error of her ways, so Jenny leaned on her. Anna has retained her behavioural rigidity, while Jenny has definitely lost hers. They've kept in touch but you still raise Jenny's hackles. Anna is exactly the kind of person we cannot attract into the Vanguard. Ah, there's Ken, Linda."

Kenneth Osis was approaching the seating for Serninsea Ings deanery clergy. He nodded acknowledgement.

Hey, there at the very back row was Charley Darley, the Unitarian. He waved across and shouted "Hia!" in his almost falsetto-sounding voice.

"Hello, what are you doing here?" I called over, and I left Keith to make my way to Charley.

"How could I resist this spectacle after your visit?"

"Have you come to tell me I'm doing wrong?"

"Far from it. Go for it."

"Christine, whom you saw, has walked out. She won't be here I don't suppose. We got into a lot of trouble over visiting you and reporting back. They said I was sounding like what you sound like. I mean in content, not pitch."

He smiled and then said, "I thought I had seen Christine here, but I'm not great for faces. My voice pitch has deepened, and is dropping."

As I returned to find Keith I saw - no, surely not - Dyfed. It was. And Lucinda? Really? I waved; I smiled. I called over: "Hey, you two came here! All the way over! That's fantastic. I'll see you after. I have to join my colleagues."

That was so pleasing, I thought. Reconciliation? When back to me, Keith was grumbling something. Colin was about to sit nearby, but when passing he asked me, "What is that Adam Magellan doing here?"

"I don't know. Sitting with a female friend, I think."

"I know Cheryl Mould. Something funny's going on here. I don't know. Just... just get on with the ordination."

I was in place. Up front there were dignitaries. One was the Mayor of Wytham, the Tory Candida Hayes. (I thought of Giant Haystacks!) There were three Members of Parliament: Stephen James Davidson, Tory MP for Serninsea and Eastern Foss, Paula Mason, Liberal Democrat MP for Wytham City, and Geoffrey Hindley, Tory MP for Eslaforde. I recognised Gethin Layne, Serninsea Councillor. We also had the aristocrat Lord John Scott of Pedwardine. Judge George Thomas of Wytham was present. Of course there were the suffragan bishops, and the diocesan who'd so given me his approval, and they were being assisted by Bishop Meela Geels of the Old Catholics in the Netherlands. Oh good, our ordinations were underlined as valid (ha ha).

I wanted to let the service work upon me, if it could. The Common Liturgy for Ordinations started. I forgot distractions, including Adam's presence; I cleared the mind; I danced with the music.

The Netherlands bishop gave the sermon, with a single sheet of paper, but in a proper controlled English that we Anglicans like to develop, though her accent was hard to follow:

"People will only want to know what you know when they know that you care. Every relationship should be based on trust, and this means pastoral care, person management, shanging things.

"Don't forget to say sorry and thank you to others at appropriate points and yourself. People like that and it helps develop trust.

"But don't go in just shanging things. When you get your new place, look at the worship and embed in that worship, and schange only slowly.

"The vision for the parish is in the congregation as it stands, as it develops. Don't impose one. Rather, identify what it is and make it explicit. That's ministry."

Her advice was not to concentrate on the minority who do most of the work: everyone deserves attention, the least getting most. Get friendship outside the congregation, away from the concerns within. Find someone to discuss reactions to the strains and stresses, keeping confidences. Keep the family close and take exercise.

I wondered if this sermon from Meela Geels was a repeat from one given to those who became deacons.

Nevertheless, I was somewhat swept up in the greater liturgy. And when it was my turn, with hands laid on my head, I did somehow feel a shiver down my back to my rear.

It was significant. I had been changed, and I smiled like the others. I let myself enjoy what had happened, once it had happened.

That feeling maintained itself and I tried to let it grab hold of my mind. I tried not to label it but I still thought, this must be the Holy Spirit. Indeed, I no longer believed nothing.

So the music and procession afterwards was a joyous moment to share; I was now a priest.

And afterwards there were photographs taken outside by a roaming photographer: of Colin Cromer the training incumbent and me, and then of Keith alongside us, and then the unusually unsmelly Bishop of Bolingbroke, John Terence Barman, making four of us, as this bishop moved around. There were more pictures with my various priestly retreat colleagues.

I also got Cheryl to take a quick picture of Adam with me, and then scarpered. I noticed Colin leaving altogether, surely the first to go.

Bishop John Barman reappeared; he told Keith and me that I would be expected at the diocesan's lecture at the University Chaplaincy's Annual theology Lecture. Upon his rapid departure I shook my boutique-improved hair and I thought that the absence of desire for my brush was some sort of sign and miracle.

Jenny, with Fatima outside, said to me, "It's a different life now; you and I are both properly dedicated to Jesus Christ. Is that not right? Anna!"

"Yes, that is right. Can I see you? I'll travel. I'd love to find out what you've been doing and I can tell you about my road to here."

She paused. "Yes, I suppose so. Anna!"

"That would be so good," I said. "Do look after yourself." Anna approached. I said, "Well done, Anna. It was good."

"Hope you enjoyed it, Linda. Jenny, Fatima, please come and see my folks."

Looking behind me, I returned to Keith now some yards away. The diocesan Bishop of Wytham, Derek Imperial, came and shook my hand and Keith's, "Well done Mrs. er em Jupitas, and do not forget my lecture at the Chaplaincy on the main campus, you know. I'm going to be talking about Christian expression and bodily movement. John wanted me to tackle this. You're the theological woman, yes, and I really want you to be there."

So a photograph was taken of us three by the roaming photographer. I wondered about my own impending bodily movement but I wasn't desperate (another miracle?) and it could wait until later.

Emerging out of the milling crowd, Lucinda appeared, with Dyfed just behind her. "He persuaded me to come, now you've become a nun. Oh, hello Keith; still with her then?"

"I'm not a nun," I said. "I'm so pleased to see you two, really pleased. Especially you, sister. We really ought to - well, we haven't always got on have we?"

"I'm not the sister: you are," Lucinda joked.

Keith remained silent.

Dyfed said, "We've looked around Serninsea. Saw the farm as well. Da iawn, isn't it. We've got to gyrru back," he said."

"Hurry back?" I asked.

"Yes," said Lucinda.

"Drive back," he said. "Yfory (pronounced 'uhvory') - tomorrow - I'd prefer, though we've stayed overnight already. The receptionist said Luce looked just like somebody she knows - how about that, isn't it?"

"I'm presiding first time, this evening. Come to the service."

"Byddwn mynd." He nodded.

Lucinda said she and he would like to look at the cathedral itself. Keith then wandered off alone at some speed as I noticed Connie Wilson approaching. I wondered if that was significant at all.

She said, "Reverend Linda, what a wonderful day for you, and we must, we really must, get together for shopping and there's so much we can do together now."

I noticed that badge on her, first time I'd seen it, as ever half concealed, but now I knew what it meant. I'd probably get my own.

"You're wearing that badge."

"I am. Now did you have a good retreat?"

"A lot of time spent with Christine. Very thoughtful."

"Yes, but you may have to forget her. The group may have to neutralise her."

"Neutralise?"

"She is the source of some conflict. I will be in touch. I must find Ken Osis for a one-to-one."

I remembered that she had 'relations' with him. As for Christine, I thought that when people leave the equivalent of vanguard groups they do get airbrushed out at best.

"Oh, Rabbi," I said, as Keith came back to me with him.

"Maurice Neptune," Keith stated. "I rushed off because I thought he was leaving."

The Rabbi said, "But let me say well done Reverend Jupitas."

Keith said, "The rabbi here told us in SMS about mathematics via the Muslims and the Jews, don't you know, and where numbers come from after the Roman system."

I said, "From the Hindus and via the Arabs."

Maurice agreed: "And the Jews too. They lived in Arab and Muslim places."

"And supposedly heretical Christians, in those lands," I added. "They were allowed to be scribes and to do some interpretation."

"Look at them," said Maurice, as Charley Darley now came along. Maurice was referring to Connie Wilson talking to the Reverend Osis, almost as if she was laying the law down.

"Worrying," said Keith.

Charley said, "I'm going now. All the very best. We might invite you to preach, if you're allowed."

Maurice said, "I might ask her to preach as well."

"Thank you for coming, Charley," I said.

"Corrosive, those Unitarians," said Keith. "I don't think Connie was too pleased about Ken joining Diana and you. Diana kept away today."

I was now staring at Connie and Ken; Ken noticed me looking and he then walked away from Connie rather rapidly.

I said, "Kenneth does seem unhappy."

"She's a bit strong for him," said Maurice. "But you and me - we met so briefly before. I'm sure that our theologies are mutually beneficial. I'd meet you personally as well as the group thing - you've no objection, Keith?"

"Not any more. Time to go home."

Maurice left, and Keith and I left the cathedral car park in my car.

Something was wrong within the group under the Confraternity, I thought, and not just over Christine. Perhaps Ken had upset some of them. I decided to see how the land lies. There was also the parish to consider, in that so far it had not been exactly brilliant there.

The New Normal?

I pulled into a lay-by on the road out of Wytham. Adam Magellan drove in behind us in Keith's car. "Back to fully comp now," Adam said to Keith. So I had Adam as my passenger and Keith was back with Cheryl. In another car was Lucinda driving with Dyfed.

"Amazing. He hates my guts but practicality wins against all."

So what could I tell Adam about the Confraternity? Not much. So I said this, "That group I was investigating, with the badges and all that. Well, I got to find out all about it at the retreat, so I am no longer investigating it any more, and so you don't need to help me. But thanks for what you've done."

He said, "All I did was throw some confusion in George Wickenby's direction. George got his own back, telling Diana not to go to the cathedral."

"I'm not happy about that at all."

"Do you want to know what happened?"

"Go on."

"While on your retreat she received note with a message through her door and the name 'Channing' alongside it. So she realised it was a grid reference in the text, like I'd done with you, and took a trip and found a chalk mark and a package and placed a pin. She came back with this new note, entered the enclosed web address, and retrieved an online message. This is what she printed out."

'Channing' deciphered it.

Christine Vine has been making love to Linda Jupitas several times on retreat, successfully, and Linda will join the Worshipful Company of Serninsea Theatrical Players. The orgasm is the supreme revelation sign from God. Ken Osis will make love to her often. Do not go to the cathedral ordinations.

"George Wickenby was playing games?"

"Yep, it was him. Retaliation against me, really. She passed it all to me, so I thought I would go along. So you are fine now about being followed?"

"Not really. They were checking me out. They won't be doing it any more."

"Why? Because you have indeed joined it?"

"Not necessarily that."

"Ah, Linda, the 'not necessarily' answer. I thought at first that he was making it up. Have you joined it?"

"If I had I could not say, but the answer is no. I have not."

"And will you join it?"

"I refer to the answer I gave some moments ago."

"Very good politician's answer. So one of your deacons was missing, the very woman herself."

"Yes."

"The other brave one in the bank robbery."

"Yes."

"You can slow down a little, Linda. So I noticed you were looking out for her, and she didn't come. She was at your retreat. She had sex with you in reality, then."

"How did you get to Wytham, Adam?"

"With Keith and Cheryl. He could have brought Diana. They were going to drive to the cathedral from their holidaying, but Cheryl wanted to see her mother. I was contacted so that Keith could demonstrate to Cheryl that he and you were splitting."

"I see."

"To return to my curiosity: I think this Christine persuaded you to join this group, although you have yet to do it, but you are concerned that, well, either she has walked out or they've excluded her."

"She walked out at the retreat after a bad interview, Adam. Are you investigating me now?"

"No, just curious. So that was enough for her not to get ordained at all, whereas it wasn't enough for you not to get ordained. Because you were a bit doubtful when you went."

"I was, yes. But enough people - including the diocesan bishop no less - wanted me to be ordained priest."

"So this Christine was getting ordained simply in order to function in this group. Therefore, being a priest must be important. Because she is secular in her money making: she buys property from Ann and Labhaoise to rent out, and what is really weird is that she is some sort of escort."

"Yes, she is, Adam, so perhaps she is going to stick to the day job. She is - or was - based at Wheaton, which is a set-up that gives - or gave - herself some space from the town evangelicals at Eslaforde."

"How did your holiday go? I suppose you weren't followed there."

"If they did they were wasting their time. The farm is isolated. I left a day early and stayed at Bever Wood Naturist Centre. And who should be there but Keith and Cheryl, and indeed Jeremy Symes and Lindy Peacock. Fortunately I missed Emily, his wife, who went there afterwards and created a stink."

"The news is that he is suspended."

"It is a mutual agreement; suspending is far more complicated than that."

"He is mutually suspended whereas you are not: indeed, you've gone up a peg or three."

"Yeah, well you and I are discreet, Adam, and now I am 'up a peg or three' Keith can do as he wants and I will do as I want - with you.

"There's a lay-by there, Adam, and woodland. I need to be like a bear. I'm sorry, but I still have inadequate resistance when nature calls."

"What?"

"What do bears do in the woods, Adam? I've got kitchen roll in the boot."

"I'll wait. No, I need a piss myself. Saw you two go and we missed going to the loo."

So Adam was 'up-wind' and I could see his golden arc. He finished, made a shake, put it away, zipped up, looked at me with my arse out mid-process, and he went back to wait. I carried back a lot of used kitchen roll.

Back in the car and driving off, he said, "Say this group, that you may or may not join, has an opinion on you and me, given that Barman doesn't like me and Colin Cromer definitely doesn't, who has precedence? The group, or you with me?"

"It does not necessarily follow. It's hypothetical. I couple as I please."

You're good, you are, Linda. You really are. That spot was still there, I noticed, but might be going down a bit."

He had no more to ask me about the group, and we were in relative silence nearer town.

After some five flushes down the bog, before the others arrived, the time available at my curate's house was limited, because an evening Communion would follow, the first one with me presiding, and where someone else would express my doctrinal commitment.

Over rapid drinks, with Adam, Lucinda, Dyfed and Cheryl, Keith announced: "I have news. I have a job soon starting in Felixstowe. It's a sideways move, not promotion, but it is what I want."

"Of course," I said. "Perhaps you will be promoted later. Good news isn't it, Cheryl?"

"Yes. And with me expecting - we are expecting, everyone."

I asked Keith if he would see the day out. "Are you observing me this evening?"

"No. So the other news, everyone, is that Linda and I are now separating. Cheryl and I will be in the second bedroom. I'm afraid, if you two are staying here, Lucinda and Dyfed, it'll have to be the small bedroom. Either that or it has to be a bed and breakfast. I know a good place by the coast a little north of here."

I thought, hang on, this is my house, but he was ordering the bedrooms!

"We are already staying there," said Lucinda. "Marsh Coast Maa Skelter Guest House."

"Linda: I have an increased number of visits down to Harwich and then it's a permanent move to Felixstowe. Afterwards I could be coming up here from time to time for contact reasons. Would you then want me to use a hotel?"

"No. You can bring Cheryl."

Cheryl said, "Again, you are very kind - a true Christian."

He said, "Sometimes I might be coming up on my own, so I could stay in a bed and breakfast." "Bring Cheryl," I said. "There is always room." I knew what he was coming for - the group - and it meant he would be concealing from Cheryl and lying to her from now on.

"I'm so pleased, Linda," Cheryl said, "that you've been so friendly, you know, starting with your overnight stay at the club. Emily was terrible. I never remember you getting angry at anything. Keith, you don't either."

I said, "As for the church, Colin Cromer will have to adjust to Adam as my partner. Now, there could be quite a crowd there this evening, so I am going to have to go early. Colin will have arrived back from Wytham earlier, so there is some preparation over there."

"We're coming," said Dyfed.

"Really? You surprise me," I said.

"Oh I can't miss this," said Lucinda. "Coming to see you do your magic tricks."

"I'm staying here, like Keith and Cheryl," Adam said, and Keith patted Cheryl's backside.

"Who's preaching?" Lucinda asked. "You?"

"We've got in a Lay Reader from a nearby deanery."

"Pity."

"Colin is off on his longer holiday early Monday and wasn't doing it; I have been busy, obviously. Presiding is the gig. So, come in my car, Luce, Dyfed, and let's go."

Lucinda said, "Dyfed can drive; we'll go in fifteen or twenty minutes and sit at the back."

"I'll go alone, then."

First Presiding (Sunday Evening 30th June)

Peter Marshall was in the evening congregation and took this opportunity to congratulate me, and I directed him to sit with my elder sister and her husband once they had arrived.

I expected another rise of inner enthusiasm. This service, to celebrate me becoming a priest, had a sermon by this known evangelical chap Colin Titan. Colin Cromer and I sat alongside each other on the choir stalls listening. The Rural Dean, the Reverend Grant Trapp, sat opposite us.

After his Trinity loyalty bit, Colin Titan began, using no notes at all. "Let's be clear: the Creator God in my life is as real as the people I meet. Non-Christians make the mistake that just because they haven't experienced the work of the Holy Spirit, they think that God isn't real - but it is they who are missing out because they don't want Him. Yet they need Him. How to receive Him? Read the Bible."

"The truthfulness of the Bible is objective. Unlike the subjective, postmodern humanists' and atheists' notion of 'truth', the Bible gives actual knowledge. The Creator God sent His supernatural guidelines into human nature: there is the good and the bad. Yes, it is binary."

"And the ugly," I muttered, with Colin tapping my nearside left leg on my cassock.

"This is why the anti-Christian woke theological lefties hate Christians so much: we have the objective reality to live by and they cannot dilute or explain it away with their fake 'truths' in the plural. The Bible is the measure to determine, yes, in the binary sense: right from wrong, good from bad, moral from immoral, love from lust. This is distinct from all relativity and situation ethics."

What bee was in his bonnet? I wondered.

"Therefore human marriage reflects the spiritual marriage between Jesus Christ (the Bridegroom) and the Church (the Bride). Changing marriage from solely between a man and a woman, to man with man or woman with woman, breaks the guiding symbolism of the marriage between Jesus Christ and the Church. Of course it is a complete abomination to think that Jesus would dump the Church and marry another Christ (as if there was one), or if the Church, if it could ever would dump the Christ, to marry another Church (as if there was one)."

I could now see where this was going.

"Biblical Christians, meaning Christians after all, can therefore make no alteration than having a one man with one woman marriage. Even transgender marriages are excluded, because that's like Jesus pretending he is the Church or the Church pretending that she is Jesus. It makes a mockery of marriage.

"God then has the authority to do what He wants with creation and this is what He wanted: He laid out his rules for living. We should therefore never be ashamed of our faith in God and our trust in God's Word, the Bible. In contrast, human reason is a disaster, evidenced by its shameful mockery, put-downs or intimidation of biblical Christians. Homosexuality is a blatant act of defiance to the Creator God along with human-reasoned evolution theory, the big bang theory, One World Order, world peace humanism and climate change, and then all the other constructions they call religions, and their denials of true religion. God warns us about ignoring Him and leaving his narrow path, and yet He displays great pity on those who rebel against Him: thus the charitable words: 'Father forgive them, for they know not what they do.' Given the world-wide ignorance and sheer defiance of God's Word, you'd think He would want to destroy us, but we are allowed to carry on and show our worst.

"But a mention here, that our new priest here, still the curate of course, did know what she did earlier today: she has, as a priest, within the enveloping consummation of the Church, married Christ, and has, for all eternity, given her life to Christ."

(This sent a shiver down my spine, and it was cold.)

"When a man says, 'I don't believe the Bible...!', he, in his defiance, believes in something else. Everyone believes in something. Secularists must have faith in where their false ideology will lead. There is but one authority leading to salvation, and it is represented in the Church, the very bride of Christ, collectively, for which Linda Jupitas here is forever an embedded representative, and now Christ is her lover, partner and friend, and she will obey whatever he wants from her. Amen!"

Why was I associating with this utter bilge?

"Bit of a robust view there," Colin Cromer said to me, as this chap descended from the pulpit.

"I am appalled," I said.

"Freedom of views," he said. "We don't often get it quite said like that."

"Colin, it is not acceptable."

"Yes," he said louder towards the Rural Dean.

What normally follows the sermon is the creed. But before this came my specific declaration for the home church.

I stood facing the few faithful and my visitors, and the Rural Dean alongside me said, "Your curate Linda has been examined and found to be of godly life and sound learning, and she has duly taken the oath of allegiance to the Sovereign and the oath of canonical obedience to the diocesan Bishop." (He didn't add the suffragans!) "She has affirmed and declared her belief in 'the faith which is revealed in the Holy Scriptures and set forth in the catholic creeds and to which the historic formularies of the National Church bears witness'."

Yes, but not belief in the crap this bloke had just spouted.

Presiding at the Eucharist was something I only could think about for a year. Now I was doing it. I did ask: "Can everyone hear me?"

I heard someone say, "No and we don't want to." The entertaining ones always choose their moment. As a female I was told to expect some negativity. However, I gave the liturgy of the binding ritual, and this Lay Reader received his just like anyone else.

And then there were refreshments, at the bells end of the church, with the congregation, with me pressing the flesh, so to speak.

Dyfed said he was looking to enjoy some brief visits to places on the extended route back to Wales tomorrow. Then he asked, "Is yours like a tied house then?"

"Yes, for all the time I am here."

"We're lucky about the farm and the annexe house we have," said Dyfed.

Then Lucinda said, "We've come here - you wanted to, Dyfed - to see how you fit in with such as that utter shite in that sermon."

"I'm so sorry. It was appalling and I promise you it's rare and of course I never say anything like it."

"Ah, did I hear sermon criticism?" asked a voice, that of Colin Titan. "I'm always interested in comments about my sermons," he said.

Lucinda wasn't out to offer criticism. I know my sister. She was going to tear him to pieces. "Ah, how to be ignorant," my sister told him. "All what you said is predicated on clear, binary, sex differences."

"Indeed it is," he said. "God introduced them."

Colin Cromer was now coming nearby.

"Well, I was born genetically male," Lucinda said directly at him, "but the androgens which make you have active testosterone and thus make you male weren't recognised in my body. So I am female and I did marry as female."

"That's simple," he said, "you are a man."

"Have you seen the size of my tits?" she said at him, pushing them as Les Dawson once did when playing Cissie.

"It's like being a transsexual," he said.

"I am not transsexual. I haven't had to do the slightest thing to look the way I am. Furthermore, if I had Swyer syndrome, the other way to have male chromosomes and become female, I could even take tablets and have a baby."

"So you can't then?"

"I can't. It's like a hot water tap without a boiler."

"So you are a man," he said.

"That hot water tap is my c..."

"Colin Titan isn't it," I said rapidly to him, merging the cs. "You are biblically misinformed anyway, as well as offensive."

He said, "The truth cannot be offensive. And I know my Bible."

"And so do I," I said, "especially on this. So the Genesis binary pattern on which you depend does not hold up. And do you know why? Because rabbis circumcised infants and would find some who were of in-between sexes, even when they knew nothing about producing females when their genetic origins are male. Isaiah says he'll give houseroom even to eunuchs, better than sons and daughters: an everlasting name which - joke - will not be cut off."

Lucinda said, "Yeah, some others are inbetweeners."

"Still male then," he said.

"Not what Jesus said," I stated, drawing the usual trump card out of the pack. "In Matthew he says something like, 'Not everyone can receive this saying, but only those to whom it is given. For there are eunuchs who have been so from birth, and there are eunuchs who have been made eunuchs by people, and there are eunuchs who have made themselves eunuchs for the sake of the kingdom of heaven.' So only those who can receive the binary teaching actually receive it."

"All that means," he said, "is that some are incapable of marriage because they have congenital defects; others because they have injury or restrictions imposed on them by surgeons and the like. But there are others who don't do marriage for the higher service of God, as Paul states in his first letter to the Corinthians."

"Not at all," I said, pointing my finger. "It is a statement by Rabbi Jesus in a time of limited knowledge that there are others around than the male and female of Genesis - that some are born this way, some become this way, and some do it in order to give devoted service."

Colin Cromer said, "I think this is for a discussion group."

"No, Colin," I said. "This man has made offensive ignorant remarks in a public space and he isn't being informed by his own sources to correct his own prejudice."

"But we don't make this into a public spectacle," said Colin.

My sister then said at Colin, "Your failure to correct him is exactly why your institution is going down the plughole. He is ignorant to the facts. I couldn't care less whether it is in the Bible or not. He is just ignorant."

"Far from it," the preacher said. "You have made my case. Neither you nor our new priest here believes in the Bible, the only source of truth."

Colin Cromer said, "Er..."

I said at him, "It's half-ignorant itself! It is not a medical guidebook."

Colin Titan said, "I suppose," he said, "it is not a history book or science book either."

"No it is not," I said.

Colin my boss said, "This conversation has to stop now."

This other Colin said, "It is the original, the only, the complete, the reliable, source of truth."

Colin my boss then said, "This conversation must stop here! It is becoming over-heated. You are all entitled to your opinions."

Then Lucinda said, "But he is not entitled to be offensive to me and those like me on the basis of misinformation. I am not a man; no one would ever regard me as a man, and long before anything regarding transgenders and birth certificates, anyone born like me would be counted as female. And he offends my marriage, which is here to my husband Dyfed."

"Only by appearance," said the fundamentalist. "And did anything Jesus say contradict Genesis?"

"So what?" I asked. "Why would he?"

Colin Cromer said to Lucinda - so naively, "I'm sure the offence wasn't meant."

"He keeps calling me a man," she responded. "This is offensive now, and proves it was offensive when he said it from that wooden box. He has attacked what is a heterosexual marriage, one that your Church in its prejudice recognises."

Colin Cromer then said, "Look, we are becoming a spectacle. This is supposed to be a day of celebration for Linda here, having presided at her first Eucharist, everyone having been told by the Rural Dean that she is of godly living."

The Rural Dean, Grant Trapp, came along and said, "Linda, you should obey your senior priest here, and you are both representatives of the bishop."

Lucinda then said, "But I do not have to obey some purple-head. This man is an ignorant git. I have the female phenotype, even if I have male chromosomes."

"God's reproductive mechanism," said the Lay Reader. "Male and female, and binary."

I said, "There were no amphibians mentioned in the Bible, never mind no dinosaurs."

"Oh I think there were," said Colin Titan. "Dragons?"

"I must... I must go," said the Rural Dean, acting like a coward, and he headed for the vestry.

Colin Cromer then said, "I insist now as Vicar of this parish that this conversation comes to the end. Mr. Titan, you are a Lay Reader and you preach in this church on my say-so and that of the bishops. I shall report back on this episode to at least the Bishop of Bolingbroke. I want a copy of your sermon, in whatever form, and I'll also want a word with you, Linda. And, may I say, positively, your sister, is very..."

"And her husband," I added. "Husband according to the old rules."

"Yes, well my point is that you are both welcome in my church, in my bishop's church."

"Well that's not good enough," said Lucinda, "because the welcome has to be demonstrated."

Then Colin Titan said to me, "I wonder if you two are the same; I suppose being a male priest could be some compensation."

My mouth was open.

Colin Cromer now said, "That's it. Please leave, Mr. Titan, at the earliest opportunity. Collect your things, and leave immediately. I will have the bishop contact you in due course. I insist upon it."

And thus he we watched him disappear down to the vestry and presumably use its door out.

Lucinda said to me, about to leave, "I'll see you later."

Colin said, "Stop a minute, Mrs. er..."

"Cadwaladr," I said.

"No," she said. "Come on Dyfed. We'll wait for the creature of this church to return to her temporary home."

There was soon some arguing happening outside as we shook some hands. "Stay," said Colin Cromer to me, who went out to the arguing between Mr. Titan and Mrs. Cadwaladr in the street.

With the disputing parties broken up, Colin Cromer then returned and, waving at others inside, ordered me to the vestry and shut the door.

"Even if she is your sister - and definitely not your brother - you must guard against creating a public spectacle. One of our tasks is to smooth the waves."

"Ugh," I said to my immediate boss.

"When do they go home?"

"My sister and her husband are staying overnight at a bed and breakfast."

"Look," he said. "Other than this, it's been a good day. I'm proud of you. You looked good at the cathedral. But something is missing tonight. Or, rather, someone."

"Go on."

"Your husband, Mr. Jupitas."

"Because, actually," I said with some bite, "he is walking out on me."

"Well, he's not exactly been here much."

"He was reducing his attendance before. Now he is leaving me."

"This town is not some vacuum, you know," said Colin Cromer. "The woman at Wytham cathedral was Cheryl Mould and is in fact your husband's lover."

"Yeah."

"You seemed and seem remarkably cool about it all. Presumably because Adam Magellan was there, and he is still your lover."

"I have not been with him recently. Go on."

"Linda. We are not fools. You have been on such thin ice there is every probability that you will fall through it. But, I do praise your sisterly solidarity. Oh, go home: we can have a staff meeting about all this later."

"It is not simply solidarity: I am the same as her. I have exactly the same variation."

"Really? Gosh. I'm so sorry."

"I am not sorry at all. But I would ask you, because of exactly the sort of prejudice just seen, not to spread this information to anyone else. Not even the bishop - especially not the bishop."

"No. I won't. Gosh. Have you ever been counselled?"

"Colin, I do not need to be counselled. I am male genotype, female phenotype, female gender, and bisexual."

"Bi... sexual. And your sister?"

"Heterosexual. Probably."

"I don't know what to say."

"Try and say nothing, Colin."

"I won't have him back. So you could have been born male."

"Colin: only if the androgens had been recognised. I have a younger sister, who is female across the board."

"Could you, say, fall in love with a woman as you presumably have with a man?"

"Yes."

"So, as a naturist, you are tempted..."

"Colin, please. Heterosexual naturists still mix with the other sex. I fall in love with those I fancy and make a relationship when they also fancy me."

"But do they know about your male genes?"

"All they have to know is that I cannot have children like Lucinda. They will get to know that I have no periods."

"Oh, em..."

"They will get to realise that I have no body hair other than on my head. I very rarely smell when I am sweaty. I have undescended testicles, Colin."

"Do I need to know all this?"

"Lucinda had hers removed and is on HRT all her life. I won't have a menopause. Anything else you'd like to know?"

"Nothing. And I should reassure you that the bishop has no right to know this. Please now tell your sister that she was very brave to tackle Colin Titan. In fact I will want him off the preaching circuit in the Serninsea Ings deanery. Em... Have your usual day off tomorrow even though I'm off on my proper holidays and you have to hold the fort. Just be around in case of emergencies." He locked the vestry door.

Heading for the front door I said, "I won't leave town."

"Yes, but try not to empty the church. See, I do need a break and, by the way, I'll be thinking about my own future."

I drove home rather angry, and then tried to change mood arriving at the front door.

Lucinda Confronts Linda

When I arrived home, not only were Lucinda and Dyfed back to join Keith and Cheryl, but Keith had let in Diana and Patricia. He distributed wine and juices. Adam was not there.

I was angry. So I whipped off my collar and cassock and sat down among the rest. "Deal with it," I said. "Where is Adam?"

Keith said, "He left. He'll talk to you later. Diana and Lucinda looked at me and each other.

I asked, "Can I have some support, Diana? I hear they've been playing games with you. I wanted you - and Patricia - at the ordination and you were told to stay away."

"Others join Linda and me?" Diana asked, as she started unbuttoning.

Lucinda said, "I suppose we should clag," and followed on.

Cheryl looked at Keith. Cheryl pulled off her clothes. Dyfed followed on but Keith did not.

"I'm quite capable of being like this alone," said Patricia to Diana. Or with Keith."

"I'm just showing my male body," said my sister to me, "according to your joke of a preacher. My tits are bigger than yours."

"Well, he'd say it's because of the drugs."

"I'm not sure that is a very pleasant thing to say. No wonder Adam has gone," Lucinda said.

"Well, why has Adam gone?"

Keith said, "He went after a certain identifying conversation happened. He didn't give a reason."

Lucinda said, "I'm not hiding my identity from him or anyone."

"Well, Diana? Are you going to walk out? In May we discussed my features - nearly all the same as Lucinda's.

"I looked up the possibilities, intersex being one. Perhaps your sister is more forthright."

"Well, well done Luce for standing up to the lay reader. He deserved everything you said. Just to say, he'll be barred from our church in future, and it looks likely the bishop will discipline him. But what did you say here to everyone?"

"That you stopped me telling the cunt that I have a cunt."

"I still don't see why Adam left."

Diana said, "Because he's a chicken. Lucinda told us everything."

I went to the kitchen to prepare something salad-based for everyone to eat. In there I called Adam and told him to bloody well get himself back to the house. He agreed, but wanted to talk to me afterwards. I went back in the lounge with eats to add to a now naked Keith's drinks.

"What we want to know about," said clothed Patricia, "is what you believe now, Linda? You were so doubtful before you went."

"I think I'm happy, other than about the idiot who preached here."

"So what happened to you before tonight?" asked Diana. "I'm talking about nearly two weeks."

"No more than I went to the farm, stayed at the annexe while Luce was away, had a problem boil on my bum dealt with - it's improved as you can see, went to Bever Wood, met Keith and Cheryl there unexpectedly, and others, and then went directly to the retreat, where I passed two rather examining interviews, and a rather friendly and purposeful colleague walked out."

"I obviously read about Bever Wood," said Diana. "Tell us about these final interviews."

"Well, I can't really, other than one bishop's interview was a bit strange and the other hostile, but the diocesan coming in made clear his approval of me and my theological approaches."

"Ah, all that sophistication," said Diana. "So which bishop was strange? Presumably the one we see around here."

"Strange in the sense that he could have been usefully employed by the former East German Stasi."

I collected some glasses for the kitchen and Dyfed followed me in and asked me, "I've come for a better look at your bottom."

"The witch hazel gel helped but I have a few old antibiotics here. If it doesn't clear up completely then it will be evidence of a bad time."

Lucinda came in saying, " Don't prepare anything more. Dyfed bursting your boil with a boiled, flamed, needle was a very silly thing to do."

"It has lost all its anger now," I said. "Unlike me." There was a ring at the door. I said, "Let him in, someone."

Patricia went to the door, and Adam came in with Peter Marshall, accompanied by Kathryn and Kathleen Wickenby.

We three relatives made our way out of the kitchen and already both Kath's were stripping. "We have done modelling. He's a chicken," said one of them.

"Like his boss," said the other Kath.

Keith puzzled people by saying, "Many eggs could be laid here."

I said to Adam and Peter, "If Keith can do it, so can you two. Come on, it's not as if this is some orgy."

So Peter joined in, assisted enthusiastically by a twin, but Adam dismissed the aid of the other twin.

There was a desire abroad for a much bigger Chinese meal. It was fine by me. The orders were made. People still had the salad.

Dyfed said, "You've got a casino here, haven't you?"

"Yes."

"I've missed the chance to see inside it, probably."

Peter said, hands clasping his genitals, "It operates a bit irregularly, I gather. There's an upstairs too."

Keith said, "The upstairs is closed off but the downstairs opens throughout summer."

"Just looking for some ideas for my new premises in town," Dyfed added.

"I hope you don't introduce gambling," I responded.

"Just peripheral things, perhaps, with a cafe: a place to read and use a computer."

Diana asked me to go back in the kitchen. "Did a woman ordinand made love to you several times?"

I explained that the note she decrypted was accurate, accidentally or otherwise; Adam's rival George Wickenby was getting his own back.

"This was in a convent?"

"A cenobium. Yes, we made love - in a nearby church as well, on the altar table."

"You don't exactly do things by halves, do you?"

"But she's run off and this group has a dark side."

"Adam's learnt himself that this decrypted note seems to be true."

"Look, I haven't signed on the dotted line. I need to investigate this group further: about why Christine ran off, and where is she now, how many groups are there..."

"It said why - orgasms with divine messages or something bizarre like that."

"The ecstatic in religion, really. But it's all been news to me; and consider that Colin Cromer is in constant touch with this bishop, and Colin hasn't got a clue."

"So they deceive people."

"That is worrying, yes. Secret and ritualistic."

"I'm going to mingle again. Linda, you stretch people, like your real friends, to the limit."

"I don't see why you should be offended. You've denied me over and over again."

"Fuck off, Linda."

Back in the lounge the Wickenby twins were unsure what had happened to Barman's great location advert, as they saw it, the Serninsea Cross brooch. The Cambridge lab had not received it and therefore had not tested its Anglo-Saxon credentials. Anyway, after much chit-chat we ate Chinese dishes. Somehow we girls got grease and soy sauce on our tits and then were a bit deliberate about it.

But soon the twins wiped their fronts, and with Peter returned to their textiles - and they left.

Patricia went. Diana decided to go, dressing in front of me in the hallway. "So it's Complete Androgen Insensitivity Syndrome."

"Yes. Perhaps the Holy Spirit worked through the appalling preacher we had to release the truth."

"You believe that crap now?"

"Good that I can. Bye."

Those who remained after the departures were Keith with Cheryl, Lucinda with Dyfed, and Adam with me.

"I feel all alone now," said clothed Adam among the naked. We looked at some television late news, for me to catch up with the world (after losing contact with the world).

So United States President Donald Trump regarded the Saudi crown prince as a personal friend doing a 'spectacular job' and he'd meet dictator Kim Jong-un soon. Meanwhile, Boris Johnson visited farmer John Garnett and the dairy cows on Ackenthwaite Farm, Milnthorpe, Lancashire, in a publicity effort to become the new leader of the Conservative Party and Prime Minister.

It was time to sleep. Adam and I would be in the main bedroom, Keith and Cheryl in the second bedroom, with Lucinda and Dyfed to avoid the small bedroom by returning to the Maa Skelter Guest House. First I went into the kitchen for more clearing up.

"You can stay!" I told Dyfed alone, as he came into the kitchen.

He said, "I'm telling Lucinda I did nothing but burst your boil. Your mother thinks it's hilarious funny. I warn you I'm not sure Lucinda is in a believing mood."

"Hill areas," I said.

"What?"

"Sheep. Oh never mind."

"Gwirionedd!" he said.

Lucinda appeared. "Dyfed, leave!" He did and she shut the door.

We were standing facing each other. Then she pressed her similar body into mine, with the table blocking my way backwards.

I said, trying to pacify her, "Thanks about that preacher again."

She asked, "Why do you think I've come here?"

I didn't get a chance to reply.

She carried on, "Mummy once said I had to share everything; my stuff became your stuff. But you took it anyway. At least daddy didn't give you cuddle time. Keith was mine - yes he was - and you even took him. So I had him when you two were back, fucked him, because he's pathetic."

"We move on and things have worked out recently."

"But it doesn't mean you can have my husband."

"What? All he did was to be good enough to get at the boil on my bum."

"Don't come all that. I know you fucked Dyfed because I saw the stain on my sheets."

"No! He was in his room, and I was in mine. Anyway, there'd have been pus as well, even some blood, surely."

"You'll have washed that off. Semen."

"He had a wank! I told him: 'The war between us two has to stop.'"

"Try the truth," she said. "You couldn't leave my husband alone. He drools all over you."

"But it doesn't mean anything happened. Look. Him giving me such divine pain, is one thing, but doing something extra is another. And we did not."

"I know you. It's all about advantage. Keith hesitated over me, so you took him instead. You are not having Dyfed."

"Well, let me tell you something. You did well not to get Keith. He is a consistent concealer and liar. He has had an affair with Cheryl for two years. He is screwing another woman as well, and Cheryl doesn't know it. You might just have seen her, recently. On the basis of religious ideology, he is having sex with loads. Why don't you ask him to add you to his list? You might come to shit and swallow very easily."

"And this Adam Magellan: 'Hello, I knew you from school - give me one!'"

"Adam's an old friend more than you know and I care for him. After all, if you knew what happened at school, you'd have jumped on him as well."

"What happened at school?"

"That's for me to know and you to wonder. Anyway, I might put my sexual skills to good purpose elsewhere."

"What?"

"You wouldn't understand."

"Anyroad, you leave my husband alone. He's a sweet bloke and he doesn't want kids and just wants to make a living and get on with the people he knows in town. He said you and I ought to make up, being smitten with you. No we don't. And remember you have those Ten Commandments: do not steal and do not fornicate with others' husbands."

"I'll absolve you of your sins and mine - I'll give you a blessing."

"Oh, sod off," she said, opening the door, and her husband had already dressed. So she did, and left with him to stay in the house of one of Keith's lovers.

Once I'd finished in the kitchen, I went upstairs. Adam was in the bathroom. I got into bed, and I grabbed my hairbrush.

He came in. I said, "Adam. You are stood there naked looking at me. Why couldn't you have been naked with my friends around?"

"Because it is different with you. You're doing that hairbrush thing again. It's far more than needed."

"Adam, get into bed."

He didn't. "You and your sister look so alike. You know, when we were teenagers, I didn't know what I was looking at when I looked inside Jenny and I sort of looked inside you. You didn't pull yourself open like she did."

"Ask the fucking question, Adam."

There was a pause while we heard Cheryl start to yelp and Keith grunt.

"Are you then a man? Did you tell Jenny you were really a man?"

"I am not a man, nor was I ever a man. I am a gender woman and phenotype woman. I am what Lucinda labelled us: a Complete Androgen Insensitive Syndrome intersex person. Jenny knew I had no cervix. Keith knows. I'm telling you, because you are now my partner. I would have told you, but Lucinda got there first - as ever."

"Huh. I knew you were 'in to sex' but I did not know you are intersex."

"They discovered at puberty that Lucinda was that. She, like me, never has periods. She, like me, has no reproductive side. But the doctors removed her gonads, what in men drop and become testicles, or would become ovaries in reproductive women. So she is on Hormone Replacement Therapy all her life. She had a vaginoplasty. When it was my turn, my mother told the gynaecologists 'no', despite the pressure they applied. The risk of cancer is overblown, she decided. I am still resisting gynaecologists. They think HRT would benefit me. I had one short time when I took HRT but stopped."

"Are you in danger?"

"Marginally, and there may come a point of surgery."

"So explain why you look like a woman."

"When the androgens aren't recognised, the male features do not happen and therefore you get testes where the ovaries sit. The clitoris is usually small, but mine isn't. And there are other aspects. We're hairless below the head because of it. We don't smell when we sweat. Our teeth are longer, our hands are bigger, our feet are bigger, our legs are longer, our hips are less rounded, and we are taller. These are generalisations and we do fall within the female range. I am also female in my head, Adam."

"I don't know what to say."

"My vagina is shallow because there is no cervix or womb."

"I don't know what to do."

"Adam. At least sit on the bed."

He did, back to me, feet on the floor. "You didn't tell me."

"Adam. I was about to tell you. Keith of course has seen me using my dilators, and he has fucked me without a problem, but his work on my anus and throat has left my sphincters damaged."

"You baffle me," he said. "Keith shopped you to your bishop. Does he know?"

"I have every reason to believe that he has kept my one big secret, the one you learnt tonight. Adam, please get into bed. I was looking forward to an ordination night fuck, though nothing needs consummating. Look, I've something to show you."

"What, your lack of a cervix?"

"No. Look at this badge." I took it from the bedside cupboard. "It has this elephant on and a big W. It is one of three kinds. The one around here has a goose with a B on it. There is another, with a stag and an H on it. Look. They are all this size, they are all white and all have black animals on."

"Christine's?"

"It was hers."

He looked at it. "You did have sex with Christine at the retreat."

"Yes I did. I've discovered that I am theosexual."

"What's that?"

"Sex from a God-orientated perspective."

The noise became louder from the next room. It was rhythmic in grunts and yelps.

"I think I'm going crazy with your mad life."

"I must be very dangerous to any supposed ordinary life."

"That's a cultic group - that's what it is. They've got you. And you'll suck me in."

"Adam, I do not like the group. I liked Christine, because she was honest. I share some of her ideas. But Keith is not honest, Barman is not, Connie Wilson is a bully, I think, and Ken Osis is terribly compromised. It is supposed to be highly secretive, but I am telling you so much more than allowed."

"Allowed?"

"In Margate I had sex with a bishop called Jonathan Eyre. I had a crush on him. But he wasn't honest either: he was fucking me not because he fancied me, but because he was demonstrating that I am sexually responsive. Christine going has shown me all is not well. You don't need to investigate the group any further, but I am going to play it carefully. At the cathedral Jenny was being closely looked after by Fatima Tamuuz of Hartlepool, as much as Fatima was looking after her own toddler. Fatima was even controlling access between Jenny and Anna Ozga. I don't know why. It could be Jenny's mental state, or it could be that Jenny wants out. And about Fatima's daughter: who's the father?"

"I could try and find Christine for you."

"She's likely to buy more property from your Ann and Labhaoise. If so, you don't need to try. Whose idea was it to inseminate both women to give them two children at once?"

"What's the relevance of this?"

"Only that you and I, Adam, are unusual and suited to be together. I am definitely a woman, Adam, but for the genes. Kiss me."

He put the badge on to the side table on the other side. He leaned over and kissed me on the cheek.

"Okay," I said. "That was pathetic."

Adam said, "There's a lot to think about."

"Adam. I was never a man. I grew up a girl. I am a woman and I am a woman with needs."

He said, "I want to sleep. I'll sleep alongside you."

"I'll suffocate you with my breasts if you do not fuck me." He looked startled. "Look at them, Adam. Female. Oh, go to sleep. Yes, let's sleep. Just listen to him banging her."

"Leave my knob alone, Linda."

"Arsehole."

Narrator: Linda The Operations Refused (Monday Morning 1st July)

"When was it?" Adam asked, lying alongside me, the duvet cover off.

"Thursday May 4th 1995."

"Where?"

"Wytham Hospital. Being naturists helped, because my father, mother and all daughters were present in the room peopled by several specialist doctors and nurses. Alice Peers and Mabel Thorp were young nurses then. Doctor Imelda Stoughton was a specialist up from London, as was Doctor James Macmillan, with Doctor Peter Todd from Manchester. I thought they might publish a book on us."

"You remember their names."

"I can tell you more because it was a big event for us. Number one was John Lennon: Imagine and it was the Chinese year of the Rooster, and American Zodiac Goose."

"Blimey."

"First up was Leila. 'Born 10th January 1981,' Dr. Stoughton muttered. She'd only recently started to menstruate, so her legs went up and wide, with a speculum inserted, Adam."

"I've got the picture."

"The necessary cervix was there, of course, and she was declared with ease female: genetically as well as phenotypically. So, Adam, the three doctors took it in turns to look in, a fierce light making her pink flesh bright. Daddy and mummy were also allowed to look."

"Her father?"

"Why not? So next on the chair and legs up was Lucinda, declared born 3rd February 1978, and she was about a year on from her gonads removal and vaginaplasty operations. The speculum opened her human-built canal, that meant she could now enjoy deeper sexual intercourse. They'd also given her a make-believe cervix, but it went nowhere. It was a little dark indent on a bulge of skin. Mummy and daddy were impressed."

"Can you Thomas the Tank me, Linda?"

"Okay. The doctors wanted me to look too, because they wanted the same for me. It was either that or a lifetime of dilators, as you've seen. I was next, up on the chair and legs out. With a drop of gunge, a speculum was inserted into me and the strong light directed in.

"Doctor Todd said that as I was born in the second of April 1979, and reached sixteen, I could withdraw consent, but parents mattered.

"I remember saying that I Will Survive by Gloria Gaynor was top of the charts."

"You obviously looked that up."

"Dr. Stoughton said, 'Let's hope you survive and thrive.'

I then said, to laughs, that, 'Mummy and daddy most likely fucked for me on June 23rd 1978.'"

"You did the maths," said Adam, getting stiff.

"Daddy said he'd have to look in his diary for the word 'shag' on that day. Mummy told daddy to look at me and he said, 'You're not a nipper now! But there's nothing there, Sweet Pea.'

"He said Lilibet and he agreed that Luce had been through a lot and needed support. He said I would get the same support.

"But mummy was having none of it. She said, 'Kramer vs. Kramer was on the year you were born; let's hope we're not having 'Bode vs. Bode' here.'"

"Oh dear," said Adam.

"Lucinda said I should have the operations, to stop me being a right mardarse, so I told her that she was the mawnging twat."

"You loved each other then as well."

"I'll just lick some of you pre-come. Right. So, Dr. Peter Todd asked me for my opinion and said, in response, that lots of people take tablets all their life.

"Mummy had a long look and said I'd got maybe four centimetres push-in and a big clitoris, so I would not lack a a sex life, if I wanted a sex life. Daddy agreed about the size of my clit. Dr. Stoughton referred again to the cancer risk reduced by removing the undescended testicles. But mummy said I got me oestrogen from them and that was it. Daddy asked about the vaginaplasty and it became clear that they wouldn't do a vaginaplasty without removing the gonads. So that was it.

"Oh, yes, Dr. Macmillan did ask about Lucinda's sex life with the benefit of a vaginaplasty but she didn't want to speak."

"Understandably."

Mummy referred to this CAIS support group but that doctor said they transmit a little bit of knowledge and a little bit is a dangerous thing."

"Were your legs still wide at this point?" asked Adam.

"Yeah, and everyone kept having another look. The directive light was affecting my eyesight. Daddy tried to get them to do a vaginoplasty alone, but mummy didn't trust the doctors to do only the one operation. So Luce wondered if they'd all made a mistake with her, and so daddy promised her a 'special cuddle' later. Leila wondered if her periods would stop and she'd grow old. Mummy said not until she was old.

"With my legs still up, Dr. Macmillan sent Nurse Thorp to find student nurse Jenny Planer to look at me. Miss Planer subsequently arrived to be told there were us two in this area and two girls more out west in Foss. She was invited to join the team going to Hartlepool and see a girl undergo an operation to receive an extended vagina and have her gonads removed. The student was asked to look inside me. The speculum was finally removed and she put her fingers inside me and then pressed around to the upper side of my pubic area, locating the undescended gonads."

"I'm coming," said Adam, so he spurted on his stomach and his chest.

"The student assumed my mother would consent to the operations but she still refused and told me to get dressed. They could ask me when I was eighteen, but if I had any sense I'd refuse them. Doctor Todd said I'd see my own gynaecologists but this was the point for their withdrawal."

"I need some of that kitchen roll," said Adam to me.

Chapter 13 The Plan in Action

Narrator: Linda Connie Shopping (Monday July 1st)

Adam dressed and went to work and Lucinda with Dyfed called in before going back home. I kissed Lucinda on the cheek. Dyfed shook hands with me, obviously in fear of his wife's reaction to more. I wished them a good journey.

It was my day off, and time to sit in the bathroom and contemplate these last few weeks. They'd left me apparently committed to a group where I disliked many of its known to me members. I'd revealed my very personal secret to Colin and to Adam, thanks to a crass preacher and the presence of my older sister. Christine had made such an impact upon me, and now she was gone.

Keith and Cheryl were getting up; he had the day off. He asked if I was going into the church, Colin going on holiday. "Apparently there is some lady of the Lakes."

"I genuinely have no idea. How do you know?"

"Bishop Terry told me. And he'll visit the Priory Church of St. Mary and St. Michael in the hamlet of Cartmel. It's got monumental Norman arches, vaulted ceilings and towering stained glass windows, a place used by monks, pilgrims and other travellers over a long time."

"What's he doing telling you?"

"Making privileged conversation."

They went out; I think their travels included a view of Foss as far south as Eslaforde, and Cheryl seeing her parents in Serninsea.

My day off was no barrier to Connie Wilson: we could go shopping, she said by telephone, and: "No time like the present."

"Where?"

"Nottingham. My car. You drive to the McPhails and we'll go from there."

"The McPhails - you mean the plumber and jewellery maker at Ingle Barrow?"

"The very two. I'm just chatting with them now but when you come I'll be outside."

"All right. When?"

"It takes less than half an hour so arrive here in one hour."

"Fair enough," I said.

I left Adam a message about where I was being picked up, by whom, and where I was going.

When I arrived and had parked outside, Connie emerged from her car.

"Hello again!" she called out. "Helen and Stephen were going out so I stayed with them until about ten minutes ago."

Connie was rather well dressed, with a good whiff of anti-sweat perfume about her. (The bishop just overdid it.) With no time to waste she drove us westwards.

Driving along, Connie told me that she had been married before and had settled well from the divorce, because her first husband had been a sales manager with a hefty income. So I said about knowing Keith a year above me at school, of our university togetherness, his failed Anglican ministry candidacy, and discovering his affair. I had the impression that anything I said she would already know - but I had to say something.

She was aggressive with her overtaking, especially after Wytham as the roads became busier. She only then told me about her "obsession" with this suburban younger clergyman inheriting a large congregation. He was going places. She bedded this evangelical and so she separated from the sales manager.

"So... It was your fault but you got a good settlement."

"When I intend to get something I get it."

Since marrying Jim Wilson and moving east, she was now more involved in Church affairs including the Confraternity work as the Serninsea administrator.

"How were you involved in religion in the first place?"

"By accident, a sort of place to go to socialise." She said, "I've always been eager, but ever since I met Jim I've enjoyed an excessive sex life."

"So did your first husband do anything wrong?"

"Not really. I like material things, but I like tough men better. And although many clergy are wimpish, Jim isn't. He is tough in word and actions. So, about you! You were finally introduced to us by the wayward Christine."

"She didn't strike me as wayward or wimpish."

"We want people who say yes to life and say it abundantly. Yes? Positive about their bodies, and all bodies. Did Christine tell you about how the Confraternity got started?"

"You tell me."

"It was born of a revelation."

"Do tell."

"Two bishops as friends - when one wasn't yet elevated - and an affair. So the friends are Terry Barman and Jonathan Eyre, who were fortunate to be together in the same Gravesend Theological College. This confuses people because it is named after Richard of Gravesend, 1258 to 1279. If you go to one of the Oxford theological colleges, you'll know about all the gay affairs that go on. Well, these two were the heterosexual equivalents, within the college and the university. And then, after Terry became a bishop, before coming to Wytham, he connected with priest Liz Huett, at some gathering or other at the end of Hadrian's Wall, where they had the revelation. The orgasm is the insight to the Kingdom of God: it is so good, it must be good."

"Rather than if something is good, it must be bad."

"The damned Calvinists," said Connie. "And they are damned not saved. Nothing good ever came from Calvinists."

"Christine dislikes Calvinists but not their sort of authority, surely."

"Christine Vine and Jonathan formed an attraction. She gave him ideas, often during the sex act itself. It was her approach that formed the basis of the group. She was a lay person, but the best place for her towards ministry was up here in Wytham. Fortunately, as a working escort, she had money and flexibility, and took a house in Eslaforde. It is puritanical evangelical down there but Terry Barman got her into Wheaton to its north. The ideas given to Jonathan are all mainly hers, including episcopal authority, but that is the seed of her problem. She simply forgot who she is. She can advise - we can all advise - but only the bishops make decisions."

"It's not very Anglican," I said. "Eastern Orthodox?"

"But it is vanguard: the Vanguard. We want to do nothing less than overturn the theological inheritance of sin. It has ruined Christianity for too long. Look what happened when Western Christianity went to India. All those beautiful images at the heart of Hindu worship were turned into embarrassments. Good for Sanjay and his niece Yojana, with us, recovering a Hinduism free of all such guilt. You know that Keith mentored Yojana."

"Oh - I see. But aren't they fucking each other because he enjoyed two affairs?"

"Why shouldn't they enjoy it? That's the whole point. But they are not having an affair. A few weeks back Tess, that's Liz, Elizabeth, took Yojana around South Wales. They were intimate all right, and both Yojana and Tess had further intimacy with the two South Wales bishops coming on board. Three women and one man. The question is, Linda, are you committed? Keith is and Christine was."

"Hmm."

"So, the question is, who will mentor you?"

"Er, it was going to be Christine."

"Christine had no authority to make that decision."

"I don't want John Barman to make that decision."

"He has done nothing against your interests or your welfare, Linda. Anyway, the decisions on mentoring and initiation are taken by the bishops, asking you, of course, and seeking advice. I would like to mentor you. What do you think?"

"I don't really know you."

"You will if I mentor you."

"I wanted Christine."

"But Christine is gone. Terry says he will try and find out what she is doing. She seems to have cut us off. So how do you see yourself contributing?"

"Only that I got ordained and want to make a difference. I want it to go somewhere. The parish is fine, but it's not where I am performing the best. Christine gave me a purpose. I'd come to my ordination doubting why I was doing it at all. I was a bit conflicted, and maybe I am still, but there was a turnaround and she and the ordination did rather zap me."

There was a pause here. Connie put on the radio, and thus we had some pop music on. Although irritating, it did give my brain a rest from Connie's talk. Except a report came on later in the news about police arresting two men in Harwich (of all places) after staging a robbery in Serninsea. They used movement between a party of people from their firm's head office to its branch at Serninsea to give them cover for a robbery of a small town bank. CCTV and road side cameras had connected vehicle use in the area and commuting.

The music resumed. I looked at these roadside cameras on our trip. They were put there ostensibly to monitor traffic, but a camera is a camera is a camera. After all, back in the days of the North of Ireland troubles police knew IRA movements. Mobile phones also do the same job.

Connie said, "The bank robbery could have been embarrassing. It's how you learnt of Christine and Jenny World being in our group. We cannot control everything. Nor did we plan for you to bump into Helen McPhail." Putting the radio off, she continued, "I know you don't like deception. Sometimes you have to do it. To move to Wytham, Jim and I had to assure the then diocesan bishop, the Right Reverend Lord Daniel Dimpleby, that we had no relationship before the divorce. John Bolingbroke didn't care, frankly, other than it appeared there was no relationship before the divorce."

"I have heard of this tactic," I said. "Appearances."

"It's how we manage information. Fascinating topic, information."

"Ah, I'm looking for a topic for a sermon."

"You're supposed to follow the lectionary. Jim does always."

"I'm allowed to do topics."

"Colin Cromer is too flexible."

"That's not how I see him. But - yeah - I'll preach on 'Information' next Sunday."

"Do not mention the Theatrical Players."

"Of course not. Like once I didn't mention badges. So lies are all part of managing information. That's not very good - not very evangelical either. Or maybe evangelicals deal in delusions: delusions of history, for example."

"Regardless, with the suffragan's backing, we were able to move in to the neighbouring parish from Colin Cromer's and yours."

"So you moved from a successful urban..."

"Suburban."

"...church, built up presumably with a band, good audio visuals..."

"Yes indeed."

"...and all that, to what can only ever be rural churches with small congregations. Doesn't he find that frustrating?"

"It's a challenge. But people have cars these days, and he can build an attraction for people to come from all around. Parishes can be so different. It is still a challenge but also relieved from previous gossip, which can be quite destructive."

I said, "Dimpleby left the diocesan operation in somewhat of a mess. When the shit hits the fan, it should not all be Derek Imperial's fault - although he is no better. But it is going that way."

"Over the fan and all over the bloody room," she added.

The roads improved as Nottingham grew closer and she said, "Come on then. Spill the beans. You're a woman with a reputation generating rumours. Adam Magellan: he's your old school mate. Old times between the sheets."

"I rewarded him for his investigations. I like him a lot."

"He might be a contrary influence, Linda. If he becomes a contrary influence, you must drop him. Otherwise: enjoy."

Connie knew where she was going and was in a stop-start accelerating and braking mode between traffic lights. Being someone who reads detail, I did consume many Advanced Driving manuals after I passed my test, and, although I didn't take the advanced test, I like to think I am a smoother and non-aggressive driver.

She arrived at a multi-storey car park and negotiated its ramps with speed and brakes until a queue had formed behind cars trying to park. Finally we were in a space and able to get the lift into the shopping area.

Connie showed a fluency of going into one clothes shop after another, trying items on. I participated by looking at her and trying on a few items myself. In the process I saw her badge clearly: the goose and the 'B'. Soon I just decided to sit down and wait.

In the end, I emerged from a multiple of shops with a useful black blouse, given my usual braless preference, whereas Connie had purchased three combination suits, three blouses and a five packs of underwear garments.

"You haven't got much," she said.

"I'm not much of a clothes person; I'm not into fashion or anything like that."

"You don't dress to impress, ever? Oh, you'll need to dress to impress at times."

"My plunging with slits translucent dresses are because I don't like dresses."

As if this wasn't enough, Connie entered a large supermarket and was filling her trolley high, including a large selection of wines (I bought one red and one white, in case of parishioner demand). I did have some frozen food among my purchases, which might have been a bit daft.

At this point I wanted to get in her car and go home, but Connie clearly wanted to return to the shopping area.

She seemed to have even more energy when she bumped into someone she knew. This person had a house extension built and Connie heard all about it. She must have said hello to about five people and one asked after Jim's whereabouts. "We're very near the eastern coast," she told him. "Wytham diocese."

"Is that where that Serninsea Cross thing was found?"

"Yes it was," she said, "And Terry wants it to become the very symbol of Serninsea continuity."

Next, she made a bee-line to a lingerie store. "Come on," she said, "Get something for your man as well."

"You mean Adam," I said.

"Yeah. My man's into bright blue: that's unusual, isn't it," said Connie about lingerie. "Appear to appeal," she said, so I sat while she was selecting rather more than one set of these items. In fact she purchased six of these, and they were different sizes. No way were these sets for her alone. "Surely you do a bit of slap and tickle," she said to me.

"Nah. You're doing the buying again," I said.

"Mind if we go into the sex shop?" she asked.

"Well I suppose there isn't one in Serninsea."

"There is, actually," Connie said. "But I'll leave you to your innocence on the matter. This one has more choice and is considerably cheaper."

Suddenly we were out of the main stores and going down some back streets. This shop had windows lacking any display.

"This looks like the real deal," I said.

"A much as you can get in the UK."

I thought, hang on, I'm with the wife of an evangelical clergyman, being a clergywoman myself. Welcome to her world.

"Don't like rubber suits," she said, inside.

"Rubber ducks is more my thing," I responded. "Or Adam's assistant will be into ducks that can select playing cards."

"Hello Chloe," she said to the slim, female assistant, with bare arms and a braless t-shirt on and cut down jeans into shorts. "How's life? Had any strange men?"

"One or two."

Connie bought some strangely mushroom-shaped plastic devices I assume not available among the shopping centre lingerie extras. I'd have put them in the kitchen for displays, although they had curvy pointed ends. Crumbs she even purchased some DVDs, and this slim woman serving with nipples prominent through her vest gave her an "extra one" for free stimulation.

Connie told me, "The extra one is the real deal. It is disgusting." Connie purchased a large dildo not available in the high street, and five rabbit vibrators. "These are the best." Then she said to me, "Go on, get something. We can put these on expenses."

"Honestly," I said, "I've got everything I want."

"What about that double dildo over there?"

"Too big. Anyway, why on earth would I want a double dildo? There is no one for the other end."

"You never know," said Connie. "Chloe Mee, this woman has a swallowing technique second to none. She takes it all and she never chokes."

I stared at Connie.

Chloe said, "You sound jealous," to Connie.

"You bet I am. Too much and I throw up. I need lessons."

"We do have a DVD guide," said Chloe.

"Well, I'm hoping my friend here will teach me."

I stared at her more, but not surprised that Keith must have told her.

"Is it the collective account?" asked Chloe Mee of Connie Wilson. It was, via some card.

Back we went to the supermarket, because she added a fifty inch High Definition television to her purchases for hanging on the bedroom wall. Staff sent a youngster to carry it for her on a special trolley. It was laid on the back seat, covered over with a rug. Other items were added into the boot.

At last, this woman on super-alkaline batteries had finished and we drove off.

"And is Keith going to leave for Harwich?" she asked.

"I should think so," I said. "Felixstowe. Sideways move."

"We think we will have to start a group there, but we have no bishop. Margate is so inconvenient. The badge for there is Ebbsfleet - Christine again."

The radio was back on. This meant she wasn't talking, and I felt tired.

Oh, she was talking, somewhat later on. "Tell me about deep-throating. How do you do it?"

"Oh God."

"We'll do that later. Come on, I can't do it."

I decided to give a quick lecture. "It's just that you have to get your pharyngeal reflex under control. Some of us don't have much of one, and some - perhaps you - have too much."

She said, "The reflex when something touches the back of your throat."

"And nearby. So you have to desensitise it by training over time. That's what I did, with Keith. You can use a finger or the handle of a toothbrush or, say, something phallic: it must be clean and not cause damage or get stuck."

"Or stop you breathing."

"Well, as you choke, accommodate to it; you breathe through your nose. After all, the man will be blocking your mouth and the nose is essential."

"How long for?" she asked.

"You train up to, say, ten seconds a go, holding the object steady. You do it several times a day, each day, and it does desensitise. And, as this happens, you introduce motion, slowly moving the object off and on the reflex area. You just have to persist. Eventually you can take a dildo deep into and out of your throat and it doesn't result in convulsing or coughing - not much and later nothing."

"What about things to help?"

"The thing about trying aids, from earplugs to laughing gas or even acupuncture, is that you won't use these during sex!"

"Unless it's kinky."

"Believe me, eventually the reflex becomes very slight or gone. It is also a form of numbness, and thus it is not working as a defence. If the reflex still happens, swallow. Keep up the swallowing motion like when the object is there."

"So you can take a man's knob in. Like Jonathan's."

"Is the whole of my sex life known to you, Connie, and I suppose everyone in this group?"

"You know we know about Jonathan."

"That's just the issue, isn't it? I fell for him, like I fall for a number of people. I thought he was interested in me, not just whether I was available and suitable."

"Well, stop falling for people, and just enjoy. Become more disinterested, Linda. So I'd have to learn to take in a dildo in and move it about."

"Okay. First time in sex, he should remain still and you do the moving. I then learnt to do it with him moving, and Jonathan was almost violent. Open your mouth wide with tongue forward. It helps also to get the mouth and throat aligned, like being on your back with your head over the edge and mouth wide open."

"Off a table, off a bed. Look we're getting close to Ingle Barrow."

"It also depends on how curved or straight is his member. You use your hands to press against him and control the entry. When you can do it, make the best of it. Lick his balls. That also keeps him still."

"You are a proper expert; we knew we were right selecting you."

"But this needs to be delicate, or you could bite him. Another thing is saliva: I stopped even producing lots of saliva. When you do, it's a good lubricant, and sloppy-messy, but the gunge does have to get out of the mouth. You don't want it going down into the lungs. Same especially with sperm. If he climaxes while in your throat, you must be aware that lacking a spasm can lead to sperm going down the wrong way. So you must be in control mode. If your sphincters are weakened, control is more about awareness."

"Did you know I once won an antiques television programme competition?"

"That's a change of subject."

"£4,400 I won. I might show you the DVD recording, and it would look good on the new screen. This could sound a bit odd, but the McPhails have seen me arrive back knackered before, and you look tired. So their huge house has a room for us, and we will literally just lie down and drift off to sleep."

"I could go home."

"Come in and you can drive back when you've rested. Honestly, our hosts will let us rest. I have to drive around Serninsea and to the north, and I am knackered."

Connie had her own key. I had a limited number of items to go in their freezer.

"Come on upstairs and we can rest," said Connie. "Surprising as it may seem, I don't want to talk any further."

I followed her, and into this room we sat on the double bed, and she became naked and lay down. The cue was for me to do the same, and so there I was, alongside the big woman, my clothes off as well, anticipating something, but she turned away with her big bottom on show, and she did actually start to go to sleep.

My eyes were kind of going shut, and I must have slept, as an image of Adam Magellan holding his over-enlarged penis outside of my front room window gave way to the physical presence of more than one body next to me. Through peripheral vision and semi-shut eyes I realised that Stephen was on top of Connie, and furthermore that Helen was stood close by. He was thrusting Connie and worked her with penetration and stimulation to the all important orgasm, assisted by Helen's roving hands. Bloody hell, I thought.

"You're awake," Connie said, still lying flat, breathing heavily, as Stephen got up and approached Helen, pushing her up against the wall.

"Er, yeah." I turned and looked at them.

"Good to see you again, Linda," said Helen, being pressed and then entered against the wall. "We arrived back about half an hour ago."

"Er...What time is it?" was my innocent response. Approaching six o'clock, it was. Now I sat up, making Connie visible at length. Busty and hairy she certainly was. I stated, "Well that was an interesting day."

"Want to get fucked?" Connie asked.

"Er... Maybe not; still tired. I'm not shocked or anything."

"Do show us your party trick," said Connie.

I realised what she meant. "It's not a party trick."

"Helen, go and get the dildo I showed you."

Stephen released her and she left the room, returning with Connie's new wobbly thing. So I took it into my throat and showed just how much could disappear. Most of it went down. I then removed it. They actually gave me a round of applause.

Connie said, "Isn't she wonderful? Look, the bishops haven't decided on your mentor, yet, when all your obligations will be known."

"I must be going."

"Me too; they can finish off."

I collected my frozen foodstuffs and we both went to our respective cars.

At home Keith came in alone. I told him that I'd had a busy day with Connie. Cheryl was with her mother until later.

"You had time with the McPhails?"

"I see," I said, "It was, of course, intended. They offered but I didn't have sex."

"Good, because you need mentoring first, to understand what happens, including personally. You'll get initiated, and then there's more mentoring."

"Before and after?"

"It's in order to work on your obligation for service - to connect the sexual with the divine. I can suggest some theological reading. Our bishops have produced private papers too. They'll decide everything in the next few days, using that you have shown willing. The decisions are about who initiates and who mentors. You'll be a lynchpin of the Theatrical Players."

"Local girl doing local things."

"There's actually a suggestion of you travelling up and down the country forming new orgasmic groups. It would need follow-ups from the bishops to initiate clergy. It could be very exciting but you would have to become sexually strong."

"I thought I was, thanks to you."

"Fucking for the British Isles, Linda."

I nodded and smiled because showing willing mattered.

What mattered, also, was to describe our shopping to Adam in a matter of fact way.

Adam's Visitor News (Tuesday 2nd & Wednesday 3rd July)

Next morning, Adam brushed his teeth, but when I went in and sat on the toilet and leaned forward, Adam headed for the door.

"I'm told this is a sacred act," I said.

"Who by?"

"By whom. Christine Vine."

"Tosh." He went downstairs to sit at the breakfast table.

When I entered the kitchen wearing nothing I asked him, "Why do you like a 'Thomas the Tank'?"

"It keeps my bollocks busy. A pretty girl on Goosechat, and no one else need be involved. I do like it when someone like you holds my todger."

I grabbed a bowl and tipped in some Strawberry Crisp, then poured milk from a six pint carton "You stumbled across Goosechat?"

"George Wickenby went on it when his nieces tried it out. He told me about Goosechat."

"Incestuous stuff. So you met a fellow wanker."

"His nieces soon came off it."

"Incestuous."

"There's a lot of it about; sometimes I even investigate it."

"You going in?" Keith asked Cheryl pushing past him in her own search for other cereals.

Cheryl said, "I will go home - Harwich is my home now - tomorrow?"

"Fine," I said.

"Come and see your old mates at work, today," said Keith, "and with any luck I'll get a quick decision so I can come down to Harwich for a few days tomorrow."

Adam left just after they did, with a kiss for me, and I was alone.

I'd told the churchwardens that they could open up for private prayer - no Morning Prayer. I did do some visiting and met a man who talked tourist statistics and made me think about my sermon to come.

Eventually Keith and Cheryl returned from work, and indeed Keith had gained permission to go to Harwich the next day. Thus they slept together that night, making their usual noises, whereas Adam was 'busy' according to his message. So I slept alone. Keith didn't go at it for this long with me, I thought - not in recent years.

I had a different idea about early mornings, and stayed in bed on Wednesday as well. So Cheryl left with Keith, and I was left alone in bed. I decided to do sod all. The Holy Spirit kept my head on my pillow. Where was my enthusiasm?

Adam was in my bed, turned to face away from me. And through the open door, opposite the bed, came the Bishop of Scredington. What was he doing here? He had nothing on, but was holding a crook. The crook's curly end straightened, and pus was coming out of this straightening end. He removed my duvet, and this bishop was going to insert this crook, my legs widening. So I started bashing Adam with my right arm, to get him to wake up. I was hitting the empty bed.

I got up at midday and wore mufti out to the shops. It was time to go to Adam's, and find out if he was avoiding me. I simply went past Peter's occupied reception room and looked into his empty downstairs office. So I went upstairs.

About to speak, Adam said, "Shush."

"Why?" I answered a little aggressively.

"Because Ann is here talking business." Oh, she was sat behind where the door opened.

She said, "Glad you're here. Adam's wife's daughter Yootha Ann is coming up to Serninsea on a compassionate basis, and perhaps with her mother."

"I remember Agota," I said, thinking of something to say.

"Yes. Her name was Agota Annabella György. Mary was Mirela Annabella György. György was her first married name. If you change your surname to 'George' then why not the other names?"

"Her mother's maiden name?" I wondered.

Ann said, "Ardelean. It means forest: Hungarian for it is erdő."

"She's got a forest?" I asked.

"Unlike you," joked Adam.

"Ho ho ho. Sorry Ann. He is referring to the absence of hair around my vulva. Just thought I'd let you know."

"I can recommend it," she said, as sharply. "I suppose I should have let you look, Adam, when I had it done properly on Saturday."

Despite being astonished, I blurted out: "I don't shave, it doesn't grow. He thinks I'm a bloke because I've got a hairless fanny."

Ann gave a puzzled look but did not respond. "Anyway, Mary Ann George was soon Mary Ann Magellan and Yootha Ann stayed as George until she also married."

I said, "Come on Ann. Let's compare fannies. If you were going to show him, show him now, and let's compare one that's hairless with one that's depilated."

Ann stood up, lowered her trousers and lowered her knickers. So I lowered my trousers.

I said to Ann, "Can I feel around it?"

"If you must."

I said, "I can feel the presence of growth. It's not smooth. Adam, have a feel."

So he did, around Ann's lips.

"Feel mine, both of you."

"It's very smooth," Ann said. "Well done."

"I told you. I don't do anything."

Trousers pulled up, Adam said, after blinking multiple times, "Do you know why she selected 'Yootha'? You called her 'Goat' when she was on the neighbouring farm and she realised that her name was no good here. She saw an old comedy on Colin Cromer's television set and, given her own surname had Ys in it, she took on the name Yootha, also because she was interested in Aborigines and their art, and because she worked for Mr. Yannis Youell, who is the one presently dying of cancer. He is terminally ill and Eliana, his wife, wants a visit."

"I didn't know this. Yes, he was running the next door farm. I'm going to have to visit. Oh dear, dying of cancer. Aborigines?"

Ann said, "Yootha the name has Aboriginal origins. And Aysher is Yootha Ann's married name since living in Reading."

"I hope she comes and gives comfort to Mr. Youell rather than bringing him to a premature end."

Ann only said, "Your humour does you no credit, Linda. I'll let myself out, Adam. You two have things to do." She left and went down the stairs.

"What do you have to do?" I asked Adam.

"Work. Perhaps you should do your pastoral visiting."

"Are you avoiding me?"

"Ann says I should give you emotional support."

"Does she now? I don't need emotional support; I need fucking and you keep running away."

"We all need emotional support. Ann and Labhaoise do give me emotional support as well as business support.."

"She shows you her fanny."

"I did give her a child - and Labhaoise."

"Be in my bed tonight, Adam. Everyone has gone, even Colin has gone on his holiday. I suppose I'd better go home, put the cassock on and go and see Mr. Youell. That might be different from how they sometimes saw us in the fields. My daddy kept up good relations with our farming neighbours."

Thus I began what would have to be a series of visits to a very ill Yannis Youell, eighty, and his wife Eliana, seventy-seven. When back I wrote a sermon against labelling and racism, with something about Christianity becoming universal. Then I realised this Sunday I'd told Connie I was preaching on information.

As for information, that evening I decided to close down all of my online interactive messaging and any debating. Why? Because I had collected these responses to becoming a priest and, for fun, corrected the atrocious spelling and put them into alphabetical order:

All these women! The Church is capitulating to culture.

Are you a virgin? [Hardly!]

Are you going to get a lesbian haircut, minister?

Are you in fancy dress?

As your brother in Christ do re-consider taking this pastor role in the church as it is prohibited in God's word.

At least you're easy on the eye.

Did you lose your virginity before you got married?

Do the manly thing and resign.

Do you kiss the blokes when they leave your service?

Does your husband do the cooking?

Even if you had tattooed on your head 'PRIEST' you wouldn't be one.

God would not call you - being a woman.

Have you thought about your earrings when you lead worship? Could be distracting. [I never wear any!]

Hello vicarette.

How attractive should a female priest be?

How can you possibly do this when you're a wife and a mother? [I'm not!]

I'll give you this - you'll be much more pastoral as a woman.

I've got a good fundraising idea - come to church, ogle the vicar and give generously.

I've seen you for real - gorgeous women distract the congregation.

I bet your voice is too high.

I don't want to hurt your feelings.

*I refer to what St. Paul says about a woman preaching.
I see that around town you dress up as a man. [Often in a cassock!]
If we call priests Father, what do we call the women?
Intellectualism does not become you.
Is your husband interested in theology?
Is your husband ordained too?
Isn't your husband ashamed that you didn't put his vocation first? [I did!]
Jesus called only men.
Jesus was a man.
Let's try the four fuck-offs: Female, Fat, Forty and Fick.
Ministers like you should sign that they won't get pregnant while in post. [I can't! But I would not.]
Ministry is incompatible with your duties as a wife and mother. [I am not a wife or mother, of course.]
My colleagues can't find a job because women are taking their place and some won't share an altar with a woman.
Next time God will call the best man to be the bride of Christ. [Interesting.]
No debating from me as you will get too upset.
No one can receive communion from someone who paints their nails. [I don't paint my nails!]
Preach about cooking.
Serninsea needs another man when Colin goes.
She's thinks she's clever.
Should a lady vicar be wearing that?
So who does the cooking in your manse?
Tell us the dates of your periods so we know when not to take communion.
[Of course, he doesn't know.]
The children will like you.
There's plenty you can do without being a priest.
What part does a bra take among the vestments? [I don't wear bras!]
What role do knickers play in clerical dress? [I don't wear knickers!]
What's the betting you've got suspenders on under that cassock?
When you move on you'll need to apply for churches that men wouldn't want.
Who will men go to if they have a difficulty?
Why is someone so attractive acting like a vicar?
Will people ever take you seriously?
Women should be nuns not priests. [My sister said I'd become a nun.]
Wow. You're a cleavage in a cassock.
Yes, sweetheart.
You're a blonde vicar with a cracking rack.
You're a blonde vicar with a racking crack. [Same person as above.]
You're a good girl.
You're not the leadership type.
You are a liberal and a slut.
You are a naughty girl.
You could come as the strippergram.
You have a much trimmer arse than [removed] in Foss. She has the better proportioned tits.*

*You have some nice jugs.
You need to wear more make up to be more professional.
You would have been such a good mum.
You're damaging the Gospel.
You're doing the work of the devil.
You're gorgeous: why aren't the people flocking in?
You're just a faux-priest.
You've been a busy girl, haven't you?
You've taken on a lot for a woman.
Your church will grow with a sexy vicar like you.*

Adam came in, read these and smiled. He said, "Obviously, according to these, you are not a bloke. Comparing fannies, you're not a bloke. I didn't think you were a bloke, but I have had to mentally adjust."

"I enjoy sex as a woman, Adam. Perhaps I over compensate. My body is my temple, but it misfunctions. I have issues: I do know this."

I decided I'd get up the next morning for Morning Prayer.

At the Diocesan Bishop's Lecture (Friday 5th July)

Clever Colin Cromer had arranged his holiday to avoid the diocesan lecture! It meant I had to be present. The email said each of us had two seats, one for a partner. Adam, back in my bed and doing sex again, said he was uninterested but I could "take the lad" - which meant Peter. He agreed to go. So I picked him up from Adam's place.

He was a lively passenger, and he told me about getting on with Kathryn very well. Why her and not twin Kathleen? Well, Kathryn had made the move.

Being somewhat naughty, I asked Peter, "Mary Ann George, or Mary Ann Magellan, was at SMS. Why did she leave so quickly?"

Peter said, "Before my time and above my pay grade."

"You're not paid by Adam," I said. "Ann Dromeghda interfered in the marriage, didn't she?"

"I'm the monkey and he is the organ grinder. You know better than to ask me, Linda."

"A brass monkey."

"All three, Linda."

So instead I told Peter about visiting the Unitarian chapel during my retreat, and getting into a lot of trouble over it. He said he had never even seen one, never mind been to one. He liked the Pagans but not their magic, and he liked the Buddhists but not reincarnation, and so had settled on Unitarian Universalists online.

"I can imagine a lot think like you," I said. "So what about, say, Christianity without the miracles?"

"But it is all about miraculous intervention."

"Oh dear," I said. "Well, perhaps we'll find out tonight. Remember I mentioned a magical presentation? I want to make a point. Like the Lent show but close up and for discussion."

"You are a good shape for fitting in things," he told me. "Can I saw you in half?"

"Which half would you like to keep?"

"Can you start to exercise and become supple?"

"I am supple, laddie. Okay, I will start exercising immediately. I mean, when home."

"You need to get in and out of small spaces quickly and efficiently."

"That's what Adam has to do. Has Adam told you about this group, The Worshipful Company of Serninsea Theatrical Players."

"Something."

"What does he say?"

"Linda, I'm not allowed to talk about work."

"Why is it work? I told him to stop investigating."

"Perhaps he has; he's not mentioned it for a while."

The lecture was not given at the Cathedral as usual but at the University of Foss, a series of buildings all circling around a long lake and a railway station just opened along the way.

I drove us to one of the university's car parks. The park and ride on the bypass was for daytime only. We got out and it was a fairly long walk to the door.

"University for a theology lecture by your bishop," Peter stated. "Is he a professor?"

"More likely a dogfight between the Bishop and the Dean and Chapter of Wytham Cathedral."

"Tell me more."

"There's a Council of lay people meeting twice a year to advise the Chapter and a College of Canons including Dean Alistair Jackman for setting the agenda. He's been accused of poor financial management by Bishop Derek Imperial while he accuses the bishop of being incompetent regarding administration."

"Oh dear."

"Perhaps the Bishop wants to deny the cathedral income from our presence, or perhaps Dean Jackman has made the bishop unwelcome - although, properly speaking, he cannot."

"The cathedral is full of treasures," Peter asserted. "Pinkepinke." [Sounds like 'pinky pinky' - it means getting and holding on to money.]

"The big drain is the huge cost of repairs, but plenty of running costs too, at the cathedral. Staff redundancies were on the cards with the cathedral losing nearly £100,000 a year. Attendance for worship has grown, especially among midweek services, but Bishop Derek dislikes the visitor entry fees. Money comes from legacies, donations, selling off assets, and grants from the Lottery. There are National Church Commissioners who help towards our pensions."

"But not Christine Vine's," said Peter.

"Oh," I said. "Tell me more! Have you two been doing work on her?"

"I spoke out of turn. She doesn't get paid like you do. You know that."

"I'm what's called an FPS, or Fully Paid Stipendiary. She is a UVM, or Unpaid Voluntary Minister, of which there are many Lay Readers, Deacons and Priests. We have RVM or Retired Voluntary Ministers. UVMs effectively decide their own workload, but they establish a pattern by which they are reliably available. Many hold down jobs."

"So is your cathedral going bust?"

"The cathedral hopes to charge more for filming dramas around its estate. It hopes to use the building itself for more corporate dinners and fashion shows - the nave is alike a giant catwalk. I wonder what we can copy for St. Sernin's. I would remove all the pews, but Colin will not. The cathedral, after all, uses seats. We could have corporate dinners too, given the links Bishop Barman has generated, and be an alternative to the main hotel."

"Hmm. I would stay clear of him."

"He is the diocesan bishop's serving bishop; we can hardly say no. Keep walking quickly: we're nearly here. Both Bolingbroke and Screddington have gone on courses that are like microscopic MBAs. My boss Colin Cromer reacted that they ought to train more in theology, liturgy, pastoral and community needs: not to mimic being executive officers. Let's save this conversation now we are here."

The lecture was entitled Christianity as Movement: A Linguistic and Bodily Approach. The Bishop of Screddington, Julian Worsley, sat on one side of Derek Imperial, while John Barman, Bishop of Bolingbroke, sat on the other side. And it wasn't properly a Church do, but a University do with a connection to the chaplaincy and, well, normally, use of the cathedral.

A chaplaincy position in Higher Education would be so tempting, if I could get one.

I was rather chuffed that the diocesan recognised me and gave me a wave. Once again, he was approving of me. Given his approval of me at the retreat, the least I could do was be there and listen, accompanied by the keen Adam's apprentice.

Within his speech there was a lot of tedious "What I am going to say?" and "What I have said was..." that frustrates me. Just say it, and say it clearly enough.

"Christianity is nothing if not bodily," said Derek Imperial, "centred around a divine-human person and the Church is seen to be indeed embodied by that divine-human person. But that is simply to say the matter formally, and is rather like the headlines."

We were told that the mind is of the body and the mind makes sense through symbol, and symbol is embodied in ritual and ritual involves movement. At the heart of this is language: language by the widest definition, however. He went into several theories of language origin among humans, including the bow-wow type theory, which is the discredited early words-like-the-noise-made, to a newer one that language has come from the ability to appreciate music and is to represent things artistically. These were fundamental symbolic appreciation methods to map the immediate universe. But he returned to the bow-wow theory with others in mind: he has a pet dog.

"I can now say 'walkies' in any tone of voice and the result is my dog will jump up, get its lead and wants to walk. It is excited. I don't need to cry 'walkies' as I once did. Nor do I now over-express it's time for your teeeee. Saying simply 'it is teatime' is enough for the mutt to go mad around his bowl."

A further point was that his dog ignored all music. It had no necessity in its life. On the other hand, even with its necessities, the dog still had no grammar, no construction of sentences, and no symbolic extensions. "Whereas, for us, 'dog' the word has enormous and lengthening meanings, even arriving at the present use of the word 'dogging' which, I am reliably informed, means having sex with strangers usually around a collection of cars in some lonely place. Please, no one leave to go and check out the car park: it is floodlit and it is not lonely."

Peter found that quite funny, although others weren't sure if or how to laugh. I remembered the trip to the woods on that non-participatory basis with Keith. He hadn't wanted a dog in case of long term commitment - because, of course, he was having an affair and didn't want to get attached to a dog if he was going to live somewhere else. Keith was crass when trying to be innocent about the word 'dogging'.

Derek Imperial was continuing. "The fact is that since Ludwig Wittgenstein and William James, expression has made reality; we build reality in the mind from those collective agreements of wordy expressions. Indeed 'the fact is' is simply established by my expressive power!" (A few chuckles were heard.)

I groaned, not because it wasn't funny but because this was dangerous existential territory.

The bishop told us that there are language games, and he thought they varied between maths and its attempt at symbolic precision, physics which did the same but had inventive names and expressions for particles discovered and assumed, chemistry also "welded" itself to substances arranged on the periodic table, and biology was underpinned by the evolution narrative - "And it is a narrative," said our Christian leader digging a very large black hole for himself.

"Religion, seen this way, is perhaps the most expressive, the most subjective and very much like art," he said, "But we try to ground it by drawing on narratives from science and history, and not always very successfully. History is very disciplined about the primary document, no matter which school of historiography then uses them, as is archaeology about gathering evidence - but sometimes expert driven; and science after Popper is very demanding about falsifiable experiments. Too often religion sweeps its way around these uses without taking their lessons seriously.

"We have to maintain serious work on the Jesus of history, as it has been called, the rabbi Jew who gathered leaders symbolising the twelve tribes of Israel, who perhaps preached a 'coming one' that may or may not have been himself transformed. We have to examine scrupulously the Easter narratives, not just for their anti-semitism, for which our locality has a sad history, but for their reliability. Would Jesus ever have been sentenced by Jews for claiming to be a messiah? No, surely not, and my view is Pilate would have taken little interest in yet another trivial trouble maker come to town. Stroke of the quill: a demonstrable non-citizen to be crucified. Messianics with followings were trouble makers. You see the problem, in that our gospels are post-Easter narratives, and all that follows-on. Narrative is a historical method, of course, but narrative of primary documents is located in the Early Church and not before."

Peter looked at me wide-eyed. I said to him, "I know. But it's a lot better than a fundy preacher we had recently."

"But where religion is especially grounded," our diocesan bishop said, "is in the anthropology of bodily movement, the bodily movement which supports and underpins expression. Anthropology is very clear that people who come together and exchange, do bind themselves as one. It is true in sex, in the economy, in conversation, and it is fundamental to the Eucharist as both expression and movement. In sex together one finds the gift of love, in the economy one finds the progress of added value, in talk we find the richness of conversation, and in the Eucharist we make the material effort and transfer tokens for a spiritual gift, and these tokens involve the fundamentals of eating and drinking.

"The model is 'take, bless, break and give' from the apparent model of the Last Supper, but I do not subscribe myself to the Last Supper being the Eucharistic model. I don't because, although Jesus had a final meal, we don't know what meal it was or its intentions. Maybe it was a seder. In Corinth Paul was saying that the Eucharitic tradition goes back to the Lord. But did it? Because, Jesus's last meal, I'd argue, fits in with previous meals about the bounty of the coming Kingdom. As for how we do it - the Hellenistic Eucharist liturgically developed - the tokens of exchange are insignificant in themselves, although the Catholics say they embody in all reality the Lord himself in the transference to breaking and the crucifixion. And in a way, they are right," he said with added emphasis, as if he had become Bishop John Robinson in the 1960s.

Peter said, "And in a way it's all talk and shuffling along."

I replied, "Yeah. Or come at it from both ends. He is in dangerous territory."

The bishop wanted to turn to Buddhism, he said, "...not because I am a Buddhist but because it acts on the edges of language. The Buddhist does not want to talk, but empty the mind of all noise, the emptying leading to non-distractions and therefore an end to the sticky, messy, samsara that Christians call sin."

I wondered about this. Really? Is samsara what Christians call sin?

"But we notice there are texts to guide the activity, and symbolic body stances: for example, to be properly positioned in front of a statue of Buddha is as if that is Buddha himself. There are of course mid-way conditions and states, such as, in some traditions, helpful deities; but, unlike our God, Buddhist deities are temporary and of our world. And then, also, look at the sutras, where language is pushed to paradox. Nirvana and samsara become one. If you desire nirvana you are still in samsara. Is it not a case to live along with samsara is itself a kind of nirvana of attitude?

"The Western equivalents to this, though less 'real', are the postmodernists and poststructuralists who say that every binary end expression contains within it the other pole. There is no purity of expression, no binary finite position."

I thought, goodbye Trinity, goodbye Unity, it's all contradicted within each and the other. Gordon Bennett.

On he went. "Here I want to have a crack at our scientists. I mean the Al Khalilis, the Dawkinses, the Coxes and the de Sautoys, who have been all over the television screens. Using history to explain science is to use a narrative story; to talk in terms of wonder is to be expressive: many of the terms for particles are suggestive, and television summaries use music to evoke responses. At any level, science is expressive - but I won't go as far as some to try and suggest equivalence between the scientific method and the religionist method. Religion really is expressive; religion really is like art. What I will say to the scientist is, 'Be careful,' because beyond the facts we have dependent narratives, and the offered facts about dark matter and dark energy are creating contradictory problems deep in the narrative. Whereas religion can maintain a tradition because it knows it is a story, science has to change its Kuhn paradigm when the facts falsify the story. When a scientist tells me this is the fact of the matter, I'm asking what part is a fact of the matter. Expression?"

"So language matters, but what religion does is overviews it all via movement, via ritual, via symbolising the given. Yes: art does that too, but we attach to this religion narratives like our own post-Easter interpretation. God, as they say, in the beginning, was and is the Word, and that is the brilliant insight of our religion in its construction of words."

Hang on, he hadn't finished.

"Let me say on religion. Of course, I'm grounded in the grounding of Christianity. But the Word and wisdom come from Judaism, and we see use of language and bodily expression in the submission to God in Islam, and we see what we have discussed as transitory in Buddhism, and of course Hinduism is nothing if not the narratives of gods and the broad God. So I have no intention here of being exclusive: religion is that symbolic insight of our symbolic selves, but in our case we have the post-Easter narrative of a real man and claimed deity, who actually moved bodily, and used words creatively and employed stories himself, with layers of ritualistic meanings, and of a Church we know as his body extended into our symbolic oversight. Thank you very much."

There was a good applause from the three hundred probably gathered. Peter said, "Given by an atheist."

Suffragans Bishop John Barman and Julian Worsely were looking for questioners. Contributors should give names and location. I said to Peter, "Go on, ask him a question."

One question from Peter Beardsley from Wytham was, "How do you, bishop, see more precision in Christian expression given that you said we were, as Christians - as actually the postliberals say - bound to rules of language performance in the identification of a Christian people?"

I took it that this person was a disciple of Lindbeck and the like.

His answer was: "This is precisely it. The expression makes the truth grounded in the rules of performance, although, as I say, we try to ground Christian expression via other methodologies. In the end theology can only draw on tradition, on pre-statements: on loyalties to reflective scriptures, liturgical books and confessional statements, and try to relate them outwardly. I'm convinced today that there is no such thing as natural theology. It is all dogmatic in one way or another, and that is both a strength and a weakness."

I said, "Go on Peter. Go on, go on, go on, go on," as 'Mrs. Doyle' might have expressed it.

Brilliant! Peter's hand went up. John Barman himself pointed across and a microphone arrived. "Peter Marshall from Serninsea. Isn't this the emperor's not very new clothes? What are you wearing? At one time, they said, God sent his very Son and self to save those God knew would be saved. Yes? Now it is all expression and human movement, and what's spoken out of our mouths."

"Good one," I said to him.

The bishop's answer was staggering. "We cannot escape what the philosophers have said, what the psychologists and social anthropologists have found. And it is quite liberating, really, because it has huge interfaith implications. And there is a real dialogue with humanists too. But we Christians are saying something else too. We are saying that it is in the body, and we are the body people, we are the body religion. It's not a oneupmanship, it's an insight, a central insight, the central insight. You see, whichever way you understand the Last Supper and the Eucharist, whether diverged, converged, or mixing the two, it is dramatic theatre combining the body and the culture."

"It's non-realist," said Peter. "Your God and doctrine has given up on reality."

(Oh, Peter, you are wonderful! I was enjoying this.)

"Oh no it's not," said the bishop. "It's left the question of the real open, like the Buddhists have the real and have it in paradox. It is grounded, grounded in several places, and maybe thanks to other disciplines, but we then make our expression about bodies and do it in movement. It is real, but an expressive real, nor is it a reductionism to language pure, but an expansion through symbolism wide. I don't doubt the difficulties regarding precise doctrines as direct descriptions, but what we can do - according to the Most Reverend William Blair Rothach, our Archbishop - is get into the detail of these descriptions and do history-like work upon them. Nevertheless, these are always post-Easter descriptions and that is what makes the difference, I think."

"Someone else," said Julian Worsley.

"Yes, but a well appreciated question," said the diocesan. "This is what we want, and I note that the young man is sat next to one of our brand new priests of a deep theological appreciation herself. She must be doing a brilliant job in outreach."

"Smoke and mirrors," said Peter to me.

"Brilliant," I said to him. "The emperor's not so new clothes."

"I get all this stuff online," said Peter. "I ought to come here to study but I can't and won't afford it."

"Quite," I said. "Our shit governments devalue education. Everything is 'training' these days."

"Anyone?" asked the Bishop of Bolingbroke. "You see anyone, Julian? Oh yes. Fire!"

"James Lauder of Eslaforde. How do you regard the virgin birth and bodily resurrection then? Are they just expressions?"

Here we were again, with tick-box credal Christianity.

"Virginal conception is of course a paradoxical expression at the heart of things. It has to be divine making it impossible as human - but he was human. It comes from several sources, and particularly grounded in the Greek translation of Hebrew scriptures and thus seen as prophetic; and virginity is a significant expression regarding prophetic characters in all sorts of religious settings. The narrative story in its detail is then about the special uniqueness of this person as a chosen one which can be examined now in the textual detail as if in a history-like and science-like manner but neither as history and nor as science. As for resurrection, well, yes, it has to be bodily because we are bodily, thanks fortunately to the body beliefs of the Jews in burials at that time and place, and of course affirming the material body (and not just some spiritual experience) becoming then an affirmation of the real, the actual, and the restoration of goodness over time with human effort assisting the divine plan. Again we get the significance of the post-Easter faith by examining the details of the stories of the tomb and the appearances as history-like and science-like, as before, in other words taking the texts at face value and without losses, and so mining them all for the significance of say authority in the Church, proper ritual and the development of the fully rounded trinitarian account."

I asked Peter, "Did you get that?"

He replied, "What he meant was these events didn't actually happen."

The bishop was keen to carry on. "You know, we forget how potent beliefs were in other times. Have you ever thought of the keenness, even, of the Mediaeval and early Modern English to chop people's heads off or event to have them chopped off? These Catholics, Protestants, really did think that if you chopped someone's head off then the deceased walked straight into the next world, showing who was correct. No wonder, then, that they developed sophisticated means like being hung, drawn and quartered to make death painful. So these Jews and Romans at the time of Jesus weren't revised humanists or something, and why Romans had this thing called crucifixion for non-Roman citizens. Make it cruel."

I said to Peter, "He really is all the fun of the fair."

I thought it was time to ask the question to end all questions. My hand raised, I asked, "The Reverend Linda Jupitas, curate at Serninsea. The orgasm is nothing if not bodily. How might you see it as an insight into the Kingdom of God?"

The Bishop of Bolingbroke had a stern expression on his face, staring at me, then asking, "Is that a serious question?"

Among the laughter in the crowd, I answered, "Oh, definitely, linked to religious ecstasy and all that."

"No no, John," said the diocesan, "I can see that this is a very serious question. This is extended thinking. The mystics, of course, many in confined absolute institutions, as the sociologists would say, do get into states of ecstasy that they associate with Christ, as lovers of Christ. To be really risky, it brings prayer towards, indeed, masturbation, but if you think about it - and this is fresh, on the spot thinking here - it cannot be masturbation. No, this is very insightful. Masturbation is inwardly directed, seen as a diversion, even wasted activity. But it is not here, is it, because prayer is communicating. I think some prayer in communication with the divine could be so intense, so imbued with the Spirit of Love, that it could indeed have a sexual product. I know there are papers written about past mystics on this, but with use of psychology and psychotherapy there is a whole theological landscape here today to connect prayer with ecstatic and sexual responses. Hmm."

Peter asked me, "Are you a theological terrorist?"

"He wasn't injured in any way at all."

Julian asked, "Any less controversial questions?"

There were other questions, like Jason Wells of Rasa Market asking about how to relate Wittgenstein and William James, with an answer about expressing that becomes the real, and another from Ian Wigley of Bolton cum Heckoring about paradox in the Trinity that gained an answer I just couldn't fathom because I don't think Derek Imperial then knew what he was on about.

"The one that isn't one, the three that could be more..." (Hey?) "The subordination that cannot be accepted, human and limited but divine and unlimited," said the bishop.

It was surely very paradoxical to the point of being nonsensical. I think he was starting to clog up himself. A woman (!), Dorothy Strachan (pronounced Strawn) of Wulfstan, asked whether his God was 'personalist', and the bishop said that the God encounter was indeed in the I-Thou but he wasn't himself opposed to systematic theology. People were always getting Tillich wrong, he thought, "although Tillich might have been confused himself."

(Really, bishop, you don't say.)

With the fog thickened I said to Peter that there were drinks in the car and I wanted to get away very soon. Peter might have stayed to debate with individuals.

However, in the notices, we were told that Gretta Cox-Jenkins would be lecturing in the next week on Rejuvenating the Church. He hoped as many here as possible could return. This would be at the cathedral, suggesting that the diocesan bishop himself and Wytham Cathedral were at war. Gretta was also looking for someone to show her around and give her an overnight stay.

"Good lecture!" I said at Jim Wilson while heading for the door and arm locked into Peter to drag him along.

"Well, was it?" I heard him reply.

Connie Wilson came towards me fast. "Your question was near the knuckle."

"Near the clitoris," I said.

"You know what I mean. Too public."

"Pubic," I said. "Come on Peter," whom I kept linked to my arm.

"I need the loo," said the lad.

"Can you wait for a lay-by or must you go now?"

"Now."

"Shame. Okay, I'll go as well. I might not last."

Out of the loo, Peter was at a distance and Connie and Jim were waiting for me. She said, "Keep your mouth shut. The bishops will have a mentor for you soon. And you obviously need mentoring."

Mo McArden and Tom Bowler had come along, unknown to me. Mo said, "You and your boss. I can see why you are a priest, now. I'd no idea."

"I can offer you some theology books," I responded. They seemed uninterested and wanted to move off.

A certain Kenneth Osis was heading my way and blocking my return to Peter: "Can we chat, now ye're post ordination? Wasn't that a good lecture? Who's yer clever man? Oh, look, the top bishop has found him."

"He works for a friend. I suppose I'll be seeing you again after all."

"Yes indeed. Bye. Now's yer chance to get close to the decisions, make a difference." He seemed to avoid Connie as he left.

I said, "Peter. Hello Bishop again."

"Wonderful young man. A Unitarian? How exciting! Transfer him across with his theological sophistication. We could do with that."

"I could try," I said.

"Encourage him in his endeavours. All the very best to you both. Did you understand me?"

"He encourages me and we both understood you. Come on!"

I grabbed his arm and dragged him off.

Out on our own he said, "You and your orgasms!" Peter started laughing.

"Deadly serious. Serious question."

"You really are unique," he said.

Peter asked to go to to Inglemire and his father's house. I dropped him off there. It had many rooms.

Adam was inside my house. I told Adam that his apprentice ought to be treasured.

"I thought he might like it, and he thinks you're an interesting woman."

"That's right, Adam: a woman. I want an orgasm, tonight," I said, doing some more pelvic exercises as a kind of warm-up.

Preaching Information (Sunday 7th July)

It was time to preach on Information. Colin Cromer was still on his main holiday. It made using the vestry loo so much less stressful!

My sermon was written rapidly but inspired by a pastoral visit on Tuesday to a retired man who had been one of a small number of employees in a tourist statistics business. All this business did was make tourist activity reports for local authorities and commercial bodies. It did it by collecting supply-side statistics on hotel and guest house room availability and reported percentage usage, and made use of related attractions on the demand side. He'd said that often the statistics did not equate, or were not provided, so the firm just filled in the gaps. It did not matter because the authorities needed externally referenced reports with the display of 'objective' statistics in order to make policy. So money was being made by the firm not wholly through the gathering of information but by its generation.

Peter Marshall continued his recent theological engagement by coming into the church.

At the appropriate liturgical setting, I rose to say (for Peter's benefit, given his dabbling in other religion via his work computer), "May the words of my lips be acceptable to our God. Amen.

"Now, I want to talk about incarnation, crucifixion-resurrection, and information. You see, information is now understood to be significant factor of existence in the universe. I don't mean information in a narrow sense, like today is World Naturist Day in the northern hemisphere. Just thought I'd mention that news. I mean it more in the physics sense of making and carrying information. The speed of light is the maximum speed of transferring information, excepting instantaneous quantum entanglement. I suppose we have become more aware of information in this supposed information age, or entering what is sometimes called an information economy. Information is a commodity.

"Talking about information is directly related to talking about energy and matter, because with information you can manipulate energy and matter. James Clerk Maxwell, the famous Scottish physicist, who showed us the difference between artists' subtractive primary colours and those of additive lights, imagined, in a thought experiment, a demon who could so arrange faster and slower moving molecules that therefore heat could be made to increase in one compartment and reduce in another, based on the information in the demon's observations."

I noticed the absence of attention in some of the twenty plus mainly elderly people.

"What Maxwell didn't quite work out, was that it takes energy to sort and activate such information. We would call it memory as in memory in a computer - this requires effort. Even allowing for ease of information in, there comes a point where memory reaches capacity if one thinks of the demon acting freely: achieve capacity and then you have to move stuff out to move stuff in. You cannot have something for nothing.

"The other crucial point is that information to be realised has to be rules-based and embodied. It has to be ordered, and only within a medium it can be transmitted to be made useful.

"I want to give an example of embodied information. One would be a pianola, a piano-like instrument that plays using a roll of paper with holes in it. Rather like the punch cards for an old-fashioned industrial loom, such holes are binary on-off information that instruct work. The information is embodied in the paper with holes, following rules, and putting the paper to work gets you a tune. We can call these holes 'data' contained in the paper and the question is always the minimum amount of embodied data to release a certain amount of information.

"At the same time many of us hold secrets. But secrets are also information, and to hold information is an act of work, and work demands energy. Secrets are definitely embodied, and they are organised.

"Now those of you who are theologically insightful can see where this is going."

I took a look at utterly puzzled faces. Oh dear. Keep Calm and Carry On.

"Christian theology is all about the Word that is embodied, embodied in a man and that man is therefore our deity and our data.

"In technical terms, information must be subject to the laws that say entropy always increases. What this means is that over time we lose the organisational order of things, or the ability for energy to do useful work. Entropy rising means deterioration rising.

"For example: build a sand castle in a desert with its wind and that castle of high organisation and low entropy will deteriorate and end up as part of the high entropy shape of sand dunes maintained by the winds across the desert. The castle was the information, the sand the embodying the data, and the data is concealed into the sand dunes. Or think of a car engine. It always goes from good towards needing repair. Its entropy goes up. You don't buy a poorly working old engine and find that it changes itself to being as good as new. It is so improbable it is ridiculous. What we do as information-bearing people is do work to organise and embody information within a created lower entropy structure."

I thought, 'Oh shit, this is terrible.' I'm not transmitting any information. What a Carry On.

"So, for example, we do work in cooking to use the breaking down of food towards its higher entropy to feed ourselves and use that food ingested to make ourselves become structured with embodied information that we can then transmit."

"No? Back to theology!"

"Jesus Christ is," I said, "the data representing God's effort that dynamically manipulates the increasing entropy of the material world and converts it by his work into embodied divine information. Being incarnate is like being a chef. Yet he shares in the world's entropy. The greatest moment of entropy is the crucifixion itself, the whole agony of the passion that results in his death. And yet that entropy is used: used to do work in the divine sense, and out of it comes the utterly transformative resurrection and signal of redemption for the whole material world. You see, the information died, of the highest entropy, and died with Christ's death, but Christ went down to hell, and when he was raised - when the work was done - he was raised with information embodied and the container was the resurrection body. So it is utterly dynamic."

I looked at Peter. I could even see his widened eyes. There was even a broader modicum of interest, if not quite the nodding heads Pusey had discovered in Germany whenever Christ (and here the resurrection) was mentioned, despite the incomprehensible radical sermon then being delivered.

"I note that the Baha'i faith talks about the manifestation of God and makes a distinction between that and the incarnation that we have. Why? Because it inherits from Islam the necessity of a stricter monotheism. However, Christianity is surely correct to emphasise the body, and the material, because the information of the Word is embodied within the material body of Christ the human, lost in his crushing, and yet, in the transformative energy of the resurrection, is newly able to transmit the information that is the redemption of the world. Entropy was used and reversed in the resurrection. And so here is our incarnation, our crucifixion and our resurrection. Amen."

I went on to preside at the Eucharist, but Peter stayed in his pew despite a prompt from the churchwarden Gertrude Carter (fully recovered, thanks to entropy-lowering medicine) to go and join the short queue to partake.

After the service Peter waited to talk after I'd shaken some hands.

He said, "Manifestation is also a formation of expressed energy. So you can have information manifested."

Crumbs. He understood it? I hoped so.

"But the spiritual is just containerless," I suggested. "That won't go."

"You're saying two persons of the Trinity are containerless. You must be."

"No, because they are embodied in Christ," I said.

"But for you the Holy Spirit does its own work."

"Through humans, animals, created things. My point is it's all via the material, including Christ."

He said, "I want to think about that."

'Back of the net!' I thought.

"Anyway," he went on, "the Muslims might be right to send Jesus into resurrection while still alive. If he dies, you've lost the information. But you cannot lose the information."

"No, you cannot lose information."

"But maximum entropy - death - means the embodying brain is dead."

"It's like Saharan sand all made smooth. The brain has all its past in it, but death makes it inaccessible. I'm not saying his brain switched on again but it was transformed."

Peter said, "I suppose the analogy would be with a black hole. Imagine a book lost down a black hole forever. But, as the book goes in, the book leaves an imprint on the horizon, and that radiates out - radiation happens because the black hole has a finite entropy and therefore you have positive temperature and that radiates."

"What?" I asked.

"I'm trying to work out how information works via crucifixion! Your crucifixion cannot be crucifixion: hence the Muslims' case."

"The point is that as soon as he is a transformed body, that has the information. There is, like in creation," I said, "a dispersal into something re-cohered, but you have continuity and discontinuity. Remember Christ is as wisdom, actually doing the creation. Creation is information. So there is an added insight here..."

"There must be a flaw in your argument," said Peter. "Hmm."

"Nothing is lost, only changed."

"It still doesn't work," he said, "not if crucifixion is death."

"The resurrection draws upon the imprint..."

Barbara Legge nearby then asked, "But did the resurrection actually happen, curate?"

"That we don't know," I said. (Oops. I wasn't supposed to say that.)

"Then what are you on about?" she asked, and walked off and away.

Peter said, "I'm still not happy."

"It is retained by God," I said.

"No, because you said information must be embodied. Clearly it is not embodied after the crucifixion. He is dead; it is maximum entropy. If it is held by God, then it is manifested - the data that holds and then transmits the information. That's like the Spirit."

Some final leavers were rolling their eyes.

"I think he's got you there," said elderly Janet Watt. "Think of someone who dies and all that knowledge and experience has gone. Percy Thrower, Geoff Hamilton."

"Yes, it is a puzzle," I said. "Perhaps we will all be transformed."

Peter said, "It proves my other point: Christianity depends on miracles. It has no logical basis without miracles, to get itself out of its own traps."

"Maybe," I said.

One person hanging back, Charles Rowland, told me that he dealt with Information Communications Technology, but not whether in school or business. "Sounds about right, what you said, but not sure it transfers to religion." Off he went, avoiding an argument.

One person who might have understood my sermon was the diocesan bishop. I took Peter into the vicarage, using my temporary possession of Colin's key. I went on the computer there and grabbed the sound file that had recorded my sermon. I put it on to a USB stick and sent it to Derek Imperial in Wytham, with a note that Peter had heard the sermon.

"This information is embedded in an .MP3 file, held on a USB stick," I said.

"No miracle involved," he commented. Off he went.

In the evening I preached against labelling people and racism. I referred to Jesus's story of the Good Samaritan, of course, and how the Samaritans were labelled. I also said Christianity was intended to be a universal religion, rather as became Islam. Paul was cross-cultural, and probably radical about women too. Koine Greek was an international language, spoken by Jews and Gentiles across the Roman Empire, and it contributed to a wider view of society than the tribal groups.

Of the sermons, I preferred the first, but more understood the second one. Mrs. Carter said she did not miss Morning Prayer now that I had neglected it. Neither did I.

Recording in Church (Monday 8th July)

Just because Colin was away didn't mean I lost my days off - except when the suffragan bishop decided to telephone me, waking me up. Adam was alongside me.

"Bishop John here. Are you still zinging after your ordination? The diocesan thinks he must pursue literature connecting the orgasm and theology. Sorry to criticise you in public, there, but you know why. He likes your sermon on information."

"It's my day off, Bishop."

"But you are holding the fort. It seems no one is on duty at present except Doris Clumber, the volunteer Secretary. Mentoring: Let me suggest names. Connie Wilson."

"No."

"Jim Wilson."

"No."

"Jim is very strong on 'take, bless, break and give' and these are of a Godly model."

"Still no."

"Keith is obviously a no. Stephen McPhail?"

"Possible."

"Helen McPhail?"

"Could do."

"Neither of the McPhails are ordained, of course. Jenny, Jonathan, Tess, Fatima, are so far away."

"Jenny would be great, but she might not think so."

"Maurice Neptune - wrong religion - but he is mainly in Wytham. Maurice might want to be involved with you personally."

"Really?"

"Well, what about me?" he asked.

"Maybe not."

"I suppose you wanted Christine."

"Definitely."

"No one can find her. I cannot imagine she has simply walked off and lost interest; she could be up to something. I'm sorry you don't want to go with me; I'd have willingly found the time. We need at least two bishops to physically meet to make new sacred decisions on you - they will be binding."

"I'll wait for you bishops to make your decisions."

"Two bishops may come on board same time as you are initiated. Now, let's change the subject. One of Colin's responsibilities is a woman called Laura Kingswood. Her address details are in the safe. She is now fifty-one years old. She's suffered abuse from her father, husbands, even her brothers and an all too recent boyfriend from whom she needs protection. That brings us to an intelligent ex-firefighter chap called Andrew Walker."

"Walter. His surname is 'Walter'."

"Colin has mentioned to me that he is worried about Andrew. Not because he is violent, or anything, but because he could be misleading a rather delicate person. Can you visit her please? 3 pm tomorrow."

"Yes."

"One final thing. I received anyway recordings of your sermons. Colin will hear them when back. Is that chap Peter, the apprentice, still with you?"

"He's not 'with' me - he attended the morning service yesterday."

"The microphones were on and recording when you are chatting to this Peter."

So I have that to the diocesan."

"I didn't know other sound was being recorded. The conversation with Peter should be private."

"It's in the church; the diocesan will really like it. So, be in touch very soon. You can work your magic on that young man with my blessing. Goodbye!"

"Shit," I said, once he'd gone. "I knew the sermons went through but all the bloody talk in there is recorded as well!"

"He'll know about Lucinda."

"He might know about me! Make love to me, Adam."

He did, and when done I rolled over, got up, washed, and went downstairs. Adam followed and had breakfast with me.

Later on, Adam, Peter and I went into the vicarage and looked at the computer. As I knew, there was a sermons folder within the church folder. There was a Talks folder - news to me. Both contained hefty sound files. It seemed that any noise inside triggered the recording. The minimum file was five minutes. We found the one with Lucinda arguing and Colin Cromer telling Colin Titan to stop.

"I want to erase this," I said.

"It's too late," Adam said. "It goes through, obviously. Leave things as you find them."

We found nothing from the vestry. Perhaps this is why Colin spoke to me in the vestry often?

Although the computer contained the means to start and stop the settings for recordings, we thought that there must be a switch inside the church itself.

We went into the church. Inside a metal box at the end of a wire was a line of switches. A red one said 'Sound' that was in the 'On' position.

We dropped Peter off at their workplace and then, after looking inside the northern-most house of the terrace, Adam and I went out to sit in my car at Ingle Park.

I opened his flies and my mouth gave his grower attention.

As I swallowed and wiped my mouth, he said, "You're going to be mentored?"

"Yeah. I can do it - to find out stuff at least."

"Who has a personal interest?"

"The rabbi in Wytham, apparently. There you go - I need to find out what's going on."

"You join a cult and dump me for him?"

"Absolutely not. Bishop John knows I liked Christine but she has vanished."

"You'd dump me for Christine."

"Rest assured. She doesn't do personal relationships, even if she is around."

"Christine is a lynchpin for you."

"You could look for her."

"No, this is your thing, your project. I'm not going to look for her."

"I did ask you not to investigate further. I realise I've to investigate and I'm to decide. They can't force me, after all."

Laura Must Move (Tuesday 9th July)

So, next day, with Adam off to work, I went in to the church in my white cassock and, getting her number from the vestry safe, I made the appointment to see Laura Kingswood that very afternoon.

First I went to visit Mr. Yannis Youell for half an hour, who seemed stable but rather feeble, helped in the basics by his wife Eliana. For pleasantries she recalled seeing my father especially and me. I presume mother was in the shop.

I wasn't sure if I would meet Andrew Walter at Laura's, or meet her recent aggressive boyfriend, or what her state would be. Before I got out of the car, I gave my hair a good brushing. It was getting hotter out there.

Her flat was in an old building. I assumed that some housing charity had acquired it and done it up. She'd be subject to all the benefits and clobberings of renting social housing.

"Tell me who you work with," Laura said at the door. Thin Laura was wearing a tee-shirt and nothing behind it, with her belly button exposed, and cut denim shorts with browning legs.

"Colin Cromer."

"What about it?"

"I rang you."

She said, "Does Colin Cromer work for Terry Barman?"

"Yes, if you put it that way." It did seem strange.

"And you are?"

"The Reverend Linda Jupitas."

"Sorry. I can't be too sure."

"Dead right too for asking," I said. She let me in.

After some pleasantries, I asked her about this accommodation.

"It is not registered as social housing," she told me, showing me around. "My landlord is kind, and does do the repairs. Ms Vine. She owns the building. She knows Terry Barman. She advised me to know Colin Cromer locally."

I could tell that Laura was in transition, to move out. She said that it was really important that her ex did not discover the next accommodation, and Christine Vine had said she would find her somewhere else. Friends would have to keep quiet about where.

I said, "We have pastoral rules about confidentiality."

"The chap I'm staying with temporarily knows about confidentiality." she said.

"Andrew Walter," I said.

"See, you know who I'm staying with. I've been told that you are in The Worshipful Company of Serninsea Players."

"About to be. Are you?"

"About to be."

"Are you sure you want to be?" I asked her.

"It has confidentiality, Reverend Jupitas."

"Well, the Church has its pastoral rules and we don't tell. If it reassures you, I can tell you that your address isn't even on the vicarage computer. It was placed in the safe."

"Andrew Walter is in The Worshipful Company. He is disabled."

"He is also intelligent, philosophical and has rescued people. I met him with his rather advanced views on psychology and counselling theory. His life is changing."

"My ex-boyfriend, the bastard, discovered - and I don't know how - where I live. I went ballistic after he rang me and he told me he knows my address. And this after I managed to get a good landlord."

"Use the police. This man obviously worries you."

"I told him: if he comes here, I'll call the police. Andrew and friends will help. Christine has helped me a lot. But we have a problem, Andrew and me."

"What is that?"

"We can no longer have Christine advising Andrew. The bishops met yesterday afternoon. She was not my mentor, but because Andrew is a new member she has checked he is mentoring me properly. It can be challenging."

Now this concerned me. Laura was clearly troubled and left in a delicate state. I didn't like the idea of Andrew mentoring her at all, and nor did I like the news that they were caught up in the group isolating Christine.

"How has Christine treated you - I mean, under this Confraternity thing?"

"Andrew has listened to her. I'm caught both ways: I wanted and gained her oversight, but now I can't have it; but how can I stop her when she is my landlord? She got me moved. Terry Barman says deal with her as a landlord but not as anything else."

"This situation is not good enough," I said.

"Come on, we must go to Andrew's. I only stay here briefly."

"Perhaps I should have met you at Andrew's. (This was arranged by Barman; I hoped he wasn't putting Laura in danger.)"

She took out her phone from her bag. "Andrew? Yeah, I've got a Reverend Linda here from the parish church."

"I know her. Come together."

She told me, "Christine is also his landlord."

Off we went, Laura locking up. I said, "Let's use my car even if we can walk. So I drove the short distance to the property I'd seen before, and she gave Andrew an embrace and kiss. I put out my hand for a handshake, which he took."

"Still doing the psychology?" I asked, in order to say something.

"Oh yes."

Laura told us, "I'm nervous there. I've got to move fast, Andrew."

He said to me, "We'll drink tea now, but we'll have sandwiches later. We would have had a mentoring event with our coming guest, but I have to tell her we must stop."

"Then I will overview it, if you want."

"You're not yet in, though, are you?"

"No. And what of Christine?"

"She'd have to ask and repent to come back in; Christine would have to obey very closely. She is formally excluded by orgasmic decision. I'm charged with telling her."

So we had green tea and he said, "Gestalt is so useful. Fred and Laura - Laura again! - Perls, after the First World War. Laura knew Paul Tillich and Martin Buber, the I-Thou man. Do you know them?"

"Not personally," I joked.

"I want to use these with you, Laura. So Gestalt's origins are Freud, obviously, Reich on the body, Buber himself, and a number of Gestalt psychologists before you get to the therapy."

Laura asked, "What does Gestalt mean?"

"Patterns," he said, "that make up a coherent shape. Phenomenological, I think. Anyway, er, Goldstein, on a sort of equilibrium and actualising, and you've got theatre, dance, Eastern ideas, existentialism. Er, I think that's it. Well, was avant garde at the time."

"So it got going," I said, only half listening as I was contemplating Christine's arrival.

"Well, it had to disperse out of Germany, and then there was South Africa and USA - the human potential movement, and part of the general humanistic approach to actualising oneself. Now the problem with it was a reliance on Fred Perls as a founder, people picking bits from it, and the lack of systematic approaches."

"A problem with cult religion as well," I said. "Dependence on a founder. So has it lost its place?" I asked.

"Now it is more holistic, longer term, but practical, and deals with processes; but is a bit playful perhaps and postmodern too."

"And so it has established itself," I supposed.

"It bubbled up in London, Manchester, Edinburgh; well, first there were Americans and workshops, then people did more training and sort of set up a profession. What was radical and experimental has been somewhat shaped by professional needs, apparently."

I asked, "So is it relevant?"

"It is, for what we are doing here. We explore, develop, change, become. We are both biological and social, so we embody holistically what goes on. Culture we embody. We react and respond."

"This follows," I said. "Theological parallels too."

"We organise ourselves into patterns, and we adjust as the environment shapes us creatively. Some are even creative in hostile environments."

Laura was wide-eyed and very attentive. I said, "This sounds a bit like the diocesan's recent lecture in Wytham."

"Let me have a copy. But we also have 'disturbance': the inability to respond creatively. What was once creative and been achieved becomes inadequate. If healthy we can respond positively, but if disturbed we can't. And being disturbed can be just as simple as being overwhelmed by a situation. Laura: you were overwhelmed by your boyfriend and struggling to respond. Your responses have been fear and flight: fixed Gestalt responses that are inadequate, from which there is therapy to put into place responses that are more self-confident. Chaotic times that we have do not help in gaining a good equilibrium to function in life. Basic needs can be undermined, compromised. Basic needs obviously come first."

I wanted to be positive about this over-theorising (something I did myself). I said, "I don't know why we clergy don't do more with this stuff. We might be too assured of our own speculations."

"He's very clever," Laura said. The doorbell went. "I'll go!"

He continued: "So lots of Gestalts and life cycles are coming and going. But some Gestalts like violent urges should be interrupted, and you need flexibility. I mean. Going for a shit is a solitary activity but so much else involves others."

Christine it was who spoke: "You talking your psychology stuff; you ought to invest your mind in some theology."

"Well," I said, "I think we can use..."

"Hello, Linda," Christine said to me. "So what are you doing here?"

"I wonder myself. Ostensibly, visiting."

"I recall that Colin Cromer is away."

"Yes, John Barman suggested I come."

"At a time that is regular visiting by me, combining landlord and mentoring oversight duties."

Andrew tried to speak.

I said, instead, "Obviously he wants me to find out what you are doing."

"If he thinks you and I have some sort of connection then he's wrong, Linda. I was doing Confraternity matters at the retreat. That's all it was."

Now Andrew did speak, "Bishop Terry also contacted me, and I'm charged to say that you can't do oversight of us, Christine. This makes things awkward. The bishops made an orgasmic decision: you are formally excluded. To come back in, you must plead, repent, and must agree to obey in detail."

"Predictable," she said. "I have accommodation for you, Laura. It is fortunate and unfortunate that it has 'Goosechat' Internet workers upstairs. But it is bigger than your existing flat and I'll soon have something better, your own place."

"Goosechat?" Laura asked.

"Sex workers: no actual clients on the premises, Laura, and they're nice women in their fifties, doing an oldies' service. Andrew, I've arranged a woodworker to do some alcove shelves for you, for all your books and media beyond the shelves you've got. Does that meet your requirements?"

"Yes, it does."

"Don't worry about the mentoring oversight. I'll leave before you two get busy."

I asked Christine if I could talk to her alone. She agreed.

"I'm a bit concerned that Laura should be involved in this anyway. This turns on a sixpence into abuse."

"I know it does," said Christine. "I was happy about Andrew joining and he has joined now, but not Laura, who was his suggestion. That's why I argued that I should overview the situation. I got the bishops to agree, but he's an intelligent chap and can follow the procedures."

"So who's to overview them now?"

"Obviously I don't know. You?"

"I'm not in yet. Anyway, I might go heavy on this, regarding Laura, as her parish priest."

"That won't go down well, in direct conflict with your new Vanguard."

"But what are you doing now? You are still a deacon in the National Church?"

"No, I'm not. The letter has gone in. Barman will know today."

"No longer at Wheaton?"

"I went there for the purposes of the Confraternity group, to be ordained for its purposes. I owe them nothing and they owe me nothing."

"What happened to all that obeying bishops and apostolic authority?"

"I still believe it. But I would say this to you, Linda. This 'inefficiency report', let's call it, is going to be a nasty matter. Barman may not survive it, nor Worsley, and especially Imperial, and if this Confraternity comes to light you'd better not be in it. It will sweep everyone away who is in it. If the public get to know about it, your concerns for Laura will be exactly how the public view the whole thing: secret, wrong, exploitative, cultic."

"You must have known this: you encouraged me to join."

"Listen: people in the know told me only yesterday that this report is very bad, and, secondly, I had some ideas for us going underground more. Trouble is, Barman can't stop being a salesman. That Serninsea Cross brooch is an obvious con, but he can't let go. It isn't a Confraternity matter, but it attracts attention, and he did say it was a 'find' when the twins knew it wasn't. And then, on a selfish angle, I wasn't employed by the Church and you are, so I don't lose if it all goes pear shaped."

I asked Christine if we can keep in touch. She wanted to keep her distance, knowing full well that George Wickenby would be following her, like he had followed me. She had properties to buy from Ann and Labhaoise so would be seen.

She returned to Laura and asked her to go with her instantly to the new property. Then she would get a removal firm to shift her goods over.

Christine said to me, "I look after my tenants; so these are my theological principles in action. There'll be no time for mentoring today."

"Yes. Good."

So Christine went off with Laura, and left me with Andrew.

"She's delicate, is Laura: you understand that, Andrew."

He said he'd do nothing to hurt her. Then he kicked off his theory, again. "Initiations done properly can be Gestalt, Linda, and I think ours are. Psychological disturbance is where a Gestalt is dysfunctioning or can't be completed and what happens is habitual and ineffective. It's as if you should go through the cycle again with new sensing, awareness, action and understanding, so that the matter gets resolved. So, via initiation, change is about becoming who you are and by running the Gestalts you run better." Andrew had not stopped: "The client is assessed in a sense for the level of disturbance and what can become more positive. And then therapists focus on client bodily awareness, maybe via meditation, or focus on what is missing - sometimes that you are doing this in a binary sense so therefore you are not doing the other."

I thought at this point that this man is unsuitable to be mentoring. His head is so full of theory that he cannot see the simple problem that Laura is not substantive enough for, basically, sexual acts and intercourse inside a religious ritual. Even I would be challenged.

This was all too easily abuse. In fact, Christine's exclusion had just saved Laura from a group-based fucking, and Laura did not need this.

Meanwhile, surely, Barman would expect me to report back.

Concerns Expressed to the Bishop

Adam was with me at home when my mobile phone rang. I asked Adam to listen in, but stay absolutely silent and keep it confidential.

"Bishop Terry here. Did Christine Vine visit her tenant?"

"Yes she did."

"What's she doing?"

"Her secular work; she was dealing with Laura."

"What about her institutional religious life?" he asked.

"She said she still believes it."

"Such beliefs about obeying bishops and apostolic authority have to be realised somehow."

"Something else, bishop. Why is Laura being mentored at all? She is wholly unsuited for it."

"That's a decision we took; we did have a position where Christine was offering oversight."

"Well, there's no one doing that now and, anyway, Laura is too delicate: it can amount to abuse."

"We've discussed all this. Regardless, I'm ringing to tell you that you will benefit from Stephen McPhail's experience as mentor and I will initiate you. His mentoring is both sides of the initiation."

"I don't like this one bit - about Laura."

"It's not your decision. You are a priest under apostolic authority selected by the bishops of the Confraternity. You come under our authority now and you must show your obedience. When you were ordained priest, that was it: you became an extension of the bishops, doing what the bishops can do in the full ritual sense."

"I gave and give obedience to the diocesan."

"The Vanguard takes priority."

"Really? You can't enforce it. The group is existentially vulnerable."

"We can enforce it. Don't consider getting hostile, Linda. We want your parish life to be harmonious now. Vanguard groups can hide, dissolve and resurrect. We do not lay down trackable evidence. With your ordination, do you not now have a purpose and believe in that purpose?"

"It must be honest and it must be right. Laura is fragile."

"We listen to advice and we have good procedures. Stephen - yes, as mentor - will tell you about protections and reporting back. Laura will get oversight very soon. We can take effective action."

"Have you received a letter from Christine," I asked.

"She told you that. Yes, she has resigned the office of Deacon. We'll let her go, but we are not losing you. You have your purpose to develop the original blessing of the body. Ken Osis had second thoughts. As a priest he is also under our authority, and he had no right to change his mind. And he thinks positively again. On this positive note I will end this call. You must see Stephen McPhail when he calls you to Ingle Barrow. God bless and goodbye for now."

I asked Adam, "What do you make of that?"

"Well, I wondered how long it would be before your blinkers came off."

"What do you mean?"

"Joining a cult."

"I happen to think that their basic point is right, and we can work to that purpose."

"You went all misty eyed with your ordination. Given your upset with the parish and your doubts, you latched on to this purpose. You forgot that they were following you around, concealing, lying, and playing around with plastic badges. And they are still doing it."

"That's what vanguards are like! They end up being secretive when their purpose is perceived as contrary to their host institution. They're ritualistic with a strong sense of knowing insiders and ignorant outsiders."

"Look," said Adam. "This bishop made you that timed appointment with Laura, so he is still manipulating you, to find out what Christine is doing, and also gave Wickenby the opportunity to follow her."

"Adam, what do you think I should do?"

"Why ask me? You do what you want, anyway."

"What would you do if you were me?"

"I'm not you."

"You know what I mean: strategy."

"Hmm. I tend to play along, evaluate the situation more, and choose a good moment to get out."

"You would see Stephen McPhail."

"Play along. Don't reveal your contrary opinion - if you have one. You learn more."

"This is sexual stuff, Adam. Do you object?"

"I'm not in love with you, Linda. You're like a good mate: I enjoy you. You might have been obsessed with Christine, but I can see that you're not obsessed with me."

"I'm concerned about matters, yes. Thanks for your advice. I do appreciate it. I am prepared."

"I can see this will test you."

Seeing the Nurse Again (Wednesday 10th July)

"I need to see you regularly," said Sister Alice Peers. "This is Christopher Richardson, in his first year of training, so can he observe?"

"Of course."

"Undress everything below. I have a dilator here, and I am going to place it in your rectum. What I want to see is you try and squeeze on it. Christopher, all these online notes explain how the Reverend Mrs. Jupitas has a tendency towards incontinence caused by damage inflicted from more than twenty years ago by her now husband using various metal devices on a consistent basis. It has become a matter of inconvenience in her work."

I bent over, felt it go in and tried to squeeze on it.

She asked me, "Clearly, there is some improvement. Mrs. Jupitas carries out regular, simple, pelvic floor exercises when sat down. Do you feel stronger after your exercises, Linda?"

"I think I do."

"And how do you evacuate recently, Mrs. Jupitas?"

"I go regularly. I try to get ahead of the curve."

"Good."

Christopher asked, "So there is no need to examine one of her stools?"

"She knows what foods to avoid. Linda, I'd like to look in your vaginal area."

So now I sat on the resting couch, and brought my legs up as she inserted a speculum.

"This is the contrast," she said to Christopher. "We want this deeper and wider, and the anal area narrower. Are you still having anal sex, Linda?"

"My new partner isn't interested. He'd rather go in the front way."

"Best to keep him uninterested. Christopher: this is very rare. Hold the torch."

Christopher asked, "Jupitas is your married name, but you have a new partner?"

"I'm using the surname for now."

"See, Christopher? No cervix; her clitoris is obvious, her urethra is below, and then... there is nothing. Christopher, how much difference has all this pushing with dilators made?" she asked while he was directing a light to see between the metalwork.

"It's created a shape." Christopher asked, "And what about when your new man ejaculates into you?"

"It runs out."

The nurse said, "I'll take this out. Dr. Gujjar said he did not have a chance to examine your throat. You said this was affected as well."

"I have lost the reflexes I once had. Same time as my anus was stretched."

"So if I put my five inch proctoscope into your throat, to look, you would be able to take it."

"Yes."

Leaving me bare below, she said, "Open your mouth wide then." The nurse pushed the proctoscope in and then removed the obturator, a light shining in my throat. She said, "This is too unusual. Look, I can move this around and push in further, and you are not reacting and you are quite dry to it as well. Take a look in, Christopher." A moment on she removed the item. "Do you need a drink?"

"No."

"Did your husband interfere with your breasts, or anything else?"

"Only some slapping. He took part in the dilating I did for a time."

"Do you examine your breasts?"

"Not too often."

"May I examine them?"

"Yes."

"Take off your top and..." I did. "Why aren't you wearing a bra? These are large breasts, Mrs. Jupitas, and they need support."

"I don't wear underwear."

"Being braless is not recommended, especially when you're exercising! Those with larger breasts, like you, should feel more comfortable in a well-fitted bra."

"Right. Bras get uncomfortable after a long day, especially any underwires. The constricting sensation of wearing a bra for hours can impede blood circulation to the chest and back, which can lead to aching back muscles. People use bras when they need better posture and back support from seats."

"That much is true..."

"Bras sit against the areas that perspire. Bras absorb sweat and dirt from the skin and can cause skin irritation and even acne. Clogged pores are no joke! No bra means you sweat less and dry faster."

"Bras cannot prevent sagging with age, or make breasts perkier."

"Going braless is a step towards demystifying the female chest. Once you get used to being braless you have comfort of the natural body. You get a better night's sleep too."

"Thank you for your counter-lecture," said the nurse. She pressed around my breasts and I raised each arm. "Hmm. Hairless under your arms as well. Of course, you will be. Christopher, do you see? Feel under her arms. As I said, Mrs. Jupitas is an intersex person, of about one in about twenty thousand. Maybe. This surgery used to examine her elder sister, who is the same. Don't put that in your report. You can see how her features vary from the average. I think you have a lot of writing up to do, here, but you must not identify her name of course nor her profession. Many nurses never get to see an intersex woman. Mrs. Jupitas is genetically male, phenotypically female, gender female and..."

"Bisexual," I said.

"Are you completely bisexual, Mrs. Jupitas?"

"I could have fallen for a woman very recently. A female ordinand on retreat seduced me. I loved her but I can't now."

"Ah. Christopher. This is information you must handle with care. Having sex with men and women affects Mrs. Jupitas's sexual health and her career. She is in Holy Orders, after all."

He said, "May I ask, are these regular partners?"

"Er..."

"I'm not sure you should," said the senior nurse. "But do you want to answer?"

"As well as sex overnight with my new male partner, I did have intimate sex with this female ordinand, and I think I'm about to have regular sex with another man and some others and, I can guess ahead, an ordained woman lecturer."

The student's eyes and mouth were wide open.

Nurse Peers said to me, "Please practise safe sex, Mrs. Jupitas. You are clearly very sexually active. There was nothing untoward in your recent blood sample. I think we'd better take a swab and can you pee at all?"

So it was back with my legs up again, and the student watched while the nurse inserted another speculum to take a swab, popped the swab in a plastic container and wrote on the label, and threw the speculum in the sink.

"Do you want me to pee here?" I asked.

"No, put your clothes on, go out to the toilet, and while we write notes we will wait for you to come back. Here is a container. Pee into that."

"I want to... You don't want me to evacuate?"

"Can you?" she asked.

"It's what I'm saying."

"Then let's take advantage. Here's a card and some throw away spatulas. Use a spatula and smear on to these three areas, and fold the tabs over. The lab only needs the tiniest amount under each tab."

"What do I shit on?"

"Put some toilet paper on the loo seat and go on that. Smear from there, and then drop your waste and tissue into the bowl and flush. We'll disinfect the loo seat afterwards."

"Can he help me? I don't want to make a mess. Once I go I go."

"Christopher. Accompany Mrs. Jupitas to the disabled loo and use this consented experience to your benefit. You can put it in your report."

The upshot was that he did all the actions other than the actual shitting and pissing. On my advice he held up two overlapping paper towels for my dump. As he held the container, I apologised for peeing on his fingers, which he washed of course. He checked my arse and wiped it. Outside the cubicle, he presented the folded card to his trainer and she directed him to the envelope needed and pointed to the bin for the paper towels.

"Anything else, Mrs. Jupitas?" Nurse Alice asked me.

"No."

"Carry on with the exercises and establish a clear routine. Evacuate regularly. And please practise safe sex with all your partners. We know you can't get pregnant but you can catch all the nasties. And get yourself a decent bra."

And that was that. I was pretty sure that Christopher had a boner, but he behaved impeccably. I went directly to Patricia's, to lie naked with Diana, who heard all about my experience with Sister Alice and student Christopher.

Diana said, "Honestly: 'Please help me, I might make a mess.' Poor sod."

Stephen McPhail and Jenny World (Thursday 11th July)

The call came to see Stephen McPhail, and so, based partly on Adam's advice, and with my own plumbing inspected, I went down to Ingle Barrow and its spaced row of posh houses to meet the Bishop of Bolingbroke's plumber.

Helen his wife was present, and the first thing was a welcome from both and then we moved from their kitchen to their large lounge with glasses of wine and a juice for me.

Stephen told me that they have a mentoring programme to take initiates to membership with The Worshipful Company of Serninsea Theatrical Players and then beyond for a short period, after which the person becomes a full participant. The Vanguard was its purpose, directed by the bishops in the Confraternity of the Theocratic Principality of the English National Church, or Principatus Theocratici Confraternitati admissis in Ecclesia Anglicana Nationalibus. That was them; we were 'under' the Confraternity. "We don't have Anglican authority in this set-up: there is no lay membership, the authority is purely episcopal, the Eucharist table is open."

"What concerns me is the apparent compulsion."

"The lack of choice concerns priests only. This is because of their special ontological change, as the bishops put it. By the way, we make a point of calling the Wytham suffragan Bishop Terry. Jonathan is still Jonathan. We call Elizabeth a variety of names, but some call her 'Tess' which we get from her being Tees of the Diocesans, like Thomas Hardy's Tess of the d'Urbervilles. You get a badge at initiation, and it is having that available that can tell another member that you are in one of the linked groups, currently three, soon to be five."

"I know all this," I said, "but I was concerned about one of the initiates."

"You had a disagreement with Terry."

Helen said, "I will now oversee Andrew and Laura. Laura achieved the lowest rung of retail management, even though now she isn't working."

"Reading between the lines, she's been raped several times by a violent ex-boyfriend, who found her change of address. And I am telling you more than I should."

"This group isn't only for the very fit and able," said Helen. Jenny, your past friend, has issues and why Fatima keeps her eye on her. Jenny loves sex, and that's the difference. She would really like to 'turn' Anna Ozga her way, when once Anna turned Jenny her way. Anna, despite now being a priest, is not a candidate of ours.

Laura, however, has said she loves consensual sex, though one of those she manged became obsessed and violent. She says she is happy with Andrew. Some who have been raped do have a broad sex life, before, after or both. I was raped."

"The danger for many of us," I said, "is repeated patterns of behaviour: relying on the next one along, who turns out to be just as unreliable."

"Well, Andrew is not unreliable," Helen said. "Look, the bishops came to a decision based on her job, experiences and willingness. Just as God is in suffering, God is in rape."

"That doesn't make it good. I suppose Christine addressed this."

"We obviously don't accept anybody and everybody. We select the capable and then make our approaches. Andrew offers his experience and intellect, his psychology and psychotherapy, and Laura offers her desire for sexual openness. But I will overview him, now. When he advises and acts, sexually, I will be there."

Stephen said, "You and I now need to begin our mentoring process. And we should start with nothing more than getting in the bath together as a kind of clean start, symbolically, and I'll go through the mentoring process with you."

"OK. Are you coming, Helen?"

"No no: Stephen is the mentor."

So we went up to one of their bathrooms, and he ran the water into the bath in the centre of the bathroom designed for two with central taps. The toilet only had a curtain to draw around it. On this occasion, if I needed to pee, I could do so privately, but he just undressed and pissed. I didn't care. Undressed myself, I sat on the toilet and peed noisily.

Stephen said to me that some items in the mentoring process hardly needed introduction, but nevertheless he had to go through them. We got into the water where the heat of the water in was controlled by an automatic thermostat. I might have had it cooler.

As it happened, Helen did come in to see us in the water, as she brought Stephen his forgotten laminated Mentoring List. "Enjoy!" she said to us, leaving.

"We have Eight Guidances. The First Guidance is to obey the bishops. They listen, but they decide. There are exceptions to immediate obedience. And the exceptions are commercial, pastoral and personal relationship confidentiality. So we'll do this in more detail soon, but you can claim opt-outs on these three demonstrable bases."

"If I was a Methodist minister, say, would I have a choice?"

"Apostolically ordained priests must obey so the opt outs must be demonstrable."

"The bishops then know..."

"'Demonstrable' does mean you give the area of concealment: it is very tight. Now, I have some bottled bath soap here and a sponge: you can allow me wash you after you've done some on yourself. Stand up."

I said, looking down at him, "Christine walked away as a deacon."

"The instruction - and it is relevant to obeying - is to forget Christine. Helen ignored your earlier reference. So I'm not answering. The Second Guidance is to be secretive outside and revealing inside. Bishops instruct who is to talent scout, and when you have your badge you reveal it partially only to those we target. We do by default conceal and by instruction reveal to outsiders. We are the Vanguard and must protect our existence and identity. We try not to lie but sometimes it is forced upon us by necessity or for the greater good."

"As happened to me."

"Do your stomach and breasts now. Keith was secretive to you, but also he revealed much; but he did conceal aspects of your sexual relationship with him, on the basis of personal relationship confidentiality."

"What did he conceal?"

"We don't know! He claimed personal relationship confidentiality and he is laity. Otherwise he told us all about you. He said you have special circumstances of birth and upbringing. That was enough - we do take much on trust. We can often help one another, through openness."

"There was Ken Osis not letting on what happened with my friend Diana and me."

"Quite. The Third Guidance is that you must engage in rituals. Bishops and priests must not avoid them. You have a habit of avoiding Morning Prayer in your parish. We do have opt outs and variants for other religions and the secular, but with an open table we insist on participation in the Body Eucharist for all at some stage. Yojana uses Krishna, for example. At the moment, if you can't do the Body Eucharist, you can't join, because it is the initiation rite. We intend to use this ritual more often and it remains under development. Bishops and priests carry it out. You must join us and you must do it."

"Presumably without this it doesn't work."

"Do your left arm please. The Fourth Guidance is that you are obliged to have sex with bishops. Bishops will ask to have sexual access to your body, and outside ritual you can say no but you must say why and understand that saying no is contrary to openness. If a bishop wants to have sex with you, you should regard it as an honour and treat it in a holy fashion. When a bishop meets you pastorally, you may well end up having sex with them as part of that meeting. It helps us all bond together under authority. Right arm."

"Makes sense."

"The Fifth Guidance is getting happy with casual social nudity and enjoying broad sexual contact. It hardly affects you: I mean, you were lying on the beach with us and you have quite a sexual history. During mentoring you'll have regular sex with me and with people invited in. Gretta-Cox Jenkins is not a member of the group, but you will be hosting her after tomorrow's lecture."

"I assumed so."

"The bishops have decided and stated via me as your mentor that, if she wants it, you must offer her full personal hospitality as if she is in one of the groups under the Confraternity. She might get a group going in Canada. I'm also inviting Rabbi Maurice Neptune to meet you, and arranging a stranger to fuck you."

"I'm sure we will have a good time."

"Quite. Better not lift your leg, because I'll do your left leg. Just stand and wait. I think the complication with Maurice is he wants you to be his wife, but that would be up to you. We'd prefer him over Adam Magellan, and the question is whether the Reformist Jews would accept a priest as the wife of a rabbi. But we don't instruct on marriage or other partners, other than you retaining sexual relations with the rest of the group."

"I'm going to stand now and feel your body." He did as he said.

"Your legs are very smooth. The Sixth Guidance is on achieving orgasms and learning the theology of the orgasm. You might think this is the First Guidance, but the fact it comes sixth is no more than logical ordering. So when you and I have sex first, and when you service Gretta, if she wants it, and have Maurice, and receive the stranger, we expect orgasms on both sides. It is not just enjoying sex with multiple partners but coming with each to the glorious state of ecstasy. If you orgasm first, do not neglect theirs. We simply reject all notions of Western Christian sin and restraint when it comes to expressions of love and ecstasy.

"Turn around, bend over and hold the sides of the bath. I'll wash your arse and legs. The Seventh Guidance is what to expect at and from the initiation itself. Both parties orgasm and should closely together if possible; you have to exchange body fluid from the initiator to the initiated, and this can be something like sperm, naturally made lubricant, spittle, urine, shit if you want, menstrual blood. If you give fluid back, it's all to the good, but it is the bishop's that must come to you, and you never send theirs back. For example, if a male bishop discharges his sperm in your mouth, you don't then kiss him so that he receives some back. You might offer back, say, menstrual blood, if you're on your period. So you receive their gift, and do receive it. By the way, we value women in the Vanguard offering sex when menstruating. After the initiation, there should be the opportunity to have sex with several others. How are you if I use my hand to wash your vulva now?"

"Fine." I turned and he began that action.

"It follows that, before and after the initiation, and regularly, you do need sex health certificates and can use birth control. Julie Manns of the Margate group wanted a baby, father unknown."

"It's Jonathan's."

"Probably. Fatima in Hartlepool had a child, Akemi, father is known. We really do not like barriers. We are all about exchanging fluids, so it also follows that, outsiders need sexual health checks. Keith, seeing Cheryl, got himself regularly checked. He is secretive with her about this group - she does not know about us."

"Ah ha. So he went to the sexual health clinic far more often than I ever realised."

From behind a soapy finger went into my vagina.

"Linda, you are incredibly tight. Keith did say this but to experience is to believe. He vouched for your sexual health before you went to Margate, although he activated relationship confidentiality on the actual gynaecology you undergo. In any case you were outside the group, so we took his word for it. Jonathan said you were tight. I think you're washed. Turn around and we'll sit back in the water."

"What's the Eighth Guidance?"

"Basically, you might want to raise concerns, say on a group member, or what is being done. A bit like you have been doing already. It's a safety valve, if you like. The Eighth Guidance is to raise matters of concern confidentially with the bishops. If unsatisfied, we have a Counsellor of Complaint, who is Ken Osis. He still does that role. Given where you are, would you like to wank me in the bath?"

"Sure, and I'll blow you too if you lift it up."

So this is what happened, and the plumber was responsive with his own pipe extended, and he experienced his pipe far down my throat.

"God help me; seeing and feeling really is believing," said the plumber.

Sliding his penis right out, I said, "Thomas again," and he went right back in, his penis pressing upward going down my throat. His body movements told me he was about to ejaculate, and so I then guided that sperm upwards, and he saw it actually come out of my nostrils.

He said, recovered, "Helen can do it a bit, but it has never come out of her nose."

"As I said to Connie, it mustn't go into the lungs. So it has to go somewhere, and unless your knob is removed then up the nose is a good a place as any."

"When you are initiated, you can give us all a tutorial. Actually, that idea isn't mine. Connie on the phone suggested a tutorial. You told her in detail how to do it. We all could benefit."

"And you orgasmed."

"What else was it? Do you not want an orgasm?"

"Not particularly. Treat it as a gift, a theological concept if ever there was one."

"Wrong answer!" He put his finger curled upwards into my vagina and he did bring me to the right conclusion.

"Pray, Linda. You should pray."

"Thank you Holy Spirit for your gift of orgasm."

"Make it all more immediate next time."

"When we were dried and dressed, he couldn't wait to tell Helen what I had done with him inside my lower neck. Meanwhile, Helen had something to show me.

Through to her own study and on her desktop computer was a podcast. It was of Jenny World, the one-time Jenny Masters. She was speaking and it had all the delivery of a sermon. She spoke of a hanging man, and a hanging man could no more perform in his own unhangings as we could in removing our own sin. Grace was purely one way: as vertical as the rope and as one way as gravity. What an image!

Helen said, "She is being secretive, properly. She is the biggest sinner around!"

Indeed, it struck me as formulaic throughout. We ministers of religion learn to read between the lines, and look for nuances. So I was reading - or misreading - between her lines.

Jenny had said, God had decided salvation for individuals from eternity, and although we might behave well and show the fruits of salvation, we can never be sure: neither in history, nor in culture, nor in institutions. Yes, people showed one another signs of their conviction that they are saved, and produced a moral community, but only God knows.

This formula was age-old Calvinism. That might indicate a postmodern mind taking refuge in a bubble of the premodern, or it was of no modern mind whatsoever. What I'd expect is some reference to contemporary life, and there was none, other than, "...this includes us in Hartlepool," which was incredibly tame. A sermon that belonged in the Wee Wee Frees had no cultural 'way in' that contemporary evangelicals find: they attack contemporary culture and yet are happy to use it as entertainment for a hook. And this was not there. It would have suited only some remote Scottish Protestant island, once translated into Gaelic.

Jenny's preaching could not have come from the person I knew who once went into charismatic and evangelical religion fearing her sexuality. Obviously not, if now she liked plenty of sex.

I was surprised just how religious were Stephen and Helen. I left them being told that God had favoured me, and I would be purposeful under the guidance of the Spirit.

Knowing the URL, I found Jenny's podcasts when lying in bed with Adam. He said to me, "I don't understand any of this stuff; it seems olde-worlde to me. She seems as remote as ever."

Adam confirmed that when she left him it was with a huge doubt about who she was sexually. He said this preaching sounds formulaic. She either depended on this stuff for mental stability or it was a front.

Adam in bed asked me about my view of the group.

I said, "I'm definitely going along with it for the time being. If I do have to extract myself, at some point, I might then need some assistance. I'm not going to tell you where I'm going or doing on a daily basis, so just let me see how it goes. But," I said, "I can list the Eight Guidances for you. Are you interested?"

"Yeah. Shoot!"

"The First Guidance is to obey the bishops with commercial, pastoral and personal relationship confidentiality exceptions.

"The Second Guidance is to be secretive outside and revealing inside."

"Unlike you now," said Adam.

"The third Guidance is that I must engage in rituals - the Body Eucharist and initiation, often together I think. The bishop gives you a body fluid to absorb.

"The Fourth Guidance is that I am obliged to have sex with bishops."

"Lucky them," he said.

"The Fifth Guidance is getting happy with casual social nudity and enjoying broad sexual contact."

"Lucky you," Adam added.

"The Sixth Guidance is on achieving orgasms and learning the theology of the orgasm.

"The Seventh Guidance is about the initiation.

"The Eighth Guidance is about raising concerns via the bishops and the Counsellor of Complaint."

"Who's that?"

"Ken Osis. But I'm not sure what he is supposed to do with such information."

"You tell me this but you don't want me to investigate."

"I'm just letting you know, as I investigate," I told Adam.

"You are having an each-way bet. You're a good mate, you are - good to be with overnight - and an ordained slut."

Lecturer of Many Greek Words (Friday 12th July)

Thursday later Keith had returned back home and slept alone in the second bedroom, grumbling about being back.

Friday and a text from Bishop Barman told me that I was expected to host Gretta Cox-Jenkins and make sure I introduced myself to her. I followed Adam to his workplace. I had a dark blue blouse on and a long similar blue skirt, one of the few times I wore a skirt. I did not wear clerical identification. I told Adam, in his office, "You're at your own place tonight - sorry - as I am entertaining this Canadian theologian late into the night."

Adam showed a level of displeasure: "I suppose we said this wasn't the usual sort of relationship."

"It was only some days ago you had difficulty even touching me."

"It's not about sex all the time. It's about how you and I relate to each other."

"'Mates,' you said. I want my freedom and I want to find out."

"When you're a fucking clergywoman!"

"I am a fucking clergywoman, and I'll have a quick word with Peter."

"He has a girlfriend. I even feel protective."

"Irrelevant to what I want to say."

So at the reception room with Adam following, I asked Peter, "Do you want to come to this lecture? It's by a Gretta Cox-Jenkins, a radical theologian. Might be your sort of thing."

"I went to hear your diocesan bishop. I don't know how he can say all those creeds."

"She's a Canadian, Lutheran now I think, but she once was independent or something."

"I can't come. I'm seeing Kathryn. Not that I won't go to another. Let me know what you think."

"See you. I am exercising still. I'm finding muscles I did not know I had."

"And using those you know you do," said Adam.

Peter said, "So this magic display will have specific religious messages."

"Yes. We'll consult. I may as well go to Wytham now and make it a day out. Colin Cromer is back Sunday evening. I rather wish he wasn't."

In fact I went first to see Mr. Youell and his wife. That done, I cleared my head by looking in on the second hand bookshop down Toulouse Street, just to browse. Sometimes they get something in, and I bought Godless Morality by Richard Holloway. I hadn't read this before. I went to see Jagjit and Gurinder Kapoor, buying some sweets for the journey and hearing rumours of SMS's demise locally.

Then it was off to Wytham, for time in the town as well as for the evening lecture. In the course of my wanderings, I spotted Maurice Neptune's Reformist synagogue in the city, so made a note of its location.

I took the car to near the cathedral and inside sussed out that the lecturer was this rather rounded five foot woman using walking sticks. The gathering was much less that it had been for the bishop.

I approached her, looking down on her head and oversized bosom (she was in mufti, like me), and said, "Hi, I'm Linda, and you're staying at mine tonight."

"Ah, you're the curate on the coast," redhead Gretta said with an expected Canadian accent.

"Yes. Just over forty miles, I'm afraid."

"Some of us commute that far every day outside Toronto."

I said, "Well, be my guest and thanks."

"It's for me to say thanks," she added. "I will see you after."

Ken Osis came by and said, "I would have hosted Gretta but you seem to be in favour these days."

The two suffragans said hello to me. John Barman asked after my thoughtful friend of the previous Friday.

"Seeing his girlfriend."

It wasn't that I would be without company. Rabbi Maurice Neptune said,

"Hello!"

I said. "I enjoyed our encounter at the secondary school, folks wearing these badges. Thanks for being at my ordination."

"A spot of talent-scouting at the school for later," he said. "Can I sit with you then?"

"What's your interest here?"

"See how independent radical Christian theologians put their ideas across."

"Stephen McPhail, my group mentor, says I should see you soon."

"I know. I look forward to it. I hope we can be a little more personal as well."

"Sure." (I was feeling like I'm anybody's, modelled on Keith.)

Derek Imperial stood and introduced Gretta Cox-Jenkins to everyone. The lecturer herself began in a booming voice for a small person, staying sat down, into the low stand microphone: "I'm gonna talk about kerygma, diakonia, koinonia and eschaton in remaking the Church - Rejuvenating the Church indeed."

Oh right, I thought, any jargon to confuse.

"If we're gonna rejuvenate the Church, and restore its reputation - because it is regarded as homophobic and backward, out of sync, increasingly sectarian - then our kerygma has to be liberationist, inclusive, and promoting the dignity and worth of everyone. We have to read this off the Gospel texts, and indeed study the texts of every liberationist that has stood up to represent a progressive Church. Kerygma means message. Rudolf Bultmann used it: the message of the text beyond what's possible with history. It is about the community message post-Easter."

So I got that and then she was rather repeating herself as she proceeded. I'd say less, but then few understand me.

"To rejuvenate the Church is to need diakonia," she claimed later," because diakonia is all about what you do for healing and reconciling, binding up wounds, yes, and bridging chasms. The organism is unwell - and sure it is unwell - and so we are restoring health to the organism. The gospel imperative is service, and ministry is service and diakonia directly means service. But I'm indicating that it means more than this. It means reconciliation. Now of course we do this service to society, but we must do it within the Church. We have many wounds to heal with the LGBTQI people, though I hate these categories, because these categories separate out all of us who differ in sexuality by degree not kind. So let's get the kerygma right, and when that's right, we can do diakonia."

Most interesting, I thought. It was hanging together.

"This is entirely consistent with Judaism," said Maurice Neptune.

"Before I go on," she said, "I've got some bad guts. If I have to pause, it's necessity, but I'm trying with medication to make it to the end uninterrupted."

Oh, lovely personal detail.

She proceeded, arriving at the next label: "Should we be doing the diakonia, we will then achieve koinonia. Koinonia is usually translated as 'fellowship'. Fellowship in the Church should be indivisible, and frankly, with the need for diakonia, it is not. We label, we separate. We have discussions between heterosexuals and gays, between ins and outs. No! There are no ins and outs, nor should there be. Our koinonia should be a visible demonstration of the kerygma achieved by diakonia. It is what the church strives for, it is hope realised, and we should not simply be hoping for something we can do.

"I'm shortening this... So this brings us eschaton. What is 'eschaton'? It means living this day as if it is the last: the end is nigh, so to speak. It's a sort of expectation of completion, and it transfers itself into a 'get on with it'. Which I ought to do. If I fart I am sorry. What on earth are we waiting for - who is afraid of the other person? Again, Rudolf Bultmann of kerygma fame calls the Church the 'eschatological community'. It means living like the new era, and being ready to move on to something better. The least shall be the first, and all that: the ethic trumps everything else. I should choose my words more carefully. I can carry on. I did take some medication."

That sort of hung together, I thought.

She continued and arrived at her summary: "So here we are: the message must liberate, and we can get that message from texts old and new. We must enact that message in our service to others and ourselves, and that way we get koinonia where they become us in one fellowship. Yes - and that fellowship lives like it is the end time, getting prepared with the right ethic in place - takes us back to the kerygma of course. Well thank you very much. I'll be back in ten minutes."

Applause followed as her walking sticks helped take her to the toilets.

"What do you think, Rabbi?"

"Get the message, act upon it, gain the fellowship, live as if is the last moment fluidly and tentatively."

"Yeah, it sort of stretches across religions."

Derek Imperial gave a brief thanks (very brief for him) and asked people to think of questions and come back in fifteen minutes.

I went to the loo myself and I could hear her farting and uttering words of frustration. When she came back (I was sat; Maurice returned) the first rather tedious question came from an unknown to me clergyman: "Rev Christian Skidmore from Breadwick. I did not hear the word God once, Jesus Christ once nor the Holy Spirit once. What was this about?"

She was quick: "Sir, you didn't need to, because anyone could see that they, all three in one, are contained within there. The Godhead is exactly what these four stages are about."

He then came back: "But this could be any organisation, secular, heretical and ours."

"The wonders of the incarnation," replied Gretta. I was beginning to like her.

The bishops were looking for more questions.

"The Church is a lifeboat: we might be on the sea for a long time," proposed Jason Wells of Rasa Market.

"Yeah, and the sea underneath is dangerous, and you'd better live like it's your last day," she replied.

Another man (there were women present), Charles Wynne-Jackson of Spaldswick, asked: "Are we the vanguard, like the vanguard of the proletariat? Are we not asking 'What is to be done?' No?"

I wondered: was he one of the group? As I looked at Maurice he shook his head at me.

"Yes," she replied. "We are. Lenin had his message, and they carried out political action, and they made a fellowship, and every revolutionary lives like it's a new dawn - the last of the old, and make the new."

"But we wait for God," he followed up.

"Well, no we don't, because if we live like the ethic then we actually prompt in the new dawn. Someone mentioned Jesus. He was doing the same, for what would come and transform; to be prepared and live the ethic is somehow itself to bring in the new dawn."

Someone was heard saying, "Pelagian." She ignored it.

Another man, Ian Wigley of Bolton cum Heckoring, asked, "How does anyone preach this?"

"Like I've just said it. Use the Greek headings perhaps but no more technical terms."

A woman, at last, Dorothy Strachan of Wulfstan, asked, "Does new wine fit into old wine skins?"

"These days we use bottles. We can change the packaging along with the wine. Okay, keep your dogmatic reference points. They are useful for identity. But let's get on with a liberating service and fellowship that lives tentatively and ethically - always ready to see the next step."

The diocesan stood up. "A great place to finish. I will make a comment on this and my own lecture last week in our next diocesan magazine," he said. "May we all thank - yes, I shall call her Bishop Gretta - Bishop Gretta Cox-Jenkins in our usual way."

"That's most generous of you," said the short once independent bishop, "though now I tend to reduce down references to these titles: I'm really plain Gretta and that's all I am. By the way, my arse is dancing and I really need to get to a safe place."

"Can't you put her up?" I asked Maurice. "You're nearer."

"I could. Ask her."

I approached Gretta once she was out of the toilet again. She said, "I'm now having difficulty going. It's there and it's not there."

"Rabbi Neptune lives much closer; wouldn't you like to stay with him?"

A recognised male voice and perfume from behind said, "I'm sure Gretta will enjoy staying with you." It was, of course, John Barman.

She said, "I'm sure there's be some hedges to go behind on the way - if needed. I'll go with you."

I went back to Maurice to report my duty. He said, "It's you I want to stay over at mine." He decided to go.

Bishop Derek shook my hand, saying about the lecture, "Something to build upon there I don't doubt."

"Quite. Eschaton!" I said with a smile, thinking of the near future.

And along came smelly Bishop John, again, "Good to see you with Maurice." He said, "Entertain our guest generously, won't you? Pity she is temporarily unwell. She can get up the stairs, by the way."

I acknowledged him but moved swiftly towards the theologian, who was seeing others.

So it was that I led Gretta slowly over to my car, she with a backpack and a suitcase that I had to carry. Her bag and suitcase went into the boot, mine on the back seat. She raised the seat belt over herself in the front passenger seat to get it to click in.

"Shee," she said, "this driving on the left. I still cannot get used to you folks driving on the left. I wouldn't drive here in the dark. Huh, I hired a car in Scotland and it was for daytime only. Same in Wearside: daytime driving only for me. Lovely woman, that Elizabeth Huett."

Gretta's Guessing Game

So off we went, and I headed for the bypass road, and then the A road and then the B road for one of the routes to Serninsea.

Beyond the street lights, Gretta Cox-Jenkins told me, "Your bumpy roads are doing nothing for my guts."

I said, "My guts do nothing for my guts. But exercises could be helping."

"Do you ever find that you confuse scatology and eschatology? So immediate, so demanding."

"Never. Scatology holds me back. It's not like my last day; it's every day."

"We postmoderns play with the words with similar sounds."

"It's my arse that plays with me, Gretta. It's why postmodernism, as it is, can be so unappealing. I want some evidence."

"Oh, my, we have to be playful as part of re-enchanting things. Don't you have that strategy?"

"No. We find that the theological theory precedes, frames, even suggests events: a young chap whom I hoped would come tonight says any realism in Christianity depends upon miracle. Miracle is..."

"Evidence of failure. It's not history, it's not science, but tries to be."

"Postmodernism is evidence of failure, isn't it?"

"No. It's that truths exist in literary and artistic creativity as well. And institutions can be framed that way."

I said to her, "People are naturally realists: simple and straightforward. On that basis they were a bit quick, the questioners, to accuse you of secularism."

"Did they? Do you accuse me of secularism?"

"No. I don't. They were the usual suspects. Eslaforde and Spaldswick is towards the evangelical."

"Yeah! This is a big diocese you've got and I'm told there's a hotbed of fundies down the south end."

"That's where the money is, because, although rural, it forms commuting country for many into the capital. I think money and aspiration equates with charismatics and, yeah, fundies. We're only talking about Church life here: the world is just as secular."

She said, "I get the mid-morning train tomorrow because the early one is too darned expensive and seats are reserved from well down the line. Fine if you want to get off, but not if you want to go to London. I hope my guts improve. Not on this road."

"At the south end of the diocese the trains are fast, frequent and direct. Wytham improved recently."

"Prosperity gospel: you get that everywhere now. And where we're going, there is less money I take it. Your bishop - Johnny the suffragan - says there is a lot less economic activity than the government makes out."

"Yes and no. We are definitely on the forgotten east coast. There's tourism, and there is a small dock of sorts, with businesses. The archaeology is quite good."

"Your job is secure."

"I'm one of the most secure employed and well-paid in the area. We are supposed to serve them, but they are so much worse off by and large. We do have some managers."

"Johnny Barman said he wouldn't tell me much about you, so we had something to talk about."

"Really. What happened to openness?"

"Openness? Ah, you are referring to the secret Confraternity, the Vanguard."

"So you are in the know."

"But openness is for when you're in such a group. There are possibilities among Episcopalians in Scotland. The ecclesiology puts Presbyterians at second class. I'm considering forming a group in Canada. The one place I would not start one is here."

"Really?"

"But I approve."

"They are trying to start one or two groups in South Wales."

"They might get away with it."

"Tell me more."

"Perhaps I shouldn't. He thinks if I was here I'd join, but I don't think I would."

"Come on! You're clearly 'on the inside' already."

"I'm more interested that you are being let in."

"I suppose they think I'm suitable. Like you."

"They know my theological views and actual practices regarding partners, being gender-queer and all that to begin. What about your views and practices, Linda?"

"Apparently we haven't got any choice, we priests, once they curl the finger and beckon you in."

"What's the best cheese to attract in a bear?"

"Hey? Dunno."

"Camembert."

"Jokes are ways to avoid telling me more. You've clearly got objections of some kind."

"As you are now being mentored, perhaps I should hold my counsel."

"No, I want to know."

"Perhaps later. I want to find out about you, first. You're married, partnered, anything?"

"I can't believe he's not told you, or you've not found out. I'm separated but he is in the house. He's transferring south soon. He was lucky getting into the measurement of transportation business."

"You're a happy heterosexual, or you were, or could be?"

"He's definitely a man and I am a woman."

"Really. Are you a 'woman' compared with my own non-binary definition?"

"I wasn't passing comment on you."

"But you are a naughty clergywoman, given the way that group seeks people out."

"The suffragan bishop is a happy heterosexual; but he's never been short of partners. Never any males, however."

"Apparently," said Gretta.

"He had that affair with Elizabeth Huett."

"He did."

"Those two - with Barman's pal Jonathan to make three - made something of it; they called it the Confraternity."

"I do know all this, and now you are deflecting from telling me about yourself. But back to theology versus event. They say the event generated the theology - orgasms and then came the divine interpretation. But here too the theology framed the eventful findings of the Barman-Huett affair, and then Eyre making a threesome."

"So you must know about me."

"All I was told about you is where you live, that you are a curate priest and have an interest in academic theology."

"Really? So guess about me."

"You want to play games!"

"For a car journey. I'll tell you I'm bisexual."

"Oh, I gathered that. Ever heard of the late theologian Marcella Althaus-Reid? She studied bisexuals and Church identity back in Canada, though she became professor in Scotland. Indecent theology: where people are, really. Sexual liberation and all liberation run together."

"If it's liberation theology then the playing field is uneven; I don't think our little playing field is even."

"But let's play on it. So what can I tell about you? You're not wearing a bra for a start." She paused. "You're not answering either. Knickers? No knickers."

"One you have observed, and one correctly speculated."

"I'm afraid if we don't stop soon I could have a serious accident, knickers or no," she said.

"Do you want to stop? I'll stop carefully - a car behind me - to avoid a serious accident."

"Find somewhere - I'm holding on. I have knickers on and a bra: with these things I need a bra. So do you."

"No I don't, as I lectured a nurse recently."

"They won't look good in later life."

"Rubbish. I take the view that 'looking good' is a social concept to be overturned."

"Radical indeed! As a five footer with these hooters I need a bra, deary, however I consider myself by gender. So I would think you'd be a naturist or something like that."

"I'm also holding on. You know. Looking for a place to stop."

"Are you a naturist or sympathiser by any chance?"

"You already know, so why ask?"

"I do not know. It is genuinely a guess. Believe me please. It is not right to be disbelieved. Are you a naturist?"

"Correct. Where else have you been while in Britain?"

"I kinda said. Nearly two months travelling from Dublin to Glasgow airport, to St. Andrews, Edinburgh, Newcastle, Wearside and here. My next guess is that you do spread your partners around the genders."

"I can fall in love with women as well. It just happens. I suffer, it that's the word, from rapid feelings of attachment and desire."

"Insecurity?"

"Possibly."

"Rejection by, say, your father?"

"My current partner is an attempt to stabilise myself beyond such desires. There is a lay-by that I know, quite close now."

"You haven't fallen for him."

"He's an old friend with whom I was intimate long back."

"Can you indeed please soon find a place to stop?"

"There are copses all the way down here."

"That's the last thing we need."

"Quite useful I'd have thought."

"Hardly, and why would they be along this way?" Gretta asked.

"Well," I answered, "because the farmers maintain them I suppose."

"What is this? Rural crime or something?"

"Hey? No, 'copses' are small woods. See? Here is one with access at my favourite lay-by, it seems. Inside it is gloomier and we won't be seen so easily."

Having stopped, Gretta got out more quickly than she could manage. She was able to stagger to find a place in the trees while I took a kitchen roll from the boot of the car.

I said, passing her lowering her clothing in a rush, "I'll find somewhere else to squat."

She didn't squat, but, with trousers and knickers down, bent over near a tree.

I was only about twenty yards from her. I started to pee, but with her arse up she sprayed this tree with a reddish brown shit.

She called out, "I need some of that paper."

"Hang on," as I dabbed myself. Trouble was, her going made me think of going more substantially myself.

She said, "Be a dear and wipe me. I have such trouble twisting to wipe my own arse."

So, with a huff, I stood behind her tearing more pieces off, two at a time, wiping and folding, pulling her left bum cheek, doing awkwardly what she found difficult.

"Move," she said. She sprayed out even more, over the grass below this time. Some was running out afterwards.

"What have you been eating?"

"Can't you smell it?"

"It smells Indian."

"I think it was bad. Scatology is indeed related to eschatology."

So I wiped her arse some more, from the safety of by her side. Reddish-brown shit around red pubes in this lack of light needed a lot of attention. There was actual heat coming from her bottom.

"Thanks," she said. "I suppose I disgust you."

"It seems I don't need to go. I'm making progress. Are you going to shit any more?"

"I must be empty by now," she said. "I cleared the main blockage like a bung at the cathedral. How far?" she asked.

"From your arse to the tree was the longest." I replied, and started laughing. Wiping her some more to finish, I folded sheets into sheets, and I went to put them all in the boot.

Back in the car and driving along again, she said, "OK, I am sorry to have so embarrassed you."

"You didn't. I embarrassed a trainee nurse the other day, taking my shit sample. I visit folk who need social workers and nurses attend to them."

"And you, obviously. Useful to wear knickers. You're not wearing any."

"Diet, dear. I have a loose anus so my shit is fibrous but I could build Georgian houses with it. Knickers make no difference. You can have the washing machine on when I get home."

"I have some washing with me and some clean clothes. But don't neglect our game: what other secrets have you got? Naturist, for sure, but there is something else."

"I'm just too clean-living."

She spurted out laughter with spittle.

"Oh, I'm good at sussing people out. I can cold-read and plant suggestions. I can guess deep secrets, like your lifestyle. Now my arse should have settled I can concentrate on you better."

"OK. What secret do I possess?"

"Oh wow, this is fun."

"Well?"

"I'm thinking."

There was a long pause and I was driving rather quickly.

"I'm waiting," I said plainly. "You've gone quiet," I then said. I looked at her and she was looking up and down at me from so close.

"Not polyamorous, but maybe you are..." she was guessing. "Of course, that vanguard claiming group is designed to make you polyamorous."

"It's something else," I teased.

"I have met Christine Vine. She has more sex than anyone and now defines herself as asexual. Her last relationship was with Jonathan Eyre, at which point she decided to have no more. There's talk that she receives beatings."

"I think so. She says about self-sacrifice. Why mention Christine? You're not supposed to mention..."

"I'm not an insider. I know she walked out from getting ordained. That was, shee, extraordinary for her. Nothing was more important for her than becoming a priest. Some thought she was bishop material, and one of those was her. Right? And the basis of her walking out was her disagreement with Johnny Barman. I think she manufactured that walkout."

"Why would she do that?"

"Because, she's right, that he is a pleasure-seeking arsehole, but mainly because she knows what's coming."

"Have you seen her?"

"I haven't," said Gretta. "I'm interested in how these groups form. They rarely agree among themselves and the group has to have methods of enforcing unity. They can do it by being quite threatening."

"So she got out to protect herself?"

"Maybe it's more about the report on the diocese coming along. It is far far worse than the top dogs, including Barman, expected. The group will likely have to disappear for a while, but every time it expands it risks being exposed. If someone like you questions the group, then the group risks becoming exposed."

"I haven't questioned it."
"You are an argumentative type."
"I've run with it."
"And the media always shows added interest in the National Church, and reduced interest in others."
"So your advice to me is..."
"I don't give advice. I would not join."
"They say I have no choice. I must obey my bishop."
"Your diocesan. But he does not know."
"They have become my bishops, I'm told: those three, soon to become five."
"Soon to become two, or none, I would guess. As I said, Wales might just get away with it, but the National Church in England will not."
"Then they'd better circle the wagons. I'll suggest it to my mentor."
"You've really bought into this, haven't you. I need to ask you: do you love Gaad?"
"Love God?"
"Well, that was my question."
"Do you, Gretta?"
"Oh yes. I love Gaad so much that Gaad must love love."
"And sex?"
"That's the means to the end, as well as the end to the means. Are you gonna answer my question, Linda?"
"I don't know what 'love God so much' means."
"Oh well, if you ask Johnny, or Liz, or Jonathan, they all love Gaad a lot. All the concealing they have to do, all the deceiving, all the plotting: it really is because they love Gaad."
"And I don't?"
"If you did, you wouldn't speak as you do. Christine is besotted with Gaad. One reason she doesn't have personal relationships any more is because she has one with Gaad."
"Perhaps you have found my secret. That I am mystified by the mystery."
"No I haven't. No, I suspect that you harbour a deeper secret, my dear. So I want to make a bargain with you."
"What?"
"I will guess your secret as an exchange."
"Why do you suppose I have a secret?"
"Don't backtrack from what you've said. But I will go further. You are a person who conceals. You have manufactured all that you live by."
"This could be deemed as offensive: I'm supposed to believe you, and yet you regard me as a fake."
"Not a fake. I bet you are like the diocesan, theologically. You are burdened by it, all the Church stuff, and you are burdened by something related to that - which is your secret. It could be a deep secret. Like a death in your hands or a birth that was stillborn or something of that order."
"What is your bargain you want to make?"
"If I am right, before we get to your Sernin town..."
"Serninsea."
"I have the freedom to seduce you tonight exactly as I please."

"And if you don't get it right?"

"Then you can do me the honour of sleeping alongside me, perhaps, and I can only wish for what might have been."

"You would deprive me of my pleasures!"

"Oh, Linda, it's such an act with you. You're like a ball in a pinball machine."

"The Pinball Witch."

"You've played the silver ball? No, you are the reflective ball bouncing all over the place. So let me consider your secret. How far away are we now?"

"We leave the Wolds very soon, and then it is across low-lying flat land to the coast. You play by intuition?"

"Then, Linda, this road seems deserted enough. You can stop the car again, but leave the engine running and your headlights on."

"Why?"

"Get out and stand in front of the beam."

I pulled in on this down-slope, and with the engine still running put the full beam on pointing just off the road. I went and stood so that she could look at me lit up through the windscreen. In fact she got out of the car, took her sticks from the back, and moved close but to the side to look me up and down.

She said, "Undress."

"Out here?"

"Out here. If a vehicle comes along, just go into the field."

So I took off my two items of clothes (except shoes), giving them to her left arm while gripping that stick, and I stood in the cold enough air.

She said, "Turn around."

A car came along in our direction, but I didn't move. It hooted as it went by.

"That's the act of the dedicated naturalist," she said.

"You've already had that one. You say there is another."

She instructed me to put my arms in the air, with legs apart, and said. "Turn back again. May I touch?"

"You may."

She ran the back of her right hand around my pubic area, and looked up and down. Then she said, "I'm getting back strain stood still so here are your clothes. I need to sit down in the car."

She held on to the car doors her side to put sticks on to the back seat and negotiate herself back in. Dressed, I returned to the car.

So I asked her, "Well?"

She replied, "I'm thinking."

"No you're not; you are clueless." I drove off, and there was silence. I did look at her, and she looked at me.

She said, "I do want some intimacy tonight; I really fancy it with you. So I must get this right."

I remembered Adam saying I should effectively play them along. I didn't fancy this five foot woman, even if I might be called 'heightist' for my lack of desire.

She said, "You're definitely all woman, there."

"All woman indeed." I said to her, "Your bargain should cost you something if you lose. Offer me something if you lose, not just your abstinence and mine. After all, I told my partner to stay away tonight."

"You're so right. Let's see. Yeah. I will give you my bishop's cross, the one that's still dangled around my neck now and I wanted no one to see. If I lose, you get my pectoral cross."

"No. That's too much. I want something like a signed card of lust, a confession, some informal information say about Elizabeth Huett - she is in Middlesbrough after all. You slept with her, didn't you?"

"You're already a kinda well-informed person."

"If I am well-informed, it is because I get people like you to tell me things."

"Look at this cross." She pulled it up. "I'm not really using it any more. One day you might want one."

"Rubbish. And if it doesn't matter to you, why is it between your breasts?"

"Well, that's the deal," Gretta declared. "If I am wrong, you have it, and, remember, if I am right, I keep the cross but I will ravage you sexually. So I will be right, and you shall have lost the bargain."

"So we have the bargain," I said, "and I think you are ready to guess."

"I'm thinking."

"You're still clueless."

"You forget the work I have done on genders and definitions, transsexuals and the like. I like being queer-gender."

The car occupants went quiet again, for quite a time.

"Gretta, we are well on the flat land and Serninsea is over there," I said. "You get one stab at this. Any mumbling, fishing around, and your bargain is lost. But I don't want the cross. If you are right, what intimacy do you want?"

"You pleasure me all over, including rimming, and fist me before I sleep and, by the way, fist me after I wake in the morning. By fisting I mean moving those fingers from a clenched position. But I won't want to fist you." She looked at me with a stare, and I kept my eyes on the road.

"Why not?"

"Well..."

I feared that she was on to me. "I am disappointed that only you want fisting."

"You are definitely a concealer and a deceiver, as I've already said."

"I've already said I am a clean-living woman." I started laughing again.

There was another pause and indeed rather a long silence.

With Serninsea but minutes off, I insisted: "I do need an answer."

"We've established that you are a naturist."

"Yes! So what else?"

"Oh, I think you're intersex."

Time to deflect. "I am definitely into sex," I said, whilst a cold shiver went down my spine.

"So it'll be Complete, won't it, Complete Androgen Insensitivity Syndrome."

"Ah. Oh. Why you didn't offer to fist me."

"Indeed. I monitored the flicks on your face, even in the gathering gloom. So I win."

"Bloody hell."

"And Johnny Barman did not tell me."

"He does not know. Colin Cromer worked it out, recently, from my CAIS sister, but I think it is the one thing he won't tell the bishop."

"You tell your lovers, of course."

"Yes, because sooner or later they will find out. Jonathan Eyre didn't pull me wide enough open, but he knew something was different."

"He treats women well only after the event. He held on to me like some zoophiliac holds on to a chicken."

"Ugh. What a horrible image. The lights are coming on across Serninsea, and we go to Sutton-on-Serninsea, where I live. Come to my house, and ignore my husband in the next bedroom, because you have won your bargain. And you keep your cross. So it's buzzers and bells and lights a-flashin' tonight."

"I will keep your secret," Gretta said.

"Thank you. It is becoming a burden. My sister defended herself from a ridiculous preacher. Thus my parish priest worked it out, and that led to me telling my partner of now. This is Titansea properly speaking so there are some minutes to go now before getting to my little curate's house. Sutton is the northernmost settlement of the three. Something to eat first, surely?"

"Sure. Oh yeah. My guts feel empty."

So we stopped off to see Bob Battersby's, and took the three times not very fibrous haddock and chips home.

Gretta Gets Personal (12th and Saturday 13th July)

Before going indoors I noticed the front sitting room light on. Once in I called out, "We're here!" I took the fish and chips portions in to the kitchen. Gretta struggled in with her sticks and headed for the lounge. Back out and in via the car, I then fed the folded soiled kitchen paper sheets into the downstairs toilet, flushing frequently to avoid blocking the toilet.

Keith came out and went to the car, bringing in Gretta's bag and suitcase. He sniffed and said, "There's a smell of Indian-flavoured shit here and in the car."

Going from the understairs loo to the kitchen, I said, "There's fish and chips for you."

"You'll need my knickers," Gretta called out, so she took her trousers off and then her soiled knickers and handed them to me. "Might need a scrub."

"Hello Bishop Cox-Jenkins," said Keith into the lounge.

"I need a pair of knickers."

"No you don't!" I said from the kitchen, having removed my own two items of clothing and kicked off my shoes. "Actually I'll have that suitcase here. Are you taking your blouse and bra off?" We have towels to sit on.

Keith brought the suitcase to me. Gretta further undressed and entered the kitchen to lean against the sink's draining board. I scrubbed her knickers and placed them into the washing machine. I then opened her suitcase for other washing to load. I added my own two items.

Keith now said. "I hope you wash your hands before you dish these out."

"Why don't you put them on plates and use the microwave?"

So clothed Keith gave each plate of food a two minute boost. He went into the larger lounge with his own. Once the washing machine was going, I washed my hands and we took ours into the lounge, dropping down towels to sit upon.

Gretta said, "You two seem civilised; I had wondered if there'd be a bad atmosphere."

"No," Keith said. "I'm going to my bed as soon as this is down my throat and I've had a drink. So keep the noise down, you two, please."

"Keith, I might have asked you the same with Cheryl. I'm sleeping with Gretta because I lost a bet."

"She did."

"I've told you before about gambling."

We were eating with our fingers and grease did drop on our chests.

And when he had wolfed his food all down, Keith went to the kitchen. "Coffees?"

Keith deducted a microwave minute for his, so he drank his quickly. So he went up the stairs lugging Gretta's bag and closed-up suitcase.

I said to Gretta, "Don't worry about any noise. Once he falls asleep, nothing wakes him; even the alarm only just gets through. He is history now."

"I'm pretty noisy when my oxytocin gets to work."

It was interesting seeing a large breasted small woman in my bed, her short legs wide. Nevertheless, my lubricated wrist vanished with my big hands into someone so apparently small! She didn't say if she had ever given birth. I was all right about her presenting her backside for my finger and tongue, despite earlier events. I'd lost the bet and obliged her arse with two fingers to the knuckle.

I mentioned my efforts at tightening my arse, and so she got me to orgasm through more standard clitoral stimulation after pulling my labia wide.

Gretta's extended orgasms really gave me some work to do because she wanted them to go on and on. When done she explained this was what she'd meant by referring to 'oxytocin'. The sheet was also soaked beneath her so I moved it to the side and laid a new one.

She nor I offered any prayers at our orgasms.

In the morning, the Saturday being mine, and my last day before Colin returned, I woke with this woman soon with my hand between her legs and I just did not know when I could stop. I was content with much less.

Gretta said, once she recovered, "I assure you that your secret is safe with me. I realise how precious this is, and how you've altered your physiology."

"Blame him, getting up."

"I noticed your absence of a cervix. It's fascinating to me. I took a huge guess about you, in the car."

"You could have lost your pectoral cross - but you wouldn't have because I wouldn't have accepted it."

"Your speech is so precise, so English," Gretta said to me. "I'll remember you, back in Canada."

"Do you think... Do you really think I should stay away from the group under the Confraternity?"

"I don't even think you're that committed to it. You're not, are you? It's not a fantastic discovery, and doesn't meet a personal need. You are gathering information, I think, but it's not the same thing."

"Do you do cold reading?" I asked her. "You could teach my lover's assistant something."

"I find the signs fascinating. Every eye movement, every tick, every side movement, and speech. You control your speech, but not well enough. Most English would regard you as 'posh' but, actually, you are a local girl with layers and layers of paint over the top."

"I stopped using regional words but I know what they mean."

Before we went downstairs to breakfast, she watched as I laid another sheet on the bed. Two wet sheets came downstairs with me for another wash. She had fresh knickers to put on. We acknowledged Keith and had breakfast together.

Bringing her suitcase and bag downstairs, I helped Gretta pack. Then I drove her back to Wytham, with no stops, directly to the station. And then at the station, I went and called for assistance for her, to then return to Gretta.

She produced her bishop's cross on a chain from a pocket. "I want you to have this."

"No, you won your bargain fair and square. I enjoyed it. You weren't excessive either."

"You were a very pleasant and willing host. And driving me back and forth."

"The travel is on expenses. I'll claim them from the Church."

"Take this please. I think you may want to wear this in the future."

"But if I walk out of the group, as you recommend, when they say I must get initiated and take part, the suffragan will do all he can to frustrate and eject me from the ministry."

"Precisely," she said.

A man in uniform appeared, saying, "It's due in minutes." "I'll assist you from here."

"Goodbye Linda. Remember me." She pushed the pectoral cross into my trousers' pocket.

She was soon gone, on her sticks, assisted to the train with her luggage.

I drove homeward, paused at my favourite lay-by, and looked at the gold coloured item. Possibly its chain was gold. There were no maker's marks. I pissed at the tree where she'd shat the day before.

On the way in I diverted to Ingle Top Drain where I swam naked for about half an hour. After all, it was International Skinny Dip Day.

At home Keith was reading a physical newspaper. "Cheryl got me back into the habit of reading a newspaper. Nice walk to get one. It made me think that we should get a dog."

"We?"

"Cheryl and me."

"Of course. Yes."

Chapter 14 Recruiting

Narrator: Linda Second Visit to the McPhails (Sunday 14th July)

Sunday morning I gave an indistinct homily that seemed to be well appreciated, as I presided at the parish Eucharist. After that I was summoned to the McPhails at Ingle Barrow.

Welcomed by them, Stephen said that the bishops wanted my mentoring up to initiation to go quickly, because I was ready.

This time they took me to the play room where several devices were available. Stephen had just made one he wanted me to try out. It had an undulating table top, which prevented anyone getting comfortable. If your bum got into a hollow, your back hurt, or your bum was uncomfortable. There were four adjustable poles at the four corners, to be moved up and down. Undressed, I got on this unpleasant top and tried to lay on it. Velcro loops around my thighs and lower arms were each attached to chains and closed leather loops. The poles lowered, they were then pulled upwards through the leather loops. Thus I was trapped and exposed to whatever he, she or anyone for that mattered wanted to do with me. He said, "It's good for whipping around the pubic area."

Stephen removed his own clothes, and, looking at me splayed out, started masturbating. Helen smiled and left us. "You did take Gretta Cox-Jenkins home. How did it go?"

"Fine."

"I need some more detail than that. This relates to openness. You should tell me as much as you can, remember." His hand cupped over my pubic area, and he started rubbing. "I heard she's partial to some fisting."

"You heard correctly."

"She knows a lot about the groups; she may set up her own in Canada. What sort of things was she saying?"

"Not much to me, as a yet to be initiated. She said she was at Middlesbrough, so obviously with Elizabeth Huett."

"Did she mention the one we cannot mention?"

"She knew she's run off, that's all. I did see Christine, briefly."

"Yes. You'd better tell me about it."

"She was dealing with landlord business, and was prevented by her clients from doing any more overseeing. She wasn't surprised. I'll claim pastoral confidentiality."

"You can only claim it for Laura Kingswood and Andrew Walter on your parish business, not on ours."

"I was there on my parish business."

"But not regarding the visitor. And what is the unsaid person doing now?"

"Her secular work."

"We don't see how she could have gone from theological bigwig to nothing. Didn't Gretta say anything?"

"She said she was a woman of many formative ideas, but I knew that."

"So here, Linda, we have had an example of openness - Second Guidance."

Your claim to pastoral confidentiality can be challenged; I will pass on your remarks to Bishop Terry. Now, how are you on there?"

"It is starting to press on parts of my back."

Stephen was getting erect from the sight. No doubt in a passage from a BDSM textbook, he decided simply to put his manhood straight into my feminine purse, and push. The lack of lubrication was deliberate.

Speaking while thrusting, he reminded me of the Second Guidance on confidentiality and being secretive. This included Adam Magellan, he said, who is of concern. I was not to tell Adam anything, and not even use 'The Worshipful Company of Serninsea Theatrical Players' - and it was unlikely I'd be asked to talent scout for a while. He said, "Although there was an intelligent young man in your company the other week, and working with Magellan, we gather he is connected to the archaeology Wickenby twins. Gosh you are indeed tight."

I felt that I needed to protect him, so said nothing.

"You're not exactly flowing with information," Stephen said. "And, as for Magellan, you may be required to operate on detailed instructions from the bishops and keep to these. They're for the survival and progress of the group, and individual initiatives are not wanted. I'm sure you realise all this," he said to me.

"Of... course."

"Are you enjoying this?"

"You're a good fucker."

"I can't understand why you are impossibly tight."

"Good self training."

"There isn't a blockage, is there?"

"Nothing is being blocked," I said, which was true.

"The fun stuff is the Fifth Guidance. This is where Terry thinks you're already well ahead. Sometimes we have to coax a few into happy nudity and open sex. You haven't said in detail what you did with Gretta. How the hell did she fist you?"

"She didn't."

"Can I try?"

"You won't do it."

"Do you want to bet?"

"No, you won't do it. You could cause damage. Surely in all this openness I have a right to know my own body."

"I'm about to come."

So the conversation paused, and he came inside me. He said, on shooting, "Glory be to the threefold God!" Pretty much the lot ran out. So he opened me up, which didn't matter because his gunge prevented him from failing to see a cervix.

My response was, "Do I lie on this bloody thing all the time?"

"You haven't had an orgasm. I'll bend down to you. You know the clitoris is shaped a bit like a chicken's wishbone?"

I didn't answer. His tongue working on me prevented further delivery about the Guidances. He realised this and so transferred to his finger, using sperm as a lubricant.

"Sexual fluidity means having intimate actions with Maurice Neptune. He used to be a city banker, and had a change of career, but likes to live in comfort and kept his chauffeur. He has a live-in maid as well."

"How intimate are they?"

"The maid was, well, one of her self-employed workers. So she provides Maurice with full services."

"And is the Reformist Synagogue aware of her enhanced role, or indeed such activities as coming... I think I am com... ing."

I went into orgasm, and just the one.

"Praise and prayer!" he demanded.

"O God thank you for this my wonderful orgasm," I said, while thinking this forced verbal expression bordered on the stupid. Once I'd drifted down again, I was able to say, "Gretta is one of those lucky women who can multiple orgasm."

"Like Helen," said Stephen. "We'll have a session with Helen. If you do get to like Maurice personally, we'd all prefer that because you could then drop Adam Magellan. And we know that Colin Cromer hates to know you are with him. So you are already on to the Sixth Guidance of orgasm. I don't suppose you've read much orgasm theology."

"Story of the Eye. Georges Bataille. Can I get off this now?"

"Yes, that's one of them. You really are well advanced. I'll lower these poles and then you can get off. And you should read in the negative as well," he said, lowering each pole as he spoke. "We read what Augustine had to say to know that we reject it all. Read positively Matthew Fox and Miriam Simos or Starhawk."

"I already have."

"Fox writes, We burst into the world as Original Blessings, and we think the same."

"He's holisitc," I said.

All the poles were lowered, and my feet were released. "He says the sin is not to see all as whole. 'Creation-Centered Spirituality' is what we follow too. So we connect with the New Age. We had a talk from a Buddhist called Anong not long ago, in Hartlepool - ask Keith - and she said of groups derived from her's that went New Age. Fox is positive about the work of the Holy Spirit incorporating Wicca, Shamanism, and the Goddess."

"I believe that Anong has a theology of defacating," I said, getting off his horrible device.

"Yes. You are well-informed. The bishops thought we are not ready. Some find it difficult. There are rumours, however, about Gretta Cox-Jenkins."

"What like?" I straightened my back.

"Liz thinks she went to see Anong, arriving a day early before she met Liz."

"She didn't tell me that. She slept with Elizabeth Huett."

"She didn't try any scatology on with you?"

"She played on the words 'scatology' and 'eschatology', with little impression on me."

"All talk then."

"She had dodgy guts and shat at a copse, and I ended up wiping her arse."

"And how did that affect you?"

"I didn't affect me at all."

"Did it give you a sexual kick?"

"No."

"So why did she ask?"

"She can't twist around."

"I bet she does on her own."

With Stephen holding his and my clothes, we went through the house to join Helen at the kitchen.

In the kitchen Stephen said, "I was just saying about some orgasm-supporting theology, Helen. Matthew Fox."

"Yes," she said. "We learnt that he is like Pierre Teilhard de Chardin but criticises him for all that on self-denial and renunciation. Fox isn't opposed to 'ecstasy' at all."

"I've read both," I said. "What now?"

"Well, we're done for our direct mentoring session," said Stephen, but stay for some lunch. Helen, take your clothes off, love, in the company of a naturalist."

So I had lunch with them, but I made my exit to have more time to prepare for the Evensong. I couldn't quite work out my thoughts regarding Stephen.

On arriving and after some pleasantries, I discovered Colin's express disappointment that I had simply abandoned Morning Prayer. I claimed low attendance, but he said it was a witness to be made.

However, I wasn't preaching. A priest friend called Justin Brown from the Lake District was staying with Colin for a week. (Keith thought there was a female friend.) In a replacement of the Evensong to evening Evening Communion, I listened, with back ache, to Justin Brown preach:

"The oh-so-common spirituality of brokenness, often with a death of God or unreal theology, has created an inability to proclaim. This is the contrast between the wounded healer and the resurrected Christ. We need both to transform ourselves and then the world.

"The reality of the Spirit empowers us, and belief in the gifts of the Spirit help God to pour them on his people. Thus we should get away from secular language and use our own.

"I suggest we bring New Wine into this region. It can be evangelical and can be Catholic. It is unlikely to be liberal. Sorry about the ecclesiastical politics, but such politics is unavoidable. We are looking for energy and vitality in the New Wine. It is flexible but does not sell-out. It makes everything more responsive and more creative. That was secular language there because so much of our own language has slipped away through lack of use."

Colin was in full agreement with his friend. Nevertheless, afterwards, Colin said to us, "The suffragan bishops and the diocesan bishop will not let in renewal. We do have a heavy theology of brokenness. I think you do, Linda. Plus, your liberal sentiments get us nowhere."

Colin expected so little from me.

He and Justin went on to talk about Ambleside and ambling, and that at retirement Colin might go there for good. He was at least pleased there were no pieces broken by me locally to be put back together.

Limit Testing (Monday 15th July)

Monday was my day off but I was called to go to Ingle Barrow immediately.

I met Stephen and Helen again, and I asked her what the blood was down her legs, some reaching her flip flops.

"Free bleeding," she said. "Menstruation, of course. You should try it."

"I don't think I like the idea," I said.

Stephen asked me, "Are you due to menstruate in the next few weeks?"

"No."

"When you get your period," he said, "we'll make use of it as part of the ongoing mentoring."

This, of course, presented me with a problem, because they would either discover that I never did menstruate, or accuse me of lack of openness in that I had not admitted this. Somehow, to preserve my leaking but still held secret, I'd have to get out.

In any case, what more was there to discover? After all, I might think that indeed the orgasm, or sex in general, was good and godly, but I didn't need to turn into a group bicycle in order to have them manufactured.

Helen said, "It is part of being open and, unlike me, you can make more use of it as a priest."

Stephen said, "We want you initiated, so we're bringing this part forward. Today is about testing your willingness to go with anyone at an initiation or in a party gathering. Today you'll act with a stranger."

So I was indeed to be a bicycle today.

Stephen continued, "This person is in the group, but we think you do not know him. He is not religious. He has been health checked. He is very vigorous, and he does what he does to test your capacity in all the things we expect."

Here I was sanctioning, by my presence, someone unknown having access to my body. But it would answer the earlier question of who was in the group.

"What if today doesn't work out?" I asked, timidly.

"Further training would be needed - the whole point of mentoring."

Again I'd have to lie on one of his table devices, this one with a curved up end and with fixed poles this time not quite at the corners. Whatever happened to the standard bed?

Thus my legs were up in the air and my bottom was raised, and my position was projected forward so that my legs were back as well as high. I was to grip the poles with my hands.

Helen brought in a suited man, who undressed and said nothing. She called him 'Martin'. He was clearly well endowed and Helen made him harder and dripped a single blob of lubricant on his penis. This man simply walked towards me and forced it into my anus. I could imagine so many would find this very disturbing; I thought I wouldn't.

In fact I did, mentally, given his cold manner and increasing rapidity of in and out. I felt like I was being broken in. This man also held on to these poles - not my legs - to ram me, more and more. Stephen, who'd undressed out of my sight, came and pressed down on my ribs with his hands. Martin was developing quite a sweat.

But then this became worse, because Stephen started slapping and pushing together my breasts; he even slapped my face. He pressed his penis into my cheek. "Take it," he said. What was I to do?

This room was deep in their house, so if I screamed it could be all part of the event. In fact I shut down. I just went through with it, and I could take it given my physiological changes caused by Keith.

And then Stephen moved away, and Helen moved in, to climb over my face, so that her 'free bleeding' came on to me.

Stephen said, "This shows you can absorb one of the body's fluids: Helen's reproductive cycle, her actual life-force. Take her life force into you, Linda."

In my shut down I realised who the man was: suited, not religious, and called Archibald Holborn. They used Martin Haralambos before. So I asked him, "Are you Archie Holborn?"

He paused his rapid rhythm that had created his running sweat. Stephen said, "She must know you."

Helen rubbed her messy thighs around my face.

Archie said, "I dealt with her SMS annual stress testing involvement, when she was finding out about her husband's affair."

Stephen's own orgasmic output - "My God!" - was rubbed into my breasts. Presumably he didn't want to mix his sperm with his wife's blood. She meanwhile leaned over my full length and hooked a couple of fingers up and under my clitoris and vigorously wanked me as Holborn thrustured, so I decided I'd had enough and faked an orgasm. "God bless!" I called out.

It had the oposite effect. The violence of Holborn's penile attack increased. Helen was smearing my body further down. Holborn finally ejaculated deep inside my anus, and came away like a cork ejected from a bottle.

I was unprepared and he received what he deserved. So he went off in a hurry to clean his penis. Helen got off my face and also left the room to wipe her hands.

I curled and rolled to get off his device. Stephen asked me to stick my tongue out. "Her blood. Look, go home," he said. "Get your clothes on without washing and leave the house. Go on: fuck off. Go back to that Magellan sod, until you dump him for one of ours."

"I need the toilet," I said.

"Go in the garden," he replied. "It suits you."

So, I carried my clothes to enter their back garden, and left them a present by the back door so they had to clean it up. Then I got dressed, over my sticky chest, and simply walked through the various doors to leave the house, to get in my car. I looked in the mirror, and took the bottle of water in the driver's door to swill my mouth from the taste of Helen's blood. Then I just drove home. At home I started to shake, and showered, and told myself to pull myself together. Into the evening I was calmer but still shaken, when Adam called me to go to his place to help solve a CCTV mystery.

Narrator: Adam A Deposit (Monday 15th July)

I had been to my brown bin, in the tenfoot, to put some card and paper in before its collection tomorrow, and I noticed on top of the rubbish inside a service order from Linda's ordination service. On the cover it had written in ink:

BJTB meeting JW CW Thursday evening. About S C brooch con. From C. Just Hold actually it right there.

I returned to Peter in the reception room and on my say-so we viewed our own outside the front door CCTV. "Tell me if you recognise anyone."

"They're mainly the tops of people's heads."

"Well, there is some face in each. The message has come from 'C' so we are looking for a 'C' among these faces. There could be hours of this CCTV, even if it is triggered by movement."

This went on a while. We could not recognise anyone, so Ann and Labhaoise came down in the evening. Linda came over after her day off, although she looked very strained. Looking for some twenty minutes of fast forward-and-stop video, Ann said, "Hang on! Yes it is her passing your front door. That's Christine Vine."

Linda confirmed this, and seemed emotional in response. So we had 'C' and therefore worked the rest out. Bishop John Terence Barman, Jim Wilson, Connie Wilson, the Serninsea Cross brooch, and, thus Christine Vine. She was likely to buy some more properties from Ann and Labhaoise. Linda had met her during a pastoral visit, set up, she said, by the suffragan bishop 'BJTB' with his intention of Linda reporting back.

Peter asked, "Why is Christine interested in that brooch?"

Linda suggested, "Perhaps it's a means to some end? As in Just Hold actually it right there."

I suggested that we got the Wickenby twins involved. "They know about that brooch. It doesn't say where these folk will meet. We could follow the people mentioned to a meeting place. Perhaps we would see Christine; she has not left any contact details."

Meanwhile, I had reason to ask Linda, "Are you all right?"

"Rough day. I'm all right."

When Kathryn and Kathleen came in, they said this Thursday was within the time period of the brooch expected back from the labs. Christine would know this much. But the item didn't arrive at any of the labs. So this suggested that Barman might be going to claim it was tested and confirmed as historical and discovered, when it was surely not.

However, Peter asked to see the CCTV again, and noted an oddity. Christine's walking looked purposeful and was at the front and therefore not in the tenfoot round the back where the bin was kept.

Peter said, "I bet she's come round from the promenade and didn't go around the back at all."

I had to agree: we took so much notice of Christine that we hadn't then asked the next question - whether she'd actually left the note.

Linda asked me, "When are you going to start actually paying him a wage?"

Peter said, "This sentence is very odd. Just Hold actually it right there. Why is it reading awkwardly?"

I asked Linda, "Stop being half-secretive about this group and give us some names. The Wilsons are in it but who else?"

She said, "I'm only half-secretive because I've been trying to go along with them and I asked you not to investigate further."

"Have you seen most of the people in this Serninsea group?" I asked.

"No. I only see some of them before initiation. Anyhow, the aims of this group do not include the Serninsea Cross brooch. The Wilsons have a relationship with Barman that goes beyond the group."

I said, "We need to do some cross-referencing, in other words someone in this, and in that, who is also interested in the other."

Linda said, "That's precise."

Peter at a computer, said, "So it is clergy, SMS, to begin, and interest in, I suppose, archaeology."

Linda said, "That is precise."

Kathryn said, "We already know someone in SMS, living a short time in this town and adding her interest to our archaeology. Janet Hayes. Up from near Margate, once into selling model railways, she has been promoted to a national job: Marketing across SMS."

So I asked, "Is she in your group?"

"I don't know," Linda said. "Anyway, it is not my group - yet."

"Why are you shaking?" I asked her.

"I might be suffering from something."

"What other Venn diagram names are there?" I asked the twins.

The twins drew a blank. So I asked Peter to look on 'Personnel Link', a website by which managers and business people and even some clergy made connections.

Peter said, "Yes, archaeology is one of her interests: particularly Celtic, Roman and Anglo-Saxon."

"As round here," said Kathryn. (I knew it was Kathryn because Peter's arm was around her shoulder.)

Peter said, "Just Hold actually it right there - the 'H' in capitals, so it is actually Janet Hayes."

We decided not to approach Janet Hayes; after all, if she had done this, she did it anonymously. We would do the investigating on the Thursday by following Barman and the Wilsons.

Just as we were about to leave, and I was going to lock up and leave with Linda to her house, Peter was looking at the note.

He said, "It is on your ordination service order, Linda. Why?"

So we all stopped ourselves, sat down again, and tried to think.

The problem was that Janet Hayes had no listed interest on Personnel Link regarding religion. This meant we might be no further forward. Somehow she had got hold of this order of service, or someone had given it to Janet Hayes, but these seemed unlikely. We'd convinced ourselves it was not Christine, but now we thought it might not be Janet Hayes.

"Someone thought they had seen Christine when I was ordained, but she wasn't in the cathedral and the printed order of service wasn't handed out at the retreat," Linda told us. "Christine would have had no reason to have a copy of the order of service. Janet Hayes would be unconnected with all that."

Then we all dispersed, none the wiser.

When I got into bed with Linda, at her place, I said to her, "You've got to tell me more about this group."

"What I can tell you is that I have issues with it, but I like the basic message."

"So you will join up?" I asked her.

"Gretta suggested I get clear of it - get out altogether."

"Why?"

"Because she thinks the inefficiency report, let's call it, is going to blow up the diocese and this secretive group will be exposed. And the actions of 'Johnny Barman', as she calls him, will also likely expose the group. And she thinks Christine manufactured her row with Barman to get clear."

"Then why don't you get clear?"

"I'm thinking about it. Priests cannot choose to leave; they must go through with it."

"Well that's bollocks. Were you with them today?"

"Yes, and they were unpleasant in attitude and actions. I'm supposed to be receptive to all so they roughed things up. I'm presuming they still need me, locally."

"But you don't need them," I said to her.

"And, even with me, the whole thing turns on a sixpence, when the positive becomes abusive."

"You've said."

Linda added, "I told you to stop enquiring," as she climbed on to me to satisfy her present insatiable need for sexual fulfilment.

Linda I liked: a mate, a fuck-buddy, but she was always going off the scale. If she was a caged bird she'd bite through the metal and get out. I liked her body shape, a much older version of 'Headgirl' online, and fuckable, in a way I couldn't ever with the perfection of 'Headgirl' (and not so long out of school, really).

Narrator: Linda Walk with a Rabbi (Wednesday 17th July)

Colin Cromer told me that the suffragan bishop had contacted him that I would do some interfaith work with Maurice Neptune.

I asked Colin, "How did this come about?"

"The bishop just rang me. Two days duration, starting immediately."

So my experiencing the group was continuing. I was determined to get on top of my mental reaction to what had happened - a test of access, excess and response.

I said, "I think Bishop John must have thought I could talk theologically with the rabbi."

"With your theology, perhaps he is thinking of a transfer." (Thanks Colin.)

"I refer to the New Testament too often," I said.

"Did you know nothing about today and tomorrow?" Colin asked.

"I knew something was coming. It's like a two-person conference," I said. "No doubt in-depth."

"Are you going to Wytham?"

"I might; he'll tell me if he's doing pastoral visiting here."

I called off the usual Wednesday afternoon naked lie down with Diana. Instead, at midday, I took a journey on the Caffin Line to the Inglemire station, where the rabbi had parked his car, allowing us the prospect of the extensive Ingle Park in the direction of Caffin Park. I wore a blouse, a sweater, trousers, sensible shoes. We had a huggy welcome. He said we would walk about, and perhaps go to the McPhails to eat, if this is what I wanted.

"Not sure, to be honest."

He said, first, "I understand they brought forward the challenging session."

"So it seems."

"That's all it was. It will be much sweeter with me. We can talk ideas and intentions and compare theological notes."

I said to Maurice, walking alongside him, our equal heights aiding conversation, "So what would you say to someone who'd lost any specific Christian understanding of belief? 'Judaism is for you!' Perhaps not."

"I recall something similar in the school where we met."

"I was struggling before the retreat, but people pressed me to go on, not least those in these groups under the Confraternity. And I was surprised at the Hindu and Jewish membership, locally."

"From lowest rung upwards, the hierarchy is: secular business management, religious, Protestant Christian, and then we have the apostolic: Orthodoxy, Anglican and Catholic, Apostolic bishops deciding, and they understand 'Anglican' from the Catholic perspective. The lower you go the more are the exceptions: we 'religious' are expected to engage theologically at some level and make our contributions. Initiation has to suit us."

"I did get a boost at ordination. Half of it was a sense of purpose represented in this group, but it included then someone now excluded. I have a question for you."

"Go on."

"Why are you involved in this?"

"I have never understood why we cannot have more intimate relationships more easily."

"So which have been yours?"

"As you have no choice but to become initiated, I will give you first names. Yojana, Connie, Janet, Jenny, Fatima, Liz of course, Helen, Kay and our escapee. Some of these were in meetings, some in parties, a few one to one. Hopefully, I'll add you. Also there were women in Christine's properties, who provided delightful distractions. One became my maid."

"OK. So I know of Yojana Asthana, Connie Wilson, Jenny World, Helen McPhail, Christine Vine and..." (now I took a gamble) "...Janet Hayes, because my separated husband is in SMS. The only Kay I know is the headteacher, Kay Sally Parker."

The fact that he didn't contradict my guesses assured me that Janet Hayes and the headteacher were in the group.

He said, "Anyway, let's see if I can help on the specific belief matter you raise."

"Yes please," as we continued to walk in the park.

"So I take you back to your classical theology, your Thomas Aquinas..."

"Not sure he is mine."

"You'd be surprised. Aquinas drew on Aristotle from a previous civilisation more than three hundred years before the common era. Scholasticism produced an application of reason into Christianity. It is seen as a major foundation for Western Christendom - ancient Greek culture absorbed. So observable reasoning was the support for revelation, and not always received well. The Islamic builder upon Aristotle - rivalling Aquinas and Anselm of Canterbury, was Avicenna or Ibn Sina, who was around before both of them."

"I don't know when these people were around."

"I do. In the Common Era, 1225-1274 for Aquinas, 1033-1109 for Anselm, and 980-1037 for Ibn Sina - before them. And Moses Maimonides is our man, and he's 1135 to 1204."

"You remember the dates; I find dates hard to grasp. I remember even fewer people's names."

"The clock, with some exceptions. 1274 is a nearly a quarter past one 'previous'."

"Ah, this reminds me of colleagues who met you during our retreat visits. 1492 as half past three."

"Ah. I use 'previous' for those, it's not 1530 after all. You remember 1492! A crucial date. So, the Arabs copied and built on classical culture, but Europe rediscovered it after your Dark Ages and aggression into Muslim occupied areas - areas where we Jews had been safest. Your principal theologian had been Augustine of Hippo and his dates were 354-430 - and he rejected classical reasoning. No need for the twenty four hour clock with him."

"Gusty the Rhinoceros. I'm joking now. This is an attractive park in July."

"You see, Christianity was seen as self-sufficient under Hippo, but did Aquinas save your religion or undermine it long term?"

"I see the point," I said. "It's muddy there."

"Thank you. And you see there was the Renaissance and the confidence of the human perspective, or reasoning."

"So who was Aristotle then?"

"But I haven't talked about the Jewish equivalent yet, Maimonides."

"Sorry."

"I'll answer you. Ask."

"Aristotle then: he was an observer, wasn't he, like me looking at these trees?"

"And consider Plato, 429-347 before the Common Era pointing to perfection beyond matter in the heavens; instead, Aristotle was both empirical and practical: he wanted to understand the world. The essence of things was to be found here, not in a spiritual essence beyond, like with Plato. However, Aristotle did not understand the function of experiment. Ethics came from reasoning too. Intelligence is activated rather than following tradition and authority. Regulate your desires, and reach better decisions! Law was rational (beyond the passions) and therefore reasoned and ethical."

"And the Thomist absorbed that."

"Funny you don't say 'Aquinist'. Well: Christianity had loved Hellenism, the victorious cultural school, because it elevated this world into the world beyond, so pure forms and and reason is within God for revelation, and humans are fallible and indeed 'Ay-of-Aich' invented original sin for you Western Christians. All that stuff about the soul went into mediaeval times. But Aquinas said if reasoning is pure and correct, it will agree with revelation. How could these be different? It was just another route to God."

"The Calvinists reacted against that then."

"Much later. If reason disagreed with revelation, it had not employed a necessary argument. Avicenna also set out to reconcile rational philosophy with Islamic theology. His writings were released into Western Europe with his physics, aromatherapy, logic, engineering, geology, medicine and theology. Avicennism is his Persian Islamic school of philosophy in the Islamic golden age (until the 1400s). Ibn Sina, properly speaking, a short name of a longer one, did his proofs of God not unlike Anselm and Aquinas."

"We did those in college: never satisfactorily."

"Well, the Scholastics were careful in their reasoning but reason just had to conform with Scripture as interpreted by the Church. The light of reason needed a divine light."

"We still have this difficulty now and it costs us."

"When reason broke from theology you get what you have now: argument backed up by experiment, backed up by falsification, and different truths have emerged. Plus, we discovered that the social order was not divinely ordered. Thomism that was once progressive became defensive, particularly in 1893 when Pope Leo XIII issued an encyclical letter Aeterni Patris that made Thomism normative for the Church. I'll accept that there was thus something of a rapid deflation of Thomism after Vatican II."

"You're a rabbi - why are you telling me this?"

"Because Aristotle is all so wrong! We know, against Aristotle, that it is a fallacy that a part must have the qualities and substance of the whole. Active atoms and buzzing brain waves are quite capable of producing stable rational thought; one actuality does not have to retain the composition of the other. Plus we know about the self-organising principle and self-generating. There is the weird quantum world; time has a beginning wholly within itself; and the universe has a beginning wholly within itself. Evolution is a systemic feedback loop for chaotically mutating life. More than this, the uniformity of application of some mathematical and scientific laws is warped at the very small and the very large."

"But I am trying to relate..."

"I'm getting into my stride, Linda! Maimonides, born 1135 or so, died 1204, also known as Rambam..."

"Thank you mam."

"...wrote, even then, Guide for the Perplexed, and it was for those already into maths, logic, observations, and metaphysics. Don't read the Bible literally, God is not corporeal: he is only what can be said negatively. So you could do that. "

"Not is not enough. There's always an is," I said. "I think."

"There is no plurality in negation. You want transcendence? Perhaps you don't. So Maimonides was Aristotelian, and Aristotle was translated into Hebrew. He adopted Aristotelian thought to Biblical faith. He was used to undermine traditionalist belief and observance among Jews. Crescas attacked the Aristotelian world-view, the religious and pseudo-science and maths."

"He wasn't crackers."

"Linda, your humour undermines yourself."

"Levity among the Levites?"

"The words are unconnected."

"Gretta calls this wordplay postmodern."

"Aquinas drew on Maimonides and stated so. Maimonides stressed God's unity, lack of a body, eternity, God knowing us, punishing and rewarding. Moses had his role; the messiah will come and be of the resurrection of the dead. Now our Maimonides was very influential and set up commentaries and debates to and fro. Jewish opposition was in some ways like your Catholics to Aquinas at the time. Why 'divine incorporeality' as a principle? Where was resurrection? Why a stress on intellectual ability? What of rabbinic learning and all their debates? But the opposition that grew, including to his legalistic code, Midrash Torah, actually ceased because Dominicans were making life so tough, you see - and the French expelled many Jews in 1306."

"Just after five past one," I said.

"It wasn't funny. Gersonides was another Aristotelian writer. He was from Provence."

"Wasn't Maimonides from France?"

"No, Cordova, moved to Cairo. Gersonides said God gave the clever people magical dreams and prophecy. God didn't know everything, only what was determined by heavenly bodies but he did not know individual choices. But you can give God positive attributes where we are in the image of God, see.

"This, however, doesn't help us today, or you. By the end of the 1400s the Greek philosophical effort was over in favour of the more mystical. Abarbanel lived 'til 1508 and said you cannot make an analogy between Torah religion and science: the Torah then gets treated equally. And that was that."

"So I'd find Maimonides more useful."

"Yes, and many still do. But now we skip to the present. Would you like an ice cream from that van? We'll get it and pause. My brain hurts. Sit over there."

Having taken my first lick I said, "All these names. How come you are called Neptune? It's not very Jewish."

"The family name was Ostrowski, and my male ancestors left Poland to come to Britain. Ostrowski means 'water meadow' or 'island', but from there we came across land and sea, and the god of the deep sea is Neptune and the discovery of the planet Neptune wasn't long before, plus Neptune was discovered by calculation before observation."

"There's some lateral thinking going on there," I said.

"My name helps when I am perhaps more multicultural, you might say. And your maiden name?"

"Bode. Bee oh dee ee."

"A warning of a particular outcome. Are you a prophet?"

"Could be." With more licks I stated, "You are unmarried."

"Still looking. But enjoying something different - that group. Hah! Even as a rabbi. Who'd have thought it. Can you ever see yourself not being a priest?"

"Well, I am now."

"You don't believe in ontological difference, do you? You didn't become sacred at the point of the ritual?"

"Not if you put it that way. Nah."

"So if you didn't get another job, after being a curate, you would just be a knowledgeable theologian. But the Vanguard bishops want you for your sacramental qualities."

"All I've ever done to earn a crust is farm work."

"Be a rabbi's wife. Be a rebbetzin - in Hebrew it's rabbanit. It's often said a rebbetzin's quality is a pointer to the rabbi himself, and you would be."

Sat next to him, I looked at him, and I thought about smiling, even laughing. He wasn't. "Oh come on! You flatter me."

"Let me tell you about another Jew in the German Enlightenment - who's one for the numbers - when biblical criticism was arising in those competitive universities of the Lander. People forget: Germany was so progressive and was ruined by its misapplied romanticist myths"

"Our romanticism was, what, Wordsworth and daffodils..."

"1832 and Geiger was editor of The Scientific Study of Judaism, and he was convinced that, with practices but without dogma, Judaism was far more open to modern interpretation than Christianity."

"Did Geiger counter dogma?"

"Linda!"

"Was Judaism more open?" I asked.

"Yes. We evolved the institutions to cope."

"Surely I should be a rabbi not a rabbi's wife," I suggested.

"Oh indeed. You can learn Judaism: I'm introducing it to you, you see."

"You are chucking me in the deep end, more like. If I recall ten per cent of this..."

"I am solving your belief dilemma! And then you can convert! Go through the mikveh and then call upon God and give your commitment. We have a handful of Reformist and a few Liberal Jews in Serninsea, then a number in Wytham, but many there are in Cambridge."

"Go on with your theology later, when we walk further," I told him. "I'm not getting indigestion from the ice cream."

"You are tempted?"

"Sit and lick, Rabbi Maurice, for now."

The ice cream consumption continued.

When we did walk further he said, "The Reformist Jew must be intensively trained and understand the tradition. We are not just wishy-washy but are like the Pharisees - debating from scripture and tradition. Like: what does the tradition say about something, how can I realise it, what does my conscience say, and what is my responsibility back to the community? So our Reformists are like the American Conservatives, and our Liberals are like the American Reformists Two minutes past seven, the Liberal started, two minutes past eight changed its name to Liberal Judaism simply. It is the ethical above ritual, and has a lot to do with equality."

"1902, 2002" I said, translating from his memory method.

"And yet we are all struggling, like you, with belief, when so much seems so different now, but also because six million Jews died and either God was useless to intervene, or was barbaric and chose not to intervene, or was slow to act, or God doesn't exist at all. How can he exist?"

"Yes. The supernatural has died with me too," I said, "if it was ever alive. It was born on life support and never flourished. The Church lets you go 'bleep bleep' and doesn't let the corpse rest. But, Rabbi Maurice, you are contradicting yourself. You can have a crisis of belief."

"You see, a mad supernatural theology says that Hitler was a divine agent and six million were the suffering servants to purify the future. But is the future purified: is it any less racist? What happened in Serbia? What happens in North Korea, Syria, Iraq, Iran, in Crimea, let alone Europe? Indeed, for so many, why is Israel misbehaving?"

"Quite. I wasn't sure what to say about that with you. If you want to build a high wall you build it just inside your own plot, not through next door's and next door again."

"I agree. So another theology is it's all part of the intended pattern, that the West is better, as a result, and Jews live well now. Maybaum, this is. They live better in Eastern Europe, even in Russia where attitudes are sneering. And we have survived: we are witnesses to the fact that Hitler did not succeed. And Israel has come about, in difficulty. Fackenheim, this is. Or there is no answer: God was hidden, God was present, and it is mysterious; it's very dark, beyond understanding, but you have faith, says Berkovits. Or it is goodbye to the God of history, past and future, intervening and present. Joy is now, be more Pagan, and there is a divine Nothing at the heart of it all - just a cycle of death and life for which we had death by the Nazis and rebirth in Israel. So says Richard Rubinstein. So take the latter - a bit of magic, a bit of ritual, a cycle of life."

"I do that, yes I can do that."

"Try a theologian like Mordecai Kaplan."

"This is trying..."

"We look for improvement in this world; we get truth from science; and our values come from ourselves, and then biblical criticism shows the origins of Judaism are just a human construction. God has not revealed the path ahead to his chosen people; instead we have human authors reflecting an internal history. So God does not act in history, the Torah isn't immutable, and the foundation has gone from under rabbinical thought. But God as the will to live is important. Judaism is the community's self-consciousness, not unlike how Emile Durkheim had it."

"Yeah."

"Judaism is a culturally rich formation - social, ethical, aesthetic - a sancta. It's like a life. Kaplan's views, and with his son in law Ira Eisenstein, have led to Reconstructionism, but we include some of those views. In fact Reconstructionists move on as they are bound to do, with the consensual view that Jewish laws are the non-binding customs of a civilisation. Heschel was another same time modern theologian who said look at what forms faith, generates its need, within the real. Like the nature we see here."

I said, "This is so resourceful."

He said, "These crises of belief are within Judaism. I am indeed helping you. Why? I am being a rabbi, a teacher. You could be a rabbi, and a rebbetzin, see. I will say no more. Either we have lost the supernatural or the supernatural has brought you alongside me."

"So many things to do, this God," I said. "Very busy; receives lots of equivalent emails and plenty of spam."

We walked further and with the contrast of little being said. There was quite a while of silent walking, and we approached the tramline.

I said, "This is such a transformation from heritage into a tramline for the folk in the towns. See, transformation is possible," I exclaimed. "It would be different if it ran along the sea fronts, but it doesn't."

He said, "You know, we both enjoyed our gassing away together. We are both gas giants," he added.

It took a few seconds for me to get the joke regarding our names, and then I thought very negatively. "The joke is too insensitive."

"Ah, yes; humour is like theology: it can be very dangerous. It has unintended consequences and references. Gallows humour at best. Come into my car."

The Rabbi Overnight (Wednesday & Thursday 18th July)

Maurice drove me to Ingle Barrow.

Helen McPhail let us in. Stephen appeared and hoped that I understood the purpose of my encounter with Archie Holborn. I just passed it off with a gesture.

He said, "I knew you'd be fine over it, and that's the point. In the Vanguard, we have to be tough. We put ourselves at risk." He left the room.

Meanwhile, Helen, demonstrably wearing a skirt and no knickers - she lifted it up - told me that her period was nearly over. She asked me if I could tell her when mine was due, and I said I could not.

"You're not going through early menopause are you?"

"I should think not," I said.

"And thank you for your doorstep present, which we scooped, but you seem better now."

"It wasn't actually on the doorstep," I said. "And you told me to go in the garden."

Helen said, "Go into the garden, not 'go' in the garden."

Helen showed us our room, with a double bed and a nearby exclusive bathroom. She said, "No time like the present."

So I evacuated indoors this time, and did a brief wash, and got into bed first. Maurice went into the bathroom. He returned, naked, and I realised I hadn't encountered any circumcised penises before. The duvet cover was low.

He got into bed, and said to very directly that if I was to consider becoming his wife, he would claim many personal relationship confidentialities between us. "Furthermore, if you became a rabbi, then they could not use you as a priest."

I said, "They would regard my ontological status as fixed; I would still be eligible to carry out sacramental acts. There could be a conflict here."

He said, "If such a conflict arose, I would be on our side, and we would both leave."

"I can't leave," I said, although wondering about getting out.

"What they say, and what they are able to actually do, are very different. Witness Christine: as a deacon she should have obeyed, even without such an intensive connection as between bishop and priest. But she didn't, and as a resourceful woman they cannot touch her. I am resourceful too, and you would be, and we would decide."

With this there was a knock at the door, and in came Helen with nothing but a see-through nightie on. "I mentored Maurice," she told me, and got into bed, regardless that I was in it. So her hand strayed to me as she brazenly just climbed aboard him, and of course Maurice accepted her immediate offer. "Won't be long, Linda."

Maurice said, "And I thought Annie Fenwick might have joined me. I mentored her: she stayed with me in Wytham for over a week. She is often online, seen on Goosechat."

"She is here. She is with Stephen," said Helen, rising and falling. "But I'm not missing out."

"How old is Annie?" I asked, like a gooseberry.

"Nineteen," said Maurice, slightly breathless. "Do you mind if she comes in between us, Linda?"

"Oh, the more the merrier," I said, with an irony they did not hear.

"When she has finished with Stephen," said Helen, who was aiming to finish with Maurice in the time-honoured way that might deprive me.

"You'll like her," said Maurice. "She was head girl, and one of the few in the school who studied RE with any persistent dedication. She too rejected Augustinian theology, when she learnt all about it in her A level. She studied Spanish too, but I think she had time in Spain as a young child, so it was an easy A level for her."

It wasn't long before this lass entered the room to claim her mentor again, obliging Helen to get off before their orgasms. Thus Helen asked me to finish her off, and came round the bed. What was I to do? I stretched out my right arm and used my fingers and finished Helen with her God exclamation. Annie Fenwick was taking in the rabbi orally. I'd never seen anything like it. And, then to add to it, Stephen was at the open door leaning and looking in and soft, presumably because he did orgasm earlier. Helen bent over to kiss me, which I accepted with my arm around her back. She then joined her husband, and the bed contained three.

And three it would stay, because the young woman, once she had taken in what Maurice had to give her, lay in between us to sleep, giving me direct contact with her lovely curves and early development still.

"Stroke her," said Maurice.

Yet I felt quite uncomfortable about this. My time of discovery was at a similar age to this young woman. Annie muttered that she had slept with my husband several times. She was sure that people I knew saw her online, mainly to watch her masturbate and perhaps join in.

But she was a bright girl, because when I muttered about Aquinas again, in a wordplay, saying, "Annie, I acquired an enquiry about Aquinas earlier on," the teenager quittedly mentioned Saadia Gaon, who died, she said, two minutes after twenty to ten.

The rabbi said, "Oh yes, I didn't mention him to Linda. He was influenced by the Islamic Kalam school, who argued that Greek philosophy and therefore rational argument aided religious argument. Faith and reason are fully compatible. Descriptions of God were implications of God acting in the world rather than God's attributes."

"Are you still awake?" I joked with the rabbi.

"Or take the interesting suggestion that for time to flow means it must have a beginning. The soul doesn't start before the body nor enter from outside but functions within the body: within its faculties of reason, spirit and desire. This is so this-worldly, so Aristotelian, and is fresh to the moment."

"You're like that battery bunny going on and on."

"Annie," he said, "Linda is telling me to be quiet. You never told me to be quiet. Oh, she is very quiet, Linda."

I thought, all these folks under this Confraternity are somewhat odd. I liked Maurice, but he was very intense. The teenager's efforts with Stephen and Maurice had exhausted her, but her warm presence between us lost me a chance of sexual contact with Maurice. I did not want to climb over her, or go around her, or start making movements to disturb her.

I said to him, quietly, "Your knowledge is so much, so detailed; how did that work as a banker?"

"Ah, I knew the ins and outs and knowledge is not only power but the ability to beat the competition."

In the morning, this young woman was feeling my breasts and moving her hands all over; she had become completely sexualised. It seemed wrong.

When I was a teenager I would often enjoy going around the farm, or the club, naked. But it meant nothing to me. I was aware of bodies and intimacies, but I was one of those who just viewed nudity as other people viewed clothes. Long penises or stubby penises didn't get a second glance from me, and it was why, in my case, sexual development was rather late. I know it worked both ways, like some of the teens at the club were at it early. My love revolution was with Jenny, because I discovered largely unreciprocated feelings towards her, whereas my sexual revolution was with Keith. He took me apart and put me back together again.

But now I had a teenager crawling all over me, with a man older than me alongside her, and I'd been with Martin, Stephen, Helen, Adam, Christine, Gretta and Keith in recent times, and Jonathan earlier on. I was myself becoming sexualised. Martin had performed a conundrum in my head of a consented rape. And I did hold on to Annie when I realised that Maurice was now humping his way into her from behind her. I was being acclimatised into multiple present sex partners, rather than a different one in serial fashion. I knew that the group also held meetings and parties.

We were in states of undress or semi-undress at breakfast: Stephen, Helen, Maurice, Annie and me.

I told Maurice, in a moment exclusively together, that it must be him and me only next time. The fact was I'd had an emotional response to him, rather as I had to Christine. I didn't to Helen and I didn't to Annie. I had not seen Jonathan in this mentoring period, and I just wondered if I would fall for him again or want to kick him in the testicles. Anyhow, breakfast was the end to proceedings, and no doubt Stephen would report to the bishops.

Stephen said, before we dressed and left, "The bishops want progress, so the night and morning were a small clue as to the Fifth Guidance. You should make sure you receive and give orgasms, which is the Sixth Guidance. The Eighth Guidance is complaints and concerns. At the moment these come through me, and you'd mentioned Laura Kingswood properly. After all your mentoring, you should approach the bishops if something isn't resolved directly, but you need to show sense as to when to raise a concern among everyone at a meeting. The answer is: the more general a concern, the more it is policy, the more you raise it at a meeting; personal and direct matters should be more confidential. And this leaves us next time to discuss the Seventh Guidance, about what to expect at initiation, because we need to move you forward."

"I thought Helen menstruating on top of my face before was about the Seventh Guidance."

"They cross over," said Stephen.

Instead of going back to town I went to a nearby dyke, stripped off and swam maybe five hundred yards one way and five hundred the other. Shielded by the walls of the dyke, I lay on the grass bank to wonder just what was happening to me.

I put my clothes back on and went to the car and then went north to visit the declining Mr. Youell, and I think Mrs. Youell preferred the fact that I was in mufti and not the cassock.

Following Barman (Thursday 18th July)

The ambiguity in my own position was heightened while being the one passenger in Adam's car at 6 pm travelling to Caffernmere. I told him that almost certainly Janet Hayes was in the group, and thus she could well have left the message. I also gave him information that should have been confined to the group, that she was mentored by Stephen McPhail, being before and after initiation. Adam knew that Stephen was a plumber and organiser of plumbers.

"Helen McPhail mentored the rabbi; the rabbi mentored a school leaver. Something else, too..."

"What?"

"In the course of my investigations, I've turned into a complete slut."

"And what other findings have come from your investigations?"

"The rabbi involved is so full of theological and historical thoughts he's like a machine gun of information and clogs me up."

"That way."

"At present."

"Fortunately, I like you, Linda, and Ann approves. Ann is my more important relationship; obviously I can't have a fulfilling relationship with her."

"I wouldn't want to break your bond with Ann. Look, I'm used to coming second best. I was second best to my sister, as far as my dad was concerned; I was and am second best to Keith, especially when it came to Cheryl; I was second best when it came to seeking ordination, and I am second best with you. So it is consistent."

We stopped near the bishop's house. Adam suggested that I wear some spectacles of his. They had flat lenses, like they used to use in some television dramas. I added a flat cap, also supplied by his truly.

"By the way," I said, "if Yootha Ann, your daughter in law, wants to see Mr. Yannis Youell, she'd better get up here fast. He is not well at all."

"I'll tell her and my wife. I'll do it on my phone now."

"By the way, does Peter know what he is doing?"

"Our lad brings complementary skills. His teenage and since interest in magic makes him good at the job. Because he can do all sorts of magic tricks, he notices what I don't notice."

"How does your lad, as you call him, stay unnoticed?" I asked.

"I'm teaching him all the tricks of the trade. It's good fun. So he learns how my illusions are done. He won't tell me his! If he gets the opportunity to set things up, he can leave people mystified. Where he's best is encountering people and getting information from them."

"Gretta Cox-Jenkins can do that."

"He did a magic display and told me my credit card details and I had the card on me."

"Look after it more carefully."

"One rule we share is put things back and leave as little trace as possible."

"I've spent too much of my working time distinguishing between the supernatural and the magical," I said, becoming a philosophical theologian again.

"Hardly relevant. He can hustle. He knows about prime numbers and semiprimes, and coding, and strategies to get into online biographies. He does have a maths brain and gets percentages. He has won some online gambling but says you have to give it full concentration and take the rough with the smooth. Which is why he has stopped it now."

"Employ him properly, then, as I've said."

"I know, but he presently costs next to nothing."

"That's what's wrong," I said.

"I'm sure we will employ him," Adam said, "in that he's adding to our efficiency and capability."

"Who is we?"

"Me. Ann."

"Isn't it Ann and Labhaoise?"

"Yes but Ann is in the driving seat. Right, just a second, for Agota..."

Mr Youell is dying. If you want to visit, come now. I would like to see you and mother.

Sent!"

We sat and viewed the bishop's house. "What are we expecting?" I asked.

"Him to drive somewhere. Take us there."

We waited.

Adam said, "Hang on, a call. Hello Kathryn. Oh, you two are in separate cars. If you follow, turn off at some point and let Peter take over and he'll suggest where you can follow next. No one has come out yet here. Bye. Thing is, Linda, Kathryn dislikes your bishop for being involved in this matter of the Serninsea Cross brooch and he has not had it checked out."

"Have you ever thought that Kathryn Wickenby could be passing things to her uncle?"

"I rely on it. It's long been known as 'chickenfeed'."

"And you get the Crown Jewels back?"

"Nah. Sometimes you do have to tell someone you are doing something, to stimulate some kind of response. Of course in conditions of necessary secrecy, you hold back. Some chickenfeed is for deflection purposes, but you have to be careful."

"Presumably some chickenfeed turns out to be good."

"Especially at first."

"Isn't Peter trying to go out with Kathryn?"

"It gets better: they've an item. Hang on. Here we go. That's his car coming out. It's a 2006 Lexus LS430."

"Are we following him then?"

"Yep. We need to get an idea where he is going. We may have to guess at times."

I rang Kathryn: "The bishop is driving off. We are going to try and follow and also guess where he is going." Then I rang Peter. "Oh, she's just told you. That was quick. Oh, you both have hands-off."

Adam said, "You are my hands off."

Along the way, the bishop turned at a junction.

Adam said, "I reckon that's the Titansea route. So we'll go up here now and try and reconnect later."

I rang Peter. "Titansea, we think. Where would that be, precisely?"

Adam said out loud, "Hotel? Wilkinson's Casino? Some club? Misleading?"

Peter said by phone, "Could be," and he rang off.

A very quick call came from Kathryn to me. I said to Adam, "Jim and Connie Wilson have driven off. Peter and Kathryn are working in formation."

"That's right," said Adam. "If we miss the bishop, they should stick with the Wilsons and then the bishop comes to them. We'll go a different route. Do you find this exciting?" Adam asked.

"It has its compensations, if not enough for me as a self-declared slut."

Along the way via various roads we did indeed spot the bishop again. So back to Peter. "I'm to tell you we're back behind John Barman's silver Lexus. Oh, Adam has turned off."

"Let's see."

After some time we saw him in front. I said, "Hang on, he's stopping. Oh, you are turning off."

"That's the casino. We'll go up this avenue and face the wrong way."

Then a call came from Peter to confirm that the Wilsons had arrived behind us in a white Astra. Kathryn only had a direct view when driving past.

A car arrived in front as I found some bottled water in the passenger car door. Peter was the driver. He came to Adam's window.

"Yes?"

"Kathryn turned around; she says they've gone upstairs, the staircase going directly up from the first outside steel door in the dead-end passageway with wheelie bins at the end. She says two others have gone in, so there are five up there. The blinds were already down."

"Get in," Adam said.

"No, I'll go and look. I want to check out those steel doors. I think there is a way along below those upstairs windows."

Adam moved and reversed the car's direction so that some car lengths behind Peter's car we had some view ahead and grass to the side. The upper floor was about visible but the blinds down blocked looking in. We could see Peter and Kathryn (in a headscarf and long coat) meeting alongside the side of casino building and walking off to her car.

After some half an hour I joked, "Presumably not a church meeting up there."

"Exactly: why not in the Wilsons' vicarage? If the police ever went above the casino they'd have a hell of a job knocking the door down. Is that why?"

"There was a drug dealer's house on the little Titansea residential estate like that," I recalled. "I've seen the doors there."

"Exactly," Adam said again.

"Who owns the property?" I wondered. "A lot of the property is church owned. All sorts of rents come in from them. But bishops don't collect rent," I added.

Kathryn walked this way and got in the back. She said, "So there is the far steel door for the casino downstairs, which is shut tonight, and they've locked themselves in for upstairs. I wonder if they have the Serninsea Cross brooch up there. Uncle George says imagination must accompany observation to open the options and get explanations."

"What do you imagine?" asked Adam. "Nothing to your Uncle George about this."

"Kathleen is at home keeping her eye on him: he thinks I'm seeing my new boyfriend."

"And?" he asked again.

"It's where they keep the thing. Peter says all the cameras are for the casino."

"Once we're satisfied they've all finished, we'll meet at Linda's."

"How are you getting on with this group, Linda?" Kathryn asked.

Adam replied for me. "She says she's turning into a slut."

"So it is like that?"

I replied, "Yes it is."

"Byeeee," she said, getting out. She got into Peter's car in front and drove it past the casino to the left (east).

We carried on sitting as the five up there clocked up nearly an hour and a half.

I didn't know where Adam went for a pee, and I was beginning to need one. Little drinks of water were adding to the total.

Back in he said, "There's nowhere for you to pee, and it was a bit dodgy me doing it. But I've a bottle for those purposes, and a funnel. Look in there."

This was fun for him. I unclipped and pushed down my trousers, placed the funnel in the bottle, and then peed into the funnel. He had another empty water bottle in a back door for the amount I was pissing and handed it to me.

As I changed bottles, Adam suddenly said, "Here we go. They are coming out. The five of them."

I said, pissing, "I know who those other two are, even at this distance. Stephen and Helen McPhail. The point is, Janet Hayes has written against her own mentor."

"Well done, Dr. Watson. Any clues in their house why the McPhails would be involved? About the brooch?"

"Now I think about it: he has a forge half way down his garden and she does jewellery."

"Well done, again, Dr. Watson. Could have told me that earlier."

With that he'd had enough and Adam drove towards my house as I restored my trousers. Then I realised: Keith! Keith would give our game away, and given that I was being mentored that would be bad. So all three cars in communication did a turnaround and we went to Peter's father's house instead, in Inglemire.

The upshot at Inglemire was that Kathryn decided that she and her sister would talk in a concealed manner about the Serninsea Cross brooch to Janet Hayes, the next time they all met, but we considered that the five had met before approaching news media about the brooch.

I said to Adam, in my car, to return to my house: "How can I fit Mary Ann and Yootha Ann in the small bedroom? Keith is in the second bedroom, unless he moved to the third one temporarily."

"Mary Ann could stay at my place."

"With you? You with your wife? Surely not. It's not fair that Colin Cromer has five bedrooms."

Adam said. "Mary might tidy up the room for me, though I rather think Ann and Labhaoise will tidy it before she arrives."

"Why don't you wash your sodding duvet and sheets for once? I mean, I might like to shag you in your bed at times."

"Get Keith to move bedroom. It is your house."

"It's the Church's house and perhaps Keith has more influence about who goes in it than I do."

"The wonders of your group," said Adam.

"I'm now worried about this former Head Girl: I know she's nineteen but she strikes me as young."

"She is active on Goosechat and a certain Christine Vine owns Goosechat. Annie can look after herself."

"I see."

Back at home and, after visiting the khasi, I was in the kitchen when Adam joined Keith in the lounge. I overheard Adam say that we'd been to the woods. Adam soon came through to me and discovered that I had undressed. I asked him, "What did we achieve this evening?"

"Dogging!" Adam said out loud. More quietly, he said, "They meet above the casino - some of the time. So we need to find out what is there, who else uses it, why they used it, and what else they might be keeping in there given the ready security."

"Actually I could wash these clothes I've just removed. My trousers seem damp. I think I pissed on them when I changed bottles."

So I set the washing machine going, especially with tell-tale smears on them needing the scrubbing brush.

We went through to the lounge, so that I was among two clothed men.

Adam acquired my tablet, and in a few minutes he said, "Linda, come close."

I said to Adam, "Come on lover boy, get them off."

Keith glanced across, so far only watching television.

Adam had a female face on my tablet, starting to talk to him. Keith turned down the television sound.

"Come closer," Adam said to me. "Mirela, this is Linda. The Reverend Linda."

"Oh, hello," said this Mary, or Mary Ann. "Reverend Linda: I think I can see more than I should."

"Hold it up further, Adam. Hello Mary Ann," adding her middle name.

"Ah," she said, "You've been talking about me, Adam. Yes, well, Yootha Ann is travelling early tomorrow via Wytham and she'll be in touch about arriving. How bad is Mr. Youell?"

"I have visited him a number of times," I said. "It's not good."

Adam said, "So I might see you soon as well?"

"I cannot come up the same time as Agota. What's your address?"

"It's not mine. Staying with Linda," he said.

So I gave Mary Ann my address, to pass it directly to Yootha Ann, saying, "Looking forward to putting her up."

"I'll see you then, Mirela," said Adam.

Mary Ann said, "Linda, look after Adam for me."

I said, "Okay," but then wondered what she meant by 'for me'. So as the screen was blank I said, "For her?"

Keith grinned, restoring the television sound.

"Oh, she is just being pleasant," said Adam.

"I thought Ann ran your life."

"I am married."

"First of all, I'm not looking after you, and secondly I'm not her representative."

And as for coming second in things, it seems here I come third."

Adam smiled, and said, "Don't forget Labhaoise," which caused me to turn on him and smother his head with my breasts.

Keith called across, "Don't break your tablet!"

Narrator: Adam Christine Starts Her Collaboration (Friday 19th July)

What Linda did not know was the day after we received the note from the identified Janet Hayes, I received a posted letter from Urania House, Hammersmith, London. Personal and Strictly Confidential, it was marked, which meant that Peter had not opened it. It gave me a number by which to leave a message, a message of a preferred location and time.

How risk averse was she, because she might have to say risky things? I wanted to test her mettle. So I chose a meeting point two hundred yards to the side of the back of the bishop's Caffenmere garden, the garden where Linda and I had toileted previously. I did not tell her it was the back of his garden, but insisted on the direction of arrival (not to cross the garden). He had a camera there, but I'd since worked out where it was pointing.

So I spoke to Peter and asked if we could use his father's house, in Inglemire. We were aware that this could be a fake contact, a set-up to distract. Having seen Christine Vine walk past the office's street-facing CCTV, I was reminded what she looked like.

I arrived beyond the garden end and did a three point turn in the road. Her car arrived. So she was the genuine person. She herself insisted on a diversionary journey away as she did not want to drive past the end of his garden.

So, with her own three point turn, she followed my car get to Peter's father's Inglemire house.

"Where are we?" she asked.

"Inglemire."

"Yes, I know that. Whose house?"

"My assistant's father's."

Peter welcomed us in, and his father arranged drinks with a spare room downstairs. I had already briefed Peter on the questions I wanted to ask, and he suggested a few as well. She had come by helicopter, no less, from Ebbsfleet to Eslaforde, and driven many miles to the rendezvous and this destination.

With drinks ready, I was sat at one side of a card table and Christine at the other. Peter was sat on a settee recording the conversation, but I also had a pad of paper and a pen.

I said, "Christine. Thank you for asking to speak to me at a location of my choice. Tell me what you want to talk to me about."

"I want to tell you about a group called The Worshipful Company of Serninsea Theatrical Players. It is a cover name for, currently, one of three groups of people all of whom come under something called a Confraternity. The full name is the Confraternity of the Theocratic Principality of the English National Church and in Latin it is Principatus Theocratic Confraternitati admissis in Ecclesia Anglican Nationalabus. I think you already know something about this group, because you were investigating it to some extent while Linda Jupitas was being targetted for probable membership. And on this I want to give a condition of mine and I think an extension of that condition will flow from this."

"I am not investigating, but Linda Jupitas has been, and she obviously communicates with me. I know about the badges, some of those involved, and I know it is a secretive and ritualistic group, and learnt something about you and the pre-ordination retreat, and you not getting ordained, and that it involves beliefs about sex and practising sex. You want to tell me its secrets? You have conditions?"

"Yes. You must persuade Linda to get out. This demand is related to her historical friendship with Jenny World. Jenny is vulnerable, which is why she is still a curate, treated as a daughter or little sister by her priest in Hartlepool called Fatima Tammuz. Fatima would give Jenny up if someone else monitored her condition, but so far the relief that Elizabeth Huett provides is occasional. Liz is busy and also not based in the same town."

"Linda, for your information, is already conflicted. She looked strained yesterday evening. Did you send the note about the Serninsea Cross brooch?"

"I said she could put 'From C' to help disguise her as the source."

"Janet Hayes."

"Yes. I came past your place but she put it in the recycle bin. Janet is falling out with them, withdrawing. It's an ethical issue. I want Linda to do the same."

"Why don't you ask her?" I asked.

"Because I want you as her lover, her friend, someone she trusts, to give her this recommendation."

"You did meet her."

"I kept to a secular role script. Is Linda committed to joining this Confraternity group?"

"Linda wants to make her own discoveries. When she was ordained, she got a kind of excitement bug based around the opportunity the group offered, to actually make a difference, set against relative failure in her parish ministry. You had a lot to do with this. She has said all this to me. But she is worried about the treatment of some young and vulnerable people. Annie as 'Headgirl' online isn't vulnerable."

"Annie is a gifted person who has been wasted, despite teacher efforts; she had a bad home life. Jenny World has turned into an unstable nymphomaniac and Laura Kingswood is deeply troubled through a succession of bad experiences. She is my tenant so I still have some influence. My purchase over Annie Fenwick is limited to her webcam work and her obeying the rules. It's a very moderate site, much unlike me."

"Lovely lass."

"I know you feed the meter with Annie."

"Between her legs for me. Fabulous. She just is. But, to the point: you got out after encouraging Linda to go in."

"She's tough. They've got that right, at least."

"Maybe. Why did you leave?"

"Differences. I'll come to these. I thought I would always have Jonathan Eyre on my side, but he sided with his longer term pal, Barman. And Liz had her affair with Barman - though he and Liz are single. May I go through what I want to tell you? My comments categorise under emergence, organisation, purpose, personnel."

"Sure. Please."

She explained that the groups had their origin from a series of connections. Jonathan Eyre was in a shell of a marriage, when women became notches on a post. This included some dreamy-eyed and perhaps ambitious clergywomen, and so many women became pregnant it was amazing that he wasn't exposed. Christine was one of his lay captures, although she gave him her thoughts about sacramental ministry.

Peter said, "It's amazing what people don't take in when they look but do not see."

"Maybe," she said, "but he brought together all sorts of streams in my mind. When Jonathan Eyre fucked me, it was like everything had come together. Jonathan had me in the palm of his hand, but I realised this and tried to turn this around - my stances in exchange for sex."

Added to her ideas was the core insight from John Barman's conference affair with Liz Huett.

"Not only did I agree about the orgasm, but realised sex could pay me a living to carry out ministry. I also have a view about pain as commitment. Jonathan had connections into the escorting world via some business people. That's what got me clients and self-management."

"I was introduced to the property market at Serninsea. Directed towards ordained ministry, I located my church base at Wheaton north of Eslaforde and thus became its curate as a deacon. I read a lot of material and could see how to draw together authority and purpose. I read John Milbank, Catherine Pickstock..."

"Wacky Races?" I asked.

"She wrote much on liturgy. Graham Ward, James Smith, Stanley Hauerwas, Michael Hollerich, Georges Bataille, Randy Rashkover..."

"You're kidding."

"Matthew Fox, Sallie McFague... No? Linda will know who these are. Plus many Church Fathers, especially Quintus Septimius Florens Tertullian."

She described to me Apostolic Catholicism inside the National Church, and how she wanted to overturn hundreds of years of existing views of sin. John Barman's view was simpler: if it feels good it must be good, not sinful, but she combined service and sacrifice. Whilst she had nothing against pleasure, it had to be combined with actual sacrificial service and the end that was truth.

The upshot, however, was a group of people formed a "generous Catholicism under the Church" that even included Reformist Judaism and Modernist Hinduism, where her own Body Eucharist liturgy attempts connected into an initiation service that involved the sexual transmission of fluids.

"Yojana is in management but does have an interesting grip on modernist Hinduism. Rabbi Neptune is vastly knowledgeable on Judaic thought as a tradition and as a reform. Linda could relate to him; it might suit her theology."

The group had to be secretive to be able to select and reject people before they were too aware of approaches. Christine said how priests under bishops had no choice but to join once selected; Christine had herself avoided this, but this wasn't planned.

She said, "The group won't survive expansion based on principles of pleasure; it could be unearthed with the Wytham diocese under scrutiny of its bureaucracy. You could investigate the group and add to the exposure of inefficiency."

"You inform me, and I inform the media?"

"Yes, and add what Linda and Janet has learnt."

I could see the tabloid potential here: the National Church, its people of authority - still associated with the establishment - and effective orgies, affairs, and questions of abuse. "I'll need names, but also want to try and protect the innocent, especially Jenny, Laura, even Annie. Because these things can be destructive."

"And therefore why Linda should get out."

She told me that the Serninsea Cross brooch had backfired. Barman wanted to produce a discovery of an Anglo-Saxon treasure, but the Wickenby twins had insisted on the micro-testing of it. It wasn't directly a group matter but it showed the nature of the man. It had been made by Stephen and Helen McPhail and testing would expose modern methods even when imitating old methods. The McPhails wanted to prove they could be experts, but Barman then got cold feet. "They met to resolve how to go forward, the best way to declare it a fake."

I said, "Linda is being forced to join, and yet you are telling her to get out. What's the risk - what can they do to make compulsion stick?"

"The one example is Ken Osis. He started backing out, but he faced some of the equipment made by Stephen, as used by Connie and Jim Wilson. The Wilsons are sadists, and Barman uses Connie's assertive nature even in administration. Nothing happened because he folded. It may be that Linda has to seek sanctuary somewhere, while exposure of the group takes place until it is destroyed."

"Did you set up this compulsion for priests?" I asked Christine.

"What I asserted was that the priest was the arms and legs of the bishop, and that is Catholic theory, and ecclesiastical in form. They've interpreted that as indivisibility, and therefore compulsion. But the answer is that the priest can resign and become 'incardinated' to another bishop. Of course the problem is the Vanguard group asserts a coup of loyalty within the National Church, so the connection to the diocesan bishop is superseded by the bishops of the Confraternity. But an individual can still resign and seek a new bishop."

"Linda has a house and a paid job. You'd force her into poverty."

"No because exposure destroys the groups and the Confraternity, and if she is out of it, she keeps her job, her house and restores, properly, her direct fealty to her Bishop of Wytham. Anyway, I have the means to see that she's all right even if everything goes pear shaped."

"So, from being loyal and dependent yourself and giving them fealty, you are now into destroying them completely."

"They have become corrupt," she said. "Instead of providing service, it is nothing more than a means to pleasure. Experience is never enough; unless there is sacrifice there can be no gift of service. All three bishops are simply pleasure-seeking, and the two they're getting from Wales includes a clone of Jonathan and another where she has had a long incestuous relationship with her niece. I'll give you their names as well, but they haven't joined yet and, to be honest, no one gives a toss about the Welsh Anglican Church."

So I said to Christine, "I have some news for you. My business colleague Ann, part supplier of your properties with Labhaoise, thinks Linda is on the road to destruction. It's partly why I am staying with Linda. We are wondering if we can give her a religious role within the business - we've adjusted the planning permission to include religious use for my place and next door once they are combined. We don't know how this may come about, but she'd have a bedroom and a base to work from. Something like that."

"Might be interested in that myself - not a bedroom. I could provide her with a house. You could give us an altar table and some seats. I noticed a big double garage. Many independents put a chapel into a large shed or a garage. Gretta Cox-Jenkins once operated like that."

"She also advised Linda not to join. So I will discuss matters with Peter here now, and with Ann in particular."

Christine asked if she could stay the night, and we agreed. She needed just a bed and a room, and she'd pay for these and her breakfast. Peter's father Donald rejected payment. She didn't fancy driving back to Eslaforde or to some prostitution house in Serninsea for a room. She was probably still dodging around people and she'd come to me assuming separation from George Wickenby.

My final point was that if this involved Magellan Investigations doing some actual investigating, then there would be a fee. "On the other hand, making a dossier for the media might pay for itself via the media."

The interview ended, and Peter and I discussed the fact that we needed to build evidence to have a dossier to go to the media. I went back to Serninsea, and contacted Ann for advice. I said nothing at all to Linda about meeting Christine, when she arrived with Yootha Ann at my office.

Much later at Linda's I received a message from Peter.

Christine was naked on the landing. Her body has scars from whips and lashing. She said, 'These are from sacrifice and clients.' I proposed installing secure communications between your office and decoding terminals in London, Eslaforde, Ebbsfleet and a terraced house in Serninsea.

He was being too clever by half. I agreed, of course and then wiped the message.

Narrator: Linda Yootha Ann and Uncle Adam (Friday to Saturday 20th July)

Yootha Ann had said she would get the bus from Wytham station to Serninsea late afternoon, so after my Friday visiting I went to receive her at the central bus stops, standing under a bus shelter from the reducing rain. I would recognise her from being Mr Youell's worker from Rumania in the next door farm.

At the bus stops a man said, "Hello Reverend Jupitas," standing with a woman alongside. "Christopher Richardson; yes, Mrs. Jupitas. This is Karen Halsey, my girlfriend, who is a nurse already in Eslaforde. She's just arrived."

"Hello Karen. He won't tell you, I'm sure, but I was a patient when the practice nurse was examining me."

She said, "You're out shopping? We're back from Eslaforde looking for a sofa. The shops didn't quite have what we wanted. We'll try Wytham tomorrow."

"Ah," I said. "If you want one online, look up Dyfed Cadalwadr in Llanidloes. He has a website of furniture. Mention my name in the information box and he might knock off some money. He will arrange delivery - his location in Llanidloes is irrelevant. He sources what you want, and delivers."

Karen said, "We like to see, feel..."

Christopher said, "Cad... al... wad... r."

"Dyfed is spelt 'dee wi eff ee dee'. The 'y' is like a u and the 'f' is like a v."

"Oh," he said.

"Welsh. Obviously. He is the husband of my similarly intersex sister, Lucinda, Christopher."

"Ah."

"Go to three double-ewes dot dyfedfurniture dot co dot wal and you'll get it. And I didn't have sex with him, Christopher."

"Hey?" asked Karen.

"Sorry. I gave the nurse he was with a long list of sexual partners at present," I said. "The nurse was enquiring into my sexual health, you see."

"Giving sensible advice, no doubt, and in confidence," said Karen.

"I'm sorry. Of course confidentiality goes both ways. Apologies to you too, Christopher. I should realise that the professional activity of examining my sexual organs is in a cordoned off space."

Well, that was handled well, I thought - not, as they gave pleasantries to part. Perhaps I was becoming too loose sexually.

No sooner had the pair gone that I said, "Hello Agota," choosing her original name, as our guest came out of the bus from Wytham. She dropped her bags by me under the shelter.

"I prefer Yootha Ann now," she said, after giving me kisses past each cheek. "I tell people I am British rather than coming from Erdély."

"Of course. If you remember, Adam used your native names and I still tried your British ones. Accidental, really."

Tall, but not as thin as she was before, I noticed in my more sexualised condition that she had pointy breasts pushing into her t-shirt. Her shortened brown hair was newer to my eyes.

Walking to the car, I took her on the short journey to Adam's, and she said in the car that, "I am proud of being a Magyar but I want to blend."

Peter let us in; I introduced us, and Adam and Yootha Ann gave each other one big pressing hug. He never did that with me. Adam told Peter he could go home. We three went upstairs, where either he had cleaned up or Ann and Labhaise had done it for him.

"Nothing has changed much here, Uncle Adam," said Yootha Ann.

'Uncle Adam?'

"But it will," said Adam. "I think I'll be coming in to quite some money soon, buying next door and doing the whole place up. How is mum?"

"When I see her she is very well. Do you still care for her?"

"I have great affection for her."

"And do you love me?"

"Yootha, I have always loved you."

(More than me, then.)

"I can sleep here in your bed."

As Peter below left the building, I started to feel queasy. I said, "At my house, Keith, my separated husband, has agreed to move into the third bedroom. You can share a double bed with your mother, when she arrives."

"Oh, thank you Linda," said Yootha Ann.

The three of us went in my car to Sutton. Once arrived, Adam took up Yootha Ann's luggage. Soon she was upstairs unpacking and he was down again. I put the kettle on for coffees.

It gave me the chance to ask Adam, "Why 'Uncle' - how old is she?"

"Thirty-five. I can hardly be called 'dad', can I?"

"No. I'll take her up to see Mr Youell," I said.

"We'll all go," he said.

I rang Eliana Youell to say we'd be coming. We'd had our coffees first, to not have any there. I noticed how hands on - literally - Adam was with Yootha Ann, sat together, touching her head and shoulders, hand down her back, mugs in hands.

Soon, we all said hello to Mrs. Youell and then Adam and I removed ourselves to the car.

"So her surname is now?"

"Aysher. A rapidly failed marriage."

Back at my house mealtime took place, and she told us plenty about Reading and Slough. However, she was still shocked at Mr Youell's physical appearance. "He was once so strong," she said. "The funeral is planned; the cancer is spreading big."

I said, "I can take it. I knew him."

"No, they are doing a Civil Celebrant," Yootha Ann told us.

"A humanist. Ah, they are getting popular."

"No, these are not humanists. They do qualification."

Adam said, "A bit like an NVQ. Sort of thing my new lad is doing outside the agency inside the scheme."

"An NVQ in private investigations?" I asked.

"No. An inappropriate Administration with ICT. It doesn't test him," Adam said.

I said to them, "Clergy are sometimes put out by the rise of civil and independent funerals. We thought funerals would hold up, unlike baptisms and marriages. Funerals were yet another God-of-the-gaps ritual: people are so secular."

So, at the meal, I said of our newcomer, "Let me ask you a question. Why Yootha Ann?" I wanted to hear it from her.

"It was choice, a television star I saw. She was funny to someone learns English. Agota wasn't an England-friendly name; you know this. I changed my names, as mum did. I call her mum now just like the English. Annabella is long-winded. György is more George, but my gone husband's name is Aysher. You live with someone and then realise."

"So do you know your dad then?" I asked.

Adam quickly said, "Linda!"

"What?" I responded.

"No, I don't know. His marriage to my mum was not long either. None of them! I was pre-school when he left. I think mum marry Adam to make an honest woman of her in UK, as you say. Though it didn't last, did it. You know why, Adam."

"I don't think we ought to go over this ancient history."

"Obviously I fear for my mother as well."

I asked, "She's got man trouble again?"

"No! It spreads fear, does not cancer? Poor Mr. Youell. Mum's only fifty-two."

"Mary Ann: I look forward to meeting her."

Keith came in from an extended work session.

I said, "Keith. This is Yootha Ann. The one for whom you've shifted bedrooms."

"I have some news," he said. "I've started showing my job to someone who is going to take my place. She's on a short contract to begin with, but she will do what I have done except for some functions."

I told him there was some food left; he joined us with greetings but then decided to go to the front room.

Sometime after tea Yootha Ann asked me, "Are you going to marry Uncle Adam?"

"Em, well, the divorce has to come through first. As you saw, my husband is still under this roof, but leaves to Felixstowe to be near his girlfriend very soon."

"How did you two meet?"

"School, but mainly university."

"No," Adam said, "she means us two."

"I was a client of his. And knew him at school."

Yootha Ann said, "That's how mum meet you, is it?"

Adam said, "Yeah, but what Linda really wanted to do was find out if her husband was having an affair. She got someone else to pay. Your mother's was a proper SMS enquiry. Obviously, I didn't get further work."

Yootha Ann said, "Do you go out with all your female clients, Uncle Adam?" And she started giggling.

He replied, "Actually, a few of them."

I said, "I look forward to hearing about some of the others."

"They depends if Ann approves," Yootha Ann added. "Uncle Adam says you go around undressed many times."

I looked at him. "Er, yes, but I'm not now."

"You are a vicar as well."

"I'm not a vicar. I'm a curate, that is under the wing of the one who is a vicar. Yes, there are times and places for everything, as the good book says."

"And you never had children."

"No."

"You two can have children. You are forty. Mum got herself pregnant when 16. She was far too young to marry but did in the village church."

"In Rumania," I said.

"Transylvania."

I tried not to giggle myself, having a vision of lots of long black coats, bats flying and the like. I couldn't resist: "Was it a gothic wedding?" Adam looked at me with a severe stare.

She said, "No it was simple chapel. Unitarian."

"What?"

"It is the simple village chapel."

"These folks seem to be following me around," I said. "Perhaps it's a message from God."

"What?" Yootha Ann asked.

"Oh I walked into one of their chapels by accident in Wytham, plus your Peter has online contact. We have creeds and things, bishops, and all sorts of clutter your Church doesn't have."

"Plus deep cultic elements," said Adam.

"We have a bishop and I was brought up learning the Catechism."

"What?" I asked. "Unitarian? That's not what they said at Wytham."

"We go back to the 1500s."

"I'm confused. Adam; you must introduce Yootha Ann to Peter properly," I said. "So 'we' means you as well as your mum."

"Of course. The population around the region is Orthodox mainly but Unitarian as well, like many in the village. My father was from outside village." Then Yootha Ann asked, "Can I ask you - if it is not too personal - do you and Uncle Adam go to bed together then?"

"Well that's a sort of, 'how personal do you want it to get?' question. So the answer is 'yes' - we do, yes."

"Because, aren't you supposed to be vicar and, you know..."

"Well, I am not a vicar. Yes there are all sorts of things I'm supposed to do to live an exemplary life."

"So you don't."

"No, I am supposed to give the appearance of an exemplary life. But we don't live exemplary lives, and it is all rather by social definition and one may as well just regard it as ridiculous."

"So you..."

"Plainly speaking, Yootha Ann: my husband fucked his girlfriend, and, after that discovery, I'm fucking Adam - Uncle Adam."

"Sorry."

"No apology needed. It's how it is."

Adam said, "Actually, that was crudely speaking; I am obviously Linda's revenge."

"No you are not," I said. "You are with me on your own merits, and hopefully me to you. What is more, Ann approves. Surely that matters to you."

"It does."

Yootha Ann said, "My mother. She was in your choir. She wanted a church. She decided against the Methodist church. She liked yours better. She likes to sing, doesn't she Uncle Adam?"

"Singing. Yes, my wife was involved in your church. They needed more bodies in the choir."

"This choir folded before my time," I said. "Numbers shrank. We sing from within the congregation now. You are all surprises, Adam."

Yootha Ann asked, "Just, I am wondering. Are all clergy like you then? Your boss, the vicar then, and then others..."

"Here we go," said Adam.

"No. My boss really is exemplary. He lives the dutiful single life. Ah, yes, so your mother was his interest. I suppose I am the really naughty one, but I keep it very quiet."

Yootha Ann said, "I've never been religious. My mum was, but not now."

"She wasn't when I knew her," said Adam.

"No, well... " said Yootha Ann, stopping herself. "Big disappointment, the choir. People."

Time ticked on further. Adam talked about showing Yootha Ann around Serninsea tomorrow. For us all, after drinks, it was time for bed. And, as established, Uncle Adam came with me. We were reading via tablets.

I chose to do some reading on Reformist Judaism. I said, "I suppose I ought to read about Yootha Ann's religious background. Do they have websites? Vampire bats, blood will tell, write some code, in HTML."

Adam looked at me. "You know, for an intelligent woman, you can say some spectacularly stupid things. Fancy asking, 'Was it a gothic wedding?' Rumanians don't come out at night and and bite," he said.

"Christopher Leeeee."

Looking at a kindle, Adam said, "We did some basic preliminary research on the building."

"What building?"

"The sixties building that is the casino, with its upstairs," he answered.

"Knocking on the steel door shop."

"Is there something wrong with you tonight? It was built as a theatre, downstairs, a proscenium one - that has since gone with it being a casino. It once had a staircase behind the theatre. There used to be wings either side the proscenium and a crossover behind it all, and upstairs there was a large rehearsal space, and lots of rooms to facilitate everything. The theatre failed. The idea was to put on shows, but there weren't enough - a lack of interest - and the place didn't make enough money. The entrance was at the side like now, but just one and a staircase there. Now we see two outer doors, separated, so the upstairs is a large space and a few rooms behind still. The building is church owned."

"That explains the language of stagecraft and our bishop in the control booth and all that crap."

"Oh yes. The source of the metaphor."

"Yes," I said. "I need a pee."

After pissing. I came out of the bathroom when Yootha Ann emerged from her room in a thin nightie. The slight curve on her body was enough, and her small breasts perhaps expanded to darkening nipples, to tell me that she was pregnant. Maybe three months or a little more. She went into the bathroom.

When afterwards I lay down with Adam, and started playing with him, I said, "She's pregnant." I was on his left, both facing the door across the room.

"I know," he said.

"You know? So Mr. and Mrs. Aysher have a new one coming along. She'll have to arrange access, then, and all that."

"Not his."

"Oh. So who's the father?"

"She doesn't know."

"I think I'd know, Adam. I usually check who is penetrating me, even these days." There was a silence. I then asked, "It isn't you, is it?"

There was a knock on the door. It was Yootha Ann, of course, stood, in the same nightie, now lit from the landing light behind her, and thus more confirmation of her pregnant female nature.

"Night night Uncle Adam."

"Come on then," he said.

A naked man got out of bed, and she swung her arms around him for a hug. And I'd thought that only Lucinda and our father had 'cuddle time'.

"Night night, Yootha Ann. Go back to bed now." He kissed her on the lips.

And off she went with a spring in her step. I decided against any sex with Adam.

"How old is she?"

"I told you."

"And your daughter by marriage."

"I wasn't with her three or four months ago. I did my bit with Ann and Labhaoise."

"Okay, 'Uncle Adam'."

"She works among salespeople and, like her mum, is in administration. So her boyfriends are not even local. That's how she's kept a number of them. You're a naturist and presumably such families are on display to each other all the time. Like your dad."

"Can you not tell the difference?" I asked back.

My anxieties were confirmed when next morning there was a knock at the door, and Yootha Ann came in. She wanted to join us.

Adam said, "Come in here."

"Er..." I said.

So she popped into bed climbing over Adam and lay in between us as we half sat up.

"I can't help noticing you are having a baby," I said to her.

"Yes. I want it. I go naked like you two." And so she tossed the nightgown to float down to the floor beyond Adam.

I said, deliberately, "It is not your husband's?"

She pulled the duvet down to reveal her stomach. "No, like you, we separate. Why you have no children?"

"I can't."

"Why can't you have them?"

"I'm not made your way."

"How are you made?"

"I wasn't made with the necessary plumbing to have babies. So I have told you."

"That is sad. I am happy."

"Good," I replied.

She asked, "Are your mum and dad separated too?"

"No. They are happily together with my eldest sister and her husband, and my youngest sister, on a farm in Wales.

I could tell that Yootha Ann had placed her right leg over Adam's left leg.

"I am getting up," she said.

I was a bit concerned as how she got up and shuffled over Adam, giving him a kiss on the way. He then gave her bare bottom a light pat. Next came a complete view of her rear, because she bent right over.

Standing, turning and smiling, she said, "Good morning Uncle Adam, good morning Mrs. Curate."

When she had gone, Adam said, "Families!"

I felt like punching him in the face.

Colin's Query (Sunday Morning 21st July)

Sunday came. Mr. Yannis Youell had died Saturday afternoon. Yootha Ann was now staying until the funeral. Mary Ann was travelling up. I knew Yootha Ann wanted to attend the morning service, to see me 'perform' and to reflect her own way on Mr. Youell.

I was actually presiding in the morning and giving a sermon in the evening. But Colin Cromer wanted a word with me in the vestry before the main morning service.

"Yesterday night I received a call from a parishioner that Mr Yannis Youell had died."

"Yes, I know about him," I replied.

"Yootha Ann George has visited him several times. I understand this morning that the funeral is not to be one of ours."

"The funeral, as such, is a short ceremony in a pub taken by a Civil Celebrant when the body itself is cremated somewhat later according to the convenience of the crematorium. Her name now is Yootha Ann Aysher."

"How is this so?"

"She had a short marriage."

"Mr. and Mrs. Youell were married for decades."

"Sorry, Yootha Ann's surname."

"If you are arranging the funeral, or she is, why aren't we doing the funeral?"

"He wasn't a churchgoer. I haven't arranged anything. The younger family are very secular. They've done it."

"You did visit the family recently."

"Yes. A number of times, like Yootha Ann did once she'd arrived."

"What is going on? "

"Yootha Ann appreciated his employment."

"You seem to be well informed; I am the vicar here and it seems I am not. Why do I know nothing about this? Where is Yootha Ann staying?"

"At my house."

"For a while, then."

"Yes, a number of days."

"What is she to you?"

"I sort of befriended her. I knew she was coming here."

"What I am trying to get at, Linda, is her connection with you, let's say, before she was coming here."

"Can I, Colin, ask why you are so concerned?"

"Putting up people we barely know. There is plenty of accommodation in our seaside towns, as you have lectured."

"Yes, she is staying with me."

"Why?"

"There is one connection."

"Which is?" Colin asked.

"Her mother was Mary Ann George when mother came into the church choir."

"Then it is a great pity that we are not doing the funeral."

"She is not the Youells."

"No she isn't, and so I am back to my original question. The connection, Linda. Why would you put up Yootha Ann?"

"Colin, don't get like the bishop. I mean, like when he was spying on me."
"Bishop John does not spy! You are his and my curate, and I am entitled to an answer as to why this lady is being put up in our curate's house."
"Am I not entitled to privacy?"
"You are not entitled to being evasive."
"How do you know what you know now?"
"I know because a parishioner rang me about his death and Mrs. Youell mentioned Yootha Ann staying with you when I then rang Mrs. Youell this morning offering my condolences."
"Why are you asking me when you already know?"
"Because I want you to say why."
"Colin, there are many dying every week in this seaside town, and you take little interest in them, whether we do their funerals or not."
"I always take a great interest in the people at a funeral. Like ringing Mrs. Youell. Like when an ex-employee of theirs is staying in your house."
"Well, there you are then."
"So now I have asked you several times. Will you not answer my question?"
"It's a fluke happening, Colin. I visited the Youells' and Yootha Ann wanted to come up, and I was perhaps over-generous."
"Well I note that there is some distrust here. You are not only being evasive: you are lying."
"No, it really is a fluke. She was working at the next farm to ours."
"You are lying because this is not the complete answer. Why are you interested in this woman, Yootha Ann? Your words, please."
"Colin, why are you so interested in this woman, Yootha Ann?"
"I give up."
"But Colin, you are being evasive. You are not telling me why."
"Linda!"
"Colin, now I really have no idea what you are on about. I know it is a tied house but surely I have the right to decide who stays, even if I take in waifs and strays off the street. And she is hardly that."
"Is her mother, Mary Ann, coming to the funeral?"
"Yes."
"Is she also staying at your house?"
"Yes. In fact she arrives later today, but obviously she had missed out on seeing Mr Youell alive."
"Perhaps you will tell me the accommodation arrangements."
"As I have told you, I am now separated from Keith, but he still lives in the same house. For your information, Keith has already moved from the second to the third bedroom so that mother and daughter can fit into the double bed that Keith has been occupying. Does this answer your query?"
"It answers one query."
"Progress, then, Colin," I said.
"For God's sake answer why you are housing her!"
"Because she is her - Yootha Ann's - mother."
"Not her. You simply will not answer my simple question: 'Why is Yootha Ann staying at your house?' Answer me."
"I have told you. Either that or you think you have another answer that I should give."

"Well, let me try this answer. Mary Ann was in our choir. Adam Magellan married her. He then lost his wife's company when she so incredibly soon gave up her SMS job and moved away. Yootha Ann is staying with you because you are living with Adam Magellan, in that house, despite my repeated warnings and despite your separated husband being in the same house. The reason she is staying at your curate's house is because Magellan has his feet under your table and he has already invited his adult stepdaughter to stay."

"It's a fluke."

"Not really, and it is a good job Bishop John will know what is going on because I will tell him."

"Colin. I'm saddened."

"And so am I. Good job that the validity of our Eucharist is not affected by the moral standing of the priest."

"Are we done?" I asked.

"For the moment, because a service needs our presence."

"Very real," I said, as I left the vestry first.

"What?" he asked, behind me, not getting the joke about 'real' and 'presence'.

Adam and Yootha Ann then came in. I waved. Colin now gave me the severest look I have ever received from him.

It put an edge on to that morning service. Who was being unworthy? Plus, Yootha Ann came forward for communion. Unitarian isn't exactly valid enough to partake. But I wasn't going to refuse her. Colin gave me one glance but he had the chalice and didn't refuse her.

Colin said no more.

Sermon & Christine's Escape (Sunday Evening 21st July)

After a Sunday afternoon of accompanying Adam and Yootha Ann at 'The Playground' amusement park and lying on a town beach, where I was hideously over-dressed, Yootha Ann decided that she wanted to come to the Evensong and hear me preach. Her mother would arrive by car into Serninsea later in the evening. (She had learnt to drive in Slough.)

Yootha Ann and her five years older stepfather arrived with some five minutes to go, as I came out of the vestry holding my sermon papers, and I noticed a certain well-dressed Christine Vine sat at the back. There were only nine others already attending.

I went to her. "Hello. What are you doing here? Come to pray?"

"I've come to warn you. I'll listen to you first."

"So pleased to meet you again; it was awkward at Andrew Walter's."

"Your training vicar is looking."

Indeed, Colin was looking from the altar table end, and when I returned he said, "I recognise her. She was the curate in the bank robbery and the news, and she was the one who failed to get ordained. What is she doing here?"

"Come to pray, I think."

Colin said, "I'm beginning to think that you think I am an idiot. I see that Adam and his daughter in law are here again. They got away before I could speak to them this morning. I have an answer for that."

So he went to the back of the church, where he said hello to them both, and also to Christine, in a combined act of pastoral duplicity. It was clear that Adam had recognised Christine, which, given his lack of ability to remember faces and names briefly encountered, was rather interesting.

About ten minutes into the service, a certain John Barman came in and sat on a pew nearest the door.

I said to Colin during the second hymn "The bishop is here."

"As entitled," he said. "Make sure you give a good sermon. I've told him about Adam Magellan staying in your house, and he said he is very concerned."

I suppose, with all that was going on, and having been ordained priest, I didn't care what Colin thought or did any more. Because, of course, Barman now had me 'on board' and he knew all about Adam in my house. Barman himself might have disliked Adam, but he didn't care, so long as I was discreet.

Funnily enough my evening sermon was on pastoral care itself. Perhaps I was offering pastoral care to Yootha Ann. Although I was looking at the bishop, at Yootha Ann and Adam, and at Christine, Adam and Christine looked decidedly uncomfortable, shifting about on the pews and looking side to side and at each other.

What I said was that the word 'pastoral' can be too narrowly associated with the clerical paradigm. We are all members of one living body, and arguably one priestly office between us all. As for caring of souls, I stated that we mustn't make a mistake of spiritualising souls. "It's kidneys that rejoice in Proverbs 23:16, I told the gathered small number that chuckled. The soul thirsts and hungers for the Lord, it says in the Psalms 42:2 and 84:2a, meaning physical attributes. Indeed the central Christian rite is of eating and drinking and not something disembodied."

I thought, myself, but didn't say, that I bet the Unitarians could not match this! "Liturgy and worship should embody pastoral care," I told them, "but not be limited by it, providing its own regulative pattern.

"But if liturgy produces a set of gateways to the future, produces the new from the old, in exchange and gift, then it is clearly pastoral because the new is healthy and the old is but memory. This is more than time as a healer, or waiting as pastoral: it is a ritual act and in a sense forcing the issue through renewal in encounter.

"And it is not individual. Although individuals receive pastoral care, the care is done collectively, publically, and interactively. We become captured as one in the sacred story. And it is both ordinary and extraordinary - either the Eucharistic meal, so basic, or indeed the full Christian narrative itself of loss and death and utter renewal."

I looked at Christine, who'd said so much herself about loss via sacrifice.

"In the end, to know is not cognitive and propositional, but to know when one encounters it. And that's biblical and pastoral. Amen."

As I returned to the choir pews, Colin Cromer, clearly over-compensating, told me that this was the best sermon I'd given so far. "Positive and no self-doubt."

As the dismissal came, for me to do it, I positioned myself at a church pillar to avoid being seen by the bishop as I looked at Adam and pointed to Christine. Adam himself was pointing towards the bishop at his stomach level and shaking his head. I nodded. I saw Adam speak to Yootha Ann and I paused as she went over to Christine. I then did the dismissal and the organ music started.

Adam walked ahead from his seated position and stood to anticipate, even block, the bishop. Christine stood up, and she and Yootha Ann came directly down the aisle towards me. Adam then pointed to the altar end of the church, near the vestry door, turned around and left through the main door (before anyone else).

Colin said, "Yootha Ann, and Ms Vine together. How interesting. Are you coming to talk to us?"

Thinking on my feet I said, "Speak to Yootha Ann, Colin. This is Christine, who was a reverend deacon in our very own Church as you know; I'll show her the vestry if I may. Come on."

"The vestry isn't for... Sorry, Yootha Ann; I hear you are staying with my curate. Come with me to the main door where I will shake hands with departing folk."

In the vestry I unlocked and opened the external door, our own sometimes clerical way in and out. And off Christine went as Adam approached from the back gate beyond the graveyard. (The vicarage garden was to the side of the graveyard.)

"Star number palindromic base 2 and 8 St. Sernin's French road!" he shouted to me. "Star number palindromic base 2 and 8 St. Sernin's French road!"

"Yes, I've got it. Star number palindromic base 2 and 8 St. Sernin's French road."

"I'm a bishop from yesterday!" Christine called back. She and he walked directly down the grass pathway alongside the graveyard to the end gate.

As I returned to the vestry's outside door, the other bishop approached from within the vestry. I did actually stand in his way. "Bishop! So good to meet you."

He asked me, "2 and 8 St. Sernin's French Road? What does he mean? There isn't a St. Sernin's French Road!"

"Don't know Bishop John; excuse me." I went around him very slowly in the vestry.

He went down the path, but Adam and Christine had bolted.

He turned to call out at me, pausing. "I am going to do your initiation; you follow my authority!"

"Oh no you bloody won't," I said to myself. I went back among the pews and up to the front.

"What is going on?" asked Colin alongside Yootha Ann in the main church, still at the main door. Yootha Ann smiled somewhat at the spectacle.

"I think Christine decided to leave before the bishop could get to her."

"You helped her."

"Yes, he has no claim over her."

"But he has over... Anyway, Yootha Ann here says she remembers happy times with the Youells. They really looked after her. And she says I can meet her mother, with pleasure."

"She'll be arriving tonight."

"We'd better go," I said to Yootha Ann. "Ah bishop, you're back. This is Yootha Ann. Yootha Ann, this is Bishop John Barman and Bishop we two are off for something very nice to eat. Come on, can't stop. I'll disrobe at home!" I pulled her by her arm.

Colin said, "Er, goodbye, and see your mother soon! Bishop, please, what..."

"That Reverend Christine Vine," I heard the bishop say as I paused to the side of the doorway outside. "She has not given up her religious activities, and I'd hoped to ask. Being helped by Magellan and your curate, obviously."

"Come on," I then said to my lover's daughter in law.

Yootha Ann got in my car with me. "On your phone look up Star number palindromic base 2 and 8."

She said, working the Internet, "Star number 1, 37, 73, 121, 181, 253..."

"253 is too many, actually 181 will be about the last one - if it is Toulouse Road. Locals should know that the Abbey of St. Sernin or Saturnin is in Toulouse, Yootha Ann. It's why we have Toulouse Road. The bishop should work that out when he thinks a bit."

"I am looking now palindromic base 2 and 8. Er, 1001001 and 111 it says and both are 73."

So I dropped her off in Sutton and inside I disrobed and changed to mufti, quickly, before I drove to the researched destination and copied the stake-out of the other day to park a short walking distance away - in fact between number 2 and 8.

However, I could see the bishop walking about, clearly considering whether to knock on some door. So he had got the correct road. I decided to drive past him, without spectacles and flat cap this time; I didn't think he noticed me. I could not approach number 73, so I turned and drove past him again to observe and go home. He must have seen me, because it wasn't long before he called in person at the curate's house.

"Where have they gone?" he asked me as soon as I opened the door, fortunately still clothed.

"I really don't know. I was as lost as you, Bishop John, driving in the same area."

"Why did he pick her up? Your Mr. Magellan. You helped."

"No, it's very unusual for him even to come to a service bishop. Ask Colin..."

"He was there this morning. He obviously knew in advance about this evening."

"If you say so."

"You must have known Christine was coming," he said.

"No I didn't." (This much was true.) "Adam does not tell me what he does at work. I thought I would get to chat to Christine."

"You're lying. And under the Confraternity you do not lie to me."

"I'm seriously not. I did not know. But, bishop, you turned up during the service, so you must have known she was with us."

"I cut to very short an appointment at another church, when I was told. I thought I heard the word bus. So it could be bus 2 and 8, but we don't have a bus 2, 8 or 28. Toulouse Road?"

"A bush bishop, perhaps?"

"I'm telling you: don't come out. I'm going back. I'll find them. And I think Stephen McPhail needs to emphasise our requirement for your obedience."

"Oh. See you later Bishop John."

Adam's phone was off, and so was Peter's. I had some tinned salmon with salad with Yootha Ann.

She said, "Are things normally this?"

"It is a bit weird tonight."

"I think Reverend Cromer is trying to find out more about mum."

"Yes, something there that isn't quite right either."

Mary Ann arrived! Yootha Ann and I, and then Keith, welcomed her mother.

We had to explain that Adam was busy. (Keith also kept his counsel despite his group membership.) Thus I decided to go out and down to Toulouse Road, parking in a cul de sac some blocks away, regardless of the episcopal instruction.

I went to number 73 and rang the doorbell.

"It's open, come in," said a slightly metallic voice.

"Oh, hello Peter," I said when indoors.

"They came here and left immediately out the back. Ann Dromeghda acquired this house ages back. Adam then asked me how we could codify the house and I said about the special number characteristics of 73."

"So where are they?"

"They are at my dad's house in Inglemire. You see, we are almost certainly being watched. Kathryn's uncle is doing it, Sunday. George will guess you have come in and think they are here. There's a tenfoot at the back way and you can get out to Mabel Street. So specs and a hat, I think, for both of us, a bit like you had at the stakeout."

"Yes. You've got them. Good."

"We'll leave the lights on."

So I went first, and waited in an access tenfoot to Mabel Street, and then vanishing man Peter drove up and told me to get in.

"I'm parked down Thorpe Close," I said.

"He'll find that, will George. Your bishop will already know you've come into number 73. It's all about our ability to get out less noticed."

"Isn't your dad's address known?" I asked.

"Eventually." He parked in his father's drive, and I'd recognised Adam's car on the road.

In we went. Adam, Peter, Christine and myself were using Peter's dad's sitting room. I said, "Hello Christine! What a going on!"

"I didn't think he would come to the church. After all, he was supposed to be at Wilson's church in the marshes."

"Useful number 73, isn't it?" Adam said to me.

Peter said, "This is my dad, Don Marshall."

His father said, "Ms Helicopter here is good company for a middle aged geezer like me. Used that field yesterday, flew over in both directions today. What a machine!"

"Leon is the pilot, not me," said Ms Helicopter. "Having the helicopter fly over Caffenmere and Serninsea today fits in with my appearance in your church."

"You're all investigating, and out of hours," Donald said.

"Yes," I said. "Adam, how do you manage Peter's involvement like today, Sunday, on a government scheme?"

"Well, that is for me to know and anyone else to guess," said Adam.

I said, "Yootha Ann is this moment welcoming her mother, your wife."

"Oh fuck," said Adam. "We'll go soon as we can."

"Christine," I said, "what shall we talk about?"

Donald said he'd return to his programme on television and left us.

"Your service," she said.

"Really?"

"Yes."

"No, let's ask about you. That clothing is sharp," I suggested.

"It's because of aspects of my job."

"You said you are a bishop now. How does that work out?"

"Listen. I will talk about your sermon."

"I don't think you are a bishop."

"I am but I will talk to Adam first." Adam looked at her, and then looked at Peter looking at us.

I said, "I can wait. My training vicar: he liked my sermon tonight."

"Yes, I thought it might impress."

"I didn't do it to impress," I replied. "I tried to give it 'substance'."

"I bet you did," said Christine, "But if you examine it, was there anything actually said?"

"Yes, the soul is not disembodied."

"How is the soul either embodied or disembodied?"

"Em, well, not airy-fairy spiritualised."

"What is one and not the other?" she asked. "Nepes means soul, mostly a noun, rarely a verb. Mediated by throat, appetite and breath. Basar is flesh, as something held in common, whereas nepes is individual. But they are connected. You cannot eat the nepes - counted as blood. Body and blood, Linda."

"I don't get your complaint," I said.

"You were not talking about anything," she asserted.

"You're very sceptical," I responded. "All we've got are words."

"Think about it," she said, "where is the sacrifice in our general core ritual?"

"I was talking about inner renewal."

"You cannot have renewal without sacrifice. In your view, liturgy is only like a battery getting a top-up."

"No, it's more eternal than that."

"So why keep doing it then?"

"Because our real lives have a pattern: drinking, eating, urinating, defecating, talking, sex even. A ritual exchange is a token, representing real world life changes. Andrew Walter talked about Gestalt."

"You constantly come at this from the wrong angle."

"Well, you haven't lost your interest at all."

Adam had lost interest: he was looking at the ceiling; Peter was listening.

"I told you, I am now a bishop. Respond to my point! You come at this from the wrong angle."

"Circularity and renewal in ordinariness: but set against a linear faith, a line made more eternal," I answered.

"That's dualism. You always end up dualistic," Christine said. "You are trying to leap-frog across a chasm. When we have a core ritual, we ought to give a sacrificial offering."

"Isn't the point that Christ did this for us, so we do not any more?"

"Then why do it - the ritual? What is the real presence? Assuming it is real presence. Where is the giving? Where is the effort?"

"Turning up. Coming forward. The collection."

"Trivial," was her dismissal.

Adam then said, still looking up, "Why are we talking about this?"

"What are you suggesting?" I asked Christine.

"His body and his blood, our body and our life force. Of course it is ritualistic, but it must involve something."

"Ritual involves useless token exchanges: Trobriand Islanders and all the Kula ring shit. Poor quality wine and a wafer are just as useful. Anyway, real presence is ridiculous," I stated.

"But here is the thing. I am deadly serious; Barman thinks it is all entertainment, all pleasure. There is no harm in pleasure, but we should do something that involves actual effort, real risk, in offering to God, recognising at some cost God's, yes, unconditional gift to us."

"Barman is after you," I said.

"Ah!" said Adam, "relevance!"

Christine said, "He has no jurisdiction over me. I'm taking away his pleasure trade."

Adam then said, "I don't want to be funny, Linda, but, at present, the less you know the better. Christine has already been giving me some useful information."

"That, I gathered," I said.

"I want you to play dumb and puzzled regarding Christine. Obviously don't say a word about the earlier stakeout."

Christine said, "Janet Hayes doesn't like Barman doing what he has on the Serninsea Cross brooch. They met to strategise wriggling out."

I said, "He is pressing me because I am under the Confraternity."

Christine said, "I have an alternative. I will tell Adam."

I asked, "What is it?"

"I'd rather not say, yet. But my travels and conversations and actions..."

"The helicopter yesterday?"

"Yeah. But you, Linda, do not get initiated into the National Church Confraternity supposed Vanguard. Get out. I am warning you. It is your real sacrifice."

Adam said, "She's right. It's now too risky for you to find information from inside the group"

I said, "Rest assured. I'm not having Barman fucking me in an initiation."

Christine said, "It was never going to be anyone else. But even if someone like Liz was going to do it: get out."

Adam stated: "We may need some duff notes for Kathryn or Kathleen, I suppose, in case their uncle starts getting funny. But, Peter, anyone, tell Kathryn that Christine here went to number 73 only and she's locked in. I don't want George down here."

"Chickenfeed," I said.

"Linda," Adam said, "can I have a couple of minutes with Christine alone? Go and say hello to Peter's dad."

I knew when I wasn't wanted. But I wasn't a fool. She used the helicopter yesterday, and she'd told me she was a bishop from yesterday.

Adam drove me to the north end coastal road of Sutton-on-Serninsea and then drove further northwards, leaving me to walk home a fair way under the soon reached street lights. He'd decided he could not come to my house after all. I did pass a car a street from home with some man sat in it looking at a mobile phone, but I decided to keep walking. I knew I'd have to collect my car next day. I went in to welcome Mary Ann, unable to say when Adam would be back to welcome his wife.

Adam did return late and greeted Mary Ann just as she was going to bed in a nightie. And for two well-separated, the hug was rather heavy and long. Again, he didn't hug me like that! So why the hell were they not together? Surely Adam could have operated in the Thames Valley, where there was likely to have been more work as well.

Colin Criticises (Wednesday 24th July)

On Wednesday afternoon attention was paid to the funeral. It was strange because there was a direct cremation to take place in the future and the ashes ready to collect later still. No one attends at the actual cremation and it is much cheaper. This 'service' was in a local pub that Mr. and Mrs. Youell frequented. A Civil Celebrant was hired and was available very quickly. Wednesday was their traditional night in that pub but this was early.

Adam was not sure about going, but did, taking the two women, whilst I was sure about not going, and didn't. Instead, I did a short spurt of visiting, and then came back to have a walk about town (to meet and greet randomly) and end up at the inner town cafe. In came Diana and Patricia, burdened with some town shopping.

Almost straight away, Diana said, "Your fucking sad man, Ken Osis."

I asked, "What's been going on?"

Diana said, "I was at reception in the casino last night when he came in and he recognised me. My dress was low-cut and he even referred to it. I've heard earlier today in the college that he has been into the staff room with his collar on."

Patricia said, "Linda, can you help her get shot of him?"

I said, "Well, yes. I hope he is not talent scouting."

"What?" Diana asked.

"Oh, never mind. Talented women, he likes. Look, Mary Ann is with us. This Unitarian thing! So this wife of Adam was one of these in some Transylvanian village. Presumably she still is."

"Sorry?" said Patricia. "Say again!"

"I know! Transylvania," I said.

"No: 'Adam's wife,' you just said." Diana was smiling. Patricia continued: "You are a married clergywoman sleeping with a married man, who welcomes his marriage partner?"

"He's well and truly separated."

"They should have divorced by now," said Diana. "So they are - what? - both staying at your house?"

"Yes."

"How much trouble do you want for yourself?"

Patricia asked, "Who is Adam sleeping with?"

"Me! Mind you, Adam doesn't hug me like he hugs them. He hugs Mary Ann, who's 52, and Yootha Ann, who's 35."

Colin Cromer himself was at the window, and came in to the cafe and paused at the till to make an order.

"Shush a bit, my training vicar has just come in."

Diana asked. "Yootha? Where did she get that name from? A vampire?"

"Television. They both changed names when here. Yootha Ann George, Mary Ann George and then Magellan. Yootha married a chap surname Aysher and rapidly separated and she is now pregnant, father unknown."

"This gets better," said Patricia.

Diana said, "Actually I've done a bit of reading, some of what Adam looks at."

"Peter," I said, correcting her. "I did say."

"Suit you, really, this Unitarian mob."

"I got a boost by being ordained: that feeling I got. My driving force is Catholic and liberal-minded."

"Feeling? Believing?" Diana asked.

So as Colin came close I said to Diana, "Well, I still feel different, so that could be what we call pneumatology. That's in the New Testament where the Spirit makes God's life active and accessible outside God's own being. That's related to salvation. Given there is only, really, the salvation economy in the Son, in which the Father and the Spirit are actively present, then everything gets incorporated into Christ. The Father or Spirit can't be separate. You can't say what is personal isn't real. There you are."

"Very good, said Colin, sitting at the spare table alongside over the aisle.

"I don't know what the hell any of that means," said Diana.

I said, "What is personal is made super-personal through Christ the personality when the Spirit moves... Definitely not Unitarian."

"She's right," said Colin. "You need to tell Peter Marshall."

Diana said, "So the Spirit is what moves you, what you feel."

"Yep. Well..."

"Feelings," Diana sang to me.

"Not so. 'All things came into being through him, and without him not one thing came into being.' It's in the book - John. 'Through whom all things.' says Paul. Father and Spirit through... Yes."

Diana looked bemused. She knew that all this was for me to impress Colin.

So I added, "In the divine economy, they all share the job done, and there is no bill because it is a gift."

"Well I am in some admiration," my training vicar responded. "You are discussing theology with your friends. But in this divine economy, there is a profit account and a loss account. And, on the latter, I was at a funeral of sorts in a pub given by this so-called Civil Celebrant. It was semi-religious. I have to tell you one who is not pleased with you, and he was there too. It is Bishop John. I don't know why he was there. Keeping their distance were Adam Magellan with two of his family. His family, still. Wife, still, and step-daughter. The bishop did not like the way you assisted Christine Vine to run off on Sunday. She has left our Church completely. Excuse me for mentioning this, your friends, but Bishop John is not happy with your personal relationship with Adam Magellan - as I am not, I say yet again."

"Oops," said Diana.

"I may as well say it, even in present company. These recent relationships - you with Magellan, Keith your husband with an SMS employee in Harwich - all started during your marriage, Linda, and before you were priested. Bishop John says you need to start doing what he requires, he told me."

"Oh dear," said Patricia.

I said, "Let me tell you that Keith is leaving for good, hopefully very soon. Please don't try to embarrass me in front of my friends."

"They know all this! You embarrass yourself, with your conduct unbecoming. Bishop John informs me that Connie Wilson wants to meet you again for more shopping and socialising. Why this should be important I have not a clue, but what I do know is he expects you to do it. Now, do you all know how Yootha Ann got her name?"

"From a 1970s comedy star," I said.

"Correct. She saw the comedy actress on my television set. I still have it on video. Man About the House. Why do I have it? Seeing as we are being honest on this sad day, hear me. Her mother was in our choir. I might have made a respectable woman of a Mary Ann Cromer, but she suddenly upped sticks and became Mary Ann Magellan."

"Grrr," I sort of said.

"Coming into the choir as she did, she was a relative outsider, and as such had fewer implications for a man in a position like myself. And given that Mary Ann Magellan and Yootha Ann Aysher - yes I do know - are about to arrive in this cafe, I will drink up this tea and bid you all farewell for now."

"The choir were racist towards her," I said. "She got out."

"Rubbish," he replied.

Off he went. So the bishop went there. About five minutes later Mary Ann, Yootha Ann and Adam did arrive at the cafe and sat at the same table over the aisle, the two women facing and Adam facing them on the same side as me. I introduced Patricia and Diana opposite me, but after offering condolences (particularly to Yootha Ann) my friends said they were going very shortly.

Mary Ann asked, "Why was your boss, your vicar, at the funeral?"

I replied, "I don't know. I didn't even know he was going."

At this point, however, my mobile phone went. It was Bishop John, the all-knowing interfering git.

"My Reverend Linda, Where are you?"

"I'm in the cafe I go in, in town, with my friends, and now joined by Mary Ann and Yootha Ann, and I know you were at the funeral because Colin Cromer has just been in here."

"So many to see together at the funeral but I decided not to follow on. I note how unco-operative you have been, Linda. Connie Wilson wants to impress upon you your obligations. But I would say, I hear you, and I don't need to be your initiator. We can compromise."

"Colin mentioned Connie wanting me to go shopping again."

"Indeed. Have you seen Christine Vine since she was spirited away at the church?"

Adam could obviously hear this: he shook his head.

Diana asked in a whisper, "What's he going on about?"

"No," I lied, in my answer to the bishop.

"I don't think there is any more I can say productively. God bless I suppose."

Quickly I said, "I'm not going shopping with Connie Wilson. I don't wish to see her at all."

"Oh dear," he said. "Goodbye."

He'd gone.

"Adam," I started asking, "Should I make this the point of getting out?"

"Up to you. We're building up quite a picture."

Diana said, "Curiouser." She and Patricia got up to leave.

Mary Ann said, "We will both stay only one night more, if that is all right. And then we should go homeward."

Yootha Ann said, "But I've enjoyed meeting Uncle Adam and indeed you."

"We'll all head off back to my house then," I said to them. "See you two again soon," I said, looking at Diana and Patricia.

I showed Adam a text message immediately arrived from Connie Wilson:

Shopping very soon. Do ring me to arrange the date and time tomorrow.

"You'll ring her?"

"Presumably in order to show willing?" I answered him, as Diana and Patricia left the cafe.

He said, "If you don't 'show willing', that's the break off."

Mary Ann Explains

When Mary Ann went upstairs, I had the opportunity to speak to her alone. "You can tell me to mind my own business, but there's one issue I must ask you about."

"Yes?"

I told Mary Ann to come into my bedroom and sit on my bed with me.

"Look, even as a naturist I have been a bit restrained with Yootha Ann here," I said to her. "She is Adam's step-daughter and is wandering around at night with her small bump visible under her nightie and with her nightie off. I've no problem with that. I want to ask her about her affectionate nature - this 'Uncle Adam' stuff, when he isn't."

"She is - what you say - affectionate."

"Aren't you worried?"

"No. She is thirty-five but immature. Too many men take advantage. Adam? No."

"So next question is, er...."

"The father?"

"Doesn't she know?"

"She does know. I work for a Slough transport company and SMS legitimates their vehicles, they call it, at the two Felixstowe branches - SMS and my employer."

"So?"

"And for Agota we found a similar job in Reading, mixing with the same transport people."

"So the father is known then."

"He lives in Felixstowe, who himself comes out to Reading and Slough on his travels."

"Hmm. So the father is known. On Adam: I think that Adam almost grieves for you; I'm sure he really does love you."

"I am not dead. Adam: he does not know how to love. And the reason for marriage was mine; it was bad move in the church and I had to get out. And Yootha Ann became, you know, too close to Mr. Youell, so it best she got out as well. They did have affairs, Yannis and Eliana. Linda, if you want to marry, I will give you a divorce."

"I'm not married to you."

"I give him a divorce, sorry. You pick me up on language."

"You say he does not know how to love?"

"Not when I knew him. But why would he?"

"I was starting to think that he is not in love with me because he is in love with you."

"We did go to bed. Proper marriage. Consumed."

"And you left him."

"He has affection. He doesn't actually love. He joked that he was looking for woman when I had SMS business for him. I made him that woman. But he had a situation at school: a teacher he cannot escape."

"He doesn't have to see Ann."

"He likes to see them. They like to see him. Before, it was difficult and perhaps they feel guilt since. And then two girls made fun of him, horribly I think. These made him more sexual, but they took away him having a relationship. He try to have a relationship with one of them, but she went strange and dumped him he say and went to university. She went to theological college after. So she is one of your people, but not in this area."

"You know about these two, but not who they are?"

"I don't want to know. The other one went off to university and married someone afterwards. I'm sad for Adam; Adam is sad man."

"I think I do know who they are," I said.

"Maybe you do. Ann, a bad influence, is his wife, really. And he gave her and her woman children. So if you have difficulty with him, blame the teacher, the sixth formers girls."

"Oh dear. Well, em, why is Colin Cromer so concerned about you and Yootha Ann being here? It's made him a little out of character."

"I know that. I liked church life back in my village. I thought this is like a village, by the sea. You don't have Unitarian church here; you have a different catechism, but this National Church of yours looks... The word once used was 'accommodating'. So I like singing - singing a lot, you know, good Protestant traditions - and I joined in the choir. Good for English too."

"I don't get how you with a modern religion would come into our church."

"You are wrong partly. What is your parish church building - Victorian? The church where we worshipped is fortified at Dârjiu, or we say Székelyderzs; it was Roman Catholic and became Unitarian with Reformation. It is Romanesque style and Gothic, and, I know, received rib-vaulted arches, and there are carved images of a pelican with chicks, the sun, the moon, masks and a ploughshare. There are buttresses. There are five metre high defence walls in a square, the gate tower has openings for firing guns, also closed with wooden shutters."

"Useful idea! We could do with those. Shoot the congregation on the way in, kill the suffragan bishop."

"You make bad fun. There are these St. Ladislaus murals - a significant man in forming Europe. These frescoes from early in the 1400s after the church was first built were damaged when the arches were added in the earlier 1500s and in the 1600s when pulpit came."

"Sounds like lad is louts! No? I jest, Mary Ann."

"Ladislaus was King of Hungary from 1077 and King of Croatia from 1091: Ladislaus built up the Hungarian Kingdom, so later Hungarian Kings venerated him for their own purposes. It is said Ladislaus was canonised on 27 June 1192 by Pope Celestine III. The main shrines are at the Cathedral-Basilica of Oradea, Romania and Cathedral-Basilica of Győr, Hungary. I tell you the most popular story in Ladislaus's legends is his fight with a "Cuman" warrior who abducted a Christian maiden, and this is what is depicted in our church. Colin Cromer liked that story. He didn't like so much that as King, Ladislaus got tough on thieves. People could be hung for theft; if they fled to church to escape hanging, they were blinded, and offspring of bondsmen and freemen reduced to slaves. Steal a goose or a hen and lose one eye and then make sure there's a hen or goose to go back. Yootha Ann told Mr. Youell that story because he had geese."

"He had geese until he died. I mean, he always liked to keep geese."

"Of course. He liked geese, and he liked women. Among all the various important relatives, Ladislaus had a daughter, Piroška, and she was Empress Irene in the Byzantine Empire, venerated as Saint Irene by the Eastern Orthodox Church."

"I'm even more baffled now. I thought your Church was modern. So what happened between you and Colin?"

"Colin was single, too long single I think, and I warmed to him quickly. But I met Adam when business had business for him. Colin showed me love, but I did not like the choir people, because I was outsider. They did not like me. My life with Colin would have been with these people. Colin realised I was seeing damaged Adam, with sex, and gave way. To make it right, I married Adam. This left Colin very upset, and yet the choirmaster still wanted me to return to choir. I came to the church but sang in pews. Then Mr. Youell had relations with Agota, but she was able to convince his wife that it was not her. She realised that next time she would be caught. Mrs. Youell had social connections with the women at the church, and the gossip found its way to Colin. Then I was isolated by women at the church and I just looked for a job elsewhere. Mrs. Youell never went back in the church at all. At the time she met a man or two. SMS had Harwich vacancies and there were partner and client firms, in other places, and Slough was one of them, and I just decided to move. I took Yootha Ann, taking her from Mr. Youell. Soon she moved to Reading."

"Oh dear," I said. "So Colin had given you his heart."

"Adam and I did physical attachment; Colin was more, yes, romantic. I would have stayed with Adam. Ann with Labhaoise's children: I didn't know that at first and learnt this truth. They were his. I was annoyed when I found out. I was surprised Adam went to the church with Yootha Ann this time, now, like rubbing dirt in Colin's nose."

"Why do you stay married then?"

"It is no consequence. I'm different in Slough. My attachments are more like his. Perhaps you will improve him. Colin Cromer will be unhappy to know that you and Adam in relationship. Of all the people!"

"Be assured. I'm affectionate for Adam. I don't think we will ever have a standard relationship. Ann Dromeghda does approve."

"Yootha Ann and I have train to catch tomorrow. I suppose we have no reason ever to come back to Serninsea, but if we do we shall call on you, and Adam, and so both of you stay together."

"Yeah, I'd love to see you again. I'll drive you both to Wytham railway station tomorrow."

"No, bus is fine."

However, when we went downstairs and into the lounge, Mary Ann entering first, she asked, "Adam, who were those two girls you told me about in your sixth form?"

He said, "You two talking about that?"

"Gemma and Leena? You gave me once their first names."

Behind her I shook my head at Adam. I said, "I know who they are. Gina and Le-Lori."

Moving his eyes from side to side, Adam said, "Some sort of women's natter you've been having?"

"A Romanesque church," I said. "And a Hungarian Lad."

"Ger-Granville?" Adam asked, making a reference to another old television comedy.

"Ladislaus," said Mary Ann. "You know all this."

"Him on some wall," said Adam, "back in the land beyond the trees."

Later on in bed, in came Yootha Ann again, and this time her mother was behind her. Now a naked Adam got out and up and hugged each in turn.

Mary Ann asked me, "Is this all right with you?"

"Yes," I replied.

"I remember with pleasure his cock."

"Well there you go," I said.

"Nicest man," said Yootha Ann. His embrace was of her body too.

He said to me, after they'd gone back to their room, "She's thirty-five, not really a daughter, not a niece."

"Adam. I have spent ages trying to get you to get your clothes off among my friends. You then, without a thought, get up out of bed, stark bollock naked, and hug mother and daughter."

"Well, there you go," he said. "Proper intimacy, not like that cult lot you're seeing."

I said to Adam, "No matter what has gone before, now I want that bishop and those groups exposed. Take them apart."

"So do I," said Adam. "I will. You and I should stick together. I need to get back to work. Peter has been running the shop but I like your methods. Okay, we wobbled a bit with your genetics but not now; I have an urge to do some really hard sex and you are the one for it. I like looking at Annie but Mary Ann has reminded me - and you - about real contact."

"And the daughter in law you hug screwed or was screwed by Yannis Youell and goodness knows who Eliana bedded."

Still, I found what he said reassuring, and made myself available. I wanted fucking hard on the spot. He obliged. After all, he wasn't fucking his wife. On the other hand, the damage he carried was my fault.

Point Blank Refusals (Thursday 25th July)

Having refused to go with Connie Wilson shopping a second time, by telling her directly by telephone, I went, perhaps against my better judgement, to the McPhails' on Stephen's following summons by text. On arrival, there was a definite change of mood.

I sat in their kitchen, and both of them were there. He said, "Bishop Terry is very disappointed in you. You helped Christine Vine get away from him. He wants to know what she is doing. What is she doing?"

"I haven't got a clue. I unlocked the vestry door because she wanted to leave. He came along behind me; I didn't realise he was chasing her."

"Not according to him. He is concerned you haven't absorbed the First Guidance on obedience. We are here to further the work of the Vanguard Confraternity. Yes? We do it by obeying the wisdom of the bishops."

"He turned up ten minutes into the service. Christine obviously wanted to leave. She was there to hear my sermon and participate in the service."

"She is no longer part of the National Church. She has given up all involvement. She has nothing to do with Wheaton; Terry says she even has a different house in Eslaforde. But she is busy doing something and went elsewhere in the British Isles on Saturday. Her helicopter was around on Sunday."

"I don't know. I saw her earlier in something of a stitch up for me when she was dealing with tenant issues."

"Stitch up? Who made the stitch up?"

"He did."

Helen shook her head, but Stephen said, "I think you'd better get your clothes off and come to the sexual play room. You need to receive some discipline."

I didn't move. "Really? Is this instead of shopping?"

"Terry decided that we should deal with you by Connie taking you to Nottingham. You refused."

"Why Nottingham again?"

"Because you can do a stint in the sex shop we frequent there, and Chloe Brown can assist you offering yourself to willing customers. Also we can put you on the late train, and see if anyone will have you in the toilet."

"Ah, the sex shop I went in with Connie Wilson."

"Yes. Annie Fenwick has worked in there to loosen her up. She's a star now of Goosechat. You need further breaking in. You're still going, to Nottingham, because you obey the bishop. First Guidance. This, coming up now, is extra."

"Annie is part of Christine Vine's Goosechat."

"We don't change a commercial business arrangement. Annie is definitely one of ours, at our meetings. And she was eighteen then. You're asking too many questions. You need to realise just where you are coming from, instead of being on your high horse - like Vine has been. She's always telling people to 'listen' but seems not to hear anyone else. You're getting to be the same."

"Right, that's it," I said.

"What?" Helen asked.

"That's it. I'm not going any further with this. I would have done an initiation, possibly with Elizabeth Huett, but not now with this, and not with these accusations."

"There is no bargaining in this," he said. "I'm your mentor, and you need to understand discipline."

"I'm not bargaining. I'm quitting. I nearly didn't come here. I'll just do parish ministry, thank you very much."

"Linda, sit down."

"I'm going, thank you."

"You have no choice. You are a priest and the Vanguard bishops have claimed you. This comes before any diocese."

"No it does not. You are operating a cultic fantasy..."

"Oh really. Get in the sex play room!" He moved in front of me.

"Are you going to stand in my way? Am I to be your hostage?"

"No."

"Then I will leave. Thank you and good bye. Nice knowing you."

I went out into the front garden and to the road.

Stephen called out, "You will be forced back!"

I went to Adam's where he was busy in his office. I said to Adam, "I've quit the group. I may need some protection."

"Ah," said Adam. "Good. Okay. Christine was worried that you'd drag things out. So I will need a debrief all about this group, and also on what you know about the other two groups."

"Hardly anything about them. The groups don't spread out information until after initiation. The purpose of the Nottingham shopping trip was to prostitute me in a sex shop."

"Like a Mary Millington?"

"Who?"

"Never mind."

"Is she another clergywoman? I don't know all the names. Does she need protection?"

"Calm down, Linda. None of those: a tragic public figure, especially after she acquired a sex shop in London. Look, I don't suppose they will resort to physical violence because they want the group to be secret. Barman will start making your parish life uncomfortable, and then you'll have to make a career decision of some sort. Ann says it is like punishment in a school: it always relies upon the pupil's and parents' consent, even at the end of a process. If you don't consent, they can't punish."

"Why are you discussing this with Ann? Why don't you start making your own decisions?"

"Calm down! She is financing my investigation. You're not paying; Christine isn't paying, although she could afford it."

"I have left. There is nothing more to investigate."

"You told me to take them down. I'm still interviewing Christine. I want a full picture. Have you seen Sea TV today - with all that about Janet Hayes??"

"No."

"Well, watch it some time. Put it on upstairs. You'll see."

So I went upstairs, and put on the television, and when the news broadcast cycle re-ran, it included Bishop Barman saying that he'd "discovered" that the Serninsea Cross brooch was very unlikely to be genuine, and although originating with an unnamed detectorist it was likely to have been planted in the Marshes deliberately. "It is, unfortunately, modern. Nevertheless, it remains valuable and can still be a symbol of the past for Serninsea."

"Liar," I said to myself. "Forged by Stephen McPhail and Helen's jewellery skills. Complete fake and deception."

"Who are you talking to?" asked Peter, entering with two coffees.

Later on Kathryn came upstairs. She said that the bishop was: "...a complete liar. It is not a symbol of anything, other than the pastiche nature of the present day. It's fake news."

"Yes," I said, "although they are very skillful people - the McPhails."

Chapter 15 What Christine Does

Narrator: Linda Trip to See Geoff Virgo (Saturday 27th July)

It was time to disappear. Christine had advised that I get out of the area. I left an email for Colin Cromer, that I had been obliged to attend a dying aunt living in Bristol. There was no aunt in Bristol. The furthest relative, other than the family in Wales, and someone in Norfolk, was in Leicestershire, and that was a cousin of some remove, someone I never really knew. I had to say Bristol because my mobile phone would identify my location.

I drove to Eslaforde and a given rendezvous, where I then followed Christine to her new house just outside Eslaforde, near the railway, and one with a large field. The decorators were in. My car went into her double garage, alongside hers. Her pilot, Leon Agnew, had made all the clearances for a journey that would take us across the country, some two hundred or so miles, with no need to stop and to arrive in a busy airfield. The helicopter could do some three hundred miles in one go, she told me as we flew. She was taking flying lessons; this journey was one she had now made a number of times. A pilot and a helicopter were very expensive to run, but the convenience was significant.

Our luggage wasn't a lot. We were going to see the independent bishops who had ordained Christine: a deacon sub-conditione, a priest and then as bishop.

Christine said, "I got reading a bit about episcopi vagantes. Accounts were not always as awful and condemnatory as we were led to think. And then there was Jenny World's uncle, an influence on why she was ordained at all, although they were different traditions given Jenny's conversion and relationship experiences. Jenny had corresponded with Geoffrey Virgo to try and make him straight sexually, to see the error of his ways."

"Geoff ended up in..."

"Independent Sacramental Ministry. And he is married now to his fellow bishop. They don't have children, but they do have some clergy."

Much of the chat was about Christine making the connections with them and having produced a Ministry Plan for work amongst prostitutes: seeing them housed, become better protected, getting medical care, and gaining better pay and safer work among some of the business class or online. This ministry was already active. She was establishing a new and advisory Confraternity Vanguard. All the three bishops in this independent group would be involved in its governance.

We arrived at the airfield and, after securing the helicopter, made a transfer to a taxi. The taxi took us three (including Leon) to the bishops' out of city home, with a very good garden, and a large shed converted into a chapel. Leon took the taxi further into Bristol, but would be back.

The two of us greeted Mar Arcturus-Virginis Bishop Geoffrey Virgo and Mar Flacillus Bishop Luis Mariano Callas. I was especially pleased to be reunited with Geoff but chat about school could wait. The first matter was the holy blessing to the meeting in their chapel. They went away to robe up.

Christine reminded me that as an ordained priest in the National Church I had to attend approved denominations' services only. "Stuff that," I said. She put on robes contained in a long bag.

I joined in as their congregation at the large garage chapel. What I found surprising was that Geoff and Luis presented a Liturgy of the Mass that featured elements of earth, air, fire and water, as symbolised 'elements', and that the wine and bread had various references and was not simply Christian. Geoff had a tablet from which he could read their Eucharist text. This liturgy made references to science and evolution and transcendental love.

The briefest of homilies stated that once a month clergy within travelling distance get together for a communal Eucharist, whereas most of their services could be alone or Geoff and Luis together. (This was against Anglican rules: Eucharists must include a congregation of at least one.) The homily made reference to the Didache's love feast as an example of a Communion service variation.

The three concelebrated. I did receive the bread and wine.

"So what happened all those years ago?" Geoff asked, back in their lounge, all robes removed, over coffee. "I know that you, Jenny and Adam did a little - let's say - experimenting, and I scarpered; that Jenny and Adam got together after you went to university; and it wasn't that long before Adam was back on his own. I started teacher training and ended up in Bristol."

"Did you teach English as a foreign language?"

"Never. English in schools and FE. Jenny became very intense when she wrote to me. Adam went into the police. Jenny went from a year's accounting training in Serninsea and university in Middlesbrough to training for the clergy. You?"

"With Adam now, loosely. I went theological via Social Science and Theology. I met Keith, and subsequently got married."

"Couldn't make head or tail of him."

"He tried for ministry, and after his failure I tried successfully. And then the marriage started drifting, really. He now has a wife-to-be in Harwich and a mistress in Serninsea - to use old-fashioned language. He was never loyal, it turns out, in the medium to longer term."

"And Adam?"

"He got married; he still is, technically."

Geoff continued, "Ann Drummer?"

"Not her, Dromeghda, but she's a big influence still. She stayed with Labhaoise throughout."

"That's right. Did Jenny reappear at all?"

"A brief hello at my ordination. And what about the future of your small Church?"

"Well," said Geoff, "we're expecting developments from Christine, which we are about to discuss."

Christine said that she would now try to persuade Jenny's uncle, and perhaps a woman he worked with, Pauline Junor, to be incardinated into this Church, and he at least would be called Mar Simili Anseres. This would expand the Confraternity she was introducing to four or five. She was only cagey about Pauline because she did not know her. Bill had shown willing to join a larger group, when Christine met him recently.

Luis decided to speak. "We are really enthused by Christine's ministry to sex workers. Her concepts of us being theosexual, Christosexual, Spiritsexual are an exceptional insight."

Christine responded: "Listen: I looked around but I approached you two for a number of reasons. One is you were apostolic and you consider it really important - some actually don't. Also, I discovered that the 'Liberal' meaning was historical and specific, that you have a sound Catholic basis, and inclusive, and you were immediately positive about a society I proposed as adapted from the Principatus Theocratic Confraternitati admissis in Ecclesia Anglorum Nationalibus. Just because this Church has an independent existence doesn't mean it cannot be vanguard orientated. You also want to expand - some don't. Geoff has a Serninsea connection and Bill Masters can join in. He is a bit quiet about Pauline."

Luis said, "Let's discuss all of this."

Leaving me in a library, Christine went elsewhere with them alone to discuss the setting up of the Confraternity: she would lay out its principles in detail. I looked at books on Liberal Catholicism and Theosophy, including about how Arnold Harris Mathew interacted with Anglicans.

After their meeting they came into the library and we went to their lounge.

Geoff and Luis explained that so far they had ordained about twenty clergy, some sub-conditione in other ecclesiastical gatherings. Would I be interested? It could be done now, back in the chapel.

"Maybe not, for the time being."

They had ordained four of their own and incardinated two more from other jurisdictions - but Christine was the biggest catch. Coming from the National Church with a unique Ministry Plan and her own resources, they elevated her directly to bishop, her own Catholicity and ecclesiology secure beyond question.

"This means you must have a bishop name, like Geoff and Luis," I said to Christine.

"Yes. Mar Weburga."

"Mother..."

"No. Listen: 'Mar' is for bishop," she said. "Saint Werburgh was a Benedictine and patroness of Chester, and Abbess in a Minster in Sheppey, and in Ely. Died around 700. Mercian with royal relatives. Her father, King of Mercia, eventually said she could enter Ely, and she was consecrated abbess by Bishop Sexwulfus of Lichfield, of 675 to 691. Her uncle became king and asked her to add discipline to three monasteries in the kingdom. She founded more, including Weedon, in Northamptonshire, where some of my more distant relatives live. St. Werburgh encountered a flock of geese causing havoc in the cornfields of Weedon and commanded them to leave. One version has it that one goose was her favourite: she named him Grayking. He had a black ring around his neck and was the fattest and happiest looking of the flock. Grayking was eaten by the convent steward, Hugh, because Grayking looked very tempting and fat, and also because for him banishment wasn't sufficient punishment. When Saint Werburgh found out she was furious with the steward. She found the bones of the goose Grayking and ordered him to arise. The bones reformed and Grayking the goose stood before her."

"Resurrection," I said, trying not to laugh. "Sing a Song o' Sixpence is where twenty four baked blackbirds sing to the king when the pie is opened. Resurrection."

Christine continued, "Ah. In 708 the body of Saint Werburgh was exhumed because of the many miracles associated with her. They found her body to be uncorrupted and as it was when it had been laid to rest. In 875 the body was moved to Chester, the Church of St. Peter and St. Paul, which is the site of the present cathedral of Chester. It was rededicated to St. Werburgh and St. Oswald, most probably in the reign of Athelstan. Our Lady and St. Werburgh's Church has a statue of the Saint, which also has a goose beside it. The statue itself was specially commissioned by Father Malcom Glaze when the church was converted from the original state to the present day church."

"Fascinating," I said, "and thank you Mar Werburga Bishop Christine."

Then Geoff said, "And do you know the story of the Winchester Geese?"

Christine answered, "South of the Thames - it's history. Women were licensed to work under the Bishop of Winchester's jurisdiction in the Liberty of the Clink with its brothels and pubs, and close by is the Cross Bones graveyard that was unconsecrated for the sex workers. So the association of religious authorities and prostitution is not innovated by me or John Barman, and is not some fantastical association as some might think, although my connection has become more direct, and there's a ceremony on the 23rd of each month to these glorious dead at the garden there. I have attended it on a number of occasions."

Luis said, "Mar Weburga brings real substance to our communion. We don't have dioceses but if we do one will be Mercia and Christine will be for that."

Geoff said, "We do have a woman priest under consideration for another bishop, who lives in Middlesbrough."

"Not Eizabeth Huett?" I asked.

"No no," said Christine. "One of ours. See, I said 'ours'."

Geoff said, "Margaret. She would be number five."

A point came to mind. "Until Christine came along, you two were in control. Did you fear losing control?"

"No," said Geoff, "because we are introducing a unanimous-consensual decision making system, meaning vetoes and then continued resolving, and bishops can always do what so many Independents do and break away!"

Christine smiled. "This is the new Confraternity variation: unanimity voting and consensual processes."

So I discovered that, although the Church had rules, such as clergy being police-checked, it was an incredibly loose body that simply allowed their clergy to get on with whatever they were doing. Geoff was a Methodist originally, and when teaching studied Wesley the sacramentalist. Geoff went up the candle, did some studying, and learnt about Old Catholicism and Liberal Catholicism, and joined the Liberal Catholic Theosophical Church. This was when he met up with Luis, and they decided to form their own Church, first called the Liberal Apostolic Univeral Ecclesia, later shortened by removing the word Universal, the two ordained as bishops by existing bishops.

After this informative chat, the three bishops and I had a look around Bristol itself, and ended up in a public house. Back at their house, Leon Agnew rejoined us.

I asked Christine, later at a private moment, "Am I sleeping in your bed then?"

"No, I'm not organising the Confraternity like that. We will facilitate services, on our self-sacrificial basis, taking up where people are in the Church, and in religions, business and other settings. There will be a time and a place to demonstrate sacrificial openness to each other sexually, but it's mainly about openness to serving others in all ways sacrificial."

"So this Vanguard won't promote sexual ecstasy as a way to the Kingdom of God?"

"It definitely will, but the emphasis is different. Having an orgasm isn't necessary for a divine decision. Prayer is enough. Listen to me. I'm going to take away Barman's entertainment network. I will bring it down and I will replace it. Will you come on board with me?"

"Yes, but I want closeness to you."

"Linda. If you want to pay me, you can do with me whatever you like. But you can't afford me. So come and take part in the event I am organising. You'll be away from hostile forces. Properly speaking, you should come under our new Confraternity, but you can't without being incardinated. I would initiate you if you were secular, but I can't because you are in another ministry."

So it was that Christine and I were in separate bedrooms. She was entertaining her pilot, Leon, and yet she denied all personal relationships.

On Liberal Catholicism (Sunday to Wednesday 31st July)

Dressed and ready for breakfast, I headed for the gay men's staircase, although they were in another wing of this house. As I turned to go down the stairs, Christine called out, "Linda!"

She had robes on; I was in mufti. I paused. She caught up with me. "Leon will join us for breakfast later."

We went downstairs, and we joined the robed bishops to move from the kitchen to the chapel in the garage. We would have a Eucharist or Mass before breakfast.

I said to the bishops, going to the garage, "You know, I hadn't considered you as real bishops."

"Demonstrated in the courts. And we also represent the real, actual, Liberal Catholic tradition. It doesn't mean the same as your Anglican liberal Catholicism, that had its origins in Charles Gore, a sort of Oxford Movement amalgam with modernity."

So can you summarise this Liberal Catholicism?" I asked. "I got a glimpse of it in your library yesterday"

"Ah", said Geoff. "Let me do it as a homily or sermon."

He preached without notes. "In the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, and all the Powers and Principalities, and the Four Elements to the Four Corners of the World. Early in the twentieth century, Arnold Harris Mathew, a sort of ex-Roman Catholic, ex-Anglican, and for a moment, Unitarian, was made a bishop in Europe, and thought he was going to gain some Old Catholic congregations in the UK, only to be disappointed that they didn't ever exist. He did, though, have a following of clergy. One of Mathew's bishops, F. S. Willoughby, consecrated the priests Wedgwood and Leadbeater after they broke with Mathew over the issue of Theosophy; Leadbeater himself had previously left the Anglican priesthood over his attachment to Theosophy. The two supported Krishnamurti as the coming World Teacher, something that Krishnamurti himself later dropped. Leadbeater had all sorts of views regarding the astral plane and the purpose of copper in its transmission near the altar table, indeed adding Buddhism and Hinduism into the pot. The use of Theosophy (Annie Besant and all that with Krishnamurti) helped the Church grow in Australia, India, Europe and North America.

"Nowadays Liberal Catholicism does not need an attachment to Theosophy, and, anyway, it was always optional. Sadly, perhaps inevitably, Liberal Catholicism has split and often into many sub-varieties. More than this, some descendents of various bishops of that line were not Liberal and not particularly Catholic either. Some groups pursued Orthodoxy, some were Protestant, and many were Gnostic in terms of esoteric knowledge.

"One influence of Liberal Catholicism and Leadbeater in particular was an emphasis on magical interpretations rather than supernatural. Leadbeater claimed in the 'science' of the sacraments that the priest had a power many call magical."

Yes, I thought a Catholic Anglican would define power through a properly ordained priest as supernatural. Magic is where the person and the set-up have power, whereas the supernatural comes through them through correct theology and ecclesiology. So, one wondered here about Christine making a compromise.

"One of the most interesting individuals after Mathew, Wedgewood and Leadbeater was Ulric Vernon Herford. Now, he started life as a Unitarian minister, although he spent time at St. Stephen's Theological College in Oxford, a place of High Churchship. He left that denomination to embark on his own ecumenical project. He only ever consecrated one man, but one was enough for all the rest since. Rather like we did with Christine, Herford was deaconed, priested and bishoped in a day: this happened in India in a Nestorian origin Assyrian Church under his assumption that this was compatible with his Unitarian views. But his consecrator Mar Basilius made Herford into Mar Jacobus without inquiring of his views, whilst knowing of Herford's desire to have one ecumenical evangelical and Catholic Communion. My husband changed his name from Luke in recognition of the consecrator of Herford, Luis Mariano Soares. I might have added Ulric Vernon to my name, but I haven't yet: as in 'Geoffrey Ulric Vernon Virgo'.

"Herford was a very well-meaning chap: so he became bishop, started a monastic-type church and it had some congregations, variably, and he was strong on Animal Rights, all in and around Oxford.

"Herford mixed with Free Catholics and others. Take Constance Coltman. In 1917 she became the first trinitarian ordained female minister. A Congregationalist, she yet believed in the Virgin Mary as intercessor. That was because she came from the Congregationalist Kings Weigh House in Mayfair, London, which had W. E. Orchard as Minister, who was increasingly sacramentalist, and he was associated with J. M. Lloyd-Thomas, the Unitarian. They were ostensibly Free Catholics - sacraments with freedom to believe - until Orchard went off to Rome. Well, Herford ordained Orchard into the priesthood - although not Lloyd-Thomas. And he was, basically, bishop to that Congregationalist chapel rather higher in its practices than the local Anglo-Catholic and Roman Catholic churches. Lloyd-Thomas ended up going back into education after the Free Catholic movement broke up.

"I can hear you muttering under your breath, Linda," said the preacher.

"Sorry," I said.

"Please speak!"

There was this chapel that Christine and I stumbled upon in Wytham. He was fairly humanist, wouldn't you say?"

"Yes," said Christine. "And an interesting female to male transsexual minister."

I said, "This was of a Presbyterian line but now almost liberal-humanist. And..."

Oh, sorry."

"No, please continue, Linda," said Geoff.

"Only that I learnt how my partner Adam married Mary Ann, who was in an old traditional Protestant chapel culture within Transylvania. There was a Unitarian bishop over there, more a superintendent."

Christine said, "According to your Peter, it gets better: there's a universalist charismatic bishop in America in the equivalent to the Unitarians there; there's even a retired minister who's a practising Zen Buddhist."

"I cannot keep up with this," I said. "Carry on. Sorry. I'm the one in lay clothing here."

"Definitely a priest," said Christine.

He did continue. "As for ourselves, we bishops carry lines of apostolic authority from Liberal Catholics, Roman Catholics, Eastern and Thomasine traditions, and now, so does Mar Werbura Bishop Christine here. We do often ordain each other so as to attach more and more lines of legitimacy."

"On the matter of gender, Liberal Catholics have generally been pro-women and also gender orientation inclusive. They've offered a socially inclusive Catholicism, different from Rome and the Eastern Orthodox. As it happens, a minority of Liberal Catholics still have issues with it, but there are lots of female bishops. One British Church under a male Archbishop had only female bishops within Britain before it sadly disintegrated. One has had a female archbishop - a queer theologian. On the question of sex, some reject original sin, and we do, and some advance all kinds of relationships as enriching, and I think we do. Christine points out that the act of lovemaking itself is a vision of heaven; she also says sex can lead to love, and sex includes, properly, sacrificial acts from one lover to another. Sex is the material effort, and love is its gift. Her mission - Ministry Plan - turns prostitution into a sacrificial service often by those with little to give, but who should offer this from more safety. Sacrifice is not to be put at threat: it is risky in the offering itself. There is something esoteric in this."

"And thus we frame our pastoral ministries as clergy in various localities carrying out their own ministry plans, and then Churches with many societies, online colleges, and now we have this eschatological ecclesiology of a Vanguard Confraternity, where we bishops plan to lead the Church towards the Kingdom of God. Amen."

I was again the receiving congregation in the Mass concelebrated by the three bishops. It was a pity no one else came to the garage. Leon was not with us, here, but was waiting for breakfast.

We had breakfast, and said our goodbyes.

So, for the next few days I would live at Ebbsfleet. This is where the helicopter took us, with the journey through busy airspace noted by the air travel authorities.

Christine left me on Sunday afternoon for London, and she wasn't back until later Monday. I thought I would have to prepare my own meals, but these maids appeared and did everything for me. When Christine came back, she looked drawn, and was tired, so I left her alone and she did some daytime sleeping on Tuesday.

I spent some time looking at the trains flying by nearby. When I asked Christine if I could join her at her work, she said no, but she had an appointment for us at her own private gynaecologist and this was on Wednesday.

Messages on my mobile phone were asking as to my whereabouts. Was I still in Bristol? Colin asked. I decided not to answer any of them.

The Clinic (Wednesday 31st July)

Wednesday morning in Ebbsfleet there was an early visit from Christine Vine's fussy mother Carla, docile father John, and James, a fat clergyman: she talked at a fast rate, and full of opinion, father put her down with the odd quip, and the cleric said nothing. Christine was told by her mother that she might be clever but not too old to go over her knee. The bachelor priest, James, turned out to be Christine's brother. As soon as they'd gone, Christine acted as if she'd forgotten that they were ever there.

"Your brother? He's..."

"Roman Catholic. He's a convert. Oh, and he is gay."

Having spent a lot of time in Christine's well appointed bathroom, I went with Christine by rail from Ebbsfleet to London, having read this message on my mobile from Adam:

Barman rang up asking where you were and I said didn't know beyond a Bristol funeral. Colin Cromer called. I said the same. Seems you are now AWOL.

On my agreement to join her at her private clinic, and before we set off to London by train, Christine kissed me.

She said, "I give you Hildegard of Bingen's reflection on Genesis chapter two verse seven, from memory:

"With my mouth I kiss my own chosen creation. I uniquely, lovingly, embrace every image I have made out of the earth's clay. With a fiery spirit I transform it into a body to serve all the world."

I really wanted to keep to my own gynaecology service, but curiosity got the better of me, I wanted to know more about Christine, and London was far from Serninsea and this was a discreet address.

At the clinic near Urania House in Hammersmith (which I did not visit), I went into a room alone with a female clinician and signed on an electronic pad many times to give all consents. That done, I was swabbed in my mouth, then given a blood pressure test, and even gave a blood sample. I was weighed and measured.

Then I was asked by Jennifer Langley (name badges are so helpful!) to undress my lower half and place my lower legs on to the leg supports.

Dr. Robert Bruce came in, to join the clinician. Jennifer, pushing a speculum in, applying a lot of pressure, not knowing my case.

With light emitting diodes on a metal arm illuminating my inner 'purse', the clinician complained: "I can't get this in far... Where is it?"

"If you are referring to the cervix, I haven't got one," I replied.

Therefore Dr. Bruce took a look and said, "Hold back on the swabs. Do you mind if I ask my colleagues to come in?"

I thought, 'Here we go!' but said, "No, I don't mind but don't discuss it until in here."

Speculum in and LEDs shining inside, Ms Langley stood back and Dr. Bruce left the room. He returned with three others, Doctors Peter Earle, William Middlemas and Dorothy Marshall.

Dr. Bruce said, "My colleagues are gynaecologists to royalty, so you are in very good hands."

"Not Dr. William Wallace, then," I said out of turn.

So we now had three men and one woman peering into my vagina. Two swabs went into plastic containers with writing added to the labels, one that had touched my vagina wall where the cervix would have been, and one at the urethra.

Dr. Middlemas said, "We should look at her breasts. Can we examine your breasts?"

"My practice nurse at home has only just examined them. But go on."

So I took off my tops, and became naked and had four hands over both of them provided by two doctors Bruce and Marshall.

Then they felt in the area of my undescended gonads. "No surgery?" asked Dr. Marshall. "Do you want surgery? Do you take HRT?" she asked further.

"I have had oestrogen occasionally, but my mother and I refused surgery. My older sister had surgery and is on HRT."

Then Dr. Bruce asked, "Can we have you on our books?"

"What?"

"As one of our clients?"

I said, "No. I already have a gynaecologist. In Serninsea, actually."

"Where's that?"

"East coast of Foss. I'm National Church and National Health. I couldn't afford you."

"We could make an exception," Dr. Marshall said, looking around at her male colleagues.

"No," I asserted.

"Do you dilate then?" she asked. "Objects inserted?"

"I know the practice of dilating. I have a set of dilators."

"Fascinating," she said.

Dr. Bruce asked, "Do you have regular sexual intercourse?"

"Yes."

"Is this as an escort worker or in your relationship?"

I thought, crumbs, as an 'escort worker'? How did I go from being a priest (just about!) to an escort worker? "I'm a priest! I'm in a regular relationship and a few others. I am here with Christine Vine."

Dr. Earle said, "Obviously you take different sizes of penises. Do some cause pain?"

I said, "I have recently had a change of partner. My new partner is larger in dimension, and he does push all the way in."

He went on: "You've had no surgery to extend your vagina?"

"No."

"Nothing either for cancer risk? Do you want it?"

"Of course I don't want cancer."

"No, do you want surgery?"

"No, I don't."

Dr. Middlemas asked, "Do you orgasm well? Everything functions properly?"

"I orgasm as badly as the next woman," I said. "It is a clitoris after all."

"Its visible end is well visible," he said.

"Would you like me to masturbate in front of you? It'll come up even bigger and brighter."

"Would you?" asked this doctor. "If you are comfortable doing this."

He obviously didn't get irony with cynicism. "If I must."

The original woman, Jennifer, said, "This isn't necessary."

The female doctor said, "I can bring a vibrator that is new out of its packet. You can show us your dilating technique with it."

I said, "You'll have to take that out. And for no reason, I said, "Speculum sine macula." This actually refers to mirrors, not insertion devices.

Dr. Marshall thus replied, "Carnes immacolata virginitas you are not."

"I was once," I responded. I knew that phrase.

Dr. Marshall left the room as the speculum device was unscrewed and removed and placed in the sink. After a minute this woman returned and went to the sink to wash a standard vibrator. I bet it was hers as well. It didn't weigh much as there was no battery in it. So I inserted it.

I said, "Normally for ten minutes I circulate with it inside but also pushing it like this."

Then I was asked if I would consent to be photographed close-in, and so I agreed. I had an electronic device to sign.

They stood close while I continued pushing and circulating, and Ms. Langley took photographs and placed them to the computer screen.

When I stopped Dr. Bruce said they'd like to take more detailed pictures. So another speculum went in, and a camera with a light on a thick cord to a box was hand-held closely. They were muttering dissatisfaction.

"Take it out and I'll pull myself open," I said.

The speculum was slowly removed and placed in the sink.

So the photography continued as my fingers stretched myself as far as I could do it. Anyway, my clitoris had now revealed itself more and my lips had become slightly swollen. Another swab was taken of the mucus I had produced.

Dr. Bruce then said, "If we publish the photos in a book on gynaecology, we'll send you some royalties. Leave your contact details."

Jennifer Langley then said, "We haven't done an anal test."

A man said, "We'll need to clean up some of the moisture there to not get it on the swab."

I asked, "Should I get on my knees on this seat?"

One man answered, "Better on the bench."

So I came off the chair and got on to the bench, to lower my back and stick my arse out. I pulled my arse open and someone rubbed a tissue around my anus. Without using further opening devices a swab was inserted into my anus - not too far in. Out it came to be dropped in another of those plastic tubes and the lid sealed. I'd had this done before.

"This isn't right," said Dr. Dorothy Marshall. So a third speculum appeared and went into my arsehole. "Are you working today?"

"Today?" I asked, still looking towards a wall. "I told you I am not a sex worker. My husband did this nearly two decades ago. It's clean enough because I anticipated you might want to look. I'm doing pelvic floor exercises. From time to time that's the tube they use."

"Who uses what tube?" Dr. Marshall asked.

"Men with penises going down my arsehole tube," I replied.

"During escorting?" asked Dr. Earle.

"Are any of you listening to me? I am not - oh, I give up."

"Dr. Marshall said, "Gentlemen, I think we have finished. Jennifer, please see that Reverend Jupitas is comfortable and clean. Could you join us Doctor Robert?"

And with this, four left the room." I heard a man outside say, "I've not seen that before in my whole career."

"We are very pleased to have met you," said my original clinician, as I turned and sat on the bench. She said. "There is a bathroom through that door. I have this glass bottle for a urine sample, and afterwards you may have a shower if you wish."

"Nah. Give it here. I've had enough. Same thing, same questions, every time."

I pissed there and then into the beaker, and gave it to Jennifer.

I got hold of my trousers and put them on, and then placed my tops on, and finally my shoes. "No discussion about me to Christine Vine," I said.

"We don't discuss clients outside professional consultations. We will check for all the diseases and conditions, er... reverend."

I would learn by text message in the evening whether I had passed this personal MOT. I went into the waiting area. Christine was speaking to two women still down the corridor and then they left going past me.

"Did it go all right?" Christine asked me. "My clinician walked out on me and I had to sit there with my legs up waiting. Did yours leave?"

"No."

"Well there was quite a commotion," Christine continued, "and I heard someone in the corridor say, 'I've not seen one of those before in my career.'"

"I heard that too," I said.

"And those two lost their gynaecologists for a while. The thing is," said Christine, "if you are different, it may affect things."

"What things?"

"Listen: I want to introduce you to Sir Sanjay Bunker; this is how you will give me your service and sacrifice."

"I'm not stupid, coming here, but I've been denying I'm an escort."

"He is my client, normally here in London, sometimes in Ebbsfleet, and when in the Vanguard group I had special times with him. The thing is, I have you as his reward for coming to my side of the fence. You see, he wants to penetrate the Serninsea parish priest and wife of one of his lower managers. I want him split away from Barman. You are the means to this: so what you do will be vital. Accept every gift from him: shopping, presents, whatever. You're no good to him if he doesn't pay."

"If I refuse?"

"The Titansea Hotel is where I will operate in competition against the other party. My newly made Confraternity has its own badges, and we will operate only in the hotel. My prostitutes will be forbidden to go to above the casino. It is where they would initiate you. They might choose the Blue Diamond Club but it is regulated with a council licence. If we separate Bunker from Barman, we can expose the bishop's involvement and not put my client at risk."

"These parties," I asked, "Are they for networking various business people?"

"They do that, yes," said Christine. "This is what mine will allow. I will have a Body Eucharist and an initiation..."

"Not doing me!"

"Not you."

"Give something to me for a change."

"I am doing already. I guessed your measurements compared with mine at the retreat. I have bought a dress for you already. I want you inside the Titansea Hotel without anyone knowing you are there. You'll come in with me, hand in your mobile phone, and sleep overnight beforehand in the hotel."

"I'm AWOL already," I said."

"I know. Your parish priest will have to do without you. Let's go back to my house in Ebbsfleet on the train. I will give you my body. It's a fair exchange rather than a simple gift."

"Yes," I said, "especially after today. I am a sex worker."

Learning About What's Coming

On the train alongside Christine I looked at my phone and among the messages was one added from Stephen McPhail, consisting of a Bible reading and a following message:

"See, I have called by name Bezaleel the son of Uri, the son of Hur, of the tribe of Judah: And I have filled him with the spirit of God, in wisdom, and in understanding, and in knowledge, and in all manner of workmanship, To devise cunning works, to work in gold, and in silver, and in brass, And in cutting of stones, to set them, and in carving of timber, to work in all manner of workmanship. And I, behold, I have given with him Aholiab, the son of Ahisamach, of the tribe of Dan: and in the hearts of all that are wise hearted I have put wisdom, that they may make all that I have commanded thee; Exodus 31:2-6.

I have been relieved of your mentoring. I have gone back to my day job, if you like. Your friends ruined the potential of the Serninsea Cross brooch. You will be picked up by Connie and Jim Wilson by the new command of the bishops. You shall be initiated and you shall initiate others. We know you have been in Bristol and Ebbsfleet."

"Huh," I said to Christine, showing her the message. "Exodus goes on to assert the Sabbath as holy and for no work. Defile it and you face death; you are cut off from your people. Like these days we go shopping on Sundays, and we are not creative."

"Listen. Adam and Peter are doing some surveillance regarding above the casino. Now, properly, I should incardinate you and then initiate you into my group under the Confraternity. But I can't because you are still in the National Church. You will have a badge but be a guest only. You'll be directed to a registration area. There the assistant will attach you to Sir Sanjay. He'll come along when he's ready. He's a bit freer than some of the conference attenders. He wants to listen in to the actual conference as a likely financier: 'What are the future ideas to back?' It's about electronics and communications.

Each attender who wants one has an escort partner to accompany them.

You'll sit next to Sir Sanjay at the conference, you'll eat with him and others he meets (unless he asks otherwise). You'll attend to his personal body washing and so on. You'll accompany him daytime and in private arrange to sleep with him."

"Electronics?"

"It is a conference on the future of electronics in wholesaling and retailing and goes on over three days and two nights. There are some new devices to discuss, and measuring devices too. Thus there will be a few SMS people there, as relevant. So you'll still need to sign a confidentiality agreement. It is in my contract with the conference organisers."

"I might well be recognised."

"It's on two hired floors and I doubt anyone at all will recognise you."

"Huh. That's marginalisation and secularisation for you."

"Sir Sanjay was impressed with you assisting SMS's self-examination, the robustness of their procedures at SMS."

Then I had a cold shiver. "What if SMS people are there: a certain Keith?"

"Sir Sanjay has already made sure he's not coming. You'll get paid the same as me. There is a very basic £30 an hour for the accompaniment during the conference, which you must do."

"And many hours?"

"It's a long session. It's tiring in itself. You will get breaks when you don't sit alongside your man. It's the law; I insist upon them, and Sir Sanjay understands. Everything is a contract to him, just like with Donald Trump."

"It doesn't cost him much at all."

"No no. The wage is like basic. That covers the accompaniment, as such. But there are direct payments as well, and I'll tell you about them. Anyway, your job is to persuade Sir Sanjay not to go to the party on the second night. Many of the attenders will. That's the practical side: to get him to resign from the Worshipful Company and move his allegiance to my new set-up. And, another thing, Sir Sanjay is what you call him too, until if or when he tells you his real name. Sir Sanjay Bunker is an Anglicised name of an Indian, Hindu name."

"Which is?"

"I'd rather not tell you. But if he does, you are winning."

"What do I get paid for all this - the direct payment?"

"Okay, I'll tell you. Private arrangement but you're daft if you have less than four thousand, and may be six thousand for two nights."

"What? What? That's rather different from thirty quid an hour. Shit. I'll buy a new car."

"Not just that," Christine added. "Remember, accept all presents. You may have to risk going out with him. If you do, wear a wig and specs. You can take the helicopter elsewhere to go shopping: dresses, bags, make up. It might even be a big ticket item. He pays well and so he should."

I also said that I knew of a number of long term older residents who lived in the Titansea Grand Hotel and received a discount for continuous living: that they pay the same each week as residents in old age homes.

"Different floors. We're on three and four. Something else," she said, "There are rumours coming out of Harwich."

"I can guess. SMS might pull out of Serninsea altogether?"

"The conference facilities I am providing might just keep them there," she said. "I have more. Listen. I told you about the resurrected goose, Saint Werburgh's favourite. He was called Grayking. Your name in the hotel will be Cynthia Grayking. Sanjay Bunker knows this."

So I said, "I've heard plenty of what you want of me. And I'm contractual too: your body, same bed as me, and if you don't there's no deal."

Back at Ebbsfleet a text message said I was of clean sexual health.

Leon was elsewhere, I was told. Thus I was invited into her bed. But when she went between my thighs, she started pulling me open and tried to catch the light. As a result I walked out of her room.

"You are not my gynaecologist."

"What are you hiding?"

"Nothing that matters to you or Sanjay Bunker."

Thus I returned to my own bedroom in her house, annoyed.

I had a late text from Diana.

Where are you?

I've been in Bristol; I've moved on to London where I shall be for a number of days.

Can I tell this to your vicar?

I replied with a simple affirmative.

Caroline knocked on my bedroom door. The phone to one side, I welcomed her in.

"I won't look," she said.

It was so good to trace the curve of her back and the smoothness of her backside. Our tongues engaged together in some long and deep kissing.

Christine did push a finger into me. I could tell she was thinking of more fingers, so I shook my head. She said I could open her up if I wanted. However, I brought her to orgasm with tongue and fingers and she made a prayer.

Her tongue on to my protrusion had the same result with me, and she demanded I say a prayer.

"Thank you God. And what happens after the hotel, when I am back into Serninsea society? Won't I be in danger then?"

"At least pause after a prayer! I hate that because it lacks sincerity."

"I agree. Sorry."

"Listen, they can't kidnap you. They are not gangsters. Perhaps you could say you've had some days in bed and Colin Cromer can visit you. I look after my women."

She was now turning me into a tart.

The Hotel Conference Preparations (Friday 2nd August)

Thursday I'd been alone as Christine had travelled to London's Urania House in Hammersmith. I'd become a naturist within her Ebbsfleet house. She was exhausted once back and not communicative.

Friday and we had to be up early. Christine's house had a room next to a shower room with two sinks and two hair dryers. We had our hair done in there before 8 am with a couple of brought-in hairdressers.

Above the noise of the dryers, Christine said, "I'm asking how we recover Bernard of Clairvaux. Modern thought reflects a victory for Abelard. You know."

"You never stop."

"It starts, does it not, with monastic pedagogy around statutes and commentaries."

"Foundational," I said.

"So that's the 1100s, and by the 1400s there's been a change to where the world is seen as having order."

"Order!" I said, like the House of Commons Speaker," shouting over the dryers.

"You're not taking me seriously. The debate was in the twelfth century itself, between Bernard and Abelard. I want to go back to faith itself seeking wisdom, as with Bernard of Clairvaux. Abelard is a worldly Aristotelian. Quite a shift."

"It's the age-old division: revelation and supposed natural theology."

"Ergodicity', it is called," she said. "Monasteries did resist."

"To maintain the patristic."

"Theology leads to its social theory, Linda, and we need to recover this perspective as operative."

"Can you, for one minute, just give it a rest?"

"No. Listen. Take Marcella Althaus-Reid. She practised theology on the model of Paulo-Freire."

"Liberation theology and education," I said.

"Was academic, in Scotland at times: queer theologian. Died in 2009. Theology should become indecent. She wanted theology to match the experience of ordinary people, as part of their liberation. The Church continued to underline sexual oppression. She studied continuing Church identity among bisexuals in Canada."

"I recall a brief reference by Gretta Cox-Jenkins."

"Theology from below."

"You can't have it both ways, Christine. You are the most vertical authoritarian cleric I know, after the Pope."

"I am not authoritarian. God is not restricted. All voices, including yours, are to be heard without restriction. That must be right. Doesn't mean they are all equal. Marcella Althaus-Reid's ecclesiology - she was in the Metropolitan Community Church - is a vehicle for liberating sexual minorities. To me, the MCC is a sort of yes and no."

"Give it a rest!"

"Hardly in the spirit of Marcella Althaus-Reid! You will be in an unusual situation, sharing life with indecent co-workers."

"Not sure it is liberating."

"Learn on the job."

We joined reappeared Leon at breakfast. Christine showed me my plunging, slashed dress in a very light thin flesh-coloured material. It would show a lot of leg. I liked it.

Under pressure to get travelling, I apologised for the time I took in another bathroom, and we walked with suitcases (containing the dress) into the warm air to arrive at the helicopter nearby. I wore a blouse and trousers and disguises of a long hair black wig on over my long blonde hairdo, and added a peak cap and flat lens spectacles (from Adam?).

Christine's helicopter landed at Carr Fenn on a cloudy day at about twenty-two degrees. The location of landing was itself a declaration of her presence, but not my presence. Christine got out and went into a waiting car whilst I remained.

"Thanks Leon," I said as he secured the helicopter inside and a taxi pulled close. The machine was locked up, the taxi driver put the cases in the boot and we sat on the back seat. Leon got out at a terraced house not far away, where he appeared to pay and lean in as if to kiss me, and the taxi went on to stop outside the Titantsea Grand Hotel. The driver said I didn't have to pay.

From the taxi, I went in with my suitcase, and said at the reception, "I am Cynthia Grayking." The male receptionist pointed to a notice on a stand:

The Serninsea Electronics and Communication Conference 3rd & 4th Floor.

In the lift I removed my cap and flat lens spectacles.

On the third floor I found a toilets and changing area. I took my dress from my suitcase and put it on. the cap and spectacles went into the case. Outside I queued behind numbers of women similarly dressed, while others were milling around. Some official woman with the name badge Joy Melville at a reception room was uninterested in my printed off sexual health certificate; its use was up to me. Some items I did not want stealing I removed from the suitcase into a smaller shoulder bag, despite assurances of safety inside that reception room. We did not have our own rooms! Rest and naps could happen in either of the made available workers' rooms.

Another official spoke from her own doorway into the corridor. "Is there a Cynthia Grayking?"

"Me. Hang on."

"Come in. I'm Rose Crook. You are employed for accompaniment and meals and nothing else, by Werburgh Limited, and anything else you negotiate is entirely your own doing. It is £30 an hour before expenses: an allocated partner should pay all bills. The hours are 12 pm to 8 pm today, regardless of when the partner arrives, 10 am to 8 pm tomorrow, and 10 am to 1 pm on the third day. In this time, less your entitled breaks, you accompany your allocated partner for meals and at the conference sessions as he or she demands."

There was a confidentiality agreement to sign, which meant that what was seen and heard from the participants was commercially confidential. I signed it in my Linda Jupitas name. "Best is you see nothing, hear nothing, say nothing," said Rose.

All of us had to avoid using slang words and swearing, which was easy for me. We had to advise Rose or another official of strange contacts and unusual observations (seeing something!). We had to be clean, fresh, and welcoming, and maintain these.

She had a red badge with a black goose and a W for me, the red to indicate I was only a 'Guest' and I had to wear the badge in company except private one to one moments.

"Any further accompaniment with your allocated partner is by private arrangement, or you could just go home. I have nothing further to say."

Bishop (!) Christine appeared in a purple dress as thin as mine with a circle in front of her exposed cleavage, the material rising to a circle of a clerical collar. I could see one stripe mark within the circle.

She called into the corridor, "Listen everyone! The conference begins at 1 pm, to allow some to travel who haven't stayed overnight already."

She told us that there were some thirty-five women and five men to accompany attenders. There were some extra sandwiches and drinks in the conference room for us: our partners would feed with us first at the evening meal.

Off we went to gather in the third floor conference room. All the woman had legs to kill for; I was probably the oldest. The five men were in sharp suits. The prawn mayonnaise sandwiches were tasty.

Christine repeated what Rose had said. Except, she said, "You are welcome to use all facilities of the hotel if you stay around outside paid hours. As for anything else, newbies might chat with those who've been to similar gatherings elsewhere. I suggest Clodagh, Alice, Karen for consulting.

"All of us here are required to attend in this room for the second session - the Eucharist." We could decline by not going forward. Bishops Bill and Pauline, wearing red badges like me would preside and initiate, but already twelve were done in different locations yesterday and twenty-two were due today. Each Eucharist would have an Open Table.

We were never to wear the B badges some might own.

Everyone was told to be on best behaviour, as Christine's employees. "You eat with the best of manners, and extend your tastes to accommodate your partner. Stay with your partner at all times, except for the three thirty minute rest periods on full days and the one break on the final day. Even if your partner sinks a lot of drink, you don't. Use the nearby plant pots to sink drink.

Being under the discipline of the Confraternity of the Theocratic Principality of the Liberal Apostolic Ecclesia and also under the confidentiality agreement meant not going to the party above the casino. "This includes after eight o'clock, if anyone has bothered to read it. Over there, they will welcome you - but your contract here says no."

We could put in for a thirty quid subsidy towards the one approved dress or suit with Rose - she'd approve it. (Obviously this did not include me.)

"All dresses seem to be right: plunging necklines, visible nipples, plenty of leg, and touching crotches," said Christine. "Anyone with bras on can take them off immediately. Knickers are optional but best without."

Partners knew that their accompaniments needed to be told the thirty minute rest times, to be logged on the first one with Rose. "If the partner takes you out, then that is still your work time. But your partner is not under any obligation to give you any gifts whatsoever via shopping or otherwise."

Cold feet wasn't a serious reason to reject a partner. But whatever further happened with them was not part of Christine's company's wage payment. "If you do just leave, then you break the contract with Werburgh Ltd regarding wage payment and I'm ready to pursue for damages. But do tell Rose Crook why before you run away. She'd have to ring for some replacements pretty rapidly. Use your breaks to report on matters of concern. Mobile phones stay in the office: you can check them during breaks.

The only time we could walk away, Christine told us, is with violence or serious threat of violence. But we were to allow partners to put hands on backs and bottoms, whilst getting permission to do the same back.

"Any use of mobile phones outside rest times and beyond the office means you're docked an hour's pay plus temporary confiscation. Your attention is always on your partners; that's what you are paid for."

This included sitting with the partner in the conference sessions, although he or she may release the accompaniment: that's up to them. "You also separate to fetch and carry: water, liquid and snacks. Toilet breaks happen in your rest breaks.

"One more thing I have left until last. Some of us have no choice but to use our real names. Otherwise, use your business name. Models do this all the time, and so do escorts. Don't give out personal details. Clodagh."

Clodagh Grant spoke. "I'm just an old hand at this, coming from Barman and his mob. Any money payments on top of your pay should be electronic. Find one of us who can make a transfer. Don't ask Rose, who's dealing with employees, but ask me, or Bishop Christine, Alicia Rogers, Karen Curzon; we can go in an office and do some transfer payments. Get paid by your partner not to your details but to one of us, and one of us pays you. We do this there and then."

Christine said, "Any questions?"

One woman asked, "Is our having sex part of the religion?" (How her breasts stayed in her dress I did not know. Her badge was on - some still weren't yet.)

Christine answered, "Under my approach, all this does come under ecclesiastical management in a way it wasn't properly before. Sexual public displays are less here but your own sexual activity is expected to be a deliberate celebration and thanksgiving of the body under the Divine. Those of us attached to Holy Church are all theosexual, Christosexual, Spiritsexual. The centre of this must be the orgasm. If you're not having orgasms this weekend, you are not connecting with the Holy truly sufficiently. That's just a revelatory fact."

Another woman said, "I'm partnered with a woman and fortunately I am compatible, let's say. I mean, you are expecting personal overnight arrangements."

"I'm not expecting anything overnight. There are two declared Confraternity lesbians already here among us. Surprise surprise, you are paired with women attenders. I have initiated you and Jane, is it? Hello Jane - white badge on Jane please. And everyone else! No male gays, as it happens. Clodagh, please."

Here she was again. "Yeah. Don't presume any partners are actually interested in anything else beyond simple accompaniment. Sorry if you think you've missed out. Out of hours is your business, where you go and so on, except don't over to above the casino. To have our initiation is to reject theirs."

Christine resumed: "I organise the Werburga Geese, not John Barman. I'm completely independent of him. Barman is not here and he does not have access to the conference floors. He can of course come into the hotel."

We had to beware of people asking questions, and the contract included confidentiality - personal and commercial.

"We're expected to go," someone said. "always with the same partner." There were a number of 'yeahs' around the conference room - except Christine's.

So that was her public talk. She wanted me to go into the office space. As we did, Rose Crook left.

Christine asked, "You okay?"

"Yep."

"You won't be with Sir Sanjay Bunker all the time. I'll take over once or perhaps twice. He may want you to go with other men. Do it. Okay? Make sure you lubricate yourself throughout. It is very demanding after two days, and these are long days. There are bottles and sprays in the room where the money is transferred. They'll tell you how to transfer the money Sir Sanjay gives you for your personal services."

San Bandyopadhyay

Bishop Christine Vine asked me how I feel, "I bet it's something similar to being a non-Juror, being here."

I replied, "Really? In 1788 Charles Edward Stuart died and the four Scottish bishops capitulated to the House of Hanover. They had some forty priests left. So there is no road ahead in separation."

"Just thought there might have been a comparison," said Christine.

"I'm still Qualified. I think."

Rose came into the office, followed by a very tall slim woman in a long, backless silver-flesh shiny dress. "Badge!" said Rose, turning, and handed her a white and black one. Christine left.

This woman said, "Last minute, I was told, so that's when I came from a client. I would like to know who else is going to dig around my fanny."

"Mr. James Taylor, Executive Director of Sales of Fast East Electronics Ltd, FEEL. This man is married, with two children, and living near Peterborough, and he has interests in model railways and preservation railways - he's made a considerable investment in preservation railways. When he came up here, yesterday, Bishop Christine initiated him. If you are local, tell him all about the tramway."

"Puff puff into my tunnel."

"I'd be sure if he is steam driven or you need the electric," I said with a smile. She called herself Patsy Mound but then I told her I was Cynthia Grayking.

I hovered about in the corridor but didn't want to speak to anyone else beyond odd hellos. Men and the odd woman were coming out of the lift, and it was their own conference name badges that led to approaches from our accompaniment people. We did not have name badges, just Christine's W and a goose in white and black or red and black.

I found myself alone and waiting: sitting, standing and sitting again. The conference was starting, and I wondered what I would do. But then an Indian man came out of the lift.

"Ah," he said. "Are you the Reverend Linda Jupitas, parish priest here, wife of our manager Keith?" Ah, I was Linda to him.

"Yes." I stood.

"My accompaniment for today, tonight and tomorrow through to Sunday! I am going to keep you busy instead of going to the party."

"Payment, Sir Sanjay," said Christine, coming down the corridor. "Four thousand for Linda and one thousand for me."

I gulped. We didn't go into Rose's office, but another room. There was a computer terminal in there, and seated Clodagh with Alice stood behind her saw to it that a payment for five thousand was made to Christine. Clodagh then took my card and I was suddenly so much richer, from Christine's account.

"But I am disappointed," Sir Sanjay said.

"Why?" asked Christine.

"Because she is not wearing her cassock and collar."

Christine said, "I'll get mine for her in five minutes."

Alice Krasniqi said, "I'll get it. Collar with it, Christine?"

"Yes. She can hardly wear a cassock out here, San. Breaks", she said.

He and she, not me, worked out suitable times.

Rose came in. "Sir Sanjay, both of your bags are now in the lounge of your suite at 406. Cynthia, your suitcase is there as well. It is one floor up."

Christine said to me, into my ear, "Listen. Don't let me down. It's your purpose to keep him. My cassock will fit you."

Alice returned with it and collar, so I took it.

Christine turned to Sir Sanjay. "Oy!" She snogged him there and then. "Remember, she's not me."

"Come," he said to me, not her.

Sir Sanjay and I went up the elevator one floor, and he stroked my back.

At his door he gave me the key to unlock it. "Come in and shut the door," he said. "Let's unpack, Excuse me if I don't look at you further, until you've put the cassock on."

My dress was off. He was to his word. The cassock was unbuttoned, which meant I had to put it on and button it up.

He did look at me as I fastened the final five upper buttons and put the collar around my neck.

Sir Sanjay approached me. "You are the parish priest." He undressed until he became naked and was physically responding to the fetish costume in front of him. He lowered himself and put his hand and then arm under the cassock to go upwards. He touched me between my legs out of sight. Now he gathered up the material. When I was exposed, he slapped my left inner thigh with the back of his right hand, and so I stood astride. His erect penis went into me, and he began to thrust.

He slobbered his mouth over mine, and his left hand went around to my back. When he stopped pumping and slobbering, semen ran down my right thigh.

"I have been travelling and I would like you to shower me. We have time."

I took him to the bathroom in the suite. First I had to hold him and direct the flow while he pissed into the toilet. Then at the shower, me also naked, I used shampoo and shower gel. A vigorous shower was followed by a good drying - my effort. We shared the supplied hair dryer and staying nude I set about blowing him, in the windy sense, on this king size or more bed.

He said, "As a Hindu I'd always wanted to make love to a female Anglican priest. Put the cassock back on."

"Christine isn't Anglican any more," I said, as I slipped it back on over my head and restored the collar.

"She was never a priest," he said. "And now, from nothing, she is a bishop, organising everything. But I am with you, during these days of this conference. Christine says I must treat you well. Call me San."

"Then tell me about yourself, San."

"Roll that up and sit with your legs apart."

I did as he wanted. "San?"

"I am, what they call, old money and new money in India. Here, I came into insurance. From insurance and shipping insurance, I set up some ventures in the south east and east, including a measuring firm. So here was Serninsea Measuring Services, and later Systematic Measuring Services as the firm added sites."

"Why here?"

"Yes, I thought I could develop on the coast, here, with the dock and with space. There is also a lot of cheap property, industrial and residential. I thought I could do things here at low cost. So with the dock always at risk from silting up, I paid for it being dredged. I might have been wrong about its potential. I know why Keith wants an M16 road around here. I once partnered with Christine in London and here she has bought lots of property and so I have developed my client relationship with her on a more long term basis. Remind me of your maiden name."

"Bode."

"I know that your husband Keith is transferring to live with Ms Mould in Harwich, although he will work in Felixstowe. They've just bought a dog together: that's a long-term commitment. I told both him and my niece Yojana that he is a fool to leave you. So will you call yourself Bode again?"

"No. Jupitas is my working name."

"I am not called Bunker of course, that is an Anglicised working name. My actual surname is Bandyopadhyay. Bandyopadhyay is a Brahmin caste name: Bengali. I am actually Sir San Bandyopadhyay."

"Band - oh - pad - y-eye. Why 'Bunker' then?"

"Golf. Prepare to see a golf course come about nearer Serninsea within five years. Some use Banerjee as my surname, but I don't like this so much. It is another name for Bandyopadhyay. Can I watch you masturbate?"

I said, "It's up to you but the opening session starts very soon."

"I suppose so. Well, I may as well read my notes for ten minutes."

"I can masturbate while you read your notes."

"No, you have looked after me very well already. I'll read some notes alone and see you later. Go away."

"I need to put the dress back on."

"Before you do, bend over and let me look at you from behind." I did this. "You are so inviting - but, yes, later."

So it was dress back on and I went and sat in the corridor. Why was I doing this? I didn't care about San Bandyopadhyay but I still wanted to be in Christine's slipstream over Barman's despite considerable differences of theology. I was more with Abelard than St. Bernard.

San came out and I stood to meet him. "It's not really my sort of conference," he said to me, "but I am interested in what others are doing. There are some measuring device issues to be discussed, but I have people for that anyway. Come on."

We both went into the conference's ongoing opening session, and most in there were paired up. The presentation by Mr. James Taylor, Executive Director of Sales of Fast East Electronics Ltd, FEEL, was on the 'necessity of innovation' - however small - as people wait for the next upgrade. It seemed to me that the marketing need to innovate preceded actual innovation.

When he finished, Patsy Mound in her back and sides revealing silver shiny dress got up and bent over to kiss both of his cheeks. All I could see were the mounds of her backside, and the shape in between that needed no signpost.

When this session was over, Christine stood up at the front and called for attention. She told everyone. "We come back in here in twenty minutes. Can the hotel crew please bring in the heavy table, two side tables and two of the screens on wheels? Remember that we have an Open Table and anyone can participate in the Divine Economy. We have initiations, and we have the Body Eucharist."

The place was emptied, with Sir San going too, wanting some time alone, and I was the only supplied escort staying in there. A large and long possibly oak table was lifted in by four men, and then two screens of a latticed wood pattern were placed beyond the table ends. Behind them went a side table each. Some linen sheets arrived, placed on the table. Candles in large silver holders were placed on the covered table. Also brought in were bells and a gong with a stick. In came two goblets of wine and bread on a platter.

An older man came in wearing full vestments that had a join at the front, wearing a red and black W goose badge. "You are Cynthia Grayking?"

"I am. Do I know you?"

"I am Bishop William Masters. I do know who you are. You are Linda."

"I can see her in your face: you are Jenny's uncle. I understand that you were the one who persuaded Jenny to get ordained when she became religious. Your vestments are unusual."

"Not quite persuaded her. She would fulfill herself getting ordained. Her process going through with it was rather stressful. I'm surprised you are here."

"No one is more puzzled than I am about me being here," I said.

"Mar Werburga - Bishop Christine Vine - is very directional. Do you think I should join her Church?"

"I haven't got a clue. But your vestments..."

"My niece corresponded with Geoff Virgo, and now Christine says join him and his husband. Is this what you are going to do?"

"No. I'm still ostensibly a curate in the National Church. I'm hiding from some people. I'm feeling a bit uncomfortable, to be honest. I'm about to see something that might work against my sensibilities."

"Do you know why I am doing this - and Pauline will too? First of all, I've always thought the Church was wrong about sex. Prompted by Bishop Christine, I agree with Marcella Althaus-Reid that we need to sexualise theology, change authority, use metaphor and build back the sacred. But also my niece got involved in another grouping and she has become all secretive and yet I cannot join my niece's group because I have had nothing but dismissive remarks from Bishop John Barman about my status, and ministry - and, of course, Pauline's."

"There were two Hindus and a Reformist Jew in it."

"Maybe. Yet sects and cults often reject those closest to them but not in them, like me. But now we have Christine's ministry, and she has spilled the beans to me about Barman, Eyre and Huett. Pauline and I are assisting her."

"A Bishop Pauline?"

"Yes. Are you still a naturist?"

"I am."

"Then my vestments. You will not be shocked when I do this." He pulled at the meeting of the material, held by velcro. Now they were not together, and there in front of me was his bare chest, penis, naked legs. "Bishops Pauline and Christine have the same. Bishop Christine supplied these."

"I'm not shocked," I said in front of the reveal.

He closed the material by way of the velcro. "Bishop Christine wants you to sit alongside us, next to the screen on the right. We are doing initiations. Christine wants you as a witness to one in particular. I'm told that if Barman and company did it, it would be a romp and for fun. Christine says it should not be entertainment for the unknowing."

"Quite right."

"Pauline and I could be initiated, but we would have to be incardinated into her Church first. We are thinking about it. It would be for another occasion. Are you thinking about it?"

"No. I have a Church career, apparently. I get paid and have a house provided. I assert that we must have a congregation, whereas you independents don't. So the answer is no."

"We have many pastoral encounters, via our funeral and wedding ministries, and through the websites we keep. Ah, here comes the photographer, Leon Agnew. Liberal Catholic Churches do have a habit of photographing everything, to prove they happen."

"I know him."

As a result of this, I asked Christine, entering in her velcro-held split front finery, that I be allowed to sit in the congregation unless wanted specifically. I did not want to wear a clerical collar. I'd sit with Sir San Bandyopadhyay. She agreed.

Hotel Initiation & Communion

Here were three bishops in full regalia stood in front of the large table: William was to our left, Christine in the centre, and Pauline to our right. Twenty-two initiates were gathered to our right in simple white gowns and bare feet, with red and black badges - and one of them was Janet Hayes.

The already initiated were obliged to attend. Also here were people from technical firms like electronics, communications, measuring, sat with their escorts, probably a few with spouses, in what was the congregation.

I found and sat with Sir San Bandyopadhyay. Leon now the photographer got busy and stayed busy. And on this, Bishop Christine said, "Just to note. The photographer is doing the archive. I have with me two guest bishops; I am the representative bishop of the Ecclesia Apostolica Liberali or Liberal Apostolic Ecclesia. Bishop Bill Masters is the entirety of the East Angles Liberal Catholic Church; Bishop Pauline Junor is the entirety of the Orthodox Catholic Ministries. We recognise each other as apostolically sound. Bishop Bill, you start. Listen everyone."

Bishop Bill Masters began by saying, "In the name of God the Father, God the Son and God the Holy Spirit. In Christ's Body - the Church, this Mass incorporates a Sacrificial Service of Initiation into the Vanguard of the Church under the guidance of the Principatus Theocratic Confraternitati admissis in Ecclesia Apostolica Liberali or Confraternity of the Theocratic Principality of the Liberal Apostolic Ecclesia."

Christine Vine stated off-script: "When we speak of a Vanguard of Service, we do not mean a superior class of Christian. We mean someone who will give sacrifice from their personalities and bodies in the duty of service for the ecstatic salvation of others. This commitment is given by intimate submission, at this service and through subsequent actions. Only bishops of the Ecclesia Apostolica Liberali organise the Principatus Theocratic Confraternitati admissis in Ecclesia Apostolica Liberali; and their priests may join them as initiators, although guest bishops may assist in the Eucharistic act. Those initiated become members under the authority of the Principatus Theocratic Confraternitati admissis in Ecclesia Apostolica Liberali and receive a white Badge of the Werberga Goose in black.

"The initiation service is the equivalent in some other Apostolic Churches as Confirmation, but listen all: we are all theosexual, Christosexual, Spiritsexual beings, aware of our lifespan, bodies, and sexuality for the Vanguard to bring in the Kingdom. God be praised: in his depth is the source of our corporeal selves; we love Christ and feel his intense love; and the Holy Spirit moves us all over. Through our Communion: gain awareness of our bodies."

Bill Masters continued from the script: "The Master Jesus Christ, having himself published his religion to the Jewish people for the salvation of the world, commissioned his Apostles to complete the work he had begun, by preaching his Gospel to all nations."

"All power,' said he, 'is given unto me in heaven and in earth. Go ye, therefore, and make disciples of all nations, baptising them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit; teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you; and lo, I am with you always, even to the end of the world.'"

I had a few problems with that, historically, and the Creed has eternity not the end of the world.

Christine again: "We have here..." (And she read the names of twenty-two people, including Janet Hayes.) "Present to initiate sacramentally is myself, Mar Werburga Bishop Christine Vine."

Bill Masters opened the solemn initiation: "The candidates must hear this. Initiation into the membership of the Principatus Theocratic Confraternitati admissis in Ecclesia Apostolica Liberali demands that clergy can say the Creed, the Lord's Prayer, and the Ten Commandments; and that all continue to be instructed into the history and purposes of Liberal Catholicism and the Ecclesia Apostolica Liberali, whereas other initiates more simply assent that, by the grace of God, they will conduct themselves faithfully to observe its general principles, and give service and sacrifice - including that of their very corporeal being - to others ."

Christine took over: "The candidates have given written consent for the ceremony that involves the transfer of bodily fluid, but we must ask you: Do you here, in the presence of God, make the solemn promise, vow and consumption that will assent to and confirm your membership of the Principatus Theocratic Confraternitati admissis in Ecclesia Apostolica Liberali?"

"We do," they all said together, from the script.

"If you have acted with others without your neighbour's consent, you should seek forgiveness and make amends, and until you do, you should consider not attending this Mass. Nothing must happen without prior thought and sober consent."

Pauline continued: "Our body is our flesh; our blood is the life flowing around the individual body, and for this we must embrace life with mutual consent and positivity. Therefore, initiates: do take the Vanguard Bishop Christine's fluid carefully and healthily. Firstly, go behind that screen, undress and wait."

Bill returned to the participatory liturgy: "O God, unto whom all bodies be opened, all desires expressed, and where no secrets are hidden; Cleanse us and prepare us by your Holy Spirit, that we may sexually love you and our people, and magnify holiness, through the Christ Body and in his Church. Amen."

Christine was next: "Our Corporeal Guide with his feet that walked this soil: have mercy."

We said "Christ have mercy." (So did I.)

Pauline now said, "Our Corporeal Guide: have mercy." She continued: "Glory be to God on high."

We said, "And peace with service to all."

Bill said, "We praise, we bless, we worship, we glorify, we give thanks through our bodies to God."

Now Christine asked that, "Christ remove our wrongful intents; the one who sacrificed for us, show us how we sacrifice for others. Holiness come to us through the grace of God."

Pauline said, "Our Corporeal Guide be with you."

We said, "And with your Spirit."

She said, "Let us pray."

Bill gave the prayer: "O God on this day, bless our gathering and the knowledgable at this conference. We humbly beseech you so that in all our thoughts, words, and works, we may ever seek your honour and glory, and study to preserve we the people in wealth, peace, and godliness."

Next from Christine came the Creed. I expected the Apostles' or the Nicene. "We believe in Baptism, Initiation, the Holy Eucharist, Absolution, Holy Unction, Holy Matrimony, and Holy Orders. Our Corporeal Guide Christ and his immediate followers gave to His Church a body of teachings and principles we call theo-ethics. Perhaps some of the original teaching has been lost; and some has become obscured with false additions through time. What remains we express as we must, but we seek total divine wisdom and we are, as the Church, given the purpose of interpretation to that end. Developing wisdom is an ancient and modern task. From the Holy Lady Mary comes the World Mother as made real by so many women, and from Mary Magdalen comes a Tower, a watcher, a Leader, a comforter. Under the Universal Church can be absorbed all the beneficent religions and philosophies in a unity of purpose. We believe that God is Love and Service and Truth and Light, given into this Church; that perfect justice will come; and that all God's children shall one day meet with God, however far we stray. We hold to the Majesty of God, the Church-guiding Community of all, and we know that we do serve God best when best we serve our neighbours. So shall God's blessing rest upon us, with peace for evermore. Amen."

I approved of most of that.

Christine was now doing, what I thought was the equivalent of 'The Peace' and 'Draw near with faith'. "Everyone! Proceed to kiss one another. Draw to them with faith. What you do, later, in expressing your bodies, and in the exchange of life-fluids, within this building, is under this liturgical charge. Do not let the Devil enter into you. Do your engaging with one another as sacred acts. Offer one another a sign of peace, and ask for a nod for permission to embrace upon flesh and give a kiss."

Given that we were sat in rows, our embracing and kissing was necessarily limited. I've been in churches where they hug each other, and it has never convinced me. I kissed San to my right and a woman to my left. The naked initiates behind the screen kissed each other and the bishops went among them temporarily.

Then Bishop Christine, back in position in front of the altar table stated: "And so I, the ordained of this Ecclesia, will transfer part of my living, Spirit-given, life-fluid, to the candidates for initiation, in an Act of Apostolic Life, and then we will all come forward for Communion. Our Lord said, this is my Body or Flesh and this is my Blood or Vitality. Initiation candidates, come and one by one. Your nakedness is a moment of transition: you came into this world with nothing and you will leave with nothing. All your time on this earth you have your body."

The bishops in a line opened their vestments so that their apostolic bodies were somewhat visible but mainly in shadow. Right to left as I looked, Pauline turned and picked up and held the bread, to then turn and face us, Christine did nothing but face us - pushing her open vestments back to reveal breasts and a bald pubic area, and Bill turned and picked up one of the two large chalices of wine and faced us. From the right moving left, each candidate embraced Pauline within her opened vestments, so that bodies met, and consumed some bread. Each then moved to Christine, to embrace her flesh, and place a finger into her pubic area to then suck upon it. To each one she said, "I initiate you ... into the authority of the Principatus Theocratic Confraternitati admissis in Ecclesia Apostolica Liberali or Confraternity of the Theocratic Principality of the Liberal Apostolic Ecclesia. You are now a Werburga Goose, and you give your complete loyalty to the Confraternity." After Christine each initiate then moved on to embrace Bill as he held the wine up, to then receive a sip of wine. But one candidate, Janet Hayes herself, bent down and licked Christine's pubic area three times, and some urine went into her mouth. There were some gasps regarding this sight. The candidates each found new tunics with white and black badges on them behind the other lattice screen. The photographer of all this did not add to any sacred sense of the occasion or indeed make a good window.

"Listen and remember," said Christine: "we are theosexual, Christosexual, Spiritsexual, and this act has been inspired by the Holy Spirit."

Now we all went forward, to embrace and take the bread, embrace Christine and touch her pubic zone, and embrace and take the wine. I felt daft hugging with even thin textiles on. I surely had the right to lick Christine's pubic area as Janet had done, and I did so, to gasps in the congegation, but of course Christine did not state the initiation text to me.

The distribution of the elements and bodies ended. San Bandyopadhyay had received communion: the flexibility of being a Hindu! San said he had embraced Christine, but not Bill; a number of men were selective like this given Bill's semi-stiff exposed penis.

Bishop Christine said, "God, hear our prayers."

We all said, "God hear us."

Christine again: "Those who were initiated are now Werburga Geese and Ganders, and will give their complete loyalty to the Confraternity and support with intimate bodily love other Werburga Geese and Ganders."

"Let us pray. Almighty, eternal and living God, through your gifts of grace at this ceremony give those initiated a renewed sense of purpose in membership under the Principatus Theocratic Confraternitati admissis in Ecclesia Apostolica Liberali, and give them the confidence to use their bodies and life-force in the spreading of service within Your Gospel. Amen."

Bill again: "God be with you."

We all said, "And with your spirit."

He continued: "Almighty and eternal God, we thank you for feeding us, and animating our love, through the work of your Son and our Master Christ Jesus and the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, by whom we do what is good and acceptable to your divine Majesty. We make our humble supplications unto you to certify everyone of your favour and gracious goodness. Let your Holy Spirit ever guide us; and so lead us in obedience; through our Lord Jesus Christ, who with thee and the Holy Spirit lives and reigns, ever one God. Amen."

Christine concluded the ceremony. "In response to the commands of our Master Jesus Christ, you have all participated, by a solemn act of worship before God and this assembly, your dedication to work with your minds and bodies to live the Gospel and go out and make disciples of faith; and may God bless you all. In the name of the God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Spirit."

This was the end. What I noticed, from this most rigid of ecclesiastical persons, was a liberality under the Church as sole guide: the Creed was radically different, there were no scriptural readings, and the prayers were few. This was a most strange and unique sacramentalism. Perhaps nearly a hundred people had touched Christine's pubic area and some non-initiates had inserted a finger. I had participated in this most non-Anglican of liturgical acts. As people left the room, San Bandyopadhyay told me that very soon Janet Hayes, who'd crossed over to Christine, would leave for Hartlepool.

Rest of Hotel Day One

After the service, Christine, still in full vestments, but closed, came to San Bandyopadhyay and me, and suggested, "San, do the painting job after the break."

"I'd be delighted to do this with Linda," he said. "The room has been prepared?"

Christine said, "Of course. You might enjoy this, Linda. I'm just going to remind those initiated not to go to above the casino in the evenings."

San Bandyopadhyay said, "I will not go if I can take Linda to the car showroom at the same time tomorrow night."

"But then do the decent thing, San - I'm telling you - and put another two thousand in my account for Linda."

It seemed an odd payment for a car showroom visit. Was I expected to put six thousand pounds towards a car? So we went along this floor to the office, with Alice Krasniqi arriving there, and that was another two thousand for me.

We arrived at the dining room, where a late lunch was available self-service.

Whether it was against the rules or not, I asked San to excuse me, and went to Janet Hayes, and said to her, "Hello. I'm Linda. I think we are both escapees from the Worshipful Company."

"There'll be spies here."

"Really?"

"They will know you are here. Look, Linda, I'd had enough of the lies and the showman in charge. So much Christianity is trust in people, from trusting the Apostles as in the texts. But I don't trust him. I don't trust Jonathan either and Liz laps Terry up. He's a fraud on this Serninsea Cross brooch, involving his favourite people in the group."

"You left a note before for Adam Magellan."

"Yes."

"How much do you know?" I asked.

"They're not communicating with me like they did. You'll be in special trouble with them, being a priest here. I'm told Sir Sanjay is not going above the casino."

"He's my responsibility. About them, I walked out. Some people were being exploited and I received some rough treatment. Christine has toned things down a bit here."

"She hasn't and she won't. Don't you think it's unusual for a woman to pee into my mouth in front of a crowd?"

"I suppose so."

"Look, we either believe in this thing or we don't. Do you?"

"Well, I sort of..."

"You can't be into half measures. Christine won't take you in properly if you won't step up to the mark. We are extremists but this doesn't take away the decision, the choice. I mean, what is Ken Osis doing in that Worshipful Company? And this thing that priests must be involved once selected: Christine says that sacrifice has to be your own decision, and she is right. Everyone has the right to walk away."

"But it is easier if you are unpaid, like she is. I still have to obey these bishops, and it's not as if I can just resign. Look, San is over there and he is looking. Great meeting you. Are you escorting anyone?"

"Actually, no. Here was a group occasion to get initiated. Keep him," she said. "It will deprive Barman of his big financial supporter. But be aware that he and Christine do some weird shit. I admire how she steps up to the task, and will you?"

"He'll be painting me, apparently."

"That's the least of it. I'm going to leave the conference shortly. The twenty-one other initiates are staying. See, I've got a white badge now and yours is still red."

I returned to San, as he was pressing the flesh in the more usual sense, and so started introducing me as Cynthia, while I apologised for seeing Janet. We collected our food, with a touch of the Indian in the tikka fish salad, including raw red onion, cucumber, coriander, lemon, red and green chilli (deseeded and diced). I sat with him on a back table - surprisingly, I thought.

Once people had stopped approaching him, he had a revelation for me. "So I told you earlier that my actual name, my inherited name, is San Bandopadhyay. It is a very special surname because it is the family surname of Tagore. It is of the highest caste, the Brahmins. Although my family is Bengali, the Tagore clan goes back to the Punjab settling on the River Hooghly in the eighth century of the Common Era. Have you heard of Rabindranath Tagore?"

"I've seen it somewhere."

"Look him up. As well as him we are also directly connected with Ram Mohan Roy, a religious figure as well and an educator. Have you heard of him?"

"No, don't know" I said.

"Then I start with Ram Mohan Roy. He was a modern Hindu saying God is one and transcendent: he defined Hinduism as a term, translated the Vedas, co-founded the Calcutta Unitarian Society and founded the Brahmo Samaj, a modernist Hindu group."

"Hey? Them again?"

"Who again?"

"Unitarians. They seem to follow me around. Tiny group, yet keep popping up from nowhere."

"Not as tiny as the handful in Christine's Church. I know only that these two groups I mentioned focus on ethics and social reform. Roy's father followed Shiva and mother Vishnu, so perhaps this is why he transcended both and tried to make Hinduism Western. He is associated with Bristol..."

"Bristol," I said. "Funny."

"...whereas Tagore is associated with some time growing up in Brighton and visiting Staffordshire."

"Not Worthing?"

"No, not Worthing. What is the relevance of that?"

"Sorry, a distraction."

"Hmm. Tagore mixed with Anglicans, Quakers, and gave the Hibbert Lectures in 1930 - they are Unitarian related - and he was an educator on the lines of Fröbel, Dewey and Montessori - stimulation, play, harmony, community. I am told you are interested in this sort of thing, my priest, my Goddess."

"Two of Christine's fellow bishops are in Bristol. Did you just call me 'my Goddess' or is that another?"

"I do want to paint you. I have done this with Christine."

"You paint portraits, figures?"

"No, I want to paint you. I have a room set aside. I want you to be the Goddess. I am not interested in the next part of the conference, and so come with me," he said.

Here was an art room, or made into one, because on tables were blue paints in bottles, trays to put the paints in, rollers, and brushes, with water already in large glass jars, and below a whole area of the floor with plastic sheeting on it. I knew what was coming.

So I had to strip off, and get the dress to a safe distance, and he too stripped off. The idea was he was going to cover me in blue paint, the colour of divinity, directly on my body, from face to feet. So we were on the plastic sheeting. He first tipped paint on to a tray and used a spongy roller on me. Then tipping more paint into a tray, he used a rag with a rougher approach with a variant blue. All I had to do was stand there. But clearly what he wanted to do was use his hands, so the paint dribbled down his arms as he rubbed his hands all over my body.

Then he paid attention to my face, so I now was bright blue all over. Oh, he tipped a whole tray of blue over my hair. My precious hairdo was ruined.

Then I had to lay on the sheeting as he used his own body to rub over mine, so he was becoming as blue as me.

I nodded to him, because he had become stiff where it matters. So this was when he entered me. He wanted a divine connection with his Goddess, but I wondered about the blue paint going into me.

While he was busy the door opened and in slipped Janet Hayes. She came close as San was out of me, incomplete in every way.

"Do you want to come on to me?" I asked Janet.

She smiled. "No. I wanted to look."

"I've gone soft," said Sir San. "I'll photograph."

I wasn't sure about him taking photographs using a camera previously hidden behind an unused jar. At least the colour gave me some kind of disguise as I sat there and then stood up and stretched out my legs. Blue paint was dripping from my forehead close to my eyes.

It did not stop him taking that empty jar and filling it with some runny paint, and told me to sit up. He again tipped it over my hair, and it was all runny. I moved the paint over my eyelids. Janet was still there, with a grin when I opened my eyes.

He then took some darker paint as it was, in a thicker state, and tipped this over my head, and he rubbed it into my hair and all around my face as if he was washing my face.

When I could next look, Janet had gone. Now he took photographs of me, first sat and then stood up facing him.

"You are the colour of the Goddess," he said. "You are the colour of divinity and you are my divine experience."

He was stiff again, and so I lay in the paint on the plastic sheet and he shallow fucked me, probably thinking of avoiding paint going in too deep.

The facilities included a shower, so when he was done we squeezed in there and he rather enjoyed removing the paint from me and indeed me attending to him. The hair showering was extensive; and outside there was a clean space near our clothes to dry ourselves. Outside Janet was back and looking at us.

We carried our clothes in a dash to his suite followed by Janet; inside I made use of a hair dryer and she applied it to us. His hands were all over me but, all of a sudden, he paused.

He told Janet and me to have a half hour away from him. What a blessed relief. I left, dress on, holding my hairbrush from my bag.

"Well, that's me," said Janet. "No scraps for me. What's he paying you?"

I made up an answer: "I'm not allowed to discuss it."

Once she had obtained her baggage we went down to the ground floor and as she left I found a woman behind the desk at the main reception with a chap alongside her. "I'm Cynthia Grayking at the conference," I said. "Is there a garden to sit in or somewhere in the warm air?"

"Yes. The downstairs dining room down there: go past that and there is a back door."

I must have brushed my hair continuously, standing outside the building. Would anyone recognise me? Perhaps I should have stayed blue.

When I arrived back at the third floor there was a message held by Rose Crook. San wanted to be alone longer and had work to do beyond the hotel. Busy man, apparently. Nevertheless I went up a floor to San's (and my) empty suite, only to discover three dresses had been delivered, and three pairs of shiny heeled shoes. The shoes were black, red and blue pairs. One dress was thin flowing red, one was stretchy white and then there was a thin, semi-transparent blue one. Ah, a note stated that the first one was for Christine, and only the two others were for me!

I went from the suite to sit in a social room and look at my phone. Half an hour later I went back.

I put the white dress on, and looked at myself, but busy San came in and indicated that he preferred the blueish translucent dress, for dinner. The blue shoes were next. He understood from Christine that I never wore knickers. Bras were out among the escorts anyway.

So I went away again, in blue, and had nothing to do. How much these clothes had cost him I could only imagine; my measurements having been given to Werburgh Limited.

I wandered around on floor one, where I met a male resident, Alfred Burger. He recognised me. So I went into his suite and did a pastoral visit! Of course he was blinking a lot at my appearance. He was paying out of his savings and property release to live in the hotel and only wished he could have done this earlier. His wife was dead and he just had all meals and laundry provided. If he ran out of money, the local authority would have to pick up his welfare.

"You look very attractive, curate: are you staying here?"

"I'm having a day out; I'm here with a friend. Very posh if a little dated, Mr. Burger."

"You're not dated, but you are perhaps posh today."

"The hotel I mean."

"Oh it's not posh, love. I think you've made one resident very happy."

"I'm pleased about that; I should come here more often," I said, lying. What he meant was I made his day showing him impressions of my nipples and bare legs as the dress fell away.

Great. Good move on my part, I did not think. Anyway, I made an excuse and left, and went up three floors to the suite. Christine was there and kissing San for her dress and shoes, and we three went down to floor three and to dinner. I said nothing about Alfred. I think about four Anglicans lived there as residents. They probably all knew each other.

At dinner we three had nut cutlets and spicy vegetables (there was a cheese based dish for those with some allergies). San told us that nowadays, by just standing still and doing nothing, he just grew wealth. He had charity outlets but they took only for a small proportion of his income. So, "Do not worry if I spend money on you two."

I told him that the dresses were fabulous and more than I could expect.

He said, "Ah, it is so sad Christine about your split with Terence Barman. Why did that happen? Why do you recommend I don't go there?"

"Because he is not serious," said Christine. "And dishonest. Listen to me on this: you just listen."

"Theological grounds," I said. "Christine is premodern within postmodernism. I'm a modernist, you see, rather like your Tagore Hinduism. I must find out more, San."

"Hmm," said Christine. "Too philosophical by half. The Church gives rise to some seeing its position as pseudo-Platonist."

I said, "So, whereas I think there is the basis for research, for finding history, for something behind texts, despite all the problems, Christine here thinks there are no such foundations; however, out of her perceived breakdown into transient truths, there is this apparent liberty for those like Christine to go back to the Church as its own knowledge and ethic."

"I don't suppose I understand half of it but you're very impressive," said San.

"Linda presumes too much, said Christine. Why do you suppose I have no foundations?"

"Definitely not in this world," I said. "Not the one we have discovered most clearly over the last three hundred years."

"It's not relevant," said Christine.

"Linda," asked San, "is she right about Terence Barman?"

"Yes. He is in it for himself, and appears to be doing one thing while actually doing another. It's what Janet Hayes says too."

"I must paint her," he said.

I continued. "She was available!"

"You're my previous priest and Goddess."

I said, "The other thing is, he builds a reputation for being progressive when he is not, when he is the opposite. I think he and many there exploit. I choose Christine instead."

"You've got one thing right then," said Christine.

San said, "Christine is good with the authorities here. The police go after the pimps and want the prostitutes off the streets. I support you Christine because you will get in control and run the erotic services in the town. I want to be in on this too, if I can help. You give it extra edge."

I said, "My lover, partner, Andrew Magellan, is investigating Bishop Barman. He wants to keep Christine and yourself clear of the consequences."

He said, "Ah. I see."

I went on, "There is Barman's background in the Midlands, and how he came here and who followed him, and the context of a diocese that is going wrong. By the way, I walked out of his Confraternity, or Theatre Players..."

San said, "I am its secular Director, so I am involved."

I said back to him, "Far be it for me to recommend anything, but you could resign. Plus, the diocesan Bishop Imperial is a very nice chap, intellectual too, and supports me, but he's a useless bureaucrat. I find Screddington distasteful, the other suffragan, but that just may be his personality. He may not be so far from your theology, Christine."

"He fails by falling in with Barman. Otherwise..."

"So the whole lot could come crashing down. And I am part of the institution. Stick with Christine, San: she is clearly a good organiser."

While we were eating a certain 'Bobby Sernin' came around the tables looking for people to come to his show at the Blue Diamond Club - Friday and Saturday evening.

Bobby Sernin described his show as: "Near the knuckle: that's all you can see when you get deep into it."

This created an instant problem for Christine, as she was sunsequently approached by numerous white badged Geese saying that their partners would go there and likely want to go to the orgy above the casino.

Christine had to give way, much to her annoyance, but she asked San and me if we would not go. She went away and returned, and we would instead have a trip to see Annie Fenwick, and Christine asked Sir Sanjay if he would speak to her and consider investing in Goosechat as a whole. Then she asked me if she could persuade her Goosechat performer to give up her Bolingbroke Geese membership and transfer to her Weburga Geese instead.

Before leaving the hotel, and in some moments of separation from San, one of the older male business folk approached me. He was Andrew Hindley, from FEEL, a long time expert in semiconductors and lately flat screen technologies. I said I was Cynthia Grayking, who taught English and RE, but not Welsh. He said teaching was difficult and badly paid now, and I agreed and it was why I became part time and doing this escorting as well. I said that I was under pressure to produce results where the statistics did not in the end represent learning. He said he'd thought at first that I'd have been a model in some photographic studio.

"Appreciated," I said, "but I am older than most models."

"May be some time ago," he suggested.

This later comment worried me somewhat.

Narrator: Linda Visiting Annie at her Workplace (Friday 2nd August)

One person not seeing Bobby Sernin was Annie Fenwick, earning her 'tips' online. In the blue dress and with San, a taxi took us to the terraced house to see her at work.

One of the other performers there took us to Annie's room, where we two stayed off camera. 'Headgirl' was naked and open legged, masturbating to the sounds that were tips coming in. With a double bulbed vibrator part inserted, each tip produced a vibration of an intensity determined by the amount tipped. Noises were bleeps to cash cascading.

A point came when she put a BRB ('Be Right Back') notice up and cut the sound. Drinking a lot of bottled water she told a fascinated San Bandyopadhyay and me about something they call 'squirting' as a performance.

"Because the police and law know where we are, we're not allowed to urinate straight down. A lot of punters want that. So we get around it by squirting. It's like having an orgasm but what you do is vigorously thrust your fingers in and out and pee through that. It sprays all over the place. But you can only do it so often, otherwise it looks like the cheat that it is."

I thought, here is a really intelligent lass doing this nonsense to earn a crust.

He told her he was thinking of investing some money in Christine's operation, although I knew she didn't need his money.

Annie resumed her online performance and then did one of her sprays high up. Despite spraying away from us we still got wet and she had to apply some kitchen towel to her computer. For the public view she had a towel to dry herself.

In a second BRB I made my pitch for her to join Christine's operation throughout.

"But Barman does orgies, above the casino, and I like moving about different people. Christine is doing pairs, escorts, accompaniment. I'm moe a free agent."

After some time we left, and San said he'd think about investing. But what he wanted was me to impersonate Annie, so (to 'step up to the task') I did and more directly at him. I wasn't just a tart: I was becoming filth.

Christine came in and found the mess in the bathroom, so called upon a night cleaner. She looked at me.

"How am I supposed to say 'no' to him, Christine?"

"I appreciate he is risky."

She told me she didn't want his investment but I'd kept San from the Bolingbroke crowd. She also assumed that Annie wanted to keep her Bolingbroke Geese badge. Quite.

Christine said, "You're not used to it. You have Saturday and through to Sunday morning to endure. After all this, I and Adam's Ann will see that you're all right."

Narrator: Adam Linda's Whereabouts (Friday 2nd August)

At the end of the working week, I was in the curate's house checking the landline for messages and going through Linda's computers for various communications. I thought I might sleep over because her bed is a lot more comfortable than mine. However, I had my own message from Peter Marshall via my own secured media on my tablet device.

I've not been spotted by Linda, in my disguises, and dodging behind Kathleen's new friend Winnie Lott who's nicely acting as my escort. Definitely lesbian when in bed with me, when everyone else is humping. Christine welcomed me Thursday. I'll do a presentation for FEEL (electronics), by arrangement from Christine, so long as I declare it as a trick. Linda's been with Sanjay Bunker and he painted her body fifty shades of blue, Christine told Winnie. Janet Hayes got herself sexually initiated by Christine. Winnie and I took communion and hugged Bill Masters and Pauline Junor, respectively (!) as well as touching Christine. Very nice. Sanjay Bunker and Linda have gone to see your screen mate Headgirl to keep Bunker away from Barman's lot. He is taking Linda to the car showroom. It's his pound of flesh to accept Christine's turf only. Linda will find that difficult, even if very well paid. She's on £4000 and presents plus £2000 for the showroom plus thirty quid an hour. I'll go there using my Canadian disguise. I'm monitoring people going between here and above the casino. Some are staying at the hotel just to go to above the casino. There may be a spy in from the other side embedded in the conference.

I put Annie on screen via Goosechat. 'Headgirl' sprayed in the air. I know it's fake but Goosechat won't show them peeing. I sent a few tips.

Keith was milling around as per usual. Quite what he knew and did not know I did not know - and I didn't want to ask him. He was going out later in the evening, and Saturday evening, and I assumed it was to the parties held by the Worshipful Company of Serninsea Theatrical Players above the casino.

The doorbell rang, this early evening. Stood there, all threat of rain gone, as I opened the door, were Diana de Groot and the Reverend Colin Cromer.

Diana said, "Colin Cromer asked me if I know what has happened to Linda. I've had only one reply - Bristol and London - and the reverend has had none. Do you know any more? Where is she now?"

"Come in anyway."

Keith was in the larger lounge.

"Why are you here?" Colin asked me, sitting down there along with Diana.

"I have a set of keys and so does Keith."

Colin Cromer started mumbling.

"Where is she?" Diana asked.

"I don't know. She went to Bristol."

"A funeral?" asked Colin.

"There has been a death," I said, giving the sort of answer that is non-specific.

Keith then butted in. "I understand she has also gone to Ebbsfleet."

"Ebbsfleet? Why on earth Ebbsfleet?" Colin asked.

"I don't know," Keith answered, "but it seems I am better informed than he is."

I looked at Keith rather severely for playing games; he knew the home base of Christine Vine, but I suspected that he did not want to name her because this would open a route to a group trying to conceal itself.

Diana said, "She rarely goes anywhere without leaving a note about where she has gone. Has she told you, Keith? Where in this Ebbsfleet?"

Keith shrugged his shoulders.

"Well, how do you know?" she asked him.

"I don't know," Keith said. "But wasn't there someone at Margate who knew someone at Ebbsfleet? She hinted at wanting to meet up. She likes to call in on this person and that."

So Diana asked me, "And do you know anything on these lines? All I know is that there was some woman at this Margate conference that impressed her; I think she was from the south west, an academic student. Perhaps she was the one that died?"

I said, "There was someone like that; she was a postgraduate student, I heard later on. Quite a picture of health, I'd gathered."

"A few people impressed Linda at Margate," said Keith. "And she impressed them."

Colin Cromer said, "Ebbsfleet is more specific. Have you got a name, Keith?"

"She mentioned many female names. There was the Bishop of Margate there and his boss, the Archbishop of All England."

"That's not Ebbsfleet," said Colin. "And the last time I checked, they were both male - though, these days, male and female get a bit indistinct."

I said, "I expected her back sooner than this. She might be back tonight or tomorrow night."

Diana said, "Well, it's not good enough."

Colin Cromer then said, "When we are short of information, it is worth thinking about the person and how they are likely to stand up to adversity or indeed opportunity. The face that she presents to everyone is the confident and intellectual priest with a pastoral sensitivity, and her strength is that she can be forthright and determined if she wants to be. She has personal resistance and loyalty. But her flaws keep surfacing, that she does these sudden badly-advised actions and is aloof even - cannot communicate to others what is concentrated in her head. She fears that she is in the wrong job, and her core beliefs seem to be out of sync with the Church. So is this why she has gone absent without leave? She can be so self-centred, even obsessive about her nudity and she seems to dump authority as it suits; this can weaken the institutions around her. She has weakened our institution by how she has lived here, involving you two. What she needs is institutional stability and a period of calm. So what I am asking is whether we think she has hit a crisis point and so she has withdrawn from everyone?"

Diana said, "Ah... Thanks for that."

I said, "I think you may be getting ahead of matters, Reverend Cromer. She didn't strike me as hitting a personal crisis. She turned positive at her ordination."

"But," he asked, "did she just deflate again?"

Keith said, "She had a new sense of a project ahead."

And Colin Cromer added, "That was then. I'm getting no further forward here. I'm going. I just want to say I am not at all happy about what is going on in this house. It's a funny sort of separation, and who is sharing Linda's bed? Not her husband, but you."

Diana said, "Linda was loyal. Keith had the affair: two affairs, probably."

"You think so?" Keith asked.

"I'll stay a bit longer, Reverend Cromer," Diana said, "because, as I said to you, they may be able to say more to me than to you. But just to be sure: she's not gone off to the Bever Wood Naturist Club and everyone's keeping silent?"

"No," said Adam. "Pretty sure. Saxiclite is very unlikely too. She's a member of Bever Wood but it's not a place that would give her informal favours."

Diana said, "Jeremy Symes and Lindy Peacock might. They manage it now."

"My God," said Colin Cromer. "This town is a den of iniquity."

"Bever Wood is in deepest, darkest Nottinghamshire," said Keith.

Colin said to Diana, "If there is anything you can report to me afterwards, let me know. This situation is simply not acceptable."

So off he went, and we waited for Diana to say more.

And she did, too. "Right," she began, "there was a group she was looking into, a sex cult, and I think this has something to do with it."

Keith said, "Be careful what you think you know about."

So I said, "Oh I think I know quite a bit."

Diana asked, "Has this group kidnapped her, because she won't go along with them? Is this what's happened?"

"Oh no," said Keith. "She has run away from everything."

"What I know," I said, "is that she became increasingly concerned about it, and wishes to have no more to do with it, whereas they say she must."

"You think you know much when you don't," said Keith.

"Oh, I have very good sources," I said.

Diana asked, "So what is this group exactly?"

I said, "Let's just say it thinks it is the leading force of the Church to open up the future. And it is illiberal and autocratic."

Keith said, "If what you say was correct, it would be a theocracy. And why not? And what I think, Mr. Magellan, is that you are a deliberate and disruptive influence."

"This group," Diana said, "involves Ken Osis, doesn't it, and I think it is like the Freemasons with added sex. She is at risk."

Keith said, "It holds meetings, makes plans, advances the cause, and is only like the Freemasons in that it doesn't like to tell of its particulars."

"Adam," Diana asked, "from what you know, am I right? Is Linda in danger?"

"I don't think so. I think we know that Ebbsfleet is one home of the clergywoman Christine Vine. If he knows she has been to Ebbsfleet then he knows she has been with Christine. And if that is true, from Bristol to Ebbsfleet, then she is taking time out and will resurface soon."

"What do I know?" asked Keith, waving his left hand.

Diana said, "So you think she is safe, Adam?"

"Most probably, yes."

"Right, well I am going, and you'd better be sure about this. I think you are hiding something, Adam, being a complete shit, but you probably have a reason. But, woe betide if she comes to harm. As for you Keith, I don't trust you one bit. I will tell Mr. Cromer that she is most likely safe."

Diana went. To think Diana had enjoyed both of our sexual organs!

Keith said to me, "I think there is a need for you and me to communicate. Are you investigating us, and, if so, to what end?"

"More true is that Linda was investigating you, that her contact with Stephen and Helen McPhail was information gathering. I don't know all that has been going on, but I know she turned a corner, so to speak."

"Why would she and not you be investigating us?"

"Because that suffragan bishop kept undermining her ministry. Her question was, 'Why is he doing this?' and all investigations start with a question."

"So you are saying she is with Christine. In Ebbsfleet, then."

"Don't try it on with me, Keith Jupitas. You know perfectly well that the Titansea Grand has a parallel event run by Christine Vine for the electronics conference. Christine's is more daytime and yours is evening. Some but not all are going from the Titansea Grand conference to your parties, which is what they used to do - incomers stay at the hotel and go to these dos after the presentations. Yes? Is Barman going to gatecrash the electronics conference?"

"The idea is that people beyond the invited don't know what is happening above the casino. It's a very private private. So he won't be declaring his presence in the hotel."

"Christine will be operating a complete offering. No?"

"You're implying that Linda is in Serninsea. Sir Sanjay Bunker is missing too. Perhaps she is his attraction, in that he's wanted to have her especially since she started wearing a clerical collar. And once Jonathan Eyre had her, she was his must-have."

"Anyway, Mr. Jupitas, I am going to occupy the main bedroom tonight, as I may, so we had better get along in a limited manner at least."

"Oh no," he said, "I think I will go on to a nice little coastal establishment north of here. Sharing this place with you only is well beyond the pale."

"I am sure you are very welcome there," I said to Keith, and he was soon out of the house. He will have realised too that his bishop's ship of sex was getting leaky.

Narrator: Linda Lectures and Presentations (Saturday 3rd August)

Christine and I woke and I sat up while San between us was chopping wood.

She said, quietly, looking at the ceiling, "I could not have done this without your presence. This is the first one I have organised."

"On this day when Nestorius was exiled I am in exile. I've been turned from a priest into a whore," I responded.

"Well I am a whore turned into a bishop. I'm still a whore, you still a priest. What has Nestorius got to do with it?"

"Saints days. We follow them. I've a lot of time for non-Roman Empire Christianity."

"He was a heresiarch."

"Later we get the Church of the East. Luminous Religion."

"You need to come down to earth. Here, in this hotel, with him here. Don't wake him."

"The Titansea Grand rather than the Great Oasis of Hibis? What about Bill Masters, Jenny's uncle? He had his todger out. How did he end up doing that?"

"Like you, it's given him a sense of purpose. He has bad theology, of course."

"Everyone but you has bad theology. Pauline was exposed too."

"You kept covered up, after a fashion."

"Situations. When I was a model, at the photographic studio, women would think nothing about talking to men completely naked in the office while the men looked at catalogues and booked them for a photographic session. They shared in cups of tea with the kettle on. It was a communion."

Christine then got up. "Humanism. When he shows you those cars tonight, just say about the best one, 'I like that one.' Make sure you use your disguises."

When the water was flowing, San woke up. He said, "Who's having a shower?"

"Christine. She's so very busy. I'm still here."

"Let's have you then."

He carried on having me while she dressed. Christine looked on. She then left us.

While grinding on he said, "You know that my niece Yojana Asthana is still a Bolingbroke Goose? Christine has not persuaded her over. Do you think I should try?"

"My husband has a special relationship with your niece. Are you all right about that?"

He paused, still inside me. "She should be more sharing but yes I am."

'She should be more sharing...' was the new reality. And from her uncle! He went on: "It's splitting SMS, this. Some of us think we should stay with Terry Barman but others have already come over to Christine. Janet Hayes, for example. I don't want this division. There is enough difficulty up here in Serninsea, from a business perspective. I must make a guiding move."

Once he'd come inside me and it ran out, there was a period of lying down and saying little.

Suddenly he said, "It is not exactly a car showroom."

"I gather that much," I said.

"Keith is a fool to lose you, and now he is having to lie to Cheryl Mould. She wants an ordinary husband. I'm not going to promote her. She couldn't come into Terry's or Jonathan's group even if she wanted it. She's not management."

I shared the time of brushing teeth and then attended to San in the bath. His need to make calls was my opportunity to use the toilet.

I put on the white dress with red badge and went with him to join all the glamour at breakfast. At last San was attending a presentation, and therefore so did

I.

It seemed to me that the first presentation of the day was no more than a former SMS man, Francis Underhill, justifying his presence. He told of his career and then via banking in the Far East - when he was lucky to get out before the most recent financial crash. Now he marketed electronic products and had been rapidly promoted at FEEL. He could see how companies could be run to maximise innovation into sales, and thus became an executive to do just that. He said there would be ever greater employment in Artificial Intelligence and its rolling out, and thus this is what he was doing. Today factories have few people in them, and in the future there might be one person simply overseeing decisions made by communicating machines. The danger was continuing to promote cheap employment laws, because expensive labour was a route to investment and installing AI, but once installed even cheap labour could not compete.

Then it was the Body Eucharist, which followed the same later pattern as before. Last time I groped via my dress, but thin as it was this was silly. So my dress came off as I walked up, raising some applause, and some others did the same. Good, I thought. About time. This meant being naked hugging Pauline - taking the bread from her, fingering Christine - and she fingered me back, and then hugging Bill - tugging his todger and taking the wine. I put my dress back on before sitting down.

San communed after me, staying dressed. Afterwards, he decided he wanted his own working time again. Seeing him go, Bill Masters came over to me and said Jenny would be present in Serninsea but he hadn't seen her. He talked about his and Pauline's funeral ministry. She came along and told me I have a lovely body and could have started a small trend.

"How old are you both, if I may ask? You don't live locally."

Bill said, "You may. I am fifty five."

"I am sixty," said Pauline.

"You are both very good for your ages."

"Bishop Pauline lives five miles from me," said Bishop Bill.

"And why did Bishop Christine persuade you both to help her?"

Pauline said, "She is going places; she is making a difference. Look at this gathering here. She combines orthodoxy with freshness."

Bill said, "We are looking into the Communion of Jenny's friend, also being in Independent Sacramental Ministry. I don't like Fatima Tamuuz dominating Jenny, as if Fatima has two children and not one, and she and even Elizabeth Huett can't have Jenny's best interests at heart. I wish she and Adam could get back together. Adam would give her stability."

After getting a drink, and hanging about, and not doing any pastoral visiting (!), I thought I'd try to return to San. I went back to the suite, and found a naked Christine on her back on the bathroom floor with a naked San bending his bottom above her face. "Out!" she shouted at me. "Go somewhere else. Listen! Do not come back in anything less than one hour."

Outside the door I heard her tell San that he could have me at the car showroom and not now. What was there to do? Taking the stairs down, I met a chap coming up them. "Hello," he said. "I am Donald Sixsmith, Innovation executive at SMS from Harwich. I know you. Christine said Cynthia Grayking but you are the estranged wife of Keith."

"Yes, I am. Hello."

"Sad about the marriage, but we all knew it down at Harwich. Up here he's still got Yojana Asthana. I don't know how he does it."

"Lying and cheating is sufficient."

"I mean Cheryl has achieved what she wanted; surely he can't keep seeing Yojana like he will again tonight."

"He makes his own bed."

"It's where I'm going: a full-on sacred orgy. Presumably you are not."

"No. A car showroom."

"The car showroom? You are joking."

"Why would I joke? I'm going with San..."

"Best of luck with that."

Off I went, choosing this time to go downstairs and into a lounge off the main reception, where I found some newspapers for the day. If I met a resident, then sod it. As my mind drifted, I realised that Donald Sixsmith asked me questions he could well pass on above the casino.

"Hello Mrs. Morgan," I said, fifty minutes on.

"Sally, please. Alfred said you had met him, and you are dressed like he said too."

"I thought I'd come back again. I should see you on Sunday. Are you all right for transport?"

"Oh yes. But the circulating minibus is a good idea."

"I thought that. Well, we have to raise money to keep that service going. I'm sorry to be rude but I have an appointment with a member of staff."

"Lovely to see you. I'll tell Alfred and the others."

When I went back to the suite, I got hit with a whiff of air freshener by the door and there was a hotel maid opening windows. Then I got a smell of curry or something. I'd no idea why they'd share a takeaway. That smell got stronger into the adjacent bedroom (with its own door to the corridor outside). The windows were already wide open. I opened the bathroom door and there was water swilling everywhere; Christine was naked and wet including her hair slicked back. She looked at me with eyes wide open. She had a stare at me that was almost vacant. San emerged behind her from the bathroom, with a towel, and she said at him, "You say nothing - nothing."

I stood in the water and still got the smell, so I just ran a flannel over my face and rinse my hands. I got the hair dryer for them and became their servant. The maid said she was going, and shook her head.

The three of us arrived at the next talk already begun. The woman said decisions were having to be made about research expenditure and intellectual property rights quickly on very small items. After her there was this Canadian in mirror spectacles, beard and long hair called Graham Bell. He was from an associate company of FEEL, by pre-arrangement. He had a beautiful West Indian assistant - presumably an escort, 'Wonder', sorting some papers. He told us to imagine a piece of paper on which you wrote a letter that was transmitting its content direct to a computer that translated the handwriting. We didn't have to: the West Indian shook a piece of thick paper and she wrote on it. He told us that everything was captured. The paper was a disposable sensitive scanner: its content went straight on screen as the handwriting, and in a flash became editable text. He screwed the source up. Another sheet showed another feature too, where a guest came forward and wrote in shorthand something of her choice, and the connected computer gave it in longhand instantly as editable text: I'm looking forward to Bill but not my tax bill.

However, the Canadian finished by saying, "Don't believe everything you see. These were magic tricks and no more."

Christine said, "Clever chap, that Canadian."

He received a round of applause. We all had a break. I was wondering if I should declare my payments for self-employed tax.

Then I said, "Christine. I may have said too much to a chap called Donald Sixsmith."

"He is one of my undecided executives," said San.

Christine waved over to the Canadian. "Peter. Come over here. Chap called Donald Sixsmith?"

"You bastard!" I said to Peter Marshall.

"Hi Linda. Just watching things, looking at the traffic going to and from above the casino, including him. Adam knows you are here; he is keeping it quiet."

"Well, I am going to this car showroom tonight. I'm going with San here."

"Okay," said Peter.

Then there was a session by Lesley Francis of Fast East Electronics Ltd., explaining the quantum computer. It was a yes yes, no no, yes no, no yes, switching and only resolved by the user into a final yes or no each time. It was a so much faster computer. The more biological or light-based it could be, the better.

Actually, I was starting to lose sense of time and space myself. Next came the evening meal, and a vegetable curry chosen for me by San.

When finished he said, "Follow me."

Narrator: Linda The Car Showroom and After (Saturday and Sunday 4th August)

At the suite I put on the blue dress and blue shoes. Then he produced a matching blue headscarf from his bag. "You will also wear a headscarf so you will not be easily recognised."

Well, I thought, in for a pound, in for two thousand. He agreed to me wearing the black wig, spectacles and cap, so the blue headscarf stayed around my neck. A taxi took us to this showroom. San and I walked in.

He said about the best vehicle present in his opinion being the Škoda Kodiak SUV (from 'Sports Utility Vehicle' for rougher terrain) seven seater.

"I like that," I said.

The Audi Q7 was twice as expensive. The British one there was the Land Rover Discovery Sport, which wasn't so expensive.

San said, "We are also displaying the hybrid Mercedes GLE. We move cars to and from a real showroom in Skeathorpe."

Then he said that my scarf would become a blindfold. From now on, I would have to follow instructions. I was genuinely worried. But it went around my eyes, and I felt two hands grasp my bare arms, one for each. I was being led along by a man and a woman into a lift, and out, and into somewhere else. The door was shut.

A remote female voice through a speaker said, "Take the scarf off. Take the cap off. You are inside a small black painted glory booth. You can have on a third or all of the LED lights on above. There are two cameras above and at shoulder height with their lights. You see you have two bottles of water, a bucket for peeing, and two cushions for your knees. The mirror, with a hook alongside, is on the door wall, and there are two open slots on each of the other three walls. You can see that the dimensions are such that you can put your bottom to one hole while putting your mouth to another. A third man can grope you, but they all can through the second slot on each wall. A further camera may look through a slot.

"In five minutes you will start to service the people who come in for the next three hours, but you can have a short break in one and a half. Swallow with smiles: these men have paid plenty and they are not going to the bishop's party."

This was hard work. I needed the water because the penises made my mouth dry, plus the fact they came in my mouth as well as in or on my rear orifices. There was no ability to lie on my back. Sometimes I gave them the range of my bottom, occasionally I raised my leg up like a nimble dancer to press my orifices to a slot. They looked in when I needed to relieve myself.

I think one of the punters was San himself. I wondered if one of them was - no, surely not - Keith? He'd be at the other party, held at this time. It's just that I recognised his fucking style.

After one and a half hours I sat on the messy floor and paused. A hand came in with a further bottle of water and a gooey caramel filled chocolate bar. It didn't mix well with the sperm that I hadn't quite swallowed.

With penises poked through again, I resumed. I kept up my smiling. My body was messed up with what didn't deposit in my mouth. Fingers went in my orifices.

How many men did I service? Forty? Most made sure they got a longish time with me, but I could hear some muttering to someone saying 'time's up' occasionally. Thus, some withdrew before coming to any conclusion. At one point I was dizzy while a man had his fingers in my shallow vagina and another one stretched to pinch and pull at each breast nipple.

This went on and on and on. My back was aching, my mouth was drying, the cushions were no longer protecting my knees, and my arms and wrists could hardly agitate another man, and I felt like I'd had a meal of sperm. I couldn't see because the flat lenses were spattered but the cameras meant the spectacles and black wig stayed on.

By the time the last man finished, coming in my mouth yet again, five minutes beyond the given time, I was exhausted. My mouth ached, both my orifices had been stretched, and were dripping, and my arms were like tree trunks with pains in both wrists through wanking so many unknown men. I'd been kneeling or standing all that time as well - the only seat was the bucket partially filled with my piss.

A woman came in the booth and took me out to a space that had coloured spot lights above, and two men each held a camera. I was effectively dumped on to a plastic covered raised block with some foam cushioning under the covering, my cap placed to the side. As I lay on my back exhausted, a man in a mask started fucking me, and two also wearing face-coverings came on to my specs gooey face, and then a woman with breasts either side of my face stretched over from behind the platform to cup my face in her plastic gloves-wearing hands. Many unidentifiable wankers unloaded on me, and what was spilt the woman dragged up to my open mouth.

I heard a man tell another that this part was a 'special treat' after the glory holes. So they'd stayed back and each man was therefore having another ejaculation, and one or two achieved their first. Some came inside my mouth, some over my pubic area. I detected the odd condom, but many didn't bother.

All this went on and on, and I kind of transcended myself into thinking about lying down in the woods at Bever Wood Naturist Centre. I had no option but to keep swallowing, but for effect the woman in gloves spilt part of a bottle of water over my mouth - as if this would help. It was probably more for appearances. My eyes were stinging despite the spectacles.

Finally the fucking ended and the last man dumped his load. The woman assisted me up and held me from one side, and another masked man with a Canadian accent assisted me from the other. I was rested upon on a seat, and I threw off the messy spectacles on to the floor. The man disappeared but the woman stood beside me.

She joined me in a shower that had a seat in it, and I needed that seat as she cleaned me with repeated shampoo, gel and sprayed water. The wig received treatment in there. The recovered spectacles were at last made clear.

She also went on to dry me and I wore my clothing again. San came to collect me. I still had difficulty focussing despite the washed flat spectacles. The wig was wet through and heavy on my head.

We went through the cars display indoors and straight outside into a waiting taxi. Some men loitered outside. My legs ached and my eyes stung. The wig was off once the vehicle moved off. He said, "I have been catching up on my business work!"

Back at the hotel with wig on again I made it to the lift and our suite assisted by San. Pains in my legs had travelled to my somewhat filled stomach, the result of which was I threw up into the suite's toilet. White in my face, I was so exhausted that I crawled out of the dress and into the bed. Lying on my front, San nevertheless entered me from behind - but then almost immediately gave up. I think I fell asleep as soon as he moved off me.

When I woke and needed to go to the toilet again, Christine was asleep in between us. Getting out, I staggered to the toilet, and I did not care that he got out, followed me, and started to stare. As I tried to empty my bowels (nothing there), Christine grabbed him by his arm and yanked him away. I couldn't be bothered even to try to brush my hair afterwards, despite the desire. Christine back in the middle of the bed effectively prevented San from engaging with me.

So day three's morning arrived, and with Christine gone I spread out in the bed while he had me yet again. When he came up to my face, I just opened my mouth and let him do whatever he wanted. After forcing myself up and into the shower, with solidifying aches and pains, he joined me. I dressed silently and the communal breakfast lacked conversation.

The plenary session went past without me taking much in. I gathered that the future was bold, optimistic, cutting edge.

Then came the final Body Eucharist, on Sunday, with some women going forward with their dresses removed - the 'trend' I had begun. When I got to Christine with my dress held in my hand, I dropped to my knees, and stared upwards to her, as if to say, 'How did I get to be like this?'

She turned to face the altar table, squatted and circled her divided buttocks over my head. I stuck my tongue up, a gesture more than anything. When I went back, dropping the dress back over me, there was applause. (I had also groped Bishops Bill and Pauline.)

At the end, back in the suite, with Christine elsewhere, San had a final feel of me, including me bending over in front of him. He kept groping me as I packed. Then he kissed me before I got away, with my suitcase, wearing the red dress and matching badge, with the cap and specs on, adding the still wet wig, to collect my mobile phone.

Christine caught me and said, "Listen, you did really well. Badge!"

I took the red badge off my red dress, closed the pin and slapped it into her hand.

"I'll see you soon," she said. "That was good, on your knees, in the worship."

"I am knackered again," I said slowly.

At the main reception, a woman said, "Cynthia, a white car outside is for you."

Leon drove me home. I left my disguises with him. Indoors, I ignored Keith, going directly upstairs. I shut the bathroom door, pulled my dress off and kicked away these new shoes. I found some ibuprofen in the cupboard, swallowing three of the rounded tablets, and sat on the bog for a long time. Into my bedroom I finally flopped on to the bed on my front.

At first, in growing stiffness, it felt like I could not sleep. However, when I looked to my left, there was a cold mug of honey coffee with melted down spray cream on top; I started to drink it and, before it was finished, started shaking. I put the mug down, slid under the duvet and fell asleep properly.

Chapter 16 Magic and Liberalism

After the Hotel (Sunday to Monday 5th August)

Adam spoke to Diana in my bedroom while my eyes were shut. "Don't mention to anyone yet the sex cult. I want to reveal it with maximum impact, maximum revelation. For example, if her vicar knew about it now, he wouldn't understand it and they would cover up."

Diana agreed. "But I want to know everything that happened and so far she wants to say nothing."

I said, "I can hear you. I wasn't at that sex cult. I was in the Titansea Grand."

"Why?"

"The less you know before Colin Cromer's here, the better. After he's been, you can visit alone and I'll tell you."

Sunday evening my training vicar called in after Evensong, the duvet covering my boobs. Adam sat in the room. Keith came in and out with drinks, but I told him I didn't want any food.

Colin asked, "What happened? Where have you been?"

Adam then said, "I told him you'd been to Bristol and Ebbsfleet."

"I went to Bristol and then saw a friend at Ebbsfleet. I'm sorry Colin but I am not very well. My body is aching."

"Have you got some virus? You look drained. Are you seeing a doctor?"

Adam said, "I'll get one to come tomorrow."

"Now, I have to say, I spoke with Alfred Burger and Sally Morgan today and they each met you doing some pastoral visiting in the Titansea Grand. This surprised me. She even expected to see you today. You wore a light blue dress that gave Mr. Burger the kinds of thoughts he might have dropped at his age. I don't know why you think this is funny. You spoke about raising money for the minibus with Mrs. Morgan, on Saturday. You were then wearing a white dress displaying your long bare legs. I was talking to Adam here on Friday, with Diana de Groot..."

"Adam has told me," I said.

"...and clearly no one here knew you were in town. Mr. Burger and Mrs. Morgan said you were well."

"I was optimistic."

"About what? Did you do other visiting? Why wasn't I told? There was a conference going on at the two top floors; I don't suppose you had anything to do with that because it was about electronics."

"I met people visiting Serninsea. In the hotel."

"Dressed like a tart?"

Adam said, "Reverend Cromer, please, she's obviously not well."

I said, "The minimal clothing is a kind of half way house among naturists gathering. It's like attending a public wedding where they wear as little as possible. I was tired when back from Ebbsfleet."

"Was there a wedding?"

"There will be one."

"Is this to be in the parish?"

"Do you want people wearing next to nothing in the parish church?"

"No, frankly."

"Colin, I never intended to visit Alfred Burger or Sally Morgan. I'm not going to say, 'Hello Alfred, now get lost,' or similar to Sally am I?"

"Sounds like you were staying there."

"I did, among people I wanted to see, but two parishioners recognised me."

There was a knock on the door but Diana then came straight in and said, "Hello again Reverend Cromer. Linda, cover yourself please."

Colin said, "Diana, Linda here was in the hotel at least on Friday and Saturday - in Titanseas. There were naturists there, apparently. You're one of these naturists, Diana. You didn't know about this?"

Diana said, "No, I didn't. I'm going to stay with her, reverend. She's white and looks wiped out."

"Yes," he said. "Linda: you'd better continue to have time off. A sick note can be backdated, if we must. The bishop has said you were absent without leave and he is not happy. Diana, it seems like you'd better ask her what happened and I'll find out at the end of the queue."

Once Colin had gone, Adam said, "You really are a skilled liar."

"I didn't lie."

Diana said, "The Titanseas Grand? Why didn't you contact anyone?"

"Because..."

Adam took over: "Because at an electronics conference, they perversely didn't allow communication outside. New products and ideas. Linda was in the thick of it, as organised by Christine Vine."

"I get it, I think."

"Peter was there, checking Linda was all right."

"Well, if you don't mind, Adam, I will sleep alongside Linda tonight. Aardse knows where I am. Linda can take her time to tell me everything that happened."

Adam said, "If you want. I'll go back to mine. I get the sense Linda is a bit pissed off with me."

"I'm not," I said. "I just ache and I feel awful."

So Diana slept alongside me, and waited on me for all my needs. Her one memorable statement was, "It's about time Keith fucked off."

I thought I was hanging from an X frame on a wall being tested out by Stephen McPhail with San Bandopadhyay applying a bullwhip and every time it cracked my skin I tasted sperm. Stephen McPhail approached to repeatedly push his finger into my right shoulder.

Diana was already up and pressing my shoulder. She said, "Monday morning, madam, and there is a person Keith let in the house who wants you to sign documents. Can I tell him to come up?"

"What about?"

"Delivery of a car."

"What?"

He came up. When signing, Diana pulled my duvet up. The documents were for insurance, tax and registration.

When he went, I got up to look out of the window, along with Diana. "A Škoda Kodiaq," she said. I saw Keith and Adam outside of the front door looking at it. Diana said, "You'll be able to drive your congregation around in that."

Despite still feeling somewhat soiled, I sat on the bed and physically attacked my hair with the brush. Diana said, "Leave it alone, Linda. You ought to eat something now."

Then I started crying, so Diana decided I indeed needed a doctor. I said, "I don't want a doctor. What am I going to tell him?"

"Linda! That car: what did you do to get that car?"

"A bit."

"A bit? I bet it was a bit. Your vicar says you were dressed like a tart, and Christine Vine was organising it. Was it an alternative to the sex cult? Were you providing services? Are you hurting? Is it physical or mental?"

"Mental is physical. But yes."

"Can I see? Show me your body; let me look properly. I've noticed some redness around your crotch."

She had a look around my vagina and anus. "Your doctor needs to advise on this."

Then Christine arrived. Diana said at her, "Get the fuck out of this house. She might not get it, about you, but I do. She needs a doctor. She could be torn," said Diana to Christine.

"Werburgh Ltd. will pay for a private gynaecologist," said Christine outside the room door. "He's up here to do such work."

Diana said, "No! Her GP can come as a matter of urgency."

"Listen. It was very demanding," said Christine. "He's a specialist medic."

"Fuck off Christine," I said. "How could you put me through that?"

"But you were successful. I'm going." Actually, she paused.

"Just go," said Diana. So Christine went.

Diana followed her out, saying things at her.

When Diana came back into the room she said, "Now she has gone, tell me precisely what happened?"

"Leave it."

"I've waited long enough. You jump into things and get damaged. What happened?"

"All right. Sanjay Bunker, you know him. I was his escort within the electronics conference so that he stopped supporting Bishop Barman's party gatherings. They were meeting above the casino. There might have been Eyre and Huett over there. I don't know. I ended up going to this car showroom."

"What car showroom? Start at the beginning."

"Yeah? First off he fucked me in clerical garb. Oh he bathed with me, showered with me, fucked me often, watched me piss and start to shit, painted me all over in blue colours..."

"Painted you all over in blue?"

"Yes. Tins of paint. Big jars. A roller and brushes. I slept each night with him but Christine got in our bed. She did something disgusting with him in the hotel suite and sent me away. And then on the final night at the car showroom I was confined in a box with slits to the outside, with cushions for my knees and only a bucket to sit on and piss in. Perhaps I serviced forty men sticking their penises in. Then most of them had a second go nearby with coloured spot lights above."

"And you did this for Christine Vine?"

"Christine made me the attraction for him to come over to her camp from Barman's. He wanted to fuck the parish priest."

"So you are quite a volunteer. Are you obsessed with her?"

"It was an alternative to that sex cult. I think I've been paid six thousand pounds, a wage, two dresses, two pairs of shoes and now, it seems, a car I was shown in the fake car showroom. And, as for Christine, she is one religious weirdo."

"Fucking hell," Diana said. "No wonder you are traumatised. Sanjay Bunker. I suppose he thinks everything, everyone, is up for sale."

I said, "I didn't know Sanjay Bunker wasn't his original name. It's a Brahmin linked name, San Bandopadhyay, if I can say it now, and connected to progressive Hindus and yet another encounter with the Unitarian lot Peter is into, but again seemingly completely different."

"Well, that's your field. That and prostitution."

"Christine knew Peter Marshall was there."

"Yes - Adam knew where you were and didn't tell me everything. Go to the police!"

"I consented. I'm sorry but I want to rest and sleep on."

Diana rang in sick herself, and then rang Aardse to say I was continuing to be unwell.

Later she woke me to ask if I would see Peter. Yes, I would see Peter, and so sat up.

"Cover your tits!" Diana instructed. "I'm going to make some light food for you."

She went. Peter came in with Kathryn, Kathleen and this woman Winnie Lott, who'd been his assistant 'Wonder'. He said, "I looked out for you. I arrived on Thursday. The idea was to keep you safe, like you are now. I didn't like what I saw at the car showroom."

"You went there?"

"Yeah."

"Did you know I was in that box?"

"Yeah."

"Were you at that box?"

Kathryn said, "It's all right. He had to blend in."

"Did I suck you or did you fuck me?"

"Does it matter? And I stayed later - 'blended in', as Kathryn says. What they did afterwards was cruel: it was Bunker who wanted the extra session to happen."

"What accent did you use then? Not Canadian?"

"They thought I was Canadian both times."

"San Bandyopadhyay went to do some work."

"You put your bottom to him. Your arse. I saw him. He did actually do some other work, in an office at the fake showroom. If he was at the following session, then he had a mask on."

"And you?"

"I was the one with the anarchist design mask on."

"Not that it matters but did you find any Barman spies?"

"Donald Sixsmith, who was one of his men, was spying for the other side. I think you knew that."

Diana came in with a salad, one without an Indian touch. "I heard that; I'm appalled. Can't we prosecute?"

"I consented," I said again. "I want to move on, if I can."

Peter said, "Well, a long time back you indicated that you wanted you to do a little magic show some time so you could preach against magic."

"Oh yeah."

"Have you been staying supple?" he asked.

"Obviously not well enough."

Diana said, "She's been doing pelvic exercises to correct her arse, and now it's been undone."

"Not entirely," I suggested. "I can look forward."

Peter said, "Exercising might be the way to get you back to good health."

"Nice to meet you, Peter's escort," I said to Winnie a little late.

Kathleen said, "Fortunately, she isn't interested in men."

Winnie smiled.

Peter and the women went, while Diana stayed.

Colin Cromer came in, which I appreciated. He sat with me, and didn't say much. But he did say, "I've defended you against the bishop. I told him you are definitely ill. Do you not keep warm enough, is that it? I'm trying to understand you."

"I keep warm."

While he talked about what he preached the day before, Christine appeared.

"Listen, I've brought my gynaecologist."

"Gynaecologist?" asked Colin Cromer. "Why do you need a gynae... All right, it's personal. We meet again, Christine Vine."

"This gynaecologist is also a doctor," said Christine. "Come in, Dr. Bruce. He is seeing a number of people."

"Ah. You." I said, to Colin Cromer's puzzled look.

"Yes, I can go beyond the usual issues and can prescribe," said this doctor up from London.

Colin then said, "Bishop John asked me to report to him if or when I saw you again, Reverend Vine. And you are right here."

"Tell Bishop Barman what you like."

"Yes," said Colin, "But I think we should clear the room for the doctor."

I said, "You can stay if you want. You know about my sister and you know about me."

"Oh," said Colin. "Well, no, I am a man. And I am going. I'll let myself out. I won't stop and chat to Keith downstairs."

"He should leave completely," Diana told Colin.

Colin turned to her and said, "You know what, Mrs de Groot? For the first time in my life, I do not really know what is going on in this town. I used to think I did, but now, faced with a bizarrely behaving colleague, I really haven't a clue. She's clearly ill, she's been dolled up in a hotel over two days when she wasn't ill, and all I know is an electronics conference was happening, and now we have a private gynaecologist here. Does this madness make sense to you?"

"Yes it does, actually."

"Well, I'm glad someone knows, because clearly I am not meant to know. And I have a suspicion, just a faint suspicion, that even my own bishop is being evasive."

"I'd work on that insight," said Diana.

"I would too," said Christine.

"I think, Reverend Vine, the less you say the better."

I said, "Our own bishop is actually Derek Imperial."

"The one round here, the one who is effective, the one who pulls levers and makes things happen, who keeps in touch is Bishop John Barman. Is he concealing things? You two think he is. But you won't tell me, will you?"

"No," said Diana.

"Goodbye then."

"Oh fuck!" I said.

He came back in. "Did you tell me to 'something off?'"

Diana said, "She said, 'Oh fuck,' at the situation."

"The tongue, not of a priest but a harlot," said Colin, who went off more quickly still and down the stairs.

As I opened my legs to Robert Bruce, I said, "Well he's accurate there, at least."

"So we were right that you are an escort," he said, pulling at my vulva opening and shining a torch.

"Yes," I replied.

The upshot of the doctor's investigation was not to use any dilators for a week and he prescribed and gave a cream to be administered to my rear for a small tear. So I asked Christine about her wear and tear, to which she said something like resistance grows with use.

The General Practitioner, Doctor Gujjar, made a flying visit; the upshot was that I was exhausted and should stay in bed. He signed a fitness note, as they are called in contemporary Orwell-speak.

Diana alone was with me in bed when she asked, "Who the hell rings at eleven at night?"

I hoped it was not some needy parishioner. It was Jenny World.

"Thought I would call you, you know. I received information, probably third hand, that you're not very well. But, em, there might be an appointment for me down your end, a ministry in this area. I could do here what we've done in Hartlepool: our parish church becoming fully electronic and online, a fully communicative church."

Somehow the call seemed set-up, like I'd just been to an electronics conference. Nevertheless, I said, "If you are in the area, call around."

"I heard you are with Adam; you are separated from Keith."

"Yes."

"Are you in bed?"

"Yes."

"And is one of them beside you?" It seemed a strange question.

"No."

"Can I talk to Adam?"

"Adam is at his own accommodation tonight."

"Is Keith there then?"

"In his own room."

"Oh. I see. I'm a perpetual curate in Hartlepool."

I gave Jenny Adam's phone numbers, but before she rang off I said, "I met your uncle."

"Has he joined up with Christine Vine?" (This proved what was on her mind.)

"Not fully. He helped her. I did meet Geoff Virgo as well."

"There?" she asked.

"Where do you mean?" I asked back.
 "Oh."
 "Come on Jenny. I know you know. The Titantsea Grand Hotel. But no, I met Geoff in Bristol."
 "Why?"
 "Because I discovered he lived there."
 Diana said, "End this call. I can hear her. She is after information."
 "Who's that. Is she in bed with you?"
 "Yes she is."
 "Who is it?"
 "Just a friend."
 "Are you in a lesbian relationship?"
 Diana said, "Stop the call!"
 "Who is she?" asked Jenny.
 "I am going to go now, Jenny. Nice hearing from you."
 "Who's in bed with you?"
 "A friend, just helping."
 "Linda!" barked Diana.
 "Can I call in?"
 "Of course. Bye Jenny." When she had gone I said, "Calm down, Diana."
 "She's angling."
 "I know: the vacancy is where Jeremy Symes was. I didn't want to tell her about San Bandopadhyay."
 "Like you being a prostitute," Diana said.
 "About him being there, what I did with him."
 She said it more slowly. "Like you being a prostitute." Now she had more to say at a normal pace. "That car outside is four or five times your payment, plus speedy delivery. Are you staying as his client?"
 "I don't ever want to deal with him again," I said.
 "Let's sleep," Diana said. "Come on. We'll see if you can do any pelvic or other exercising tomorrow, and no dilating."
 "I'll arrange to see Jenny; I'd like to see Jenny."

Diana's Private 'House' (Wednesday 7th August)

Diana had nursed me, so to speak, for Monday and Tuesday. People had come in and out, but the effect of Diana with me day and night (in my changed state) was a growing desire for her and certainly less for Christine.

Given the heat, we had no bedding on us. "Good morning Diana. Wednesday today. We'd normally meet in the afternoon."

"I suspect you've actually been awake a while. Why has your hand been on my pubic area?" she asked me.

"Because I'd like to go inside and give you some pleasure."

"You may have become a prostitute, but I have not."

"I'm not charging you anything. Will you let me in?"

"Get your hand off, Linda: I am a happily married woman. Only Aardse goes in via that door."

"You're a naturist; I see all of you."

"That means you can stand outside and look. It does not mean you can come in."

"Then I shall ring your doorbell. Repeatedly"

"Only children play with doorbells. Grow up."

"Not the little button I want to press."

"You've already pressed your hand on my door."

"Perhaps you should not leave your door open." I removed my speculative hand.

"Look: your indoors might be the equivalent of a transport hub, but my door leads to a private house."

"So what about your gorgeous tits and your raised nipples then?"

"You can admire the soft exteriors and pebbledash, of course you can - but keep your dirty hands off. Perhaps it's time you returned to a house with a door knocker on it."

"That will give you the time to sort your damp course out, Diana. It's obviously in need of replastering."

"It's time you got up. You're meeting Jenny World today. How was her damp course the last time you did a survey of her?"

"As a new build - twenty-two plus years back - her damp course was rubbish. I don't recall it having the hint of fruit. On my finger."

"You'd bought so many apples and oranges, someone has had to eat them before they went off."

Both of us ended laughing as we alternated the use of the bathroom. She slapped my evacuated arse while I brushed my teeth.

We had breakfast. Diana smiling at me told me that she would meet Patricia and me later. The fruitbowl was nearly empty.

Jenny Meets Up

I managed to park my new air conditioned Škoda Kodiaq SUV outside Café Albert, on the promenade. First, Diana returned to me via her own home, accompanied by Patricia. Jenny was coming - she must have been (still) staying locally.

The new waitress, taking our three so far cake and coffees order, said, "Did I see you at the Titansea Grand? You look familiar."

"No, I don't think so."

"You're not Cynthia?"

"No, I'm Linda."

Then in came Jenny and a woman with a child. Jenny gave each of us a hug, starting with me, but this woman introduced as Fatima Tamuuz shook our hands.

"My five year old is called Akemi," said Fatima to me, who also shook hands from below.

Those three sat at an adjacent table over the aisle. Jenny was in mufti, but her companion wore a clerical collar.

Another waitress attending then asked, "Were you two at the party?"

Jenny said, "Yeah and I want to move back here. The ordinations again made me think I should. Thing is, I realise I must learn to drive - especially when it's rural."

"Jeremy Symes' parish? They are still to interview," I said.

"But I hear from the Suffragan Bishop of Bolingbroke that Inglemire might get a priest back. If it does, I want to be there. Let's not talk business here."

Diana now interjected, "So, according to those waitresses, you two were above the casino while Linda was in the hotel."

Fatima said, "This is not the place to discuss these sorts of things and not in front of Akemi."

I said, "We could walk outside or something."

The coffees were cold enough to finish rapidly and pay. Leaving the cafe I gave a little hip-level wave to my closer friends, who decided to stay.

Then, outside, hit by the warmth, Fatima with Akemi said, "Linda. You were in the wrong place, at the hotel. You are a parish priest here and it carries a commitment to obey the authorities."

"The diocesan bishop," I said. "Him alone. I'm having no more to do with the Confraternity under Barman, Eyre and Huett. Simple as that."

Fatima asked Jenny, "Are you all right on your own with Linda? I'm going with Akemi off to Caffernere. There's someone there to look after her."

I said, "Yes she is, and you can tell him to leave me alone. I'm out of it."

Fatima and her daughter went off, and this left me with Jenny. My one time feisty friend wanted to go to the Titansea Grand, where she was staying. It was a short drive.

"Jenny."

"What?"

"I knew before that you have a role initiating in this Confraternity, under Bishop Barman and the others. I should tell you Adam is investigating. You've got to get out, Jenny, because the whole lot is going to come crashing down."

"And you are under an obligation to join us. They won't let you get away."

We went to the hotel reception and to a woman I'd seen before. Jenny said, "My bag is still in my room."

"Fine," said the woman, who then said, "Are you Cynthia?"

"Yes."

We walked off to the lift. Jenny said, "So that's what you called yourself, Babooshka."

"What?"

"As in 'A Pseudonym to fool them', me thinks."

"I still do this!" I said. "I find an appropriate song."

"Kate Bush's Babooshka."

"So where did you stay here, Jenny? First floor, eh?" (She pressed that button.)

"While that conference was going on. While you were upstairs. Fatima and I shared a room with Akemi. We've still got it."

A lift and a short walk later she said, "Come into our room." We went in and the door shut, and she lay on the bed, so I lay alongside her.

After a long silence Jenny said, "I hated you for a long time. I think I still do."

"Why?"

"Because then I thought you took me down the wrong road. When I converted, I could not be a lesbian. I'm not. People said at university that I was strange and on the edge. I don't know how I didn't end up under medical care then. I went to Bede Theological College. I was evangelical and charismatic, and the college authorities became the enemy. It was all the doubting stuff that I know you spout. I continued, and I was mentally patched up and they decided to be compassionate. I had one curacy and then ended up with Fatima, who I've been with her ever since. And with Elizabeth Huett, I've been placed into this Confraternity group. Look at this. My badge is H for Hereteu and a stag. Yours will be a B with a goose, when you get it. Christine didn't give you one of her new Ws did she? Did she break her own rules?"

"No, she didn't, because I am Anglican. I had a red one."

"We missed Sanjay Bunker. How was he?"

"Horrible."

"I still want a parish."

"What is wrong with Hartlepool or Tees in general?"

"Nothing. Time to move on. Fatima cramps my style. She won't let me look after her daughter when she's busy. I know who the dad is - Philip Shrimpton, who fucks anything that moves."

"You want a parish around here? Let me think: it's because Christine has gone. It's to service the Confraternity."

"That's why I might get one."

"Why would you, an evangelical, consider a near-defunct Inglemire, who'd take anyone? I mean, it is the sort of parish where an incumbent goes to sleep. If the diocese functioned properly, it would be merged with anywhere to give it some life. Serninsea itself cannot go on like it is: they'll all merge sooner or later. Colin says Serninsea should become a Minster model church, with clergy centred there, but probably after he has retired."

"I don't want to be a curate at the Wilsons' church and vicarage; I don't even like them. Jonathan Eyre can call on several ordained women in Margate and area, but for all his efforts Terry has failed to get any woman to stay in this area to do the main job. Hartlepool still has Fatima and Elizabeth if I leave. This place will have you and me."

"No it won't because it won't get me, Jenny. Adam wants to exclude you when he exposes John Barman through his investigation. If Sanjay Bunker can be out of it, you should be out of it. Adam does not tell me everything, but he is building his dossier. You also lost Janet Hayes. He is probably interviewing her now."

"Then I want to talk to Adam."

"I'm sure he wants to talk to you. He hasn't been at my house for the last few nights, but I've seen him daytimes."

"You were fucking a woman."

"No I wasn't. Diana is a compassionate friend. You met her just now."

"Face is somehow familiar. Was my uncle at Christine's bash?"

"He was indeed. And his partner Pauline."

"She's his friend. Like your Diana, then."

"I think they will be joining Geoff Virgo's Church like Christine did."

"She went all episcopi vagantes. Huh."

"Like your uncle."

"Huh. Anyway, you have to join because Ken Osis is all dopey about you and your friend, and even Maurice Neptune wants more with you. If you want to keep your parish ministry, you'd better knuckle under."

"Jenny, have you been sent to tell me all this? You won't make any difference."

"I said it wouldn't to Terry. Show me the Inglemire parish."

"Don't you know it?"

"It's a long time since I've seen it and I wasn't signed up to the Church then."

So we left the hotel and went to my new car. Inglemire had just three churches: Inglemire itself, Caffemere and Ingle Barrow.

In the SUV Jenny asked me, "Is Adam still married?"

"He is."

"And you live with Adam?"

"He stays over. We have a loose, friendly, sexual relationship."

"Keith will be gone soon."

"He should have gone sooner. Perhaps he's too attracted to Yojana."

"He'll come up to see her, when he's gone. He's a good fuck, your Keith."

"You get around everyone in these groups."

"Too true. I love it. Sarah Deimos, the suffragan in Hartlepool: I'd want her but she has never been interested. I just love sex. I kind of fancy Sarah Deimos, but Liz is gorgeous."

"And a woman."

"Look. You're married to Keith, shag Adam, shagged Jonathan Eyre, Ken Osis probably, clothes off with Jeremy Symes..."

"Not in a group: one by one."

"Stephen McPhail, Helen McPhail, Maurice Neptune, Martin Holborn."

"Not exactly relationships by choice."

"By the way, has Ann Dromeghda approved of your relationship with Adam?"

"Yes. And this is Inglemire village proper, as you do know."

The church was locked. We went to Caffemere, and that church was locked. So we went to Ingle Barrow, parking the car and going up the mound into the coastal church - hoping the sea might add a little bit of cool.

Inside it, Jenny said the church gave her the spooks. "One thing when you are going strange is the visions that become real. These imaginings are never pleasant."

I said, "Let's go to the car and let's go to Adam's back in town. Surely you can't operate as a parish priest in this place on your own."

"I don't think I could be here. Not at all," Jenny said. "But you could and we could."

I reflected that had I been on my own I'd have swum in a dyke, given the heat.

Narrator: Adam Janet Hayes Adds Information (Wednesday 7th August)

I opened another window and sat down with Janet Hayes in my downstairs office. "Thank you for coming to talk to me. You know that I am investigating John Barman, for a report that I wish to co-ordinate with a report coming out about the National Church's Wytham Diocese: it's a by-word for chaos and inefficiency."

"I don't know anything about that," she said.

"The first time I became aware of you was when you sent a note via my brown recycling bin: that we first thought could have come from Christine Vine. We worked out it was from you, but didn't approach you."

"I was bound by the confidentiality of the group I had joined."

"We were thrown by the use of Linda's ordination service."

"I wondered if it would help keep my anonymity. Barman had some left over and they had a blank page for notes. So he was using them. Waste not want not. He won't have noticed one going missing."

"You've now joined Christine's group. How did that go?"

"I don't know if it means anything because I'll be up in Hartlepool soon. If she takes over Barman's group and other groups, I might have a role up there. But I'm not ordained and can't do anything to start anything up. It was just a statement of intent: out of Barman's outfit and into hers."

"I can assure you that you won't feature in my report. Your evidence will be from a well-connected anonymous source; however, I can't guarantee that a journalist won't find you."

"Eyre and Huett should be exposed as well. Christine has captured Sir Sanjay Bunker."

"Tell me about your life."

"I was born near Southend-on-Sea, at Great Wakering. I'm thirty-five. So after a few jobs I got selling items of model railways at Margate five years back, mainly via the Internet. Another thing about me is I'd been brought up in the National Church, had a lot of boyfriends including in the fellowship group, done some modelling, and had a modelling friend in Southend who became a prostitute. I got paid once for her client going with me, while she was paid to fuck at these nearby stables and I don't mean the farm workers. Some others I met got me involved with some local digs and they were interesting."

"Archaeology?"

"Yes. My family did have an allotment in a historic space. Also, when I moved over the river and east, to Margate, I looked for social groups, including back to the Church. I had been a classic case of confirmation as a leaver's certificate - I was spotted by Bishop Jonathan Eyre. He was always interested in new people into the churches. When he found out about my dodgy past and discovered that I was still single, he fucked me. He didn't mess around, and I was besotted with him. I went to his accommodation over and over again. I took emergency contraception afterwards first time and then got myself properly protected. He won't use condoms, femidoms, anything like that. I'm not shocking you, am I?"

"No. I've heard a lot similar."

"You're a hardened private detective."

"Investigator."

"The bishop recommended that I get a job in Systematic Measuring Services, and so I went further north, to Harwich. Here was an extension of Jonathan's group, which I didn't join until I moved, and it was under this thing called a Confraternity. I assume you know all about this institution. Here he wanted me to fuck around lots of different people. And suddenly I did this marketing course online, and they just made me Marketing Director, from absolutely nothing. Bring it on! Sir Sanjay likes his temporary favourites. He ignored me at the Titansea Grand - I felt a bit put out."

"Divert to him for a minute. What do you know?"

"He wants to dominate a woman, test her to the limit and then some. He'll have some obsession about her. He put the end of a long model railway track into my vagina. Work the rest out yourself. I hardly dare mention other things. The Confraternity attracts extremists, and it makes extremists."

"So you were in SMS."

"The plan was to move me up to Serninsea, temporarily, and then Hartlepool, where I am about to go now. They are all National Church Confraternity locations. We say this, but of course the National Church is ignorant of it. These soon to be five bishops have taken it upon themselves to demand authority. The crazy thing is the model is not theirs: it's Christine's. As you know, she is the brains. Jonathan fucks, Barman is a schemer and fucks, and Elizabeth Huett is the one Anglican nymphomaniac diocesan bishop; she was promoted as capable but adds this to her list. She has heard from Connie Wilson that Linda can swallow the male organ, and both want lessons in technique."

"Huett had her affair with Barman."

"Yes. That started it with her before she was a bishop. There is no reason why they can't marry. Outside constraints they'd probably be a polyamorous couple."

"He's more casual than that," I suggested.

"She has favourites. Jenny World, Fatima Tamuuz, for sure, and has protected Fatima having a daughter unmarried, and there are a number of gay women she visits. She once sought out Sarah Deimos but covered her tracks. Jonathan is married, by the way, though he never mentions his wife in any detail. Sarah Deimos is a lesbian, but you'd never see her in this Vanguard. By the way, since Liz overstepped the line, Sarah realised something is wrong. She knows that her bishop travels here from Middlesbrough a lot, and Sarah is picking up some signals from within Hartlepool. Fatima Tamuuz is a one-time lesbian Muslim and broke away from her family in every way. She too is a woman of extremes, and as a convert she was someone for the National Church to brag about. Sarah of course knows that Fatima looks after Jenny, but Sarah does not know Akemi's father's identity and Fatima refused to disclose the man. Fatima is a controlling lesbian above all others I've ever known. Jenny can't breathe. One reason why Jenny fucks all and sundry like a bitch on heat is to try to create some space from Fatima's control. Fatima has these helpers for Akemi who may not know what Fatima gets up to and so Sarah can be less worried about Akemi. It is one reason why Jenny will be able to come back to her home town, because Fatima knows she is coming under Sarah's increased scrutiny. Fatima would get rid of Jenny to save her own skin."

"So you got out."

"Well, before my move I didn't pay much attention to it: the Serninsea Cross brooch. But coming up here the Wickenby twins and a few others said it must be a fake. It was not found in the right setting. Although it is not a Confraternity matter, it does involve some of its people and reflects Barman's character. The Wilsons do all his dirty work for his favours. Stephen and Helen McPhail made it. They went for maximum authenticity. But you can't beat the scientists."

"What about George Wickenby working for Barman?"

"And more. Barman wanted to recruit the Wickenby twins as models into this Confraternity, but they aren't managers that have had to deal with confidentiality, and, of course, now wouldn't join."

"And George himself?"

"He's outside of it. His nieces know he is a bit of a perv, and their modelling was encouraged by Uncle George. Uncle George did some photographing. He's no Eric Gill. Linda was in that studio years earlier."

"I know."

"You go back with Linda, don't you Adam."

"Are you interviewing me, now?"

"Linda does share some of our views. She was loyal to Keith, but he's pleased that since he 'released' her she's been rather active."

"I have a loose, supporting relationship with Linda. I like that with my women: Ann, Labhaoise, Mary-Ann, Yootha-Ann, Linda. I've a soft spot for Jenny. I don't like the reports I hear about her."

"Jenny does a really good licking around my anus, and I mention that because Martin Holborn found Linda easy to penetrate deep into her anus. Am I shocking you?"

"Nope."

"Barman is hung like a horse. Horses have never interested me, but there are rumours around here of a woman and a dog, if only I could find her to find out. Keith has asked about it; has it come from Linda at all?"

"I haven't got a clue."

"The group frowns on it; something about animals cannot sin but I think some animals are social and even devious. Then I thought the Worshipful Company wasn't into sin. Think instead of leaders, loyalty, ranking, the herd. Doesn't quite add up, does it?"

"The needle has now gone right off the scale."

"You're too timid, Adam. You know that they intend to get Linda back, and their plans for her do not include you?"

"Tell me about their plans for Linda."

"Will you tell her?"

"I tend to see how things play out first. She is very capable at looking after herself. I step in if necessary."

"Historically, I'm told, Inglemire with Ingle Barrow and Caffemere were two separate parishes, but they're not now. The plans are to merge with Serninsea, but Barman has other ideas. He can install Jenny there. There is another option: Jeremy Symes' ex-parish is up for grabs, but that's further north and north west of the Wilsons' - beyond the Marshes. The idea is Jenny looks for a parish, but Linda will be the priest-in-charge, and Jenny her curate. They'll end up in the same vicarage, and Linda will do what Fatima has been doing for quite a while now. Both women will initiate and guide, and without even common tenure Barman will have them where he wants them."

"As I understand it, common tenure isn't as good as the old freehold."

"It's better than being a priest-in-charge. This is why I am talking to you, Mr. Magellan, so that this sort of development is stopped. This movement is supposed to be for people who love God, and who see that sex is part of the vision of divine love. We arrive at divine love by open, consensual, sexual expression."

"Can you explain divine love? I mean, sex to me is self-satisfying."

"When he orgasmed into me, Jonathan Eyre would say, 'For the love of God,' and make direct believing statements. He encouraged me to think divine thoughts when I hit the heights. 'This is what heaven is like,' he said, with him ejaculating into me. I really believed it. And I still do. And at the hotel: I didn't get naked and lick Christine in front of a crowd of businesspeople without believing what I was doing was special."

"What about Christine?"

"I'm not gay, Adam, but I wanted her juice in me. That is communion, Mr. Magellan, and the commitment to join. I'd been with her before - quite a privilege given her prices - and her tongue and fingers were in my vagina and anus working me. She's very strategic: she says she is too expensive but knows just when to offer herself for free. And now she's a bishop chosen by the wider Church. Some time after the initiation she came to my room and took me apart - I orgasmed like never before. You should try it. When you come, praise God. Would you like to fuck? I'd like that, Adam."

"Well what about Maurice Neptune and - oh, I don't know - Ken Osis?"

"Maurice will have his own agenda, so he could break away. Ken Osis is trapped, but they are short of ordained women in this locality. So Linda and Jenny together matter."

"Just some other details. You and Linda shared the same mentor."

"Stephen McPhail. He builds BDSM equipment."

"I suppose some people buy them."

"He makes money building and selling them; he makes money organising plumbers; he makes money plumbing; and she makes money with jewellery and craft. I've been suspended on his contraptions. He's clever."

"Thank you, Janet, and best wishes for your move."

"Get undressed, Adam Magellan."

"Not really."

"I've some spare time, Adam. I'd only like to experience what Linda experiences."

"Thank you, Janet. Enjoy your move."

Jenny Visits Adam

As Janet Hayes left by the front door, Linda and Jenny were arriving. Jenny said to her, "Oh, you. You decided to run before you were pushed."

"Goodbye Jenny," said Janet. "Hello Linda."

The two came in. Jenny wanted to meet Peter, so she and Linda went into the reception room. "I've heard about you. Peter Marshall, eh?"

"Hey?"

Peter said, "Linda: introduce me to this lady."

"The Reverend Jenny World," Linda said. "An old friend of mine. Well, she's forty, like me. By the way, I'm all ready for our magic show, and it could be a good way to get me back into the swing of parish life."

All four of us went to the downstairs kitchen, which Linda had not been in before, that had a small breakfast bar at the wall and two stools. But first, Linda left us for the toilet.

I said, "She does do this."

When Linda appeared again, Peter immediately asked her, "How much did the SUV cost - immediate delivery?"

"I don't know."

"Normally, £29,000 new, plus rushed delivery, though I suspect it was from the showroom. It is two years old. £24,000."

"He spent £30,000 for those nights with me, plus other purchases? I am staggered."

"What did he do to you?" asked Jenny, but Linda didn't answer.

While I put the kettle on and got the cups to make the drinks, Peter produced a pack cards. Leaving the pack face down, Peter put the top six cards face up. Jenny had to choose one of them. Putting them back on the top of the pack face down, I thought he then (as stated) put the top card to the bottom of the pack and produced only the top five, laying them all face up on the bar. Had the card Jenny thought of been removed?

"Yes."

"What was it?" Peter asked.

"Six of hearts," Jenny said.

"Phew!" he exclaimed.

She said, "That was very clever."

"Well the handling was, but you didn't look."

"I did."

"You looked, Jenny, but you didn't see. That was me at the hotel. I remember you, Jenny, on floor two and you went to the party above the casino."

"I don't know you. I knew the card I chose."

"You were there for a reason," Peter said. "Donald Sixsmith?"

"I know him, of course."

"You two met."

Going to the bottom of the pack he showed her that the first six cards were eight of hearts, six of clubs, seven of diamonds, six of hearts, seven of clubs and eight of spades. The narrative, he said, was removing a card, but the five cards she subsequently saw were the six of diamonds, eight of clubs, seven of hearts, eight of diamonds and six of spades. They were therefore all different cards and only looked like the same ones. Deceived by one missing card, she (and all three of us) hadn't checked the rest. His 'phew' had been further deception along the same lines.

Our drinks were ready.

Peter said he'd do another trick, so we went upstairs to my accommodation. Peter unwrapped a brand new pack of cards. He did a "simple shuffle", as he put it. He turned the pack and displayed the bottom card as the six of hearts.

"Remarkable," Linda said.

"People are impressed when you open a new pack of cards," he said. "Magic is deception. You cannot conjure up magic that isn't prepared. There are no magical powers, just skill in the sense of dexterity and telling a story to put you off the scent."

"Like in the hotel," said Jenny, drinking her coffee. "I know that Linda tried to let Christine achieve everything she wanted. Thirty thousand quid! Sanjay Bunker was separated off from our John Barman - but he wasn't. Christine is deluded."

"Why?" asked Linda.

"They have other shared interests."

"I know," said Adam, "like the Blue Diamond Club. But that's not the point here."

Linda said, perhaps to change the specific subject, "Peter, did you know that this San Bandopadhyay or Sanjay Bunker shares a real surname grouping with a Unitarian founder in the Bengali area?"

"Khasi Hills," said Peter. "The impact locally went into the Khasi Hills, in extreme north east India. Matriarchal area. Unitarian villagers and otherwise Welsh Calvinist missionaries."

"So we have Dracula in Transylvania and, what, Carry on?" Linda asked.

Peter asked, "What?"

Jenny said, "She means "Carry On Up The Khasi."

I corrected her: "Carry On Up the Khyber! Khyber Pass implies arse."

Linda said, "The Khasi of Kalabar, Bungdit Din, Sir Sidney Ruff-Diamond, Private James Widdle, Captain Keene, Brother Belcher, Sergeant Major MacNutt. Soldiers made invincible because they don't need anything under the kilt."

I asked, "Are you busy Jenny?"

"That's why I am here. Talk to Linda and also talk to you. Find out what's going on."

"I've heard you are looking for a parish around here."

Jenny asked, "From Linda?"

"No, from other sources."

"Anyway, I'm staying here tonight."

"Oh, really?" I asked. "My bed isn't exactly suitable."

"Fatima is staying in Caffermere so I am staying here, tonight."

"Fine by me," Linda said. "Thanks for the coffee. Toodle pip!"

Peter said, "Linda, hang on. Practice, please, bending your legs from straight out to bent-under, and be able to swivel your body within a contained space. Can you send me some information on individuals who might come to the show, if ethically allowed: people where someone known had died some time ago? I'll email you a form for you to fill in: their first name, the deceased's name, and trivial things like names of pets and car makes. Then, on the day, let me know who is in the audience."

"Is that ethical?" I asked Peter.

"It will make a point Linda wants to make."

She asked, "What point will I want to make?"

"That hearing from the dead is bunk."

"One-off then," Linda said, always willing to compromise. "And these clothes are coming off in this heat! Bye!"

I said, "So, Jenny: you and me. Go home Peter. Work has ended." Peter went downstairs. We heard the front door go. A few minutes later the front door opened and closed again.

I stood up and started washing the mugs.

Jenny got up and put her arms around me, stretching up on her toes. I felt slightly uncomfortable. "You and me," she said, "were once an item."

"It wasn't easy, Bouncy."

"Well, Linda damaged you, and Ann did."

"I won't have people criticise Ann, Jenny. What are you up to, Bouncy? I mean now."

"Telling you I want you to stop the investigating, Adam."

"Sorry - no can do."

We washed up, to make those mugs available another time soon. Jenny said nothing until they were on the draining board.

Then she said, "I want a parish down here, so don't destroy my chances."

"With Linda, apparently."

"Whoever."

"And not with Fatima Tamuuz?"

"I hate her. Her daughter is lovely."

"You don't hate her. Do you want some grub - the old fish and chips, if it's not too hot?"

"Yeah. Okay."

"Come on then, Bouncy." So we went there, Café Albert, and in fact ate outside, given the heat. Eventually we drifted back to my place, and she went to inspect the bedroom.

She said, "Do you ever wash your duvet cover, pillows, and stuff? And there's all sorts of rubbish in your bedroom."

"Well, I do; had I known... The office sofa is brilliant for sleeping, if you want to go down there."

"Fuck off; I'll sleep in your mucky bed next to you."

When Jenny presented herself to me, removed of all clothing, she was just a bit of a plumper version of her former self that I knew so well. Of course I desired her - Bouncy - and it wasn't long before we did what we used to do. Her on the bed and me kneeling on the carpet, she had this funny action of clamping my head in between her thighs, and tapping her finger on the top of my head. When I could focus close, I recalled her labia when younger - a less bulbous version than now. A couple of fingers went in deep and wet; she was so much tighter as a teenager. The other thing I recalled and she revived was her leaving the bathroom door open and doing her noisy pisses.

I suddenly felt very caring for her; in bed she didn't just fuck and the rest, but clammed herself to me tightly. No covers were needed. This was more tightly than when she did it before she split from me. I uncoupled myself for the loo, but when back she wrapped herself around me again and hard until she loosened with sleep.

She said to me, when back herself from another noisy piss, and clamping on, "You know, like, when you go mad? You go places, and no anchor, freewheeling and crazy journeys, and numbers are shapes and full of colour in 3D, and it always ends up being painful."

I felt sad for her. I expected a long persuasive talk of sorts to drop my investigation. But she had nothing to say, really, in fact about anything. Neither did I. So, when she left, she went off to the hotel, cursing about meeting Fatima again and that she wanted rid of her.

Narrator: Linda Rest (Thursday 8th to Saturday 10th August)

On Thursday 8th August I thought I should attempt to get back into parish life. I felt the requirement to attend Morning Prayer as Colin had restored it. People had been told by Colin that I was ill. Meanwhile he thought the magic show was a good idea to get back into the thick of parish life. He understood it would have a distinctive Christian message, and we would follow up the use of the church hall with a discussion back at the curate's house. It was my project.

Colin said, "I hope the suffragan bishop will be pleased about your initiative. He seems more hostile; I continue to plead your case. He was muttering about a clergy discipline measure but I said you'd been ill a while and you did look ill in bed. Perhaps we're not entitled to know everything about your personal life. And good too to involve that young chap, Peter Marshall. I quite like him, the sort of young man we should attract. But I don't need you yet, and I'm suggesting an extra break. Go to one of these places you stay at; I will come and visit."

I asked Diana if she wanted to come; I asked Adam if he wanted to come. Neither of them did, but I took the advice to go. I wondered if Colin needed me at all. Of course I went to Bever Wood on the 9th. Going there meant I was again out of the way again, and could not be pressured to return to the 'sex cult' that I'd investigated.

I met Jeremy Symes and Lindy Peacock on arrival. I'd no qualms a little later about telling Jeremy about recent events: Christine's hotel endeavour was less secretive than Barman's above the casino, but I spilled all the beans. Jeremy was still suspended, facing no future as a clergyman, and indeed working at Bever Wood.

I wanted to be outside more, and it was by trees or running water that I wanted my mind to be blank. But at a certain spot, I recalled the second part of the car showroom, where my mind took me to Bever Wood for the duration.

The weather was warm: no longer the heat wave. The temperature was around twenty degrees but the outlook was stormy. Still, I could relax.

Next day Jeremy sought me out and found me staring at trees in the woods by the stream outside as before.

"Ah, Jeremy. Do you also reflect here as well as in ministry?" I asked in a one-to-one chat.

"Better. I'm thinking that old certainties can leave us unable to deal with the challenges of today. So Barman may well have done me a favour in making me agree to my suspension. I'm free to reflect and question."

"I'm doing this."

"But you still have the institutional gravity."

"I suppose so; I suppose I saw the Vanguard group as a potential."

"My questions are getting basic. Can we still accept a definition of the divine that was formulated in the fourth century? What of the sin of the first mythical parents? Surely humanity could not be appeased by the sacrificial oblation of God's Son - and it is mythology. We can value both service in virginity - the Marion model - and service with diverse sexuality. No fig leaves."

"I've thought all this."

"Here we're surrounded by reproductive nature giving me an appetite for a new understanding. Thus doctrinal definitions beyond have become a serious obstacle to experiencing wonder. I'd find new metaphors and new language, but I wish to be respectful to what exists and people still use."

"I grant that traditional practice leaves a lot to be desired, but I still want to reinvigorate doctrines via original blessing and the supposed indecent. The Body Eucharist gives the body and real to our actual bodies; indecent theology brings out sexuality."

"They don't reinvigorate. It doesn't matter if John Barman does the Body Eucharist or Christine Vine. It's offensive to the core ritual. I say this even with being forced out, even with my rethinking."

"I thought it could be a legitimate extension."

"The model is St. Paul's," he said. "I do accept, with the critics, that the Last Supper is not the institution of the Eucharist."

"Oh I agree. But surely rituals can adapt further, as this one has before."

"But that economic version of the love meal - think of the Didache - and a gathering that can be done quickly under repression is and remains the core ritual. Barman, as a bishop distorting the core ritual, should be thrown out for this alone. Christine Vine, of course, is now out, in some group among groups that do all sorts of innovations."

"You have a strong argument."

"Come on. It's more than that. If they knew that Bishop Liz Huett was giving her body fluids to others in an initiation ceremony tied in with the Eucharist - the Eucharist! - do you think they'd just let that be? This lot are secretive not because it is some vanguard but because this is an offensive combination, an offensive distortion. You've participated?"

"With Christine, yes."

"What did she do?"

"She urinated on Janet Hayes. I just licked her, put my finger in her."

"She peed on her?"

"It was very brief, so she took in a body fluid into her mouth. I couldn't have done it - I mean presided, if that's the right word. If I'd have started I'd have lost control until my bladder had emptied. Jeremy, you've got a semi."

"Yes and it's wrong."

"It's not wrong!" I said. "Sex is good, and it is divine." (Then I thought of the car showroom, and realised I needed to alter my argument.)

"So what is your view of the core ritual?"

"I think I regard the Eucharist as sufficient and complete. But we need a ritual to affirm the body and involve the body. The body goes through changes, and life does change: we need to recognise that. I affirm the body. So do you. I'd like a ritual to affirm the body going through life. It's why you and I are naked - we affirm the body."

"Well, do that then. But don't offend the core ritual. And as for the Barman group forcing you to join, it can only mean they fail or do violence, and surely violence isn't part of this new route to the Kingdom. As for sex, loyalty matters."

"It wasn't like that when you started - your wife?"

"I agree but I have sex with Lindy and no one else. It was a tragic state of affairs. It needed sorting out. It was sorted out. But we are a faithful couple. I'm far from perfect. Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn in The Gulag Archipelago reminded us that we are all mixed up from sainthood to evil in the same person:

"From good to evil is one quaver, says the proverb, and correspondingly from evil to good."

"You're not faithful to Adam. These now two groupings in their idealism demand deceit to the monogamous."

"I'm faithful to Adam in the sense that monogamy is not required. We're good pals and fuck-buddies."

"Clergywomen cannot have fuck buddies, especially not to facilitate other sex partners."

"That's what's wrong with it."

"And how much does Colin Cromer know about this innovative suffragan bishop in his neck of the woods?"

"Absolutely nothing. He cannot see it. He wears blinkers."

"He will soon, because if your Adam pal won't expose Barman I will. Barman's mistake is that I've now got nothing to lose. But your Adam is likely to be more effective at sinking Barman - being an independent investigator. If Barman is sunk, and I stay out of it, I might get back into parish ministry, even after my coming divorce, even after working here."

"Are you being paid twice?"

"That's their fault. Suspended on full pay is a coward's deal."

"Jeremy, you have a good strategy. I need a continuing strategy of avoidance until Adam strikes. But Adam wants to time his revelation alongside the anti-bureaucracy report."

"Yes, I look forward with some pleasure to the double-barrel shotgun going off."

Colin Visits (Monday 12th August)

A text from Colin Cromer, my training vicar, said he would like to come and see me at Bever Wood. He would see how well I was doing. I had to admit I was intrigued and even excited about the visit. This was a naturist complex and the authorities expected everyone to remove clothes. I went into the woods by the stream for some more incoherent thoughts about what I was doing lately. Was I going to stay as a priest? I seemed to be hopeless at the job. What else could I do? Jeremy and Lindy had bagged the only available continuous paid work at the centre.

When I was ordained priest I had like a shot of purpose. However, this had gone in a group of extremists who turned what was positive into abuse.

The threat of rain was undelivered. My phone said Colin had arrived so I went and found him sat at reception. He was clothed. I started laughing at his startled face.

"I'm blutterbunded," said Colin, on viewing my body. "I mean, I saw the photographs and your duvet did slip down, but not nothing but flip-flops. Linda, I feel like saying, 'Cover yourself up!' But then here's Lindy, and Jeremy like I've never seen him, and all these people in and out."

"Colin. There are rules here. Go in the cloaks. You can always drape a towel. Take this lot off. You would say, 'In my church follow its rules and customs,' and it's the same here."

"You say more than you intended, I think, about this as your church. Surely they can make an exception for me."

"No. Become enlightened."

"I don't seek this form of enlightenment. You could dress; we could go out."

"I want to show you around. Were you not curious?"

"I do want to understand your world, but you must keep my visit private. I never expected to see my curate like this, in every detail. I don't want you seeing me!"

"It matters nothing to me."

"I'm near retirement. I'm not forty like you are."

"Most of the people here are already retired."

"Yes, I think I have noticed. Defeats my argument, I suppose."

"Well?" I asked.

"I'm sat down and you are a tall woman - your, well, you know, is in my eye-line. And I would never expect you to see me similarly."

Lindy said, "If you're embarrassed, hold the towel in front of you, but if you sit down you must sit on it."

Finally Colin went into the cloaks area, and then emerged, towel hiding his penis, and looking very uncertain.

What followed was a tour, first inside (swimming pool, games rooms, refectory, residential rooms), and then outside: through the area that was connected to a closed coal mine. I took him into the woods.

"Sit on the towel, Colin. You can always get another one if it gets muddy. I'm sitting on mine. It's not such a big deal is it?"

He said, "You're so forward. I held back with Mary Ann George, the Rumanian, and I lacked confidence. There's a sister of a clergyman in the Lake District I'd like to get to know more. I suppose you must get plenty of vitamin D."

"I've been doing exercises for Peter's magic show."

"You promise me there is a Christian message in this."

"Against magick. Believing in the supernatural is not the same as believing in magic."

"I'm surprised you prefer the supernatural. The temporary 1960s argued against it, for 'Being' in existentialism and the 'secular meaning of the gospel' and so on, I recall."

"Van Buren wrote a book of that title. But if you don't have the supernatural, you don't have any secure basis for this and not that. Like the 'kerygma', a drive of textual faith through preaching, is a cop-out."

"So why don't you bang the drum for the supernatural?"

"Because I'm not sure. People prayed for rain but weather systems cause rain."

"But how does doing magic argue against magic?"

"Magic with a k after the c. The magician shows it is deception; there are no magick powers. In the supernatural, the power is without, coming through; in magick, the power is within, coming out."

"Well, I suppose it will be entertaining. How are you feeling?"

"More puzzled than anything."

"Quite. I think you should be back for Sunday. We'll start with light duties and then be up to speed with the magic show. You know, I don't know whether to look at you or avoid looking at you. You are a woman in very good shape. I notice you haven't once looked at my private area."

"Look at me as you would in Serninsea. I look at your eyes."

"And that discussion we had: why you are hairless below... I'm sorry. That's why I looked. Do you not even close your legs?"

"Why?"

"I'm so sorry; this is really intrusive. I am responding: you know I am."

"It really doesn't matter. I'm sat on rough ground: my feet are apart for stability. Anyway, women's genitalia varies."

"Linda, please."

"I never shave under my arms, but look - no hair."

"Linda, please. I can't deny being a man. I'm sat on the ruddy towel and cannot hide."

"Colin. Rest assured that I've seen so many erections I ignore them."

"Linda, you are incorrigible! Stop it now. I've come here at personal risk to myself. I was curious to see your 'second home', as you call it. This is a sort of Eden. I'm going back to my first home. Eden is a dangerous place: you are temptation."

"You don't want to stay overnight? The sunrise here is very pleasant. There may be a spare room or you can stay with me - we can get to know each other better. We could have a naturist retreat together."

"In the same room?"

"Yes. Why don't we get to know each other better?"

"I don't believe this. Temptress, you are."

"I'm not suggesting even the tiniest sexual contact, Colin. I'm suggesting relaxing."

"I give up. I don't even know what to tell the bishop."

"We could have discussed theology further, Colin. We never discuss theology. I'm not sure if that would make you less or more excited."

"Linda!"

"I'm not looking."

"We don't discuss theology when there is the pressing business of running a parish. Too many theories."

"We can discuss here. Which resurrection approach do you prefer: the event, psi or theological?"

"Are they different? What is 'psi'?"

"One is the ordinary believer's given view of the same chap walking around, one is psychological, of motivating visions, and one is theological that frames everything expressed."

"All of them," I hope.

"I don't think you can have all of them. Although there is a big stress on a body, not just a vision, it is a renewed body - goes through walls, disappears - that can only be understood theologically. The visions is the weakest; it's less about visions than explanations."

"Beaten men were faced with defeat," he said.

"It is precisely the beaten, the dispossessed, the lowest, who seek out a messiah, a victorious figure."

"You think too much. I fear I shall vision your body for too long. If I lay on my front you'd see all of my bottom. I'm not very good at discussing. Thanks for the offer, and showing me around, and yourself in this renewed setting."

"Stay!"

"No."

"Back to the cloaks area then, Colin. It's a shame."

As we returned he said, "You're overmused. I'm not against being informed by ideas, but it's about practical implementation. I hear your sermons and they simply do not relate to what people are doing."

"Yes," I agreed.

"Try to be more practical. The magic show - yes, I suppose you will demonstrate things. Keep the explanations simple."

"I'll be more practical, Colin. I'm just not into sequacity like you."

He dressed again, and gave a twenty towards funds. I waved him off, still naked of course. Perhaps things would improve, especially if I could stay out of Barman's clutches and perhaps reset my relationship with Christine.

Rehearsal & Osis (Friday 16th August - Tuesday 20th August)

I returned to Serninsea on 16th August. I chose to behave like a trainee. I sat in on an important wedding Colin conducted on Saturday 17th at 14:30. It was supposed to be my day off! Filippo Arnolfini was marrying Devonne Miniver, and all I did was speak briefly to the best man, Joris Vasari. The Italian community in Serninsea was small, and used to be bigger, but this family was well to do and sold a variety of clothes and a cousin ran a restaurant in town: Batonis'. Colin was pleased to be in a number photographs, sometimes in between bride and groom, but I stayed out. He was pleased they had chosen us, rather than the Roman Catholics, a different outcome from my effort regarding Mr. Youell's funeral. Colin went to the bun fight at Batonis', and I didn't.

He did a very short sermon on the following Sunday and I presided. We were becoming more aware of growing moves of resistance and even chaos regarding the 'inefficiency report' into the diocese. Rumour was that it would be damning, and some were trying to delay it a long time and even stop it.

It frustrated Adam as well, who was back in my bed from Friday night. The selfish thought came that if the Serninsea group under the Confraternity left me alone Adam might not need to publish his exposé.

Saturday, Sunday and Monday, Peter, Kathryn, Kathleen and I did rehearsals for the show that would be in the Church Hall on Tuesday with a follow-up discussion back at my curate's house. I'd been out to buy a red leotard and red tights, for the work as one of Peter's assistants.

The day for the show arrived. I was over previous physical aches and pains and was getting quite supple. My toileting had improved again after setbacks.

The hall was in use during the day, and thus final rehearsals were at my house. Peter had his father's van from Inglemire and with Kathleen had brought in some props for rehearsing at my home. One was a horizontal body-length box on wheels. The face up had a long edge hinged lid to get in (with a fully detachable centre break); there was a bit of a dark well-space at the foot end, with stored feet on sticks to push out. The long far side had one top-hinged centre-break dual door for escapes, with a black cloth that could drop down from inside behind that door. Little bottles to spray gouache red paint were concealed, rapidly removed in my house from use despite the non-stain claim. The feet's toes were radio controlled from a concealed button. So we did some practices with me in my red leotard, sawing me in half, but the tights were abandoned as we could not cover the fake feet and needed to see the toes wiggle. This meant I had to make sure the leotard itself covered my vital places.

Kathleen was around in this final rehearsal, and she had a blue leotard. Peter said he thought red would be better for her in this trick. Kath's leotard seemed more secure than mine. Hers revealed her belly button within an exposed circle, so I was more concealed at least there. A red one on its way would be the same design - coming from the Arnolfinis!

In the rehearsal we made it like a dance: I was sawn in half, with concealed legs up, the box divided using those centre beaks, with toes wiggling, the box reunited, I rolled out the back and Kathleen got in there.

Peter said, "They make high-end sex dolls out of the same material as those feet."

Satisfied with that performance, they went to get another prop. Brought indoors was a vertical box, person-height, on a wider stand and wheels, and it had three independent front doors vertically and was slid into three connected parts - a zig-zag box.

Kathleen did some practising in that vertical box, going in by one door at the back, and she produced similar (sex doll?) detached feet, her blue leotard and belly button in the middle shifted to our left, and her head stayed to our right. Slid back together, she was able to come out of the back as she went in.

The door bell rang, and Peter went to the door and returned to say it was someone called Ken Osis. So I went to the door alone. Ken Osis was not wearing a clerical collar, very unusually. Despite the hours earlier than the start-time, I asked, "Have you come to watch the show or something? It is in the church hall this evening."

"What show?" Ken Osis asked, "I came to see you. Why are you in a leotard?"

"Why do you want to see me? I mean, in general."

"I want to advise you. Yer could be with me, in the parties, and then yer won't get punished."

"What do you mean, 'punished'?"

"If you don't show willing - I know that they punish clergy. They've decided. You'll be punished."

"I'm not joining up."

"I told you before: no selected clergy fail to join."

"Well, let me be clear: the answer is no, as it was 'no' before regarding you and Diana."

"What is this you are doing? Can anyone come?"

"It is for the parishioners. As I said, it is not here."

Then Peter returned. "Hey, we're busy. Is this man bothering you?"

"Peter, tell this man about your employer and his relationship with solicitors."

"Oh yeah," said Peter. "My boss Adam Magellan is in and out of court very often, and often collects and gives evidence."

I said, "Adam Magellan is investigating the groups under the Confraternity. He is also quick with the solicitors too. So that means they and you leave us alone. Go now - just go. I'm busy."

Ken Osis said, as he turned away, "I'm going. Don't say I didn't warn yer."

Peter added, "And you don't bother her or me again or it's a report on Mr. Magellan's desk for immediate action."

I slammed the front door. "He's pathetic. I think we should get back to the show," I said, "and I want to get this right."

But before we continued there was a call at the door. Had he come back? No, it was Kathleen's sister Kathryn with a package containing a red leotard from the Arnolfinis. "Thanks," said Kathleen, having come to the door, and the door was shut again with Kathryn apparently going to the church hall.

I needed the loo, and then we decided to rehearse some more. One minute Kath was rehearsing in the blue leotard with belly button exposed and then suddenly she was in a red one with the same exposing circle.

Meanwhile, for anyone coming back to the house afterwards, I prepared glasses to contain supplied red or white grape juice and orange squash, and cups to have coffees at the end, with options of cream, cappuccino and honey in the coffee, and I arranged silver onions and cheese cubes on sticks, along with salmon paste triangular sandwiches, cashews and small salty savoury biscuits. All were covered over, some placed in the fridge. I chucked out the last few apples and oranges.

Kathleen, Peter and I loaded the van back. Off we went to the church hall.

Magic Show and Theology (Tuesday 20th August)

We lugged the props and gear and ourselves into the ready to access church hall. Peter put three bottles of already cooled distilled water into the hall's back room fridge's freezer and a dish into the fridge itself.

There was a simple vertical box that contained a side panel sized enough to hold clothing, but it meant anyone not too fat could hide behind the box with all apertures open. The back door just looked like a simple back when closed; the front door was as a door. I'd not rehearsed with this one.

This box (like the props I'd rehearsed with) was ready; it was put on stage with a white dress to be visible to all on a hanger. The stage curtains were nearly closed - a width of a person open - and the lights were so coloured that Kathleen's brunette hair and my blonde hair looked similar. My red leotard appeared as the same hue: mine was complete; her's showed her belly button, of course.

Kathryn had arrived separately; the twins had procedures by which they kept separate ahead of such performances. Coming together backstage Kathryn had on a light blue leotard with central circular gap. Both women displayed bare legs.

I looked at myself in the mirror in a room behind the stage. The leotard emphasised my slender hips, lengthening my legs. My long blue dress made the contrasting leotard look like underwear: this was the dress I'd used much earlier than Sanjay Bunker's gift, the one to entertain Adam at the restaurant.

At about the allotted time, people came in, paying their two pounds each towards church funds. It was hardly an amount to justify Peter's efforts. He didn't mind: he was learning. Maybe thirty-five had come in. Colin Cromer was present, on the back row of the seats.

We had a brief conference - Kathryn, Kathleen, Peter and me - to confirm limiting apparent costume switches and lessening dramatic entrances for better effect. Then Kathleen put on a red dress over the red leotard; Peter was waiting at the side of the stage curtain.

So the performance began.

I started by saying to the audience that we were going to see some magical tricks. "It is somewhat like the Magic Lantern Show before - a variation - but this time your curate is having a go and I want to refer to miracles in the Gospels. I am definitely not implying that Jesus was a conjuror; rather I am saying that the Gospels' miracles are devices in the text for highlighting significance. So I might refer to some tricks with a bit of theology." I introduced Peter Marshall.

Peter came on stage and his use of "with Kath's help" sounded single but meant double. "So we are revisiting a few tricks, but if you've ever fancied cutting your curate in half..."

Someone somewhere said, "She'd morph into two of her - instead of making none of her."

I opened the vertical box (unrehearsed!), and inside this was the clear white dress shining in the stage lights. Peter picked the dress up by its hanger, showed it to the audience, put it back, and called Kath in her red dress and seeming red underwear to come on stage. She received some applause and whistles as she stood.

Peter said that not only would she disappear, but she would reappear wearing the dress, and do so instantly.

She went in, he shut the door, I raised up my bare arms, and he opened the door. There was just a red dress hanging instead, and no one inside at all. Then he said, "Ah, Kath's coming," and she came in from the stage side (again?) wearing a white shining dress. Her light blue leotard formed a visible impression of underwear, such that her flash of thigh was like a flash of knickers.

My doubt was about local people surely knowing the Wickenby twins. There was some applause.

I said, "Ladies and gentlemen, when Jesus was transfigured, he turned a glowing white. It was on a hillside and this represented connecting with the prophets and his own future transformation."

I'm not sure that many of these people knew what I was talking about, including the churchgoers.

Peter said he would now create instant ice. 'Kath' (as now in this white dress) carefully brought to him a bottle of water and a flat dish with a tiny amount of dust on it. All he did was pour water, and it formed a tower of ice. It was a simple trick of purity to impurity.

I thought I'd be clever and say, "Some say the Trinity is like water: Ice, water and steam. Ha ha. Actually, if anyone does say that, I will subject them to a long treatise as to why it is not so."

I could see a smile on distant Colin Cromer's face.

I overheard one in the audience call out, "Bet you couldn't, right now, turn that into frozen wine."

"No," Peter said, "because a trick is prepared. However, I can easily prepare that one if you want, it's just that I don't want to be sacrilegious."

'Kath' left the stage but I did not, standing to the side. She returned unwrapping a new pack of cards and gave them to Peter, and then she left the stage again.

Peter asked for anyone to come forward. "Marjorie Jack," she called herself. A screen came on to show close up what Madge could see.

He gave "the pack" a quick shuffle. I knew that actually only part of the pack was shuffled. Then he said he had the "whole deck" pretty mixed up and showed it fanned out with the random order of cards. In fact this left an unfanned fat end. He then gathered them, turned them over, and fanned them out face down.

He asked Madge to select blind any card and show it. Peter looked away as on screen was the three of spades. Peter turned and gathered the cards so that she placed it on the top of the deck. She was then invited to cut the deck and place the bottom portion on to the top portion. He took the pack, turned it over face upwards for them all and it showed the king of spades. Summarising the moves so far, he asked Madge to cut the deck by "roughly half" and she restored a complete block of cards with a "seven" shown. It was a seven of hearts. Peter emphasised that finding a seven was all her own actions. Face down again, Peter asked her to count seven cards off the pack. She flipped over the seventh card, and it was the one she had selected, the three of spades.

I knew that crucially the fat end of the cards had been the hearts in descending order when face up, with a cover card at the end of something different - leading to the card.

Coming from behind the stage I said, "I'm allowed to say that this trick was in fact an exercise in arrangement and mathematics. I'd say that what often strikes us as mysterious and wondrous can still have a mathematical explanation. Fractals are like this: simple equations that translate into fascinating shapes combining the symmetrical and asymmetrical. They strike us as wondrous and satisfying, and I think it is because we know there are rules operating. Card tricks seem incredible and yet follow preparations and mathematical rules."

Peter then said he noticed that there was a dog in the audience. It was Dieter on a lead with Klärchen Sisse. "Let me ask the curate: we haven't rehearsed this have we?"

"What?"

"A card trick with a dog."

"We didn't know there'd be a dog here," I said.

Kath in white came in with a paper bag and Peter gestured for the selected to come towards the stage. Kath left, and I stayed a distance away.

The human and dog came forward and Peter asked Klärchen to give their names and select a card without showing Dieter. She was loving this, almost bouncing up and down on her feet. She selected the eight of hearts and gave it to Peter. He placed it back into the pack and the German Shepherd watched as the whole pack of cards was placed into that bag.

"We shake the magic bag," he said, with Dieter looking as he bought the bag close to the mutt.

Then he asked Klärchen to hold the dog's lead while he removed them and laid the cards out on the stage floor face down.

"Tell your dog to select the card again," said Peter.

"Dieter, find the card you selected."

On screen people saw the dog go among the cards and dip his nose to one in particular, wagging its tail. Klärchen picked it up to reveal the eight of hearts.

"Clever boy," said Klärchen. "How did you do it?"

"The dog did it," said Peter.

The audience clapped. The dog hadn't looked - it had smelt the bag and the card.

Peter then said. "That was a dog. I might, however, become in touch with God: where people and animals go when they are dead. Would you like some evidence of this?"

Someone called out, "Wouldn't that be sacriligious?"

"Whether it is or not, I am getting a 'G'," he said. "Oh, it's an unusual name. Ger... Gertrude? Is there a Gertrude in here?"

Now I left the stage but at the side could see through a gap in the curtain edge. A woman put up her hand. It was Mrs. Carter - to whom I'd once said hello from Adam's high opened window, and she'd later tripped over down there at the pavement. She called out. "My friends call me Gert or Gertie."

"I'm also getting another name, Gertrude. Another unusual name. "L - not Linda, but Louisa. Not Louise. Is it Louise?"

"Louisa."

"Just to say, Gertrude, that we have never met, have we?"

"I might have passed you in the street. But I don't know you."

"Does that name Louisa mean anything to you, er Gertie?"

"She was my sister. Died two years ago."

"That makes sense. Louisa has some words for you, through me. She says she is in a good place now."

Out of sight I started feeling a little concerned about this breach of data protection.

"She says, 'Look after the little dog,' so I'm sure you do. Another dog!"

"I've only had the dog since she died. I didn't know we could bring dogs in here. I take it on the promenade. Louisa doesn't know anything about me having it."

"Oh yes she does. She knows its name," Peter said. "But it is another unusual name. It surely doesn't start with a... with a zed, does it?"

Mrs. Carter replied, "Yes it does. Ooh. So what is it then? I bet you can't guess."

I thought this is daft. If he can 'guess' 'z' he can guess the name.

"Louisa tells me it is... It's hard to believe but, em, not 'Za'... 'Zeh'... 'Zel'... Zelda?"

"Yes," said his target. People started clapping.

Then Peter relieved me somewhat by saying, "Ladies and gentlemen. I am not in touch with the dead. This is a trick. Believe me: this is a trick I am playing - with Gertrude and anyone else that I may name. And there's an M coming to mind. I don't quite believe it myself, because M seems to stand for Muh or Muhammad. Surely not Muhammad?"

"I like to be called 'Mo'," said a voice. "I might be the only Muhammad here."

"Why would I be thinking 'garden'," Peter asked, "and in Scotland?"

"I don't know," he replied.

"Macintosh? Do you wear a Mac?"

"You're confusing it with my name. It's McArden, thanks to my mother marrying a Scot."

"In Scotland?"

"No."

"But I get the sense that you've not been here long."

"No I haven't; that is correct."

"Your mother is deceased, isn't she? "

"Yes."

"She could be messaging me. Was your father Muslim?"

"She was. He is. He converted."

"My signal from you is that someone didn't. You didn't. It's you, isn't it. You are not a Muslim."

"You are wrong: I did convert. I am a Christian convert. Since being here."

I heard someone say, "Oh good." Peter had told me earlier that the best cold readers and previously informed make small mistakes, so it all sounds more authentic.

"And I am getting an E. Type of E. Not a pet, but thinking of a big cat. Why a big cat and wheels, Mo?"

"My father, who is alive, loves his E-Type Jag and says I can have it only when he stops driving."

"Thank you Mo. Once again, everyone, this is a trick, although I have never met you - yes? - and I did not say your mother is in Paradise and only 'could be' talking to me, but I am sure that she is in Paradise."

This received further clapping. I assumed that no one supposed that I had supplied the information.

'Kath' re-entered the stage with blue leotard on alone with bare middle and bare feet. This time a box was supposedly going to divide her up. She backed in wheeling it with the three doors open as one. Peter closed the doors on her and presented the blades so that people didn't see the blade was less wide than the box with the blade handles remaining beyond. And so she performed an out of sight contortion aided by false feet and lower legs with the bottom door opened temporarily before she came back together. Except that with the box back together, he threw the blades to the side and waved his arms about for further effect, and Kath had a red leotard on. What had happened was a back way door facilitated a final switch. Kath received a few more whistles from the small crowd.

Backstage I had removed all clothing down to my red leotard and waited. Feeling self-conscious about the coming trick, I had a sudden involuntary itch on my backside, where the spot had been, so I just ran my hand down my buttock.

With Kath removing her large prop to off-stage, Peter further said, "For your finale I am now going to cut your vicar in half."

"He's not here," said one chap, "but it's a good idea."

"I am," said Colin, on the back row, "and I am staying here in one piece." There was laughter.

"Curate," one woman then said.

I thus appeared in red leotard to some gasps and I confirmed, "Yes, I'm the curate."

One chap was deliberately coughing (I looked at him) and a few ladies chuckled a little. Colin Cromer had his hand at his forehead, as if shielding his eyes. Why was he doing that when he had seen me naked so recently?

'Kath', with her red leotard on, came on - without gasps - pushing the wheeled horizontal box with a saw on top, which indeed people were looking at from slightly below. She looked at me, and smirked a little.

The magician directed me to get into the box. As I approached the box, with my back to the audience, I could hear even more gasps and mutterings.

I managed all the contortions properly, as in rehearsal, and this time as his saw moved, with sawing noises coming through the speakers, I pressed buttons so little bottles of wet gouache red paint sprayed out. I knew that he was dropping sawdust on to the stage from his hand. I refrained from pressing the twiddle-toes button once the saw was going through. He divided the box and angled it so that the opening side was concealed at the rear.

I heard clapping because I was now apparently divided into two.

"Time to go home!" someone shouted. This was the point, outside, that red leotard 'Kath' will have walked off stage.

"I am going to resurrect her," Peter proclaimed. "I'll put her back together."

Someone else shouted, "Don't, and then we won't aff to 'ave any more of 'er puzzling sermons."

Nevertheless, he put the box together, but I did not twiddle the toes. "This is not three days, and probably not much more than three minutes, to bring your curate back to life."

I'd pushed the reunited back open, and the cloth came down to the ground in the shadow of the box, and that was enough for still red leotard Kath to crawl directly behind to arrive, so I slivered out, and she went over me, and she was very quickly in and the toes started to move. My job was to keep behind the black cloth, as red leotard wearing Kath got out into public sight and, after applause, she pushed the box off the stage with me crawling behind the cloth. The adjustment had been not to repeat the costume switch here.

The box off stage, she asked the audience, "Have I just been divided into two?"

This was my cue to come on to the stage from the side and say, "No, I was."

Some chap called out, "You might have concealed yourself a bit better."

I thought this meant I was seen crawling behind the black cloth. It is not what he meant. Peter and I glanced at each other, and Kath got the other meaning as well.

Regardless, I said, "To conclude. These were prepared magic tricks. Jesus was not a magician. The miracles are pointers making statements of wider belief and expectation. Our brief little show is followed by a discussion directly back at my house in Sutton, for those who want it. If you are early, someone will answer the door."

The audience departed, three of us cleared away and loaded the van; Kathryn would wait at the hall for half an hour, and vanish that way, but we three went to my house to receive interested parishioners.

Car Crash of a Discussion

People came to my curate's house in ones, twos and threes. Soon Peter arrived with Kathleen (he said) in casual clothing. My blue dress was back on, which meant back at the house I presented a leg every so often and what may have looked like brief flashes of red knickers.

Interestingly, in the kitchen, Kathleen said to me, "Uncle George says there's no work future in being a magician's assistant, even if Peter does this rather than working for his competitor. He said we'd be better off modelling as twins, like in advertising or even glamour."

"You do as you see fit," was my response.

"Kathryn only appeared in The Red Giant so that we are known outside this town as one person."

"You're both archaeologists."

"All that archaeology teaches is that organic bodies decompose. And that's also the jobs market today. I don't believe the jobless figures for one minute."

"Neither do I."

Peter showed the gathered crowd of about sixteen (not including Colin the vicar) how a coin in his hand rubbed on to a bottle then appeared inside a bottle. He'd shown it to me before - the coin inside resides at the back in the bevelled bottom, and no one sees it there until an emptied hand that still contains (but doesn't) a coin is rubbed against the bottle and the coin is brought around the bevel to the front inside. Thus a coin had "passed through" the glass.

An idea had been for me to do the trick, but I didn't have the dexterity or confidence.

When he'd done that, I introduced Peter as: "a trainee magician with his friend as assistant, Kath."

One of the gathering in the lounge, church attender Tom Bowler, said, "Reverend. We know Kathryn and Kathleen are twins, so that's how they did it. Those of us who knew kept it quiet."

Kathleen dropped her head without comment.

"There's a biblical lesson there," I said. "Even Jesus was not able to 'perform' in his own back yard. Remember that? The locals knew him too well to have the power and charisma he had elsewhere."

Another, Catherine Mould - the very mother of Cheryl Mould - asked, "Is it right that a girl who appeared topless in The Red Giant should be working in the church hall?"

"Er, yes, everyone has the right to work, and note that only one of the twins appeared in the paper. So which one shall we ban?"

"That was my sister," said Kathleen, looking across at Catherine Mould.

As I'd intended, I declared that: "Jesus will have rejected what we might call sorcery, or doing tricks to prove the act of God. He left such only to God - as he saw it." The gathered parishioners did not look happy. "This here is a discussion session, so please comment."

Tom Bowler said, "Jesus as God knew everything, and Jesus as God could make anything happen."

"He walked on water," said Mrs. Gert Carter. "This young man might be able to read my mind but you can't walk on water. That's physical, that is."

Catherine Mould said, "It's camera angles and perspex when a magician walks on water, but Jesus didn't need any of that."

Mo McArden, the featured Muslim convert to Christianity, then said, "All these tricks were revealed on television, but none of Jesus's tricks have ever been explained."

Mrs Carter added, "He pulled up lots of fish where there were none."

"That was a post-resurrection story," I said, "which has a category of its own, a meaning, as within a diocesan report: The Power, the Mission, to Gather in the People."

"You mean you don't believe it, Reverend Linda," said the man who'd coughed earlier in the hall. "It says it very simply."

I said to him: "I don't remember your name."

"Ralph. My pals call me Phil, second name."

"Your surname?"

"Thicket. I bet you don't believe in the Virgin Birth either. Or the Feeding of the Five Thousand. Poetic is it?"

"I don't think it says what it simply says: it is saying something about purpose and intention. So the feeding of the four and five thousand males plus others are stories about bounty and plenty in the Kingdom of God and what to expect - no famine, even with little food - and the early Church will have seen it as a love meal foundation. You end up with the twelve baskets: the twelve tribes of Israel."

"Well I think he did what it says he did," said Tom Bowler. "You're the magician, Peter: you could do these tricks. But I bet you can't produce that food from nowhere like Jesus did."

"Oh, and it's 'virginal conception'," I said.

"I could do all of these miracles," said Peter, "with props and preparation. I don't think that's what Jesus was doing, or could have been doing. No, he didn't arrange perspex and pay actors to walk on water. The trouble with a lot of TV magic is that the audience are in on it. I'm impressed with Derren Brown, and he is very secular."

"No, Jesus could just make it happen," said Tom.

"How?" asked Peter.

Ralph added: "Peter, in your magic box the assistant's not going to get pregnant without you doing something."

"That might be offensive," I said.

Another face I'd seen said, "It's miracles not magic." (I could not recall his name either.)

I looked at him directly. "I'd also make that distinction, er..."

"I'm Jim. Jim Bill Sayle, seeing as we are declaring middle names."

"Hello Jim," I said.

"You're a bit sexy aren't you, vicar."

"Curate," said Mrs. Carter, "I may say so, Reverend Jupitas, you usually dress properly, like even a cassock on when I saw you that time leaning out of the Mr Magellan's window."

Peter started to grin and looked at Kathleen. I was relieved that Klärchen Sisse hadn't come along, with or without her dog.

"You can visit me any time," said Ralph.

Mo then said, "Peter, I don't know how you read my mind. But we don't need to know how Jesus did his miracles, as Jim said. Cosmic energy, probably."

Peter continued: "Well, let's consider that. For matter to form you need energy, huge quantities of it, and tricks that reproduce miracles don't do that but deceive. Take Star Trek as in the sheer amount of energy you'd need to re-clone people at the other end of energising, never mind for the data information saved of those individuals. Anyway, I don't think Linda is talking about deception and Jesus does not convert energy into matter. Linda, we never completed our discussion on resurrection, information retention and black holes."

"We must resume it," I said.

"God made the world, everything, so making miracles is just a bit more energy," was the reply from Ralph.

"It would be utterly explosive," said Peter.

Mo McArden said, "I thought I read Christ as Wisdom making the universe. And it was explosive."

"Anyway," Peter said, "I'm not a believer."

"You are not?" asked Tom.

Mrs. Carter said, "You have to believe something."

"Pagan and a bit Buddhist."

Mrs Carter asked, "Pagan? Didn't we try to abolish them?"

Ralph said, "Drowning them by ducking stools."

"No," I replied.

Peter affirmed, "Buddhist as well, about training the mind into both concentration and spiritual peace."

I said, "You go online don't you, Peter? So much religion can be online these days."

"OURS," he replied.

"People are on it for hours," said Mrs. Carter.

"No, as in 'our' - mine and yours," said Peter.

Our what?" asked Gert Carter.

"Online Unitarian Renewal Scene," Peter declared. "OURS also means us, each of us are different but us - as one."

I said, remembering the chapel visit, and yet unsure because of the Rumanians and possibly Indians, "Unitarians allow their beliefs to change, don't they?"

"Yes; each express their own beliefs that are 'OURS'."

Mrs Carter followed up: "So you don't believe in miracles, curate; you are trying to tell us that miracles don't exist."

Tom Bowler then asked, "Uni what? Do they read minds like you do then?"

Peter replied, "I don't think the miracles did exist, but they weren't tricks either. People then told stories full of signs and wonders, expecting a lot."

"You see, I think," I suggested, "that although we believers say the same doctrines, what we actually mean by them changes over time. It must do, otherwise we'd never live in today's world."

"Jesus was eternal," said one middle-aged woman, "and not in the past. And don't we say it's one unchanged faith delivered by the saints? Sheila Gillespie, if you've forgotten."

Peter said, "It did change. What about Martin Luther? You know, he pinned his ninety-five theses? The Protestant Reformation?"

I said, "There was also the whole formative period of the early Church."

It was Madge Jack who said, "On that documentary it said the Protestants wanted to get the early faith back."

So I said, "What they wanted to do, and what they actually did, might be rather different."

People were muttering. "Jesus came from heaven," said Gert Carter, "so he could do anything. And Louisa my sister is in heaven. That I know."

Peter said, "Online, we in OURS mentioned the Infancy Gospels of Thomas. Jesus is thought there to be full of magical powers, but he's a very naughty boy with them and needs training by his parents after all sorts of complaints."

"Well that's rubbish," said the coughing man Ralph Thickett, "because Jesus was without sin. Unlike curates."

"So he never grew up?" asked Peter.

"Not in our sense, no," said the man. "That must be so."

I said, "Oh dear. I'm sure he had to learn. He was fully human as well. And what about when he dismisses the Syrophenician woman and her daughter in Mark and Matthew and the woman says even dogs would be treated better? Doesn't then the adult Jesus change his mind, heals her distant daughter and thus he learns something?"

"He was testing her," said the other man.

"That's not what it says or implies," I said.

"Well why do you follow him then?" said Tom Bowler, "assuming you do follow him, like."

"It sounds to me like you don't," said Mrs. Carter. "And I say that as someone who likes you."

Ms Jack was muttering: "She doesn't."

Peter then said, "I would even call it a racist slur, Jesus's immediate reaction to that woman."

'Oh shit,' I thought. We can't accuse Jesus of racism. "I do not," I had to insist, "because from him comes an ethical tradition that's within but then out of Judaism. It became a religion for all and is a tradition and resource for one's outlook, one's stance, one's future in learning our relationship with everyone else. And if the Jews were first, chosen, responsible, then we, beyond dogs or puppies, were also included by that illustrated healing and Paul made our entry into the Kingdom direct and specific."

Some were muttering about my laboured explanation. Not for the first time, either.

"Ethics trumps theology," said Peter, making a further controversial point.

"It might," I replied. "Well, there's no point having an unethical theology. I forget his name now, but some Greek created problems for God asking if something is ethical because it comes from God or does God choose only the already ethical."

"Is theology belief?" asked a large woman. I struggled for her name.

"Yes, sort of," I said. "Carrie...?"

"Then why can't you just believe? Evie Waite, not Carrie."

(She did, sort of, suggest Big Mummy if not quite the wrestler Big Daddy.)

"Ah. I do believe," I said. "But theology is also necessary argument."

"Well, he doesn't believe," referring to Peter.

"He is not me, Evie," I replied.

"But it's clear you agree with him and not really with us."

Peter said, "I doubt. I'm not magical Pagan but more about the earth and blessing it as a whole; Buddhism is a strategy; the rest is ordinary science and ideas."

Ralph said, "They're just false religions."

I said, "No, I don't think so. You don't have to dismiss other religions just because you are in yours. One religion he follows is sensitivity in what you do in the world and the other is a path about losing one's self as a way of opening out reality."

Tom Bowler said, "Ours is history."

"History-like. The gospels proclaim Easter faith, with fragments of the historical Jesus. Another way of going back is like the Buddhists do: the Eightfold Path seems to work, they say, so someone passed it on, and someone before, and before, and eventually you back very far and they say it goes back to the Buddha. Christian tradition is a bit like that. Jesus Christ is established by going back and back regarding salvation."

Ralph responded, "Jesus said no one gets to the Father except by me. We are not in 'your religion' but his."

Peter said, "Well no one gets to do the self-losing dharma properly except via the Buddha. You can do that within the terms of any religion."

Gert Carter intercepted: "But the Buddha just died - Jesus came back to life to show us it was true."

I said, to Mrs.Carter, "Do you think that's why he came back to the apostles, including Paul's earliest account? To show it was true? Peter?"

"Coming back to life to prove it is true is like a cold-reader telling you your dog's name to prove there is 'the other side'. They never say anything actually useful."

"You did," said Mrs. Carter.

"But I was telling you what you already know. And no, I won't tell you how I did it."

Phew. I then said the same: "The resurrection stories are not like Peter or some other performer telling you the name of your dog to prove something - precisely not."

Mrs Carter added: "Yes it is, along with, 'Now go, preach and reach out!' - like you're not doing, Reverend. I know 'Zelda' proves nothing. You, Mister Peter, said it was a trick - but Jesus didn't. I know a bishop once said it was a 'conjuring trick' once - but it wasn't."

"No, the bishop you are thinking about said it was not a conjuring trick with bones. What I am doing is trying to put this on a more sure footing than the type of magic that becomes the religious stuff - that our friend here rejects, and he is a magician and a neo-Pagan!"

"Well he's wrong,"Mrs.Carter said. "And you should be making him into a Christian."

I said, "I can't make him into a Christian!"

"Why do we employ you then?" asked Tom Bowler.

"Perhaps to communicate it."

He said, "You're like someone who says, 'I want to sell you something but it doesn't work very well. Read the worship book but the services are dodgy.' What do you make of the liturgy then?"

"It is the story of Christianity condensed into worship and so it is in worship that we see where we are in its story and when we renew ourselves in its ritual."

"What?" Tom asked.

A woman said, "She's saying it's like fiction - a novel like out of the library. A story."

I responded, "Yes but no but..."

"We'll rename the curate 'Vicky Pollard,' said another woman.

This was getting worse for me. "I'm sorry but perhaps when I think about ideas I forget names!"

"Ideas?" said Ralph. "Is that it?"

"My name is Beatrice Kerr. The curate gets inside a good novel," Bea said.

"Yep! That's where Reverend Pollard is, Bea," said Ralph. "She's stuck inside a novel."

"But this story is to transform you, Beatrice. The technical term is 'kerygma'."

Mo McArden said, "So you mean, like, it's when you sympathise with the characters? But who wrote the novel? See, God wrote the novel and it's what Jesus did so it's not a novel."

Peter said, "But it's not history."

"Of course it's history," Mohammad said. "What else is it? I didn't convert because he didn't do it, I converted in part because he did do it."

Peter said, "And I haven't joined. No, it's not what Jesus did, necessarily, because people in the early Church wrote the Gospels and New Testament, from different places and different times, along different traditions already."

"Yes," I said, "Mark is saying, 'You may have to suffer too,' in a straightforward sense; and Matthew adds more for a future Church; and Luke is saying: 'Gentiles, this is what it's about' - and of that strand of the early Church too; and then you have John where it's all predestined and worked out."

Peter said, "Scholars increasingly include the Gospel of Thomas - the main one and not the later infancy one."

"Why?" asked the man. "Why would they do that? It's not in the Bible."

"Because," he said, "it is a book of Jesus's sayings, and some are likely reliable, although some are clearly Gnostic and inserted."

I said, to grab the reins, "I don't suppose we will ever read from Thomas, because of tradition. Well: you might, Peter, but not when the main Churches have closed the canon. Look there is history in them: the four are the most historical, but it needs teasing out. Sometimes the early Church puts words into Jesus's mouth, and probably makes the miracles miraculous. Now who's for tea and who's for coffee and we should also thank Peter. Oh, not forgetting Kath, who's been very quiet."

"It's ridiculous," Kath said quietly. "Go to the archaeology and you find it ain't necessarily so."

There was moderate applause. I said, "Carry on discussing, please. It is a very good discussion."

I went to the kitchen. I realised that actually this had been an utter disaster. They'd be telling the others and Colin would be quizzed too. I fully expected to get it in the neck - again.

Worse than this, after some had coffees and teas, when they were leaving, Tom Bowler said to me closely, "And by the way, Reverend Curate Vicky, I'd get the leotard sorted out another time because you were impersonating a camel. And your bottom is rather impressive."

Oh shit, by 'camel' I knew what he meant. As I could see Peter moving, I went to him and said, "Do you want to stay back?"

Peter said no, with work to do; but Kath said she would stay longer. I thanked Peter and, to be fair, a number did personally.

Kathleen said to me, as we retreated into the kitchen, "They were somewhere else."

"You're not kidding. And do you think I can tell anyone that I supplied Peter with the biographical information?"

"Go and say 'bye' to the rest of them. I'll make us two coffees."

"Add one for my 'ex' Keith, who's in the front room. I'm fucking angry."

Kathleen Continues Tricks

Keith brought his drunk coffee mug to the kitchen to then go to the downstairs loo for a pee. We two women were washing glasses and pots.

As he returned, zipping up his flies, he said, "Doesn't sound like it went too well."

"No it didn't," I said.

"Another planet," Kathleen said again.

"I have news. The job is finally moving and so am I. I want an early night; there's a long journey for me tomorrow. Look, there's no point me taking any furniture, frankly."

"Oh," I said. "Is that it?"

"Yes, it was confirmed while you were going to that little show. From tomorrow on, the room is yours."

"Let's kiss goodbye then," I said, and it was on the lips like we had done before in better days. "Goodnight - goodbye."

"Yeah, I might be gone early."

With him gone upstairs, we went into the lounge to drink more and eat leftovers. "I am so angry about tonight. This was a long time in the making. I hoped the show would be like the 'Lentern' one you did. But I wanted the presentation and the discussion. And whoo, some men discover that I am a woman."

"Peter will have plenty to tell Kathryn about tonight. Something to tell you. Uncle George went in the Titansea Hotel, and found out you used the name 'Cynthia Grayking'. Barman knows: it proves you were loyal to Christine."

"Kathryn and you are so similar. I can't tell you apart."

"This is the odd thing. We have concentrated on being identical twins all our lives. It is such fun fooling people. But in one thing we are different. She talks about blokes and I don't. What is the attraction?"

"You tell me. I wonder sometimes."

"I can't tell you," Kathleen stated.

"Find a bloke and find out. You've not..."

"I'm asking you, because you're religious..."

"That's debatable."

"I've got feelings for Winnie. Is that wrong?"

"Absolutely not."

"I don't know what to do about her."

"About her or with her?"

"I see what you mean. Both."

"Well, I am bisexual. I know that because I do have crushes on women as well as men. I'm just cursed, cursed with everything."

"You sound angry."

"You bet I am. I am taking my clothes off. Sorry, but this is who I am." So I did this, including the red leotard, and she looked at me from so close. "Kathleen, tell me about you and your sister."

"You're forty, I think, and very pretty. I suppose another woman would look at you and think nothing, whereas I am responding."

"Take your clothes off, act ordinarily and friendly, and you can consider me like hetero women consider men other than their own partners."

Thus Kathleen took off everything - including her leotard - and laid back on the settee next to me.

"Kathryn and I caused endless confusion at school. The science teacher even made a lesson out of it. He got a microscope ready and got us to fingerprint! Identical we may be, but not at the level of fingerprints."

Kathleen further told me that her aunt and uncle had brought them up since being two years old, her aunt dying two years ago.

"Do you remember the news about a house fire, caused by a cigarette smoking alcoholic woman who fell asleep and died in the fire?"

"There was something tragic at the time," I replied, with a vague recollection. "I was at East Midlands University so heard about it at a distance."

"A neighbour got us out, while a burning timber fell on our father, round the back of the house, not realising we were in the neighbour's car. Mum died in hospital after excess smoke inhalation."

"So you were those infants. Brands from the burning."

"Hey? So Aunt Julie and Uncle George took us on and we never called them mummy and daddy. But we were adopted and took on their surname; we could have been called Jones. Anyway, enough of history, as Kathryn and I have a request. Historical."

"Oh?"

"Especially as you are local. We may as well do something while unemployed, so we're part of the Scanning Local Populations Project. Wytham and all around should have a mixture of Celts, Saxons and Vikings."

"What do I have to do?"

"The swab." Kathleen went into her nearby handbag and produced a small plastic tube container and then a pack of cotton buds, from which she removed one and handed it across to me. "Put it in your cheek, turn it around and not get spittle on to it as such but actual cheek cells. So be quite robust."

"Like this?"

She nodded. When done, she put it in a tube with a number that she shared with me, and said they will also do Adam and Peter.

"Glad to oblige. Not quite gynaecology, but that's a relief."

"Hey? The thing is, the population is supposed to be majority Anglo-Saxon, with the old view being the Celts were pushed out. But if burials were happening at the same time as cremations, then the Celts were burying and the Saxons were cremating and this suggests side by side communities. There was in fact very little conflict, and the Celts did adopt Anglo-Saxon culture. So, if relatively few Anglo-Saxons came over then they must have been the wealthier and more successful - their culture copied and also bred more. The Celtic culture was all the more resistant in Cornwall, Wales, parts of Scotland."

"So the question is: is my body Saxon or Celt?"

"You'll be Saxon, Linda: long and lean. You have a beautiful body, Linda. We're Saxons, it turns out, Kathryn and me, down our mother's side."

"I might be long and lean for other reasons."

"What? Viking?"

"Personal. Why are you so interested in archaeology - both of you?"

"It's about origins, isn't it: Bronze Age, Iron Age, Romans coming in, Anglo-Saxons, Vikings, and then the imposition of the Norman French elite which changed our aristocracy and royalty."

"What don't you do? What do you avoid?" I asked.

Kathleen said, "Auntie Julie was alcoholic, and trying hard to stop, so Uncle George stopped. Father was down the pub more often than not as well. We don't do drink or drugs."

I said, "This area is awash with drugs and alcoholism. Your body is so good - helped by treating it properly, no doubt. You've got the right amount of fat - really. You've removed your pubic hair. My breasts are out of proportion but yours aren't."

"Thanks. Kathryn and I have looked after ourselves and we stick to the same diet. We try to look exactly the same, if we can. Adam doesn't drink because he's an alcoholic."

"Really? I had no idea. When was he boozing? He really doesn't seem to tell me anything."

"Up to when he left the police. When Ann bankrolled him, she insisted he went teetotal."

"I'll mention it."

"Don't say I said this."

"I won't mention it then, unless it comes up. I don't drink, mainly because I don't like it."

"Linda," said Kathleen. "You look pretty. You showed a 'camel toe' because there was nothing under your stretchy leotard. How do you get yourself looking so hairless?"

"Because there isn't any. Feel, if you like."

"Really? Should I?"

"Feel the skin with your fingers. Any hair?"

"Ooh, none," she said, as she ran her hand up by one labia, and then around the top to go down again. "Feel mine."

"Yes, I can detect hair. I really can. It is not as soft as it might be."

"Tonight, I wore light mauve ultra thin knickers underneath. Kathryn wore the same. And the cut was better."

"You know, Kathleen, I can sit sunbathing by a pool with my legs open at a naturist club, or with my friend Diana, and no one cares a jot. It wasn't true, recently."

"Recently?"

"My training vicar came to see me there. Rules are rules and not only did he have to undress but he saw me like you do now."

"He strikes me as a bit traditional."

"He coped. Here they are making such a fuss of an outline? It so annoys me. Can you do me a favour? Can you brush the hair I do have?"

"And long, and groomed." She took my hairbrush in my small bag below and applied it to my head of hair. Kathleen said, "We've both done camel toe pictures. You pull the knickers or bikini bottoms up, and you emphasise the lines. The lighting is angled to make a shadow where the material is trapped. There is a camera club opening soon in Titansea and we will be occasional models but as one person because of Peter."

"I also did photographic modelling and then the lesser-paid art modelling. Some months ago now Colin Cromer received naked photographs of me from that time. We thought someone might have been trying to compromise me before my ordination as priest. But they didn't follow up and I didn't care anyway."

Kathleen said, "Especially with the Internet now, if you go naked as a model your pictures could hang around for decades."

"In the past," I said, "it was lots of photographs in private collections, and negatives. If they circulated at all, they did so at a private level. Not now."

"So - this hair is done now."

"Please carry on. I like it."

Kathleen asked, "Are you being sexual, or are you being naturist?"

"I am being both, Kathleen. I refuse to make the distinction."

"With me?"

"With anyone."

"No one has been sexual with me. You are a lot older than me."

"No one?"

"Can I kiss you?" she asked.

"If you want. But, if what you say is true, you need to ask Winnie. Go on then. Do it properly: good contact."

"OK, I will."

And she did. Then she stopped.

"Kathryn says Peter is teaching her. So would you teach me?"

"Well, Peter and Kathryn are starting a relationship, which is its proper place."

"Sorry. I wanted to know. Winnie could say no."

"We could be playing games. Sensation and entertainment. Nothing wrong with entertainment, but it is not intimacy. The group under investigation do sensation and entertainment, but not intimacy I reckon."

"Can you be with me now like you were in that group?"

"Kathleen! If you knew the half of it. Perhaps you do."

"Can I touch you?"

"What do you want? Oh, go on then. Just put your hand on my stomach. Yeah. Just rub it a little. That's real flesh."

"You do have very smooth skin. Silky."

"That was my name as a photographic model. Silky."

"Can I touch you more intimately. The wetness place," she said. "Camel toe for real."

"There is a common myth, Kathleen, that models must be really sexually experienced. It's not true. Some of them are forward, but others have no experience and it is safer doing modelling because they are not touched."

"Can I taste you?"

"Yes. I'll sit more forward."

She got off the settee to the floor. It was quite a pleasant sensation, of course.

"Can you do something to me?" she asked.

I said, "Sit on my lap facing me. I'll stroke around your breasts, one at a time." She sat on my lap and I stroked her, with her untouched nipples growing. As she returned the treatment it was obvious that she had no technique. "Kathleen, I am not a jug to be polished. You should wait to get to the nipple area. Other women have more responsive nipples than me."

"I feel sensation from mine without you having touched them at all."

"Always try and hold off something. Always be a little unsatisfactory in your satisfying. That's better. Circulate around. Use the back of your fingers. So now my other breast is getting envious, and this one jealous, so move on. No, slower. I am going to lick your breasts and your nipples."

She clearly was enjoying this attention.

"Now what?" she asked.

"Because your legs are wide over mine, I'll put my finger in a little." Having done this I said, "Move that low table and we can lie on the floor. Yes; so you get down on your back, legs open and I will lick you." In fact I descended to lick down her obviously shaven legs, and moved with more focus around her thighs. I acted with intent above and on to her vulva area. I slightly parted her lips, and looked at some pink, shiny flesh.

She then said, "I need a wee."

"It sometimes happens."

"I'll wash afterwards."

"Good girl."

So she got up and went into the downstairs toilet. I raised myself up on to my knees, facing away but looking around. The toilet flushed and she asked me to resume.

So she lay back, and, noting the water, I resumed, parting her a little, and applying my tongue. And then I stopped.

"Identical twins you may be, but it isn't just your fingerprints that are different. You smell different, you are less aroused." I shouted: "Kathleen! Come back in here."

Kathryn closed her legs and looked away from me. Into the room came a naked Kathleen.

Kathleen said, "We were going to switch back."

"I don't care." I showed my anger. "You two: this is an abuse of trust. For one thing, you, Kathryn, have a boyfriend. Kathleen, sit on the floor alongside your sister."

"Sorry," said Kathleen, now furthest from the sofa.

"Sorry," said Kathryn.

"You two: I have had a fucking awful day, and the last thing I need is you two trying tricks out on me. I didn't want to do any of this, and you two have tried it on."

Kathryn said. "I think we'd better be going."

"You damned well won't - I haven't finished yet. Look, you two, I've had my fill of being done over by others, so now I'm turning the tables. Get your bloody legs open, both of you." I rammed my finger into Kathleen and descended with my tongue on to Kathryn, telling them both to lie back.

"Oh wow," said Kathleen, as I curled my left hand finger upwards varying between movement and pressing. With that done, I pulled my finger out rapidly and sat up with a dripping tongue from Kathryn. Now I pressed my tongue to Kathleen and pushed a finger into Kathryn.

I kept this going for a while until I laid back myself and said, "Come on, pull me open, both of you."

"Peehole," Kathleen said, as each pulled at their side.

"Yes. And below it, no chance of speleology, no descending eggs. You go in, Kathleen, as there's a small space to go in. Swirling - that's good - but it's not like a washing machine! Slow down! Finger up. Your turn, Kathryn, seeing as you're so keen to join in. Yeah, and, Kathleen, your sister can watch you lick my perineum and my anus."

"Can you do that to me?" asked Kathleen.

"I'll do it to you both. Get on your knees both of you and put your bums up. Stick your bum up more, Kathryn."

I got to work, licking and probing, until two men were stood above me and them.

"Very nice," said Keith.

"Well, it's different, said Adam. "He let me in."

"I thought you'd gone to bed."

Keith said, "I finally sat in your bedroom, wondering about a last time with you, seeing as he wasn't here then. The CCTV monitor came on and Adam was approaching. I sort of looked downstairs and realised you were busy."

By now the twins had sat up and were making an effort to cover their bits. I didn't bother.

"So what's going on, Kathryn?" asked Adam. "Peter didn't expect you to go out."

Kathleen said, "It's my fault. I wanted to know things. I've always asked my sister to join in. We did a switch but Linda knew immediately. Please don't tell Peter."

I could see him wondering if Kathryn had ever switched with her sister when with Peter.

Adam asked, "Shall I go home, Linda? Are you entertaining overnight?"

"No. Stay. I'll get up. You two had better get dressed. And, no, there is no final time with me, Keith."

"A second goodbye from me, then," said Keith.

I stood up, saying, "Look, er, Kath: it was a good show tonight. I'm only sorry Kathleen that the discussion was such rubbish. Anyway, I've some information for you two. It's not just your fingerprints or your vaginal smells. Your bum holes inside are not identical."

They left, and Adam went upstairs with me. The sex with him started to be pretty good. However, the phone was buzzing. Unusually, late, Colin Cromer had left me a text message.

You are obliged to attend Morning Prayer and indeed carry out all the Daily Offices. I wanted to talk to you about a South African Anglican congregation that might be coming here. Events by you mean we are becoming vulnerable.

A message from the suffragan bishop!

I need to be blunt, direct, and specific: wearing nothing but a leotard gave some of your parishioners a display of your reproductive region. Also, there was an awful lot of your bottom on display. This is a serious breach. Decorum is expected. I also hear that you had a discussion afterwards in which you and your magician friends were spreading doubt. You and they promoted atheism, Unitarianism and witchcraft. Your show even invoked reading the minds of the dead. You must apologise to Colin Cromer and you must issue a PUBLIC apology for the show and discussion having gone wrong. But I want this resolving fully. It is time you submitted to the episcopal authorities for all your misdeeds and show willing on all fronts. God bless as ever.

"Adam," I said, "we might have to stop this investigating. I might just have to give way."

"Nope."

I said, "Fuck me, you bastard."

Avoiding Sanctions for Now (Wednesday 21st August)

"I want to avoid Colin Cromer," I told Diana. So Diana called the doctor and Doctor Gujjar came at very short notice. The note that Kathleen took to the church from him described me as 'fatigued' and 'in need of rest' with 'mental exhaustion and physical complications'.

This time I was avoiding with a medical certificate. Diana stayed, undressed completely and got into my bed again. Life has its compensations.

"What went wrong this time?"

"I had a leotard on, to be an assistant. Let's just say that, as well as showing a lot of hip, it pulled tight on my undercarriage."

"So?"

"Well, it hardly matters to you or me, but it frightened the horses. And then we had a discussion in which, let's say, my approach to thinking things through didn't exactly get on with the same horses."

"I thought they were supposed to be sheep," said Diana.

"So the other shepherds or jockeys aren't exactly backing me up."

"I'm just so sorry," said Kathleen, when she called back in.

"No," I said, "it's not you and your sister; it was the whole thing."

Diana picked up the drift. "I'm not going to ask," she said. "I'm worried about you being run down so easily."

Aardse came in, and Diana told him I had fallen ill again. He hoped I would be better and said he could cope. I'm not sure what he thought about his fleshy wife with me, other than I was lying on my side as if to sleep and she was sat up. While he was here Kathleen brought up drinks, so it forced me to sit up.

Adam decided to spend the night at his accommodation - Diana was occupying his space again. One person who did not contact me or even visit was Colin Cromer, and that was actually a relief.

A Suicide (Thursday 22nd August)

Kathleen brought me breakfast on Thursday morning.

Diana in bed alongside stated, "You do need rest, and I was here all night."

"I could stay," said Kathleen, "with or without Winnie."

Then I said, "Hang on, it's Adam. What?"

"Someone is Resting In Peace. I've just heard."

"What?"

"Kenneth Osis. He's topped himself."

"Oh shit. Is he in hospital?"

"Maybe it's a morgue."

"You... are... kidding."

Diana, able to overhear, put her hands to her face and dropped her head. "Oh God no."

Diana asked, "What have we done?"

Kathleen put her arm around Diana's shoulder - not mine!

I said, "I - we - haven't done anything!"

Kathleen then said, "You told him to get lost on Tuesday."

"Did you?" asked Diana. "What did you do this time?"

"Threatened him with legal action from Adam."

"What for?"

"For being a pest. He told me they'd decided I must return."

Diana seemed to make a silly comment: "I did wonder if we couldn't ever have met him half way."

"Well, which half do you suggest, Diana? Your lower half? I've had enough of this. Adam can stop his investigating and I am going to do what they want. Christine was in it for herself. I don't care any more. They can have me for whatever they want."

"No," said Diana, with Kathleen perched on the bed. "No they can't. He died because of what they did to him. They overwhelmed him."

"Look," I said, with Kathleen still comforting Diana. "He was an immature pest. I treated him for what he was, and then you wanked him off in the bathroom."

"I didn't just 'wank him off' - he needed to finish off his excitement about you and about me, and you did traumatise him."

"I did not."

"You screwed a plastic bottle in his arse! The man was in agony."

Kathleen then asked, "Were you going to do that to Kathryn and me on Tuesday, Linda?"

"Oh goodness me," said Diana. "Have you gone completely mad woman? That hotel and car showroom must have made you crazy."

"Osis wanked off was long before the hotel and car showroom. And as for Tuesday, Diana, they tricked me - didn't you Kathleen?. I was licking her out, Diana, on her request and not mine, and she went to the loo, and said she'd wash afterwards, and made out she'd come back, when I knew from the change in vaginal steam that it was Kathryn."

Diana started giggling. "Vaginal steam?"

"So I told Kathleen to come back in, and made them lie down alongside each other, and when they'd had their bottoms in the air a little while, Keith and Adam came into the room."

"I said I'm sorry," said Kathleen.

"And I've accepted that, but this is not all my fault."

Diana said, "Adam is right to take them on. You are safe here, with friends, and wait for Adam to strike."

"Colin Cromer saw me naked."

"What?" she asked.

"I didn't tell you. He visited me while I rested at Bever Wood."

"You didn't set about him?"

"For God's sake, Diana. Oh I can't be done with this." I said. I pulled the duvet up and turned to sleep.

I was doing my turn in a naked opera facing an audience and found myself unable to sing. Kathleen woke me.

"Your friend Jenny, apparently, is on the landline telephone." She handed it to me.

"Where's Diana?"

"Downstairs."

"I'm coming down for the funeral," Jenny told me, "and I'd like to stay at yours. I think it's wrong: Ken should have been allowed to withdraw. Can I stay at yours?"

"What? Yes."

"I want to come soon as possible, please. Saturday?"

"Yes, Jenny. Yes, okay."

"Thanks, bye." She rang off.

Diana upstairs wondered if this was wise, and Kathleen wondered if Jenny was friend or foe.

"Let her come; she was my friend. But, can you stay here Kathleen, in a room? Bring Winnie"

I did turn on local radio on the hour and it was all about Kenneth Osis, a clergy suicide. The report said:

A rural clergyman in the County of Foss has been found dead in his vicarage. Parishioners first raised his absence from a church meeting and contacted a neighbouring clergyman Reverend James Wilson. Reverend Wilson made entry into the vicarage and then called the police, who isolated the scene. Police say they are currently not looking for anyone else connected with the incident, but will interview those who knew him and there will be a coroner's hearing in due course.

I was shaking. Why would he do such an extreme act? Why was he even doing a confessor role for others - indeed, why was he even a priest? That, though, was like accusing him.

Diana went out shopping, leaving Kathleen to run up and downstairs. I spent half an hour on the toilet, also reading a book: Church Leavers: A Sociological Study by Bernice Wilson.

Diana had heard the radio report earlier. Back from the shops said to me, "We led him along. Actually, Linda, you did. You sexually overpower people. He was weak; you could tell he was weak."

"I told you..."

"It doesn't have to be all your fault. He contributed."

"You're right."

"I think if I was you I'd say as little as possible to the police about your many liaisons."

"The police? I didn't kill him."

The landline phone rang again. I said, covering the microphone end, "Oh crumbs, Connie Wilson."

"Very quick. You won't likely hear from Bishop Terry so I am going to have my say. Your training vicar thinks you are swinging the lead by going sick after embarrassing everybody. You know Ken kept a diary don't you? He kept his confessionals out of it, but he wrote in all his private life, and you'll come into that all right. It isn't the Bishop that will come crashing down: it is you. Just mark my words." The telephone went dead.

I suddenly developed a headache, and my mouth was dry. My stomach was becoming queasy, to such an extent that I couldn't fart out the gas securely. Off to the bog I went, again, rushing past Diana.

Kathleen told me that Winnie was excited to move in to a room, even to stay only a short time.

Narrator: Adam Discussion with Diana (Friday 23rd August)

I went to Diana's house, just in case people were watching my premises and Linda's house. Diana had left Kathleen with Linda. She hated me, but was always practical.

I warned Diana that what she was about to see on my laptop would disturb her: two videos I had paid for online and downloaded using a good chunk of the monthly gigabytes allowed in my account. The first was a 'glory hole' video, I explained, of a naked woman servicing various unidentified gentlemen with her various orifices in a booth using wide slits. The second was known as a 'gang bang bukkake' video - the latter term, I said, adapted from a Japanese ejaculation fetish.

"Oh crumbs. At least it's not obvious," said Diana. "Clearly we know who it is, why you are here."

"It's a black wig," I said. "And those covered spectacles are flat lenses."

"This second video is worse, far worse," Diana commented.

"The first video is over an hour, and came from three hours plus, Peter has said. The second one is almost live."

"Oh my God. Was she agreeable to this? How can she do this?"

"Peter says that during the second video she'd lost the ability to decide anything. Both sessions took place at what's called the car showroom. She was obliged to go to the car showroom for Christine Vine. Christine's scale of values and ours are somewhat out of sync; this group I am definitely investigating has sexualised Linda as well. She's always been pro-naturist, like you, but she might be losing it on the decorum of social values."

"I think it's worse," Diana said. "I think she is having a kind of mental breakdown. I think I'm going to have to continue looking after her. She tries to act tough and normal but, I mean, she's done this faux pas with this magic show and discussion, because she won't wear knickers, and then gave Peter full range to express his views, but she reacts by going back to her bed again. She's not swinging the lead. She also had sex with Kathleen and then Kathryn."

"I was there and I'm afraid Keith has been spreading rumours of her with the twins. You'd think she was less affected, but you're right. She needs overseeing."

"Kathleen is trying to work out her own sexuality using Linda - and Linda is not in a fit state to help, evidently."

"Jenny World wants to come down and stay at Linda's. She is penetrating her safe space. Tomorrow."

"Another reason why I need to be there," Diana told me. "Kathleen is moving in with her friend Winnie - discovering their lesbian leanings I think."

"I heard. I'm busy making approaches to tabloids that I have this evidence of National Church bishops involved in sex cultic activities and parties. I want a contract, but it must co-ordinate with the coming report on the diocese's inefficiencies and waste. This ought to have been out by now, but the publication date is delayed, because I'm told the diocese is performing a rearguard action, complaining of misrepresentation. Meanwhile, Peter and I have cracked a few websites. It's how we got to the 'glory holes' video featuring Linda. And there is something regarding Jenny. She is on the Secular Clergy Foundation website."

"What's that?"

"Well, it concerns clergy who have completely lost their belief in Christianity."

"So-called liberals like Linda?"

"No. Linda retains an attempt to maintain a Christian presentation. These people may have been liberal, but they equally may have been evangelical. Or Catholic. What they want is out, but for one reason or another they can't get out. In most cases, it is because they have a family and the ministry has a salary. The deception - that they believe when they don't - may even be set against their own believing partner."

"Is Jenny lying to the bishop and people in Hartlepool?"

"If she is, it is deceiving the Hereteu or Hasland group, in Hartlepool, deceiving at her home with Fatima and Akemi..."

"Akemi's none the wiser either way!"

"Of course, Diana. And then there's her role as in coming down to Serninsea and initiating people here."

"Ugh."

"No female clergy are resident here. But, getting past the passwords, it is definitely Jenny on the Secular Clergy Website, but she does not say if she is deceiving at Hartlepool."

"And John Barman?"

"Quite. So I have a suggestion, Diana."

"Go on."

"Jenny comes down here to get Linda back in the group. And Linda is under pressure now after the failed magic show and discussion. I don't like to do it, but we can threaten Jenny with exposure of her place in the Secular Clergy Foundation. This will undermine her, including her initiating in these groups under this Confraternity Vanguard."

"Let her arrive; bring her to my house here and confront her. Changing the premises from Linda's or yours might put her on the back foot - give her a puzzle as to what is going on. Do it as soon as she arrives tomorrow."

So we decided to arrange all this to happen. Diana would tell Linda very soon at an appropriate moment.

Then I had some news. "By the way. Peter is now my employee. Ann has provided financial back-up, if needed. The scheme was ending anyway. No doubt the dole will put it down to the success of their scheme, but statistics never tell the whole story."

"They'll want you to take on someone else."

"But I won't. So what was free to me now costs: over a longer period of time it amounts to subsidised employment taken as a whole."

Diana said, "Ken Osis: That's so sad. There may be developments over that: not necessarily how Linda and I treated him but how this group uses it."

I nodded.

Thus we had plans for my ongoing lover and her friend regarding a former lover and friend.

Finally, I showed Diana a copy of a letter hand-delivered by Kathryn in a scarf and spectacles to Colin Cromer's vicarage letter box.

Dear Reverend Cromer.

I am a resident of Serninsea. I need to tell you that the Suffragan Bishop of Bolingbroke is hiding secrets of a sexual nature in the locality. Don't be surprised if stories of abuse - with adults, not children - arise at the same time as the report comes out on your diocese's inefficiencies. One chaos exposes another. Perhaps this is why there is delay to bringing out the diocesan report.

Tell the diocesan bishop that, by taking Bolingbroke's advice on delaying, he is implicated in concealing what his suffragan has been doing.

Yours, Concerned.

Diana said, "What do you intend?"

"Cromer has blinkers on when it comes to this bishop. He hasn't realised that his bishop has been the driver of Linda's difficulties from the beginning. This will help redirect his thoughts."

"Are you telling Linda about this note?"

"Nope. It is a change of plan: originally I wanted nothing suggestive to anyone before the big reveal. But this is to prepare the ground, and there are two outcomes: either Cromer keeps it to himself or he passes it on and things get choppy before the reveal. It might too force the sex cult into hiding and mean less pressure on Linda."

"And what if I tell her?"

"Better not but I am calculating all the possibilities."

"You really are a bastard, aren't you Adam? I thought you were a bastard when I disappeared from round here. You are using Linda to further your own ends - money, no doubt."

"Ann says we will look after Linda, compensate her."

"That's what worries me about Linda: what's happening now will never leave her."

"We can be civil - you and me."

"As now. But don't think that the passage of time has made me think any better of you. And look at you now: you ask Ann for permission to wipe your own arse."

"Because Ann doesn't want me making the same mistakes. I've made mistakes."

"Like you fucking off to Nottingham. I'll never forgive you - never."

"And when I came back, Ann and Labhaoise took me on, knowing my moral debt. I do know all this. I'll let myself out. So you'll be ready, when the reports hit the fan?"

"I'll be ready. Yes, we can be civil. Fuck off."

"When you're done with these two DVDs, break each one in half."

"Has Linda added to your porn obsession then?"

"No. It's very limited. Honestly. There's one lass who I'd never meet."

"Fancy me having to wank you when I wanted a fuck."

"It was the fuck that got you pregnant."

"If you don't leave my house now I'm going to do you serious damage. Get lost. You fucking arsehole waste of space!"

Narrator: Linda The Police Call (Friday 23rd August)

When I next woke, Kathleen was tugging at me. Diana had been making love with me, and now I realised it was a dream. "Cover your tits and I'll let this man in your bedroom."

A mufti policeman came in and he and Kathleen sat down on the two available seats. I pulled the duvet up further as this man showed me his credentials.

"I am Detective Constable George Newlands from Wytham station. Okay? I assume you've heard about the death of your colleague, the Reverend Osis. We are establishing whether there are any suspicious circumstances. We have a few inquiries to make. The coroner is seeking some initial information. Is there anything of significance you know that might have led him to take his own life?"

"It's a complete surprise, and I only knew him professionally recently."

"In what precise sense?"

Diana walked into the room, coming from her house. "She's my friend; I'm looking after her. Thank you Kathleen. Yes, stay."

I thought Diana was in a commanding mood.

Kathleen said, "I think it is Winnie arriving." She looked out of the window. "It is, with a taxi full of baggage." Off she went with the doorbell ringing, and there was much going on downstairs and upstairs.

"You are?"

"Diana de Groot, her best mate, staying here."

"Detective Constable George Newlands."

So I answered some more. "He was my confessor, briefly: the person I met in confidential meetings to help me manage people confessing to me. He wasn't my first one."

"Well the law protects the confessional, as you will know. So, just going around that, was there any hint of why he would take his own life?"

"No."

"Did he ever discuss outside the confessional about his own brother committing suicide last year, and of his father dying of a heart attack also last year?"

"Really? He never mentioned it."

"You sound like you are relieved in some way."

"Hardly."

Diana said, "Definitely not. It's all added to her ill-health."

"Forget it then," said the policeman. "Did he ever mention his own health and outlook?"

"He might have been lonely. He brown-nosed some people. Do you know what I mean?"

"It's an unfortunate phrase."

"Bishops and so on. He was confessor to many, he told me, so perhaps he was depressed. But he didn't seem depressed."

"Well, the coroner may ask you for your impressions in due course."

Of course I hadn't mentioned our intimacies with him or scheming.

Once the detective constable had gone, there was a phone call from Suffragan Bishop John.

"I'm not happy, Linda," he said in his opening words. "I told Connie Wilson I would not ring you."

Diana came in close by me to listen.

"You see," said the bishop, "you are out of control, Reverend Linda. Anyone else would be giving you your marching orders. I have told you before, whatever we do we must be seen to be above reproach. Jim Wilson discovered Ken Osis's diary near his body, and the content of many of the pages of his time with you and a friend called Dee and later Diana give clues to this dreadful suicide."

Diana could have blown a gasket. I put my hand up to her. I said, "Connie Wilson made love to him, except it wasn't love was it? Is that in there? What about the punishment he might have received resisting initiation?"

"Connie has said she does not want you at the funeral, but I have said that we need you at the funeral to remove suspicion. All clergy should honour someone who was a faithful man and carried with him many secrets of our colleagues, including your secrets, some of which - outside the confessional - he has written down in stark detail."

He had not addressed my points but I said, instead, "Well he was never the right person for the job."

"Now you are questioning my judgement. He was exactly the right person for the job. He could have told me things about you, but he never did. How about that? You and your friend Diana lured him with your nakedness." My hand went up again. "You two played with him, the poor man. That friend of yours masturbated him. He loved ejaculating on to her body." I waved my hand over Diana's mouth. "And you, well... You terrified him - terrified him - by screwing a plastic bottle into his arsehole. The man was traumatised."

"Is his warning about my intended punishment in there? I have taken his warning seriously."

"And so you should, from such a sensitive, loving man. Indeed, I have said to Mrs. Wilson that I am now considering next steps regarding you, and she, being a sensible, organising sort of woman, is waiting for what I will instruct."

"I am off sick."

"Not too sick to receive Jenny World. She will give you good advice, I am sure. Two-thirty tomorrow she's arriving at yours."

"Don't forget, Adam Magellan is her friend."

"Oh rubbish. He is a friend of no one. I've told her that. He only comes to you for sex. She is coming to consider a parish - and is being considered, I might add. Remember, I have seen the diaries. Connie Wilson will be in touch, and this time you do as she says. Goodbye."

With him gone, Diana said, "We must expose him. Adam will take him down."

You must follow Adam's instructions, not hers."

"Quite," I said. "And then, I think, what the hell if I just fall in. I can take it. It solves everything. If I fall in, we can all live on."

"No," she said.

We heard quite a bit of noise, after which Kathleen showed her face. "It is the second bedroom?"

"Yes," I said, "with the double bed."

"Is this wise?" Diana asked me after Kathleen rejoined Winnie. "Anyway, I am going to stay over with you again. If I am in your bed, Jenny can't be: she can either stay here in the third bedroom or go to Adam's.

"I like Jenny."

"Linda, for God's sake. She's doing what Barman and the rest want. By the way, I may as well tell you: Adam has found a 'glory hole' and a gang bang something video and it is you in a black wig. They're horrible, Linda. Why did you do it?"

"Oh Crap."

"You piss in a bucket. At least you didn't shit or did they edit that out?"

"I didn't."

"So this Sanjay Bunker, who bought you a car and paid you six thousand was not being generous. He'll make his money. And these recordings also have very long shelf lives. They'll be watching this when you're an old woman."

"And he bought me three dresses. Funnily enough, I didn't wear any of them at the magic show in case they were too revealing. Instead, I wore a leotard and showed everyone apparently everything."

"Adam told me he'd found the videos after deep investigation."

"You spoke with him?"

"Yes."

"Can I see them?"

"Better not, Linda. Linda, you are not well."

"I'm better than I look."

"I think the opposite. Cut the bravado."

"Have you seen them then?"

"Briefly. I fast forwarded each one. Linda, they are disgusting."

"Adam - and Peter - is clever finding them. Peter will be in both videos - his knob and then masked."

"Linda, stop it. Yes, Adam is clever. I'll give him that. For your sake I have confidence in him. It's all in hand - I'm sure it is. You're crying."

"All this madness is swirling all around us; I don't think I can cope, Diana."

Diana got undressed, went for a pee, came back, and got in. Kathleen came in with drinks and some egg mayonnaise sandwiches. "Winnie made them up downstairs. We can go shopping tomorrow, Linda, Diana."

I said, "I want you two to feel at home. It will be good to get away from your uncle and become a little separate from your sister. You can have your own lives."

When Kathleen had gone, Diana said, "Sleep. We'll see what Jenny wants."

I went to the loo first, and came back. "You're a dead good mate," I told Diana, and went to sleep again, turning away from her and pushing my arse into her hips.

Colin Demands an Apology (Friday 23rd August)

Next day, Colin Cromer did call, after Diana went out to see Aardse. Would he tell me that I was swinging the lead? Kathleen brought him upstairs.

"Hello Colin. Again I'm afraid..."

"Quite. And how are you feeling?"

"I'm not suicidal."

"That's not appropriate."

"It's horrible what's happened," I said.

"I have to tell you that I think the show and the discussion by all reports to me were disasters. Not now, but you need to face me over your display of yourself and spreading your doubts."

"You saw me in the woods. I thought that was a landmark. You know what I mean."

"You don't display yourself to the congregation!"

Kathleen said, "It's not fair, Reverend Cromer. It was a good discussion on Tuesday and people should have learnt something. Leotards are traditional for magic assistants."

"Be all that as it may, a curate has certain duties and expectations. She is very early in ministry. Anyway, I'm not discussing it now but I will with you alone, Linda, when you recover. And your apology will be in the appropriate service order and newsletter, and you can write a piece on your doctrinal certainties into the parish magazine."

"What parish magazine?"

"I'm reviving it. We'll get parts from the diocese and you may contribute to each one, as I determine, as I will. Now, Bishop John tells me an old friend of yours is coming here - tomorrow. Apparently she is affected by the suicide. He says she could do a sermon on Sunday. Naturally, I agreed, especially as you are ill."

"She is called Jenny and I knew her at school. Evangelical, apparently."

"That will make a welcome change. She won't be as evangelical as this new Vineyard church we are threatened with. As for the South African visitors, they'd better go to Eslaforde. I don't think we can have a visiting group given the turmoil happening. What I will say now Linda is this: your attitude is such that frankly you should not have been ordained. You spout doubts and display your body inappropriately. There is a rumour going around that you got up to alley cat activity afterwards with some people."

"Gossip and rumour and assumption..." (And Keith.)

"Well, we are stuck with gossip circulating and probably have to try and recover the situation. But it won't recover without your thorough and complete, and, I'm sorry to say, personally humiliating apology. You've only yourself to blame. I'll let myself out, ladies."

I said, "I am very sorry."

"Look," he said, pausing and turning to look at me in bed. "I'm not stupid. There are growing rumours of some very nasty goings on in these parts. Now we have this supposed Bishop - apparently - Christine Vine acting along with some mad unconnected DIY bishops and rumours are flying all around. I mean, what's that all about? I hear that some odd goings on happened in the hotel - and you were there as well. You were there and you know. Stay away from that woman. But, I suppose, you ignored me about Adam Magellan and I'm sure you'll ignore me about her. What do I count in all of this? I'm just your training vicar. Training? And cover your breasts!"

"Sorry. Thought it didn't matter any more."

"It does matter. That's the point: it matters a lot."

So off he went, my duvet hoisted up again.

Kathleen then said to me, "I love your breasts. When Adam shows what Barman is really doing, and this vicar of yours finds out, he'll have to change his mind pretty quickly."

"I want to thank you for staying in the room when Diana can't be here. I'm going to have to face the music, really."

"I like staying here."

"Get yourself a girlfriend. Winnie's slept here too."

"Alongside. Like Diana and you. How can I ask Winnie given her mother and my Uncle George? I'll have to get a flat."

"Make the second bedroom here your base. Then it need never bother your uncle's or Winnie's mum's. Stay as long as you like."

"Really?"

"Yes, really."

"I love you, Linda."

"The idea is you find love. Find out if Winnie is heterosexual or not. If she isn't, woo her."

"She's interested in me; I think she is."

Chapter 17 Suicide

Jenny World Returns (Saturday 24th August)

This time I was disinvented even from observing the Saturday wedding of George Oakley and Anna Barbara Aldrich at the parish church. It was scheduled for 16:10. I liked to have Saturday off, but my responsibilities were supposed to have increased around this time regarding weddings. I was in the doghouse good and proper.

Adam came in to Diana and me in bed. It was regarding Jenny. I'd cope, I assured them. Diana displayed all to Adam getting up, and both went to Diana's. I got up. Thus I was ready when Jenny World arrived at my house at the given time of 2:30 pm. I received her with a kiss and said, "Leave your luggage here; we have no time before meeting my friends at Diana's house. We're getting refreshments there." Kathleen came out of the house with me, introducing herself to Jenny. I smelt alcohol on Jenny's breath.

In transit Jenny said that she had come by train to Wytham and caught a bus across the Wolds and Ings. She was free of Fatima. Nevertheless she phoned to tell Fatima that she had arrived. She said it was a nuisance not being able to drive and noted my big car.

Diana had a large dining room table opened out in her house near South Drain. Peter was already sat down at it. The room was lit by a large window with bright indirect light coming in. Diana was sat down on a chair away from the table and so was Kathleen, next to Kathryn.

Jenny, who plonked herself half way along the table, asked, "Is Adam coming?"

"He will be back here very soon," Peter answered.

I said to him, "Congratulations on becoming properly employed."

"Aw, thank you Linda," he said. I was looking into the garden across the room and saw Aardse busy gardening.

"This is odd," said Jenny, taking a drink. "No booze? Wine? No? Okay." She also looked to the garden.

Adam arrived with his laptop, and sat at the end of the table. He said, "I thought we'd gather like this straight away, Jenny, because I have a thesis to put to you, if I may. There's this notion," Adam continued, "that you weren't straight with Linda and me when you visited before, and I want to check this out."

"Oh?" she asked, gazing towards Aardse and not Adam.

The doorbell sounded again. "We shall pause," said Adam. I went and let in Christine Vine, carrying buffet food on a plastic film-covered tray in front of her figure-hugging braless red dress. I said, "Hello," and added, "I think Adam has become Alec Guinness as George Smiley."

"Mother Felicity, let's see how Tatiana is getting on."

"I'm not sure who's more in a world of her own," I quipped: "you or me?"

I went back in to this dining room first, and Jenny obviously recognised Christine turning in from the hallway. Thus we had Christine's own staff-made sandwiches plus pork pies on the table. Christine sat by the door: if Jenny ran, she could stop her!

Jenny said, "I suppose I should say hello. Is it Bishop Christine these days, or is that only among your new mates?"

Diana noticeably looked in the other direction from Christine, who didn't answer.

Kathleen and Kathryn got up and started cutting the pork pies. Consulting the consumers, they put selections on plates and distributed them.

"Partake everyone," said Adam.

"Yummy," I said. "These pork pies are... Begin."

Adam said, "Linda and I... Well, we both have a special affection for you Jenny. But the reason we have gathered like this is that there is a Diocesan Commission of Enquiry taking place..."

"I know about that. So what? That doesn't stop me or anyone else wanting to work in Wytham Diocese." Jenny's selection had been pork pie slices and sandwiches of prawns in mayonnaise.

"And it could be published any time," Adam continued. "They have delayed it, but when it comes out we are going to expose Bishop John Barman for all his activities including around The Worshipful Company of Serninsea Theatre Players."

"I know what you are doing," she said. "So does Terry. Nothing to do with that report."

"Ah, but put the two together. Mmm. Lunch here in this buffet: first-class. Presently," said Adam, "there is no resident woman here to initiate."

"Well, you are wrong on that. Reverend Rhiannon Margaret Fleetwood, trained in Taunton, has moved up from Rochester."

Christine said, "She recently had a baby with Jonathan Eyre, Bishop of Margate."

"So?"

I said, "The one I saw pregnant was..."

"Julie Manns," Christine responded. "In fact, Rhiannon's had two with him. I've been talking to Rhiannon, Jenny. She has moved to Eslaforde, not here, and even into my old house, with the blessing of the Bishop of Scredington, and she should replace me at Wheaton."

"You and the Bishop of Scredington? Julian bloody Worsley," said Jenny. "We know about you and him."

Christine said. "Sorry, Adam."

Adam said, "Jenny, do not continue with these mad and dangerous people further."

Jenny picked up one of the unused serviettes and held it to her face, looking directly at Adam.

He went on. "Jenny, you know so much is about hacking websites these days, and we got into a list on the Secular Clergy Foundation website. For everyone, this is a website for members who are in the clergy but have lost all belief. Peter, please."

Peter said, "They are not theological liberals, though some may have been. Many were evangelical. They lose their belief. They become like Richard Dawkins in outlook. But they have a clergy job; there are often family or other commitments. They look for a way to get out, but until they do they carry on a deception. They don't do what Linda tries to do..."

"Thanks," I said.

"...which is to reconcile different realities and beliefs. They may have done that, for a while. No: it is gone. The performance in the pulpit is likely evangelical, or liberal, sometimes Anglo-Catholic. In this, they do their job as required, and then, one day, the moment comes to resign. Jenny, you are one of those website members. You don't discuss your sexual activities, but you are sarcastic at Christian hang-ups about sex."

"You are confusing me with somebody else."

Peter said, "No we are not."

I was astonished. Gosh. Zero.

Adam said, "If we expose this, Jenny, you are finished regarding your role in those religious orgies, with any initiating appointment, in fact anything at all."

"Bastard."

"But we don't want to," he continued. "You are here to perhaps get Inglemire with Caffenmere parish, or similar, but also for Linda to be the Vicar of Inglemire with Caffenmere."

"So? Jenny asked again. "I might prefer Linda to Fatima."

Adam said, more slowly, "You've come to do the Confraternity's bidding, but in fact you will do ours."

She said quietly, "You've changed."

"This is to help you, and let's get Linda free of them as well."

I said, "We want you away from that group and we'll protect you from exposure."

Then Jenny said, "It's a job. It's why I don't care if it's Inglemire. The more moribund, the better. Sex is what I believe in and I'm good at it."

I asked Jenny, "Whom do you love? Fatima, Liz?"

"Ugh, not Fatima. Liz won't reciprocate. Anyway, have you thought about Suffragan Bishop Sarah Deimos living with Harriet Leda, the one from Seaton Carew? Harriet would be a naturist too but can't with Sarah. What else is Sarah hiding, eh?"

"Jenny," I said, "It is not about sexuality or intended naturism. Sarah may or may not be a nicodemite like you but she is not involved in the Barman activities and you know it."

"Help us," Adam said.

Christine added, "Jenny. Terry Barman loves his progressive reputation, when in fact he exploits. He has been trying to 'get' Linda recruited from before she started her curacy."

Jenny said, "I know that. I'm having that pork pie slice, please. Someone pass it to me."

Kathryn did and then said, "His ego was why he wanted to promote the Serninsea Cross brooch."

"It's beautiful," Jenny said. "The brooch, not the pork pie."

Kathleen then said, "But it is a fake and already exposed as such. And then he tried to make the pathetic best of it that he could."

Adam said, "I want you to be put outside of the report, like Sanjay Bunker. Will you help us?"

Jenny said, "He's selling two videos all over the world: porn actor Linda Jupitas, in a black wig and spectacles. How about that? He'll go on and make money for years and years. He's as guilty as sin. Expose him, if you dare."

Adam said, "Linda won't be recognised. Peter, Diana and I have seen it."

Jenny, Barman is using you here to stop this investigation, and to get Linda installed in the same vicarage as you. You then become like servants to his mates' pleasures."

"I'm here for the funeral, the one that you caused, Linda."

"I did not."

"You fucked Osis. You and her."

"Wrong," said Diana.

I said, "Your lot punished him, something you are planning for me."

"He was only roped up on a double A frame contraption. Nothing happened."

"What?" I asked. "Only roped up on an A frames thing? That was punishment, enough for him to capitulate. He was likely terrified."

"He saw a layout of instruments and agreed to sign. We've never punished anyone. But don't test us, Linda. Just join the Confraternity."

"You don't need me if you have this Rhiannon for initiations."

"You heard. So we need female initiators in the Serninsea area. We know what Screddington does too."

Christine said, "Not any more. He's not my bishop any more."

Jenny said, "Linda, the group is the key and you and me are to be part of the group."

"No," said Adam. "Linda is not joining, and you are in no place for you to continue in this Confraternity so-called Vanguard."

"Anyway, we are expanding! I thought Rhiannon intended to go to Wales, soon. You will do as you are told, Linda. Terry will engineer getting Rhiannon into the Welsh Anglican Church, and to Casnewydd more than likely. She'd like a paddock with two horses."

"Eslaforde wants an evangelical and she fits the bill," said Christine. "Eslaforde has money."

Adam said, "You're not listening, Jenny. It's not happening any more. You're in no fit state to be an initiator here: you surely don't want them to know that you are on that website. And, meanwhile, we will break the Confraternity Vanguard: bring it all down, and you are better off helping us do that."

"Adam, you're an arsehole and a shit. That's what a lot of people think, but no names. I tried to love you once. Later I heard that you were a cheat. And your blackmailing won't work: it only works if you've got nothing to hide and I know where your skeletons are buried."

"You can't function if you are on that website," said Adam to push his point again.

"Nope. Two things. The validity of the sacrament - the initiation - does not depend on the condition of the person performing the rite."

"She's right about that, Adam," I said.

"And secondly, Barman knows. Do you want to expose Sarah Deimos? It isn't just Harriet Leda she tucks away, but her true self. When you searched, did you not notice?"

"I've got it here," said Peter. "She's right. Sarah Deimos. She's looking for a way out."

"Sarah?" I asked, to no replies. "Odyssey, then." (I started humming their tune.)

Adam then asked Jenny, "Does Barman... know about Sarah Deimos like he knows about you?"

Jenny replied, "We keep our secrets, and the Vanguard operates by secrets. So the only person who can be blackmailed is Sarah. Blackmail me and I'll see to it that Terry blackmails her. Liz is her boss, as well. And be careful Adam about your own cupboard. That's right, isn't it Diana?"

"Fuck off," she said, about something I knew not.

"Is Barman in that Foundation?" wondered Christine.

"No he is not," said Jenny. "Because, if he was, he'd know Sarah is in it. I won't tell you who is in it, but I can tell you who is not in it. He's always been a bit liberal."

"Hmm," Christine responded. "A sleazeball liberal."

Adam said, "Jenny, we can keep all this quiet for now. You can help us identify people involved. We take it that the Vanguard never actually went online. It was going to but it stopped."

"Not with people like you around," she said. "Hey, Bishop Cunt, don't be so purist. You were enjoying it above the casino before: we went to that bank together buzzing and took on the robbers."

Christine responded, "That was a supreme moment for service and sacrifice. You did it and I did it. Barman would have shat himself. Barman simply wants Linda - he really does. He wants her frequently, starting with his initiation of her. For him, that's what it is all about. He's angry that Sanjay Bunker got there first, in a race, and in style."

"In style? He beat Barman to my fanny?" I asked. "I'm the one person Barman is not going to get. And I am not going back, however they threaten me."

Jenny said, "But you opened your legs to Sanjay Bunker and then about forty others."

"How he relates himself to the Tagores I just do not know."

"Who?" Jenny asked me.

"Brahmin family line. I'll tell you later."

Adam then said, "Linda, drive Jenny back to your house. You can then rest, Jenny, after your travelling. Kathleen go as well. Christine?"

"I'm going to Eslaforde, my new house; I'm busy."

Diana said, "I'll return to Linda's later, Adam; I'm still staying over there. I'll tell Aardse."

Jenny said, "I'm grabbing some of this grub first." She did, and put it into a paper bag. "Your plan didn't work, did it Adam? I haven't been trapped. I'm not co-operating; I've come to get a parish and I have come to persuade - force - Linda."

When we arrived at my house I was suspicious of a car with someone sat in it. I was not sure. Kathleen, Jenny and I went in, and Jenny took her suitcases to her room, where she stayed alone for a while.

Narrator: Adam Afterthoughts (Saturday 24th August)

Diana made it clear that she did not want to discuss anything with me with Christine still present.

"I'm going," Christine said. "I know when I'm not wanted."

Indeed this meant everyone went, including Peter with Kathryn. So it was just her and me.

Diana said to me, "Well, Adam, that went well - not. Blackmail is said to be better than a bribe, but you'd better make sure the blackmail sticks."

"Quite. So Barman apparently knows that Jenny is in this Secular Clergy Foundation website. And she can retaliate too, expose Sarah Deimos for complete unbelief. Jenny is preaching here on Sunday."

"Are you going to that?"

"No. Perhaps Peter will go, though since he's gone on the payroll it starts to become overtime rather than some undeclared backhand."

"He'll not go out of interest?"

"Since that discussion Colin Cromer probably thinks less of Peter."

"So what now then?" Diana asked.

"We'll expect Jenny to start persuading Linda."

"Hmm. This would mean exposing Linda to danger if Jenny is successful."

"Linda will be fine once the diocesan report comes out, once mine is in the press, and Linda hasn't had to sign up. But my contact in Wytham at the diocesan HQ says they are doing everything to delay the report. Potential legal issues of named and shamed people mean them having a say back into the report. This is a convenient delay."

"Having to apologise on Colin Cromer's command is a real knock to Linda. She'll do it, and that's the best strategy. But she can't do the same with this Confraternity Vanguard."

"I'll ask Ann to reassure Jenny of no blackmail, because she knows that Ann has authority in my world, and then we'll just watch the lie of the land, see how things adjust."

"It's hardly a strategy, Adam."

"No, it's not. But we will publish."

"Because it is going to make you money."

"I promise we will look after Linda. She's a mate. You are really."

"I am not your mate, Adam, and if Linda had any sense she wouldn't be yours either. She's been on the rebound from Keith and he was a shit - it's bound to have affected her to know that her very own husband was constantly undermining her and having affairs at the same time."

"Well, we all need to keep a watch on Linda," I said. "That's about as much as we can do now as events unfurl. There is a lot of watching ahead: the diocesan report, the moves of Christine in her group, Linda's reactions in the parish and what her bishop and company try to enforce, and we need to be able to react. I'm talking about you, me, Peter, the twins, and Winnie."

Diana said, "If she needs comfort - in a holistic sense by the way - I'll be providing it and not you. You're incapable of comforting anyone."

Narrator: Linda Don't Go Out in the Sun (Saturday 24th August)

This was an odd Saturday. Kathleen, Jenny and I went out shopping. Once back, I didn't notice anyone sat in a car, this time, possibly viewing us. However, a neighbour, Glenn Jenkinson, was cursing a car that would not start. The MOT was soon, and he had a crisis of low income. I already knew that he needed the car for work, to get across Wytham, and could not rely on buses, that would take so much longer and didn't reach the western area of businesses without changes of buses.

The shopping stored, I went over and said he should come indoors. As a result, I gave my old car away by supplying and signing, with him, the necessary documentation. This gave my suffering obvious benefit.

It was a warm day and getting warmer: some sixteen degrees it had been at 9 am and up to twenty eight degrees in the afternoon. We'd seen a lot of wet weather, but now it was dry too even if the sun was hazy.

Inside, I decided to strip off. Kathleen, seeing this, did the same. She went upstairs to check on Jenny.

Back downstairs, Kathleen said, "Jenny is working on something she no longer believes in."

"Her sermon for tomorrow."

When Jenny came downstairs, she had already done what she had seen of Kathleen. So she had nothing on either. She started consuming one of six bottles of beer in a pack.

I asked her, "Did you not have a sense of crisis when you lost belief? Did you not try to recover it? Anything?"

"Nope. I was ill when I went religious, I'm not going to be ill when I lost the religious. It just went. I read something, it was convincing, the whole set of dominoes went over. I said to Fatima, it was gone, and she said I wasn't the first and some people get it back by carrying on. So I carried on, and soon found out those who were experiencing the same and were contented. We have a secular suffragan bishop!"

"Who was first?"

"She was."

"Does her sister know?"

"Louise is sad about it. She left the Anglicans for more honesty but it hasn't convinced Sarah. I go round to Sarah's and we have quite a laugh. She still does all her bishop things. They promoted her while it was going wrong, so she felt trapped. She said no at first, but as a woman she couldn't let the side down. As for Harriet, she's tolerated by those in the know so long as there is no ceremony of any kind. Sarah couldn't care less about ceremonies now."

"Harriet Leda. How does Sarah hide her from the wider public?"

"Lives in the same house, but it is never acknowledged; Harri never accompanies her to an official event; they have no recognised partnership. Harri knows about you and she wants to be a naturist like you. But Sarah keeps her in a box and Harri seems to accept that for the time being."

I drifted towards the window and the sun, putting an arm across my breasts. "And you?"

"I'm just looking for a quiet life. I've finished the sermon."

"What is she doing out there?"

"She's taking in the sun."

"Fuck, we're overlooked!"

Seconds later with my cassock slipped on I was calling out of the back door: "Kathleen, you can't do that here. Come in! Come in now! The sun is harmful anyway. We have to do this at Patricia's, or I'll get you a sun lamp."

"Are you two lovers?" Jenny asked, naked herself of course, speaking from behind me.

"No, Kathleen is my lodger," I replied. Kathleen came in.

"Sorry," Kathleen said.

Diana arrived, looked at the three of us and then she was the fourth naked woman in the house. I said, "You'd better know, Diana. Kathleen went out to sunbathe like that."

"Sorry again," Kathleen added.

"I don't suppose any of them will report you," Diana said.

"They know who I am and now an unknown woman goes out naked and sunbathes!"

Diana said, "As that rival author Diana Gabaldon would write, 'Dinna Fash!'"

"What dinner?" I asked.

"Fish dinner?" asked Jenny. "How is she a rival?"

"I prefer the other one." Diana then said, "Your sister's husband would say, 'Peid â phoeni' but it's not actually equivalent. A colleague at college said so."

"Ah."

Jenny's Sermon (Sunday 25th August)

Jenny was welcomed more warmly in the morning than me. Indeed Colin told me in no uncertain terms that this week I had to prepare and show him a statement of apology for my appearance in the magic show and for the direction of the discussion. I would have to give a clear affirmation of credal belief and assent to the Articles of Religion. If I didn't show full repentance he'd be unable to work with me further.

Jenny assisted with me at the Eucharist at which Colin presided. Colin did the intercessions, including remembering Ken Osis. Jenny was preaching in the evening.

I tried to cool down in more ways than one by spending an hour in the afternoon with Jenny at Carr Fen. I tried to get ahead of the curve by a long session in the bathroom before Evensong.

Before Evensong Colin asked me, "Have you written your statement or statements?"

"Not yet."

"On my approval of your texts you will apologise and state your credal affirmation in the three services next Sunday. Your longer apology goes in the new parish magazine."

Nevertheless the training vicar was happy that Peter Marshall was in the pews in the evening.

I brushed my hair with no idea what Jenny was going to preach - she had free rein. I was given the intercessions. Now it was for me to refer to the Reverend Ken Osis, as one of the departed. I said, "May he rest in peace," and Colin looked at me with fierce eyes.

Jenny walked up the pulpit steps. Off she went, reading.

"Jehovah's Witnesses, those biblical literalists not unknown for changing some biblical words to suit, refer to a coming New System of Things, when there will be no more war, crime, violence, death, racism, terrorism, old age, sickness, diseases, homelessness, or greed, or need for money. However, the Kingdom as paradise we preach will be far from any system. I prefer 'World to come' and leave it open.

"What do we think then of resurrection, the final and best hope we Christians have of the future life? Remember, these Jews are at least right that it is about the raising of the bodies of the dead to eternal life in a new reality, and the very first - according to the New Testament witness - was Jesus Christ. Our understanding of resurrection, this guide to our future, is Jesus Christ himself. And it is about our bodies, and if we think about it: they are what hold us, imprison us, constrain us, and allow us to be free. Jesus showed that the resurrected body is a free body, and does not have the constraints of our bodies today.

"Of course modern-day sceptics say it is so much hooey, because dead bodies rot and don't reconstitute, and what about all the folks who are released into spirit-energy at the crematorium?

"We talk in terms of atoms and molecules, but the problem of divisible bits wasn't unknown to the ancients. They might ask: suppose a believing sailor falls overboard and is eaten by a shark? That shark comes near a boat, and the fishermen capture it, and their community have a good meal from it. What about the bits of the human digested by the shark that goes on to grow the shark and later remake the humans who've eaten it? In our terms we ask, 'Whose atoms are they in the final big resurrection day'?

"Augustine, the Church Father, wrote in his The City of God that the flesh of those consumed by others' hunger evaporated into the air, and that it was like a loan, so that on the day of resurrection God would redistribute it to the first human to possess the flesh; in other words, every eating from then on was like borrowing. The shark borrowed the human that was eaten, and the humans borrowed what was the human in the shark. The puzzle would end when all would be restored.

"Now God surely can solve what would be for us an enormous puzzle, but the puzzle of proprietary rights might leave some humans with very little that was actually theirs. Plus every seven years or so aren't we intended to be completely refreshed and released? What if animals too are resurrected? Now some Animal Rights type theologians might be happy but gosh it really is then complicated. When you think about it we are dispersed through so many creatures and indeed plants that the spreadsheet of origins is simply enormous. Not that God cannot reconstitute, but we have to ask what is old and what is new.

"Imagine that we are all sand castles in a windy desert. We are just going to blow away, into smooth large sand hills in the wind. But eating, reproducing: that's like making new sand castles. We build against the grain, so to speak, and Jesus was both with the grain and against the grain, even the maker of the sand before the Holy Spirit moves the sand. Many scientists say that: all we are doing by eating and building up is delaying the end. Entropy is, in the end, unavoidable. Everything goes to waste: into a passive disorder from a one time created order; but indeed they also say that when we eat or indeed reproduce, or rearrange, we are holding off entropy. However, resurrection utterly defeats entropy - and yet not as we'd expect.

"Of course the biggest sand castle maker is Christ in wisdom who made the world himself. And the Christian Gospel does not promise us a wasteland of desert all blown across, as science does: indeed, science offers us the end of the wind as well. But, and here is the solution to the problem, nor does the evidence of the Christian Gospel offer us rearranged sand into sandcastles. The JW's New System sounds like more sandcastles to me.

"You see, it is clear from the gospels that we are dealing not simply in rearrangement or an existing transformation, but in what the scientist and theologian Arthur Peacocke called re-creation. The new reality ahead of us, at the point of resurrection and judgment, is re-creation, the recreative power of God. You cannot disperse humanity so thoroughly through death and have what is the important bit, personality, restored just from the dispersed atomic elements. It needs what God had done at the beginning, before the Fall, and so what God will do at the end, which is to use the full power of re-creation. The Word had made the World: the Word was Jesus Christ. Arthur Peacocke says a new mode of existence must mean an element of re-creation.

"The resurrected body of Jesus, and our own resurrected bodies, are not simply transformations, but are re-creations. Think about it like this, that death does demand re-creation.

"You may have heard about 'energising' in Star Trek: people beam down to a planet. It's molecule mapping and restoring after teleporting. But think about it. The person who walks on to the energising equipment is destroyed. Everything is gone, as he or she turns into an mighty energy beam. And they get reconstructed at the remote end. But the reconstructs can only be carbon copies, and even if they have the memories of those who stepped into the energiser, those that stepped in died - really died.

"And what went in was easy to reconstitute because no one ate them in between. But, on the other hand, with sufficient energy, we could generate several versions of one person, all with the same memories.

"Scientific transformations might include, for example, a bit of genetic jiggling so that, say, the energised person has a gene rearranged to remove what causes an illness. That's not re-creation: not in the full sense of rising to new heights, new fulfilment.

"However, what really would connect the dead person - and remember Jesus did die - would be the re-creative activity of God. An artist doesn't copy and paste a painting, say, even one lost in a house fire or something: it is painted again, yes like the one that was before, but it's a new creative effort, even one with the memories of the original. You put new life into that re-created painting.

"Perhaps my example is not a good one; to be a good one, the paints would have to be made from the ashes of the burnt-down house including the painting itself. Putting the ash in and mixing them all into colours to apply.

"But why re-create? For a purpose, for readiness, for the end-time. The end time? Yes, its condition of new perfection. It's what we call eschatology. So the miracle of Jesus returning, like any miracle God did, like the miracle of our more-than-restoration, is in the eschatology, the perfecting, and therefore the finalising re-creative power of God. And this is our hope for the future, in the creative power of God, bringing us all to a new mode of existence and the very basis of hope.

"And I would add this. All miracles are re-creations. They are all about the future-state and end-state that is our hope. They reflect purpose and bounty. Miracles, by God through Jesus, are all consistent, as is the very created world, and the resurrection was the greatest miracle, and will be on the road to glory. Amen."

Colin said to me immediately, "That was very good, wasn't it?"

"Yes." I was gobsmacked. I'd never heard anything like it. It wasn't just your gassy evangelical throwaway stuff but quite considered, and with a scientific edge to it and a crack at the Jehovah's Witnesses that often biblical evangelicals need to demonstrate.

We three lined up after the service to shake hands. Peter Marshall was holding back.

Ralph Thickett (who'd coughed at me at the magic show), said, "Now that sermon's what you should have said, Reverend. Substantial!"

"Not sure about the artistic analogy," I suggested. "Needs new paper, does need new paint. Stretched it a bit."

Colin, alongside, said to me, "You're envious of someone who preaches better than you and intelligently."

Jenny told Colin Cromer that our church in Serninsea was getting a reputation for theological sermons, so she decided to do one of those. She said, "I have this book from 1993 by Arthur Peacocke, called Theology for a Scientific Age. Would you believe it was published by SCM?" she asked - as if SCM are on 'the other side'.

I went to Peter alone to get a response. He said, "That was a hell of a shop window for someone who doesn't believe in the goods."

"Well, I couldn't do it."

"I'll let Adam know how it works, this level of deception."

Peter said hello to Jenny and Colin shook his hand.

Colin said to Peter, "You're always welcome here. Some are muttering about you as a sceptic, but my point is you've come and you've listened and she was giving good, thoughtful, guidance to our faith."

"She was doing that," said Peter.

Jenny said to me in the car going home, "It's complete nonsense of course. My sermon, like so much, confuses science and theology, and tries to write one in the terms of the other. And the theology adds nothing. However, it is not our job to tell them it is nonsense."

"It sounds like you are thinking," I said to her. "Wouldn't you have been all 'Jesus this' and 'Jesus that' as an evangelical?"

"I can do that. But you'd had a session on miracles and a magic show. It had all gone wrong. I put it right."

I asked, "Is Jesus not a rabbi with reverse ethics and an interesting love ethic that Paul expanded?" I was trying to find a floor she might rest upon.

"But these ethics are available anyway."

"Presumably nothing based on resurrection and life after death."

"Stop being silly," said Jenny.

"Well, what of the post-Easter Church and all that?"

"What of it? So what? Millions can be wrong with organising information. 'I want information! Who is Number 1? I am Number 2! You are Number 6'."

"Correct. I am trapped in the village. But - as a secularist, say: don't you have a commitment to truth?"

"My job is like doing Public Relations. Or like working on Russian Television News. I am an instrument of policy. Sure, it is better to do something else."

"So," I asked, "do you still have an ultimate purpose in life? Supposedly not."

"The thing is, I'm forty years old, and at that point in my life where I am mentally stable and I just enjoy fucking as many men and women as I can. When I had madness issues, religion held me together. I remain schizophrenic like people stay alcoholic. It is controlled now. I take a lot of drugs quietly: you didn't see me do this yesterday and today. I regret some of my letters to Geoff Virgo, but perhaps he has found something for himself 'up the candle', as they call it, and my uncle too. Let him join Christine. It's all tosh. If you want to get inside my knickers, Linda, you can do that. I fucked Adam and waited a long time for that. You can revive memories. You don't come back to life."

"No."

"Remember my breasts? They're bigger now," she said.

At this point she wanted me to stop at a Sutton all day store. She came back with a six pack of bottles of beer.

"Drive on."

"I suppose you and Sarah Deimos laugh it all off."

"She thinks it is as ridiculous as I do. I'd love to go to bed with her, but she really is in love with her partner. I lied to Adam. They don't know I am secular. I'm good at lying now. Maybe Liz and Terry suspect. Liz is a big believer. So is Terry, beyond his surface of public engagement and wanting public approval. Christine is right that his main focus is his own pleasure. He is a sociopath narcissist. I'm not, and you're not."

"Journey's quite short."

"By the way, I told you all that in confidence."

"No, I won't tell Adam. He shouldn't be trying to blackmail you and you shouldn't try to blackmail him."

Then she said, "If you don't mind, I like a lie down on my own after a big event like a sermon. I do need rests. I'll drink these in my room and then sleep. It's for mental stability, not tiredness."

This seemed to suggest to me that all was not completely well. I was still wondering how she could remain mentally stable when losing such a commitment. Perhaps she was becoming a militant atheist; perhaps she was reliant on drink.

Narrator: Adam Christine's Idea to Release Linda (Monday 26th August)

Christine came to see me and Ann Dromeghda. She declared, "The blackmail didn't work, so what we need is a plan that gets Linda safe. Don't be under any illusions: they'll treat her as their ecclesiastical property, a slave indeed, and she will feel obliged to give her consent to punishment."

Ann said, "There is the law of the land."

"They'll get her to treat it like consenting to BDSM - shared bondage, her submission and her masochism. If Jim Wilson is given free rein, it will in fact be his domination and his sadism."

"She says 'no' now. Surely 'no' means no?" Ann queried.

"Consent happens at different levels. At some point there is consent to take a punishment. Ask a teacher."

"I was a teacher."

"If Linda were to go to, say, above the casino, then she gives a level of consent they can use to get more consent. It's like how others do Conversion Therapy. They manipulate consent at one level to extend it to where consent did not exist previously. It's about obligations and reciprocity."

I said, "I can keep working on Jenny, but the attempt to blackmail her didn't work. She's here to persuade Linda to fall in."

"What will save Linda," Christine said, "is not being in communion with her bishops. Then they have no claim over her. They can't with me. So you and I have to help set her up with somewhere to go, somehow to operate, as a priest, where Barman and the rest have no claim on her. I did this."

"How does that happen?" I ask.

"Get her chucked out. I have a plan. My Church, the Liberal Apostolic Ecclesia, does all sorts of ordinations on an ongoing basis. Your schoolfriend Geoff would stop at nothing to get some ordinations done inside a legitimate actual church - with publicity. So we have to neutralise Jenny and get her back to Hartlepool, even if only for the time being. Then get my group hosted by Linda to have a Mass and ordain themselves new successions inside Serninsea parish church. That should get Linda chucked out."

"And what do we do?" asked Ann.

"Put this Anglican opposition into these terraced houses as a Church base. If it includes me, I'll pay towards it. I continue my relationship with property with you and Labhaoise."

"We're already on to this," said Ann. "The plans allow a complete property merger, meeting area and rooms, and accommodation too. If she was to stay in the Anglicans, it could be an office and meeting place, as well as a place for Adam and some others to stay."

"With God's guidance, Linda could come into my Church, and I would play second fiddle - really would regarding the property. But I'd like access rights."

"But," I said, "Linda receives a salary and has a whole house at present. This would be subsistence living."

"If it was secure and comfortable, I think she'd jump at the chance. And we'd likely make her a bishop to give her equality in the place in hierarchical terms, so that she doesn't see me as her bishop."

However, I had a further issue. "How does this affect the media exposure of the sex cult and the diocese's inefficiency?"

"Why should it affect it?" asked Christine.

"You might create a louder bang," thought Ann aloud.

I said, "It's a question of timing. There's this funeral, where Linda is in trouble already."

"She's in trouble over the magic show and discussion," said Christine.

I continued: "The sex cult revelations must couple with the bureaucratically inept diocese revelations. I'll ask Peter about recording in the church."

Christine said, "Don't. Involve as few people as possible: Ann, you, me. Anything else needs anonymity."

Narrator: Linda After Over 20 Years (Monday to Tuesday 27th August)

I had been reading of the death of Wade Clark Roof, 80, a sociologist of religion, particularly his interest in the spiritual lives of the baby boomer generation using ethnographic methods. Reading is important for a clergyperson; Colin Cromer seemed to think reading was irrelevant for ministry in a locality.

Friends and I went to Patricia's, a change on this Bank Holiday. This way we could all be outside and in the sun: Jenny, Kathleen, Diana and me. We were all applying sun blocker as it was hot.

And I had received the reason why we had to go there. It was a message from Colin Cromer.

The bishop has received complaints of nude sunbathing in your back garden. I am fed up with this. Can't you keep this activity confined to Bever Wood? Instead of lying about and doing nothing, you could have been writing your apologies.

Wonderful. Why did any resident call the bishop and not Colin directly? I realised that Jenny must have spoken to Barman, and he was using it. Surely no resident had complained. And it was only Kathleen who had been sunbathing in the garden.

We were back at my house. We three were eating as Diana had decided that she would return to Aardse - I was obviously well enough now. I expected Adam to arrive fairly soon or when available. Jenny had bought wine, and was rather knocking some back. I received a text message from Adam:

Everything is fine by me and I will stay at my place overnight. Love Adam.

Bedtime came and Jenny was naked, newly shaven and at my bed.

"You have your own room" I said. "You're making things happen behind my back."

"Move over."

I was expecting some sort of predatory action, but instead she started retelling her autobiography. And it contained a few new details. So, both of us recalled what we did with Adam in the upper sixth, and after I went to university she did attach herself to him. She learnt then he was dealing with two women at once again, but separately this time. She was fairly certain about the identity of the other person, but did not want to tell me even now.

"Anyhow, it came to nothing," Jenny said, "with the other woman."

"Or with you. He went to Nottingham," I said.

She explained that it wasn't for a number of months into 1998 before she went with Adam at that time. Keith had sex with her on his (second) Easter vacation when visiting home.

Jenny said, "I knew you were with him, so I thought I was within my rights to share. I think I was the last person he had sex with before he left for EMU. He went with Diana during his first year vacation back, before you went to EMU. She was a regular of his, like me - he'd taken her virginity in the sixth form. And I learnt the list from him, and can update it. Want to know it?"

"He told me. Or I think he did."

"Helen Venus took his virginity when a dinner lady - later Helen Eris."

"Yeah, he was proud of her approach."

"Justine Geldzahler, Carrie Warren..."

"Oh?"

"Carrie later transitioned to male. Diana, as stated; me; and someone back at university called Lorraine."

"Before me."

"You were next, and you were his project. I don't think you're right: he was sort of loyal, if you discount Diana and me. But then back here we had farm workers Hannah and Tilly McClelland on the same night. Patricia Berger was next, after her divorce."

"So after university, he was anybody's and he was with me then. When is Cheryl?"

"Six years back, but after Diana again. Cheryl Mould was just divorced from Frank Little. He took advantage like that. After Cheryl was your sister. Took him two years and it was Lucinda's come-on. Give him that."

"I know what I'd give him."

"Just before your family went to Wales. So we're at my initiation in 2015 and your husband had me several times after, and of course there was noticably Yojana Asthana among others whom he mentored. There you go. My information is from within the Confraternity. You will tell it your own list."

"No I won't. We were talking about you."

"So before I went to Tees and before Adam was gone there was an evangelical group of believers in Serninsea..."

"It died away - the come and go of some of these spontaneous groups..."

"I moved from them to a Tees Spirit-filled crowd. It was very intense, at a time of developing illness. I showed real signs of disturbance, with religious fervour all wrapped in. I showed a new spirit of intolerance too, and with Geoff being gay, I wrote to him to 'reach for the Lord' and turn his 'sinful ways' around. It was all very intense in a Vineyard setting. Their model was John Wimber."

"In Fuller Seminary in America, his sociology of church planting was the idea of everyone attending being of the same social strata for more effective evangelism."

"I was about to tell you that, Linda."

"You ended up in the same firm as me," I said.

"Because this Christian Union person said the sociologically selective approach is wrong, because we should minister to everyone. The Vineyard world was also too indisciplined, too free-wheeling. The Christian Union approved a nearby Anglican Church: fundamentalist and anti-women regarding presbyters in charge. But there was a minority debate within, and some thought I had an ability to attach to people quickly and that this would suit gospel ministry. To do that I moved to one of the more moderate Evangelical churches, although my views were at the far end of the scale. And anyway, the hard-line church went independent under their minister Mervyn Tinkle, spawning several plants."

"They didn't pursue you?"

"Not once you swap fellowships, and they had plenty on their plate. So I stabilised with a doctor's help giving drugs and strategies against stress. The Maths plus Business Education and training for accountancy wasn't fulfilling, so I went forward for ministry. I was accepted to begin after my degree. I had my own uncle's example, if rather odd."

"He was independent. What about the mental illness?"

"I kept it quiet and they concentrated on me transferring from the free-wheeling. Then in theological college I had to do academic and Contextual Theology, and I was shocked. I mean, these arguments seemed to be those of 'the enemy'. I had nothing sufficient by which to counter these academics. You should 'unlearn' to learn, they said."

"Not to me."

"So many students write these critical, well-referenced, investigative essays, and then just put what they used to think back together again within their ministries. They recommended I carry on to do the same."

"Some of my tutors were into Karl Barth, Hans Frei, George Lindbeck - died last year. About Bultmann they said it's all about the ahistorical text. My essays got good marks as I set about their motives."

"The academic continuation into parishes doesn't work except what Lindbeck tried to achieve."

"Yes, in the parish they do expect 'role performance'. I was too critical, too actually liberal, never postliberal."

"So I had two years, not one, before I was priested, eleven years ago, under Judith Short at Marske-by-the-Sea. She was tolerant but managerial and demanded regularity in all things, and I did as I expected."

"Sounds similar to Colin. Did you get a boost being ordained priest, like I did?" I asked.

"No. Broken biscuits was my sensation. Bishop of Tees Hardwick Cockburn did the honours. Judith wasn't sure I was stable, but I was moved to Fatima Tamuz's ministry after only a year as a priest, and I went as a curate again. Fatima is a bad woman; her friend was Liz Huett. I knew I was having internal problems again. I developed unexpected and confused feelings for Fatima after she seduced me. She insisted that sex was divine, like her pal did, and she didn't leave me alone. She became more controlling, and then something enormous happened."

"Enormous?"

"I was visited by Elizabeth, then a priest, and was paraded naked in front of her. Liz was ravenous. I wet the bed with my orgasms like I'd never done before, and she was saying it was all holy and divine and God right in me. The authorities knew nothing of this side of Liz, and Jon Eyre and Terry Barman put words in for her elevation. Fatima felt overlooked and took it out on me. I swear I thought I was going nuts again because I really believed them about orgasmic divinity."

"Did this outlook on 'orgasmic divinity' put things back together again, for a while at least, Jenny?"

"No, because of the double awareness: I believed it, but it was also like madness. I was scared of Liz, really scared, especially after Penuel Fairthing retired and she became Suffragan Bishop of Segedunum in 2015. Liz said God loved me and I should be available to her all the time. And then one day soon she arrived with both Terry Barman and Jonathan Eyre. They all had me, all ends and everywhere."

"Oh my God," I said. "Together, or one after the other?"

"Fatima didn't take part, because this became my initiation; they said Fatima had acted as my mentor. I had their sperm and her juices. Next day Fatima took me for an afterwards contraception drug."

"Shit."

"I was visited regularly. Terry Barman told me to enjoy it. And I did sort of grow into it, fucking them and Fatima. There were more people getting involved, too. It was a tightly closed circle, and I had to say nothing, but I was told I was invaluable and doing everything right. Terry Barman had connected with Sanjay Bunker via SMS, and SMS were in Harlepool too. Terry had obtained the space above the casino here and it was the dead man's idea to use its history to concoct the front of The Worshipful Company of Serninsea Theatrical Players. Christine, the thinker behind the Confraternity Vanguard, became a bit of a buddy. One odd thing was not having sex with her. I didn't tell Fatima I'd lost my beliefs; you do realise, in reality, that Christine is an atheist?"

"No I don't."

"She knows all you know and I know. We are all non-believers now. What she does is push it all into the institution. Mark me, if the institution goes she loses the lot. That's why she piled everything into the Confraternity Vanguard and now elsewhere. Think of this Marcella Althaus-Reid theology - have you heard of her?"

"Yes. Indecent theology, it's called."

"Good. I don't get Christine's attachment. Marcella Althaus-Reid's theology wants the Church turned upside down and inside out, not formed into Christine's Egyptian pyramids. Christine doesn't just leave the Church intact but arms it to the teeth: patriarchal as it is."

"Now it's another Confraternity."

"Terry saw strategic Christine as a threat long back. The Confraternity Vanguard is like a Church within a Church. Her Body Eucharist is this combination of initiation and Eucharist. She has developed a theological economics of sex."

"Hey?"

"Her own body is her centre of production, distribution and exchange. She is the most bonkers of us all, Linda. Anyway, she is gone from us now. You seem to get on with her."

"Not sure. Attachment is not approval."

"She is premodern within postmodernity. It is not like the religious belief of old, no matter how much they dress it up."

"That's what I think," I said. "It is impossible to even begin to think like the ancients. The Chassidic Jews know this, that the best times were the old times, and even they are forced into a kind of re-creation - to use your word. You know, I never expected this sort of discussion with you."

"Have you heard of Jonathan Edwards?"

"Yes, he was an American Calvinist at a time when some of them were going Arminian, and he fought a rearguard action against change."

"No, there's an athlete, a runner. He was evangelical and then someone pointed out a biblical contradiction or two, and his beliefs vanished. I didn't go like that, but I never really recovered. I never became liberal: couldn't see the point. My language remained Evangelical, and now it is a public relations job. Four years now I've been with the Secular Clergy Foundation. Some are in it for much longer. Look, I can still go to a Vineyard church and join in, but I know there is nothing in it any more. So I've become an actor. There's a new one starting in Serninsea. I'd take you there."

"No thanks."

"You still have some residual belief, but you will never satisfy the system unless you can find a way to conform. I do satisfy the system, even when it has all gone. Christine is the most deluded of us all. And when it comes to sex no one gets the better of her. The bishops have been envious."

"And you don't just leave?"

"I have thought really seriously about returning to accountancy. But I like sex and they supply people."

"Who's Anna - at the ordination?"

"I got her knickers off twice but she's not into what we are doing. She's a mate still. She thinks I'm a predatory lesbian. Most of the time nothing happens between us. I'd like her to be to me like Diana is to you."

"Jenny, did the Bishop of Bolingbroke, John Terence Barman, ask you to come here?"

"Yes he did."

"Why?"

"To get you on side. It's your only stable option. What's Adam's report going to do? Oh, the Confraternity might retreat, but it will re-emerge. And, by the way, Colin Cromer is getting suspicious. He received an anonymous note about goings on. It must be Adam's doing. But the converse is, Linda, that Cromer won't be able to protect you from the storm. He will realise all this has been going and they'll sweep him aside. He's close to retirement. He's being played like a kipper."

"Kathleen - is that you?" I asked, hearing a presence beyond the closed bedroom door.

The door opened and here were two women in nighties: Kathleen and Winnie.

"Just checking," Kathleen said. "Is everything fine?"

"Fine," I said. "Enjoy!"

"Are you two going to enjoy?" asked Kathleen.

"Everything is under control, Kathleen. Night night - and you, Winnie."

They went.

Jenny said, "The gossip shop says you seduced the Wickenby twins and you were quite assertive."

"I did not seduce them. Kathleen wanted experience, and she did a switch with her sister as if I wouldn't notice. I noticed the moment I smelt her vagina."

Jenny started touching me. "Are you the same smallness down there, then?"

"Decades of dilating have made a bit of a difference."

She removed the duvet and instructed: "Open legs wide!" Jenny started an examination, facing me with her knees pushing down into the mattress. Then Jenny said, "Remember the pact?"

"Of course."

"It said we should meet in ten years and we didn't. It's twenty plus now."

"I know. Well, we are adults now."

"We should obey it. Adam can still come over." She opened me more and probed. "You are bigger."

I took hold of my mobile phone. Jenny applied her tongue. I rang Adam. "She wants you to come, now, and I do."

"OK. I haven't gone to bed yet. I'll drive over."

"You're lucky," Jenny said. "A life without periods and all that's associated with them."

"Yep. Continue, Jenny."

At one initial orgasm later, for which Jenny gave me no religious exclamation,

Adam let himself in. And we considered getting him to undress and lean against the wall but instead got him in between us. Soon, as instructed, he was doing us alternately, ten thrusts each and switching. He was slower compared with when he was a youth. It was Jenny who received his seed and she kept it better.

Next morning we both bathed Adam before we got in the tub ourselves, with the difference that Kathleen was knocking on the bathroom door. She and Winnie were forced to use the loo downstairs.

We decided not to cut ourselves and share blood, a dangerous practice. We'd met and come together at last and observed the bond we had made.

Adam told us at breakfast that he had most of the evidence to strike at Barman. He would not tell the world that Jenny was secular. She would not retaliate, she told him. I said I'd thought about it, but I was still not going to join the Serninsea group under the Confraternity Vanguard. I would not join Christine's either, which I could not anyway.

I told them that I was now hating the constraints of the parish.

Jenny compared this with being under Fatima.

I said, "I know something has to break: it can't go on like this for much longer. The next time I go ill, like I have twice so recently, I will probably collapse and die, even if I don't actually die."

But Jenny assured me that the Confraternity Vanguard would free me.

"You're not listening. I'm not joining it."

Apologies (Wednesday 28th August)

I was in bed with Adam and Jenny, deciding not to go in to Morning Prayer. I knew my priorities: we were having fun.

Colin rang me and told me that he would now be visiting me, expecting to help construct and pick up both statements of apology. He would come to me so that I could make any changes he wanted to the text on my computer.

Very soon the doorbell rang and Kathleen answered. It was Ann and Labhaoise. Phew. I was in the bathroom, with Adam and Jenny still in my bed, so I came out and listened from behind the visitors upstairs.

Ann said, "This has all rather got off to a bad start, Jenny. No one ever wanted to actually blackmail you about your membership of the Secular Clergy Foundation and no one will. But we are going to publish, and you can't cook an omelette without cracking some eggs."

I asked, "Why do you need to publish? There is another scenario. I submit to Barman, she gets a new job down here, and we just carry on."

"Because," said Ann, "that allows Barman to get away with it. No, we are going to publish. Linda, you have done nothing wrong. Publishing will clear the decks. As for Jenny, you will lose your initiator role, but it will see you out of the Church. So Adam is going to employ you."

"Am I?" Adam asked, looking over to me.

"Jenny as an accountant and administrator."

"Where is the money coming from?"

"Us. So, Jenny, you can also work for us: Labhaoise and me."

Jenny said, "I don't want to work for you. Why don't you get your snouts out of my business?"

"Because, like it or not, I am in business and this is my business. I've made my offer. You don't believe your religion any more, you surely want to get out, and you have no partner (so that makes you flexible), and we're giving you a way out into employment."

Labhaoise said, "Don't wait for it all to come crashing down. Peter can be freed of the admin and the figures."

"That's true," said Adam. "I could do with someone... Oy, Jenny, pack that in for a moment."

"I like the sex my associations give me."

Labhaoise said, "Obviously we've interrupted your present fun and games, so we'd better go."

Ann said, "Come on then, let's leave them to their fun."

With Colin still due, we got up, without doing the bath antics of the day before, and went to have breakfast. Adam went off to work late and Jenny decided to go out and hang around in town.

So I got on with typing, and was fairly swift at it too. Afterwards, I was hanging about in mufti. The doorbell went and it was him: Winnie and Kathleen disappeared into the front room.

"I have done the statements," I said, leading Colin Cromer to the long lounge. "You can read my laptop screen. I can print them afterwards."

"All right. When I've approved, send them electronically. I will forward them both to Bishop John."

We went into the larger lounge, the scene of the discussion disaster. He read the first statement I would give orally.

I wish to apologise for any distress caused by inappropriate clothing worn during the recent Magic Show in the Church Hall, and further apologise for the tone and direction of the discussion group that followed on in my house. I wish to make it clear, if a contrary impression was given, that I do of course affirm all creeds and formularies as expected by an Anglican priest.

Colin Cromer was unimpressed. This was, he said, "a mealy-mouthed typical politician's sort of apology."

Thus I had to change it, under his supervision, and it became, to read out:

I apologise for my inappropriate clothing worn during the recent Magic Show in the Church Hall, and further apologise for the tone and direction of the discussion that followed in my house. I wish to make it clear, despite the contrary impression from myself, that I do affirm all creeds and formularies as required of an Anglican priest.

"Next one," he instructed. "We can allow a little more scope for explaining the intention and the unfortunate result, but the emphasis must be on clear apology."

I said, "I'll just take away ambiguities now."

After an introductory paragraph it read:

The purpose of the Magic Show and my commentary was to show that Christianity has no place for magic, even though it certainly does have place for revelation and the supernatural. The difference is that whilst magic is the work of human hands interfering with apparent spiritual powers, the supernatural is the reassuring work from God understood from revelation. My magician friend pointed out within the show that his readings from 'the other side' were not this at all, and that they were a trick. When he said this, he meant it, and there really was no contact from an other side. He is learning to cold read as part of his stage magician's portfolio.

To prepare for the show I selected a leotard and did a lot of flexibility training. I now realise that the leotard was too thin and too tight, and had a cut that emphasised much of my body that no one should have seen. It was entirely inappropriate for me, a clergywoman, to wear this on stage. I apologise.

The discussion that followed spoke about the Gospel miracles. I was keen to relay knowledge that is debated in the theological colleges. I was not trying to undermine belief in the supernatural or Jesus as carrier and giver of revelation. The miracles emphasise many things, not least the bounty that will be ever-present in the Kingdom of God. To state that the miracles have theological readings is not to infer disbelief. Appearing to agree with my magician friend of a different religious affirmation against magick does not mean I do not believe in the miracles. I do affirm all creeds and formularies as required of an Anglican priest. Again I need to apologise for giving a contrary impression.

I said to Colin, "You do realise this is somewhat difficult for me to do and undermines my credibility, if no one actually believes the veracity of these statements."

"It is supposed to be difficult for you. This is entirely of your own making. However, once you have read the short statement out three times on Sunday and once after Morning Prayer on Wednesday, and this article has been published, I will say no more on the matter. But you must stop causing embarrassment, and I'm including here what happened recently in the curate's house garden."

Kathleen went by towards the kitchen, got something from there, and went back again.

Colin said, "Is that Kathryn Wickenby?"

"Kathleen."

"Is she staying here?"

"She has a room, yes."

"Have you cleared this with the diocese? You can't just rent out rooms. What is going on with you? Your husband has moved out, you have Adam Magellan here, and now one of the Wickenby twins. Well, I assume one."

"I'm not charging her rent. I'm giving her a taste of independent living. She needs a break from her sister, who is starting a relationship with a man."

"Hang on," he said. "She is not in a relationship with you - Kathleen? She's not a replacement for Keith, or even Adam Magellan."

"No. I don't jump into bed with anyone who comes along, Colin. She has her own room, she is just starting out being different from Kathryn for a change. I think very soon she will find herself a girlfriend and will move out."

"She's a... lesbian?"

"I think so, yes."

"She is an identical twin of her sister who has a boyfriend!"

"She also has different fingerprints. Colin, please."

"This is a curate's house. You have spare bedrooms, just like I do, for guests. They are for visitors who are doing parish business - and the occasional family guest."

"She is a family guest. This is my house! Until I go, I can treat this as my house."

"Absolutely not," he said. "You are a servant of the Lord and a servant of his Church. This house is part of your sacrificial serving life. Putting up Gretta Cox-Jenkins for the night was a legitimate use of this house. Handing a room out to one of your mates is not a legitimate use."

"She is not one of my mates. She is an archaeologist, magician's assistant and a model, and I gave her a break having heard her story."

"A model? Like you were once?"

"Yes."

"Did you go out in the back garden, or did she?"

"I told her to come in."

"If I get any more complaints about her - I get it now - cavorting around naked outside, this set of apologies here will seem like nothing. By the way, as you well know, Morning Prayer is not an option: it is an obligation for you. You will be present at each and every Morning Prayer."

Off he went. And after he did, Kathleen told me she had been in the hall and heard all that. "I'm sorry," she said for the umpteenth time. "I won't do it again."

I said, "Oh fuck it, fuck it, fuck it." I stood up and faced her, and then started vigorously undressing her to zero. I then did the same for me. She was wide-eyed. I said, "You and I are going to be like this here the rest of the day - but don't go in the garden."

Jenny, when back, had some advice for me. "The institution you're in won't have it. Most people go to work, do and say things they wouldn't otherwise, and go home to switch off. That's what I do. Yes, we have evening Parochial Church Councils and Deanery Meetings and all that, but in the daytime beyond the admin we can read, play, go out, even stay in bed. Look, you and me will have three churches between us, and one is basically a monument on a mound. Take your salary and enjoy life: and you will have pleasurable intimacy with a group of people. What's not to like?"

"I'm trying to make a contribution."

"But it's not working! When Michael Goulder lost his religion he could still teach it. He at that time, and you and I now, still have the tools to carry on. We can do the sermons and the prayer groups and the rest, and turn up as required, because we know the landscape. But all we are doing is turning the wheels. So what? That's what they want: they want to see the wheels turn."

"Colin Cromer is doing work with an outcome."

"He is like the old shire horse. What is it now? Thirty-six years he's been here, Terry said, after three at Cartmel? He is contented. He has the rule-book through his veins. You are not like him. You are a creative. Terry is a creative, really."

"And what about Christine?"

"Christine has another solution. She intensifies the institution and the self: but, mark me Linda, she could not do it in our institution. She's had to do what my Uncle Bill does, to go independent, where they have a crazy level of freedom and an authoritarianism at the same time. She wraps herself into this nonsense of apostolic succession, and then starts to let her theology go anywhere - and self-deludes that it follows all the Councils, in essence. But that's not so. I've heard her say this before - you can universalise your theology so long as it is structurally of the Church. But that kind of Liberal Catholicism is notoriously flaky: Krishnamurti, Theosophy, Buddhism of a kind, magical powers with priests, free thought, this Unitarianism thing even. But there's nothing like blinkers to avoid all the contradictions."

"So what do I do?"

"Fall in."

"But Adam will publish."

"So what? The Church is resilient. You'll be all right. If it collapses I will work for Ann, Labhaoise and Adam, but I'd rather do this. I like fucking and you do. I've seen that video. You're licking your lips."

"The sperm was overwhelming and horrible."

"Adam is wasting his time: all he will destroy will rise up again. The three bishops - even the five - won't give this up. They believe it. The Vanguard will re-emerge. We were having fun this morning until we heard from your vicar. I want fun, Linda, when the hours are ours."

Adam soon came for his tea, accompanied by four naked women, two of whom later stripped him off. We two women had fun (was he tired?) before we three dozed together.

There was yelping from the other room.

Peter (Friday 30th August)

Having attended Morning Prayer, visited, and learnt that Colin (not me) would go on local radio for its Morning Reflection slot, I came back to the curate's house and picked up my own post.

In my post was a slim package of two DVDs, professionally labelled and covered. The first was Silky Black Glory Holes and the second was Silky Black Gang Bang Bukakke. The titles annoyed me because Bunker had reused my modelling name. The sender wasn't given but the postmark was Canterbury, Kent. So who sent this? The Bishop of Margate? It could have been Christine.

Nevertheless, this was what people were able to purchase. So I went into the sitting room and used the television and its integrated DVD player.

Although some faces were spotted looking through one of the slits, Peter wasn't one of them. I simply wasn't sure which white penis was his. There were two or three candidates for Sanjay Bunker himself, and looking again I was pretty sure which one was his. Then I looked at me on my back in the second DVD and looked at the various masked people. I guessed Bunker again.

So I rang Adam's and asked Peter if he could come around to discuss the seen DVDs. Peter said he could after 5 pm, but later rang back that Adam thought I might have something material to say and he was told to leave early. I stayed in my cassock and collar (only) and at 4:15 he rang the doorbell. Kathleen went to answer it, expecting Winnie.

I opened the front door. I told Kathleen not to disturb us.

"You've seen these, haven't you?"

"Both of them. And Kathryn demanded that she see them too."

"She said something like you were doing your duty."

"Blending in."

"So do you know among these various white penises penetrating my mouth which one is yours? You told me you did not fuck me in the second video."

"You want me to show you?"

"You bet I fucking do. You didn't need to take advantage of me. How dare you?"

"To be there I had to participate. There was no other reason to be there. Adam's firm paid the fee and expenses. It was sixty quid to go in, and once in we had masks to choose from, condoms if we wanted."

"Did you wear one?"

"No. I wasn't going to fuck you."

"How did you finish with me in the booth?"

"You swallowed. Blimey, it was like having my sperm extracted. It just went straight in."

We spent some time looking at one after the other, and going back.

"It's one of two. I'm sure it's one of those early two and that slot to the right."

"Take your trousers off now and we'll look at the candidates."

"Now?"

"Yes now, you bastard, taking advantage of me. Get them down and, what's more, you can get yourself equally hard."

"Bloody hell, Linda. I don't know if I can."

"I'll make sure you can."

"OK, I'll do it."

So Peter was by the side of the screen and his penis was out. I told him to pull back his foreskin.

I said, "Look, neither of them match. They're not quite the same."

"The lighting."

"Your balls aren't hanging the same."

"They change. It is about that number."

"Two bollocks?"

"No: the queue for that slit at the booth."

"But I cannot see a match. It was you who helped lift me away after the multiple rape wasn't it?"

"Was it rape?"

"Look, you were there, with the supposed Canadian accent."

"Yes."

"Yes, that was you. Come here. Just come here."

I took hold of his penis, and put it in my mouth. I worked on it.

"Please, Linda. And in your gown!"

I released him. "You're lying. I didn't suck you off first time, just as you didn't come over me in the next DVD."

"Well, it was..."

"No it wasn't, Peter."

"Yes, I hid."

"So here is my suggestion. Adam has paid... what?"

"Hundred in total."

"He paid the sixty quid fee for you queueing up and putting your knob through a slit, yes? But you got in the showroom building a different way, hid and looked from a distance and emerged only at the end, with a mask you picked up."

"Er, yeah, em... Very good, Linda."

"You're sexually inexperienced, Peter. It wasn't just Adam who thinks you've had me. You told Kathryn."

"She wouldn't have believed me otherwise."

"She knows you have abilities of researching places and finding ways in?"

"Yes she does. Can I put my penis away?"

"No you can't."

"Adam paid me in front of her - which was him being deliberate."

"Ah. Now we have it. He had a thrill."

"What if I'd said I hadn't done it?"

"Kathryn has seen the downloads but she hasn't realised you were not involved."

"She's not as forensic as you. Linda, you are sexually experienced in a way some of us will never achieve."

"I've a good mind to extract your semen like you claimed. Put it away. Now a similar word to semen is sermon. Thank you for listening to Jenny's sermon and hearing her own deception. Tell Adam that she's an alcoholic and keeps lying down, like she is now, and is probably close to the edge mentally."

"I think I have a solution for information loss at black holes. Instead of re-radiating, the information supplies a white hole into new space and time. So resurrection is like a white hole."

"Sounds too close to needing a miracle to me, always a sign of weakness in making a religious argument."

"Could be," Peter responded.

He pulled up and fastened his trousers. "I'm sorry Linda for abusing your good name."

"You're not the first. As far as Adam and Kathryn are concerned, you fucked me in those videos. Now go."

"Bye, Linda. We're all looking out for you."

"I'll see you soon, Peter. You're a good lad, really."

Later on I told Adam in bed that I'd received these DVDs in the post; Peter and I had identified which one of the two suspected times was him servicing me.

"I don't believe it," Adam said. "To be incognito Peter had to join in?"

"You paid his fee. Anyway, we've checked."

"Did he enjoy it?"

"No more than listening to Jenny's sermon."

"That much? I'm not paying him for that."

"It told us a lot about her misusing her intelligence."

"I'll pay him a bonus but only for using his boner."

Vestal Virgins (Wednesday 4th September)

I read out the statements on Sunday three times and once on the Wednesday, and the new magazine would kick off with my humiliating article.

On the radio a news item was that the renamed Report on the Managerial Efficiency of the Wytham Diocese would be delayed at least until a few days until after the funeral of local minister Kenneth Osis.

Later, I was in the local library with Jenny (from Adam's) and Kathleen, where I was asking the librarian to get more theology and sociology of religion books for me via inter-library loans. "Anything by Marcella Althaus-Reid?"

"I'll look." She did. "Bisexual theology, What's that?" asked the woman looking at the screen.

"Polyamoury as plurality..."

"Goodness. Part of, part of..."

"Get me something by her or about her."

"If that's the sort of thing you want. We do think about you coming here so perhaps you should look at the shelves."

While I was at the shelves getting disappointed yet again, someone approached me.

"I am Carrie Chopin, and I have been asked to contact you in person. Would you would be interested in joining our group?"

She explained that they have a prayer, meditation and study group that keeps a continuous flame alive. The focus is always the local people. "We don't advertise ourselves, and when someone wants to leave we decide on who else we think might like to join us. This time we also want to increase our number by one. We act very quickly on our decisions and we're meeting this evening at the United Presbyterian and Congregationalist chapel."

"Good place to meet."

"It's defunct."

"But you meet there. What is the group called?"

"The Serninsea Vestal Virgins."

"I'm not sure I'd qualify for that. For one thing, I have been married, and, for another, I am separated from my husband while seeking divorce."

"We heard this. We don't actually expect our members to be virgins - it is a reference to Roman educated women who kept the sacred flame. It's about a listening and watching oversight and praying for the towns."

"Is this a Christian group then?"

She explained that the group had Western Buddhist origins and became of no particular religious faith. It kept itself quiet and was not well known. Members sometimes did seek a connection with the Holy Order of Sophia with Miriam Magdala, a dispersed group with a spiritual home in France.

I asked her why me specifically but she only answered that they'd welcome my contributions. As for appropriate dress, clerical or otherwise, she said I could attend as dressed here in loose mufti. I explained that Wednesday was not my day off but I made every effort to keep the afternoon and evening free.

"Your clerical friend: is she coming to reside in the Serninsea area?"

"You seem to be very well informed. Jenny?"

"What?"

Carrie Chopin asked her, "If you are to be resident locally, would you like to join us? We seek to increase our number by one."

Jenny replied, "No."

So I suggested Kathleen instead. "Perhaps you don't want Kathleen to come."

"Well, we always respond to the unexpected. Are you interested, Kathleen? You are one of the Wickenby twins, aren't you?"

"Yes. I'll come with Linda but see for myself."

Four of us were then at Patricia's in the afternoon. It wasn't quite warm enough to be outside sunbathing again so we were a bit crowded in the conservatory. Jenny reminded us of her secularity.

So, in the evening, Kathleen and I arrived at the closed-down United Presbyterian Congregationalist Church chapel.

The Reverend Georgie Smith was there, inside a dusty chapel space, wearing no clerical collar and a dark green dress to her knees and same colour long socks. "Hello... curate."

"Yes. Hello."

"And you are going to the meeting through there?"

"With my friend."

"It's in the back room." She said, "They have it for now but this place is rather run-down to become a community resource. Don't let the Anglican church hall go the same way."

"Quite."

Through the building we were asked by one woman to go in that room and wait. There were cushions on seats circled around. So we sat down, staying together.

Suddenly Carrie Chopin appeared at the door, in a thigh-length, translucent, white 'gown' with a red waist cord - it looked like the wrapping put around scratchable cathode ray tube screens. I rather approved because that wrapping was the sum total of her clothing. She held above her ample breasts what looked like a miner's lamp.

Then I realised they were all dressed like that, and a lot of female flesh was visible. Looking closely at the thigh's length edge of each gown, each seemed to be dangling some kind of metal disc - from their nearly exposed pubic areas! Badges again!

One woman carried in a bowl of water, towel and flannel. Then six more women processed in, two of whom were of colour. One of those we knew very well, and Kathleen looked all excited and clearly surprised. It was Winnie Lott, in all her hardly concealed glory.

So obviously Winnie had not mentioned being in this group to Kathleen.

They sat in a circle, around us, and Carrie placed the lamp at the centre. Each woman had a metal hoop that pierced the clitoral hood and the disc hung from a second hoop. Wow!

Kathleen leaned and started to whisper, "I thought it was for..."

"Please," said Carrie. "We expect silence and order."

"Sorry."

"I am Carrie Chopin. This is the sacred flame. As the current Lamp Keeper I report in all honesty that I have maintained the flame continuously this last week since our last sacred gathering. The Sacred Flame is for the well-being of Sutton-on-Serninsea, Serninsea, Titansea, and nearby villages. We, along with our sisters around the country, gather to pray for social well-being, and to study solutions towards problems using contemporary and historical texts."

Carrie sat down as another stood and said, "I am Paige Tuck, News Monitor. What is our concern for the week?" She sat down.

Another woman, Welsh in accent, stood and said, "I am Elan Efan, Education Keeper, and for our learning discipline we are studying economics through repair and renewal."

As she sat down, Carrie Chopin then stood and said, "Transcendent Power and Maker of the Flame, we pray now for the good keeping of our towns and villages. We pray for Serninsea, Sutton, Titansea, Inglemere, Caffenmere, and all ings, marshes, parks and the coast. We pray for harmony and for their progress."

Elan now stood alone, saying, "Welcome to our new visitors. We know that they are the Reverend Linda Jupitas, the local Anglican curate, and Kathleen Wickenby, the archaeologist and model. We hope you will like us and that one or both of you will choose to join with us. If neither of you choose to join us, our retiring member will return until we find someone who does. After a second meeting, one or both of you would have to give commitment for a year, meeting once a week. This must become your priority commitment. At any stage, commitment to stay indefinitely is shown by our local practice of wearing a special hanging disc with a piercing through the clitoral hood - otherwise you leave after the year is complete. But to stay is to stay and then needs a negotiated withdrawal."

This struck me as similar to circumcision for identity and belonging purposes. So I asked, "Do all your sisters around the country wear these hanging discs?"

Elan replied, "Excuse me, I had not sat down. I understand you do not know our procedures."

"I'm sorry."

"To answer your question, the practice is being adopted by some groups and we think it may well be adopted by every group. Do you wish to stand and ask another question?"

"Er..."

She sat as Carrie stood. "Let's keep to the order of the meeting. We've had the necessary introductions and welcome and next is our concerns section."

Members brought their concerns by standing, giving their name and speaking, and then offering a prayer of concern, holding their hands out to the contained flame in the centre.

Bethany Gorge, the woman with the water, spoke about the doubtful future of SMS in Titansea. She said, hands aloft: "We pray that this business stays and prospers in our area."

The next person was Winnie Lott herself, a British West Indian, the Monitor of Bodies, who most interestingly, said, "We pray for those local prostitutes still involved in the sex trade as Bolingbroke Geese, that perhaps they can find well-paid work elsewhere. We are concerned to hear of the beginning and growth of Weburga Geese in these towns."

Gloria Mabaso, a British-African, Developer of Ideas, added a prayer for us too, and a hope that we would each find a personal deep joy. I just wondered how much they knew about me.

Nellie Richards' prayer was for the quality and standards of Sea TV, the local community television service. She called herself the External Relations Monitor.

After these prayers came the study, and the study was understanding recycling goods as a means to economic regeneration. I thought this could well be interesting. Paige Tuck stood up and read out a section by Toynbee on what he called the 'biosphere', a conceptual way of looking at economic change spread about. This was apparently preparatory material towards a broader understanding of their specific area of concern. I could see here archaeological interest for Kathleen, who was listening intently.

Carrie standing announced that, "Our complete communal ritual is suspended for this week. We will do just the last part, the Mag-da-len-e Blessing. When someone does wish to join us for a minimum of a year, then we will do the whole ritual. Would you like to take part? You are free to turn this down."

"Yes," I said, not knowing what this was.

"Definitely," said Kathleen.

"Good. One of you come and kneel in front of me, please."

I did this first. So Carrie stood and began. The fact is I could smell her hair-covered sex and see this metal disc up close hanging down on two rings, so the disc was flat and outwards showing SVV CC. "Say with me, 'My name is Linda and I wish to be put under the mantle of Mag-da-len-e'... My..."

"...Name is Linda and I wish to be put under the mantle of Mag-da-len-e."

At this Carrie the Lamp Keeper raised her semi-translucent strange gown above her pubic hair and over my head, and then she bent over me, bringing her bare arms around me and pulling me in between her hanging breasts, touching both my ears. Crumbs, I wasn't expecting this!

"Magdalene, come down and bless this child of yours; O glorious mystery: heaven's body presses upon your child, for your blessing of the two-in-one, the one-in-two. Kiss my breasts - head side to side, Linda. Mag-da-len-e!"

I kissed each hanging breast.

"You have descended, telling us, to our hearts, how we must pray."

Wow!

Carrie then pressed her left nipple to my mouth, and squeezed her breast. This was her actual milk. Then, moving my head and her body, she gave me milk from the other breast. I had to think that Christine had missed a trick here! It proved to me that Carrie was no virgin.

Given this, I wondered what the fully secret ritual would be. She raised her gown up again to release me, and gestured that I should return to my place as I tasted the lactose.

Kathleen looked excited. She now kneeled. Again Carrie raised her semi-translucent gown above her disc laden hairy pubes and put it over Kathleen's head and then bent over her, saying and doing to her as she did to me. Thus Kathleen received her milk, running down her chin as she returned to her place alongside me.

Carrie and a few women went about doing the same to others and indeed all received the breasts and milk ritual.

This done, Bethany Gorge, the Keeper of the Washing, stood and asked if we would accept a further feet-washing ritual given to all. Sometimes this would involve removing guests' tights or stockings as well as shoes, but not in our case. We agreed. Bethany Gorge brought across the water to the centre and Winnie Lott came forward. Both of them cupping their hands with a little water, Bethany and Winnie symbolically washed our feet with a delicate touch of their hands. When done, each of them kissed our feet one by one. Beth and Winnie then repeated the ritual with everyone and finally did each other.

The kiss of peace from Winnie Lott was to everyone separately, mouth to mouth, including Kathleen of course, and Carrie as present Flame Keeper received the final kiss.

The final ritual for Carrie was to go out of the room and return with a second lamp and long wax lighter. It was placed close to the working lamp. Paige stood and waited. Paige removed Carrie's gown and folded it to bend and place it on Carrie's cushion. Carrie removed Paige's gown, and folded it and placed it on Carrie's cushion. Now naked Paige took from the flame of the old lamp and lit the new one with the wax lighter. Once it burned, the older one was put out by naked Carrie. Paige put her gown back on and now took the burning lamp and it was her job to maintain it, as the new Keeper of the Lamp.

We two were asked to wait in a neighbouring room. It was full of discarded clothes in piles. Kathleen told me she had received a fantastic, moving experience. She'd assumed the hole in Winnie's clitoris hood was for jewellery.

"I think," I said, "that they knew Jenny would say 'no' to coming, and you were intended to be here."

About five minutes later Nellie Richards came into the room.

"What are those gowns made from?" I asked her.

Nellie answered. "Wrapping material, like for some household goods."

"I thought so."

"We get this material supplied; we make them; we replace them, as they do tear and get holes in them. Excuse me. I have to tell you: we think you looked concerned at our ritual. Is it because you are a National Church priest? We understood that you had taken part in different rituals recently."

"Are you referring to the Titansea Grand?" I asked.

"Yes."

"You seem so well informed. I was helping a friend, who had just left the National Church. She is in a new group."

"Did you get meaning from our ritual?" Nellie asked me.

"I thought it was beautiful."

"It was wonderful," said Kathleen. "I'm blown away."

"Thank you."

She went; we waited some more.

A further ten minutes on they processed into the room, and Paige was first in carrying the flame. Carrie was next with the extinguished lamp. The women became naked and dressed.

One of them, Hattie Schepsutte, the Clerk, dressed, said in a German accent, "Thank you, the Reverend Linda. Thank you for coming, Kathleen. Please, Kathleen, do not inform your twin sister about us, not even that we exist. Please neither of you say more to the Reverend Jennifer World. We asked her first out of propriety. Please keep our meeting secret as best as you can from the Reverend Colin Cromer and all others. We will find you both in the next few days."

There was no coffee or similar afterwards, and no socialising as a group. All they and we did was disperse.

"Of course you've plenty to say to Winnie," I said to Kathleen, "and she to you."

Colin Says Keep Away (Thursday 5th September)

Now I was supposed to keep the Serninsea Vestal Virgins a secret, but next day, with clerical Jenny talking to some parishioners, I asked Colin Cromer after Morning Prayer: "Suppose there is a non-denominational group, even interfaith, let's say, of women who meet and do prayers and study. Would it be wrong of me, say, to join in with such a group, when they might do intercessions for places and learn about relevant things?"

Colin Cromer replied, "Well, if it was an ecumenical or interfaith group, then you would be an Anglican representative at either of those."

"Even if we change liturgies?"

"You represent the Christian faith. Our job in this world, as I have said before, is to preach the Gospel. It doesn't mean we have to convert everyone - as if we could; it doesn't mean we have to be aggressive; it does mean we represent it, do it, and live it out."

"Can't we live it out in a much more participatory way?"

He said, "As long as you participate according to your commitment to our formularies, then it would be acceptable. But this means you are subject to the authority of the bishops, and, of course, as a curate here, me. And, given all that has been happening recently, I think you must come to see me first."

"I'm just interested in what the boundaries are, that's all," I said. "Actually, Colin, I am getting fed up with this."

"Oh really. Well," Colin Cromer added, "let's see who this group might be. Indeed, there is a group of women in town who gather wearing very little - that would suit you - and keep a flame going, and make prayers, and do topics, and they are rather secretive. The Church does not keep itself secretive but proclaims. These women we would call 'Gnostic', if they think they possess some secret powers for the good of the area."

"I don't think they do," I said. "I think they are into redeeming, like we are. Colin, I am getting seriously pissed off. These are lovely ladies with beautiful rituals."

"You do not need to use that sort of language. This is a church. And it seems from your talk that you have already been along. Linda, they are not appropriate and it is about time you started taking instruction."

"I am fed up with you - and all the others - bunging me into a box."

Jenny came forward. "Linda. What have I told you?"

Colin said, "I know all about these misnamed Vestal Virgins. Virgin suggests purity, and they claim spiritual purity no doubt. Did you go, Reverend Jenny?"

"No."

"They do not claim spiritual purity."

"Don't you raise your voice to me."

"Linda!" said Jenny. "Calm it, please."

He said, "Take some advice from your faithful colleague. All right. I might meet some like them in a theoretical interfaith meeting, but they obviously don't do such meetings. The suffragan bishop knows all about them, and so do I."

"I bet he does."

"What's that supposed to mean?"

"Do you think he does everything in public? You said about rumours, after all."

"Pastoral matters, matters of sensitivity have to be private, as you well know."

"I've had enough of this. You know everyone in this town, and you think you know what is going on. But do you? Do you?"

"Test me out, then, Mrs. Jupitas."

"Find out for yourself, Colin. If you say there are rumours, follow the rumours."

Jenny then said, "Stop being ridiculous, Linda; the rumours around here are baseless."

I looked at her with dagger eyes, and she just stared back as if to say, 'Come on then.'

So I said, "I am going home, if I still have one. And you: come with me."

Colin then said, "Now there's a point," he said, "given that you abuse your home with every waif and stray."

"Me, Reverend Colin?" asked Jenny, with sad eyes.

"Definitely not. You are the one legitimate visitor to the curate's house. And, Mrs. Jupitas, don't bother about travelling with me to the Coroner's Inquest. You are going, I take it."

"Fuck that."

"Linda!" he exclaimed, and Jenny looked astonished. He said at me, "For God's sake, woman, are you going?"

"I suppose I am."

"You're off the rails, Mrs. Jupitas - off the rails. This is a very serious matter now."

"Look, Mr. Cromer, all they do is maintain an eternal flame, and their worship is for the towns, and their education as women."

"Well, the answer is you cannot be one of them, so long as you keep turning up here - if you turn up - doing this job. Carry on like you are and you'll break all your ordination vows. And, by the way, Hattie Schepsutte and Carrie Chopin were lost from us to this group, and they stopped coming to this church some four years ago on a claim of inspiration of some Gnostic groups. So they obviously decided they could not do both, and neither can you. They write and revise their own rituals, but you... do... not."

"I'm fucking going home. Goodbye." I started going, but I paused as he spoke and looked back at him.

"Serious matter, serious matter. Insolence, lack of deportment, foul-mouthed, bad - terrible - attitude. Rude! Go on. Go. Just go."

But then I turned, headed for the vestry, him jumping aside (he didn't think I'd hit him?) and I shut all doors including to the toilet.

Jenny waited.

All this raised an interesting point in my agitated body. How come he knew about them, but not the Confraternity, the so-called Theatrical Players, not the Bolingbroke Geese, nor the orgies?

With Jenny further on from Colin and looking to stare directly at me, I walked swiftly towards him.

"Mrs. Jupitas!" he said, as I passed and brushed him in the aisle.

"Mr. Cromer," I answered back. "You. Come on. Out!"

He called out, "Mrs. Jupitas, you've got the appearance of a clergywoman but the language of a whore."

Outside, I said to Jenny, giving her a shove and pointing back at the church, "Don't you, you fucking Nicodemite, undermine me with your puppy dog fucking eyes. I am being squeezed here - shafted - and you are supporting him. 'The rumours are baseless' - you fucking liar, Jenny Masters."

"I told you, you stupid sod, to fall in and conform. And I have changed my name."

"Well, come on Shitface because we can go shopping so you can get your booze to get pissed again."

"I kept my drinking down. So."

"Alcoholic! Get in the car."

"I am alcohol dependent, not an alcoholic."

So we went to this discount supermarket and Jenny went directly to select twelve bottles in two packs. As I went off elsewhere in the store, there was a tap on my shoulder. It was both Hattie and Paige.

I said, "Hia ladies. No I can't."

Paige said, "We were going to admit the difficulty with you."

"Then please ask Kathleen. She loved it and there's Winnie, of course."

"We know; Winnie told us, of course," said Hattie with her German accent.

"By the way, the difficulty is not with me. I thought you were superb. The difficulty is with this collar I've got on and where it is from. By the way, do you know Klärchen Sisse?"

Hattie replied, "I've heard of her."

"She might be interesting, possibly interested," I said. (If anyone could find out about her, they could.)

The ladies went off to the middle area, and I found Jenny at the checkout with her booze.

Later, on the Internet, I looked up about the Vestal Virgins, who supported the political Roman Empire, and they met their end thanks to a Christian Emperor. Within the confines of their service, and on pain of death if the fire went out, they were educated and liberated when women hardly mattered. The relatively recent authority on them was a Sir Cato Worsfold of Mitcham.

Here I had received a text message from Colin.

Starting tomorrow, in Morning Prayer and all services, you are to enhance our intercessions for the towns, by learning about local issues beforehand so that they go into the intercessions.

I supposed that he was listening to me, after a fashion. There was at least some working relationship. But I felt so constrained and I needed freedom. Jenny wanted me to become boxed in and I was wanting to burst out.

Coroner's Inquest and Pub (Friday 6th September)

Jenny had disappeared overnight, with no mention of where she was going. Adam slept with me and said that she's a fully grown adult. The question was whether she'd be attending the Coroner's Inquest.

Diana called at my house and the two of us went in my Skoda SUV to the inquest in a meeting room in the Titansea Grand Hotel.

I said to her, "We could be made to be the villains here."

"Let's wait and see," she replied.

Both Wilsons were present. Colin Cromer was sat alone and indicated he wanted it to stay that way. No bishops were attending.

The Coroner's inquest was without a jury. James Arthur, County Coroner, mentioned the diary early on. He said, "I have to point out my frustration at not having acquired diaries that cover some ten months up to his death. He surely did not stop writing in these hardback A4 writing books. So I have nothing on recent deaths in his family, but I gather he was concerned about suicide attempts by his brother. I can only think that his inability to connect with women intensified. The Reverend Wilson, present here, and all others who saw the body in his home assures us of knowing nothing about recent books."

This meant that the Wilsons were giving a bare-faced lie. But if I stood up and said that Jim Wilson had taken the diaries, how could this be proved? Diana and I were also not mentioned in this context.

However, I was involved in an answer to a long-held puzzle. The Coroner stated: "One feature of his past life was a collection of some three thousand photographs he took of women models in states of undress. Ten per cent are of a model a dozen years ago who's identified as since becoming a member of the clergy. It has been pointed out to me that he catalogued them and a small number are missing. The executors will send all these photographs we do have to the person directly and I think for the sake of discretion she will remain unnamed. He refers to these photographs in diaries I have seen - quite often actually - and did drawings from them for a long time."

I shivered. I turned to Diana and nodded. Colin Cromer turned and looked at me.

(Over three sessions of two hours each, the younger Ken Osis took three hundred pictures of me at a brisk rate of me moving into different positions. However, I did do a few four hour group clothed and topless sessions when there were two models on - and two Colin received were like that.)

The Coroner continued: "Taking everything into account, and despite the likely diary absences, we have ordinary evidence to record what is clearly a suicide. However, if diary editions do come to light and the police decide that there is evidence that affects materially the suicide verdict, I will reopen the inquest. On the basis of my decision I release the body for funeral arrangements."

As some dispersed, Diana said to me, "He was a pathetic man, really. So he looked at those photos of you continually."

"I don't think I or we treated him well," I said. "At least he got to see the real me later on, not just a twenty-eight year old frozen in glossy prints."

Diana said, "Your mob seem to be gathered over there."

"Yeah. I'm just looking over there too. Jenny was here. No bishop."

Connie Wilson was approaching Jenny but Jenny was looking about, as if wanting to get away.

Diana said to me, "I want to be going. I'll wait outside. I might or might not go to the funeral. I didn't know him really."

"He saw enough of your cunt: that's how much you didn't know him."

Coming towards me, Connie, still at a little distance, was saying to Jim, "He was a weakling," and then they steered away from me.

I felt like trash, myself. Ken Osis was a person everyone exploited, and everyone had emptied him out to the point where he followed one family pattern and took his own life. With no one talking to me, I rejoined Diana outside, drove and dropped her off at her house.

At my house I did some domestics. Eventually Jenny came in.

"Where did you go overnight?"

"See Terry."

"Any particular reason? About me perhaps?"

"I told him I'm trying to get you to see sense. He's monitoring you and your big swear words row with Colin. He knew about it before I told him. Terry knows about the Vestal Virgins and beyond. Their mystery and secrecy inspired him. The Hereteu Group in Hartlepool especially knows where those groups came from: a weird Western Buddhist group and there's some individuals' connection with the Holy Order of Sophia with Miriam Magdala. Two left your church to set up the Serninsea version some years back."

"It's concerning when you just disappear."

"Not you as well! Don't boss me around! Oh we'd be great together in Inglemire and Caffenmere. Fatima asked after me and says I should treat this like a sabbatical. Good word that."

I went and did some reading in the front room. With Keith gone I fancied making this into a kind of office or study, but a second living room was like an escape.

I found Jenny still in the kitchen, staring out of the window.

"You dislike Connie Wilson?" I asked.

"Basically, she tries to run everything. It's Bishop Terry after all, and he is supposed to tell her, but she ends up telling him."

"I can imagine."

"Terry is a bit scared. He thinks you want to hurt him like Adam wants. I said he was being paranoid but I refused to say it wasn't true. As a result, he thinks it is true. I know the bishops manipulate people. But I want Adam to stop it. Don't you think Adam should stop it?"

"I have wondered. We've already had one suicide."

"Quite," said Jenny. "I love it with him. He makes me ache, and few men do that with me. Mind you, he's got a wopper. Do you lot ever go to a pub at all?"

"No, I don't. Adam doesn't either - he became an alcoholic or near enough. Keith lost his moderate drinking habit as prices went up and up. I don't really do alcohol. The twins emerged from deceased alcoholic parents."

"I do go to a boozier at times," Jenny said. "Sometimes I go in clerical collar daytime but on an evening I like to go out and forget things. I like to drink after sex."

"I can smell alcohol now, Jenny. Colin Cromer sometimes goes lunchtime pubbing in a clerical collar for people to talk to him. He does that sort of non-specific walkabout and socialising to see if anyone wants his services or something to say. I have been with him, but only twice and not lately."

Jenny went to the loo as Kathleen came in. "I will go and meet Winnie Lot tonight," said Kathleen. "I've been invited to visit her home. It's true: they wanted me, not Jenny, but Jenny had a kind of higher status."

I'd have gone to the library, and for a chat with Jagjit and Gurinder Kapoor, but instead I called Adam for support and he joined Jenny and me at a pub called The ConSern. Sat on seats at the bar, Jenny was rapidly getting drunk on local Theddle Pale Ale. Adam and I were both on soft drinks. We tried to keep off contentious subjects. However, Jenny, referred again to Barman's "wonderful fucking big prick" and she started going on about Christine and her "easy to fist fanny."

Adam said to me, in my ear, "Both of her parents died of alcohol related diseases. Why is she so reckless?" Adam said aloud that he'd heard Keith would be back in Serninsea shortly, but staying at Yojana's parents'.

Jenny added, "He's fugged Yojana Asthana more often than all the others pud together. So soon up back here, eh? Cheryl must be a bit smopple."

"I said, "My ex may do as he pleases."

The barmaid had been listening with her eyes wide open. Jenny noticed this and said to her: "Hey. My short of boss has losht all these women to a compet...or. Wanna join him? Barman is looking for replashements."

"What pub is that?" the barmaid Megan asked, throwing back her long black hair, leaning forward and showing a good rack plus hair under her arms.

"It's not a pub-ub and doesn'tut sale Pale Ale Theddle," Jenny said, now slurring her speech.

"You said a barman." Megan's constructed and angled grey flat eyebrows seemed to get closer together.

"It'sh not a pub but li'e an argy."

"I don't think I want a job in that," said the barmaid. "I think I'll go busy myself down in the cellar."

This caused Adam and me to laugh, but it had been said completely innocently. Megan turned, revealing a rose and thorns flower tattoo on her inner right thigh as she went through a door and down some steps. We saw the top of one on her back.

Jenny said, "I should be wearing my H badge now, like for that bar... barmaid. Like talent shpottun. See, I'm is trying an sep-ar-ate the goosh talk from the stage talk so people don't... know, no, don't aff to connect the goosh talk with thearer talk short of thing. Megan she's Furley ...urly. What?"

"Megan is fairly early at what?" I asked.

"Her frigging surname!" Jenny said. "Fur, as in 'eff you' - yeah, 'eff off you are' something - hee hee. "Mmm, Ull ee wy."

"Right," I said. "She's well tipped over. I think it is time we took her home."

So Adam and I held up Jenny to my SUV and, when indoors, got her undressed, dropped her on the toilet, and put her in between us in bed. She did go to sleep quickly and snored as well. Kathleen didn't return during the night.

Christine's Birthday & Request (Saturday 7th September)

A text from Christine announced that it was her birthday today. Forty-three. She would call around.

I looked at my shelves for a birthday present, being a skinflint - something of her trade from which she could benefit.

Soon the bell rang in the early afternoon. I welcomed her in to the sitting room at the front and she explained that she was in Serninsea for business and also to seek out a property for incardinating and ordaining Bill Masters and Pauline Junor at very short notice.

I had wrapped my present for Christine: the book, A Marxist Looks at Jesus, by Milan Machovec. "It is an oldie by a one time professor of Marxism who helped set up the Prague Spring, and it is simply one of the best Jesus of history books available."

She thanked me and kissed me. "How did you obtain this?" Christine asked, but I didn't answer and instead looked at her.

(She only got a copy because I had two. One was from student days and one was seen in a charity shop in very good nick and I got it as a back-up.)

Then Christine said, "You and me, we're a team. Let's do more together. I know your mate Diana doesn't like me."

She then said she had received many books and in fact wondered if I wanted to borrow one. She hadn't time to read it at the moment; Bill and Pauline had both read it before. Everyone thought it an excellent idea if I'd borrow it. "It's all about wandering bishops." She spoke into her mobile. "Bring it."

Leon came in from the car outside with a book: A History of the Independent Sacramental Movement by Bishop Arianwen Bron.

"Thanks." I told Leon to sit in my larger lounge.

"I received it from my house guests, Bishops Geoff and Luis, down in Eslaforde."

"Are they there now?"

"Yes. We are having a Council on my birthday! We've had some of it, and when I'm back we'll resume it."

"Why haven't they called here?"

"Deary, you are a National Church priest and because it is quicker to get a venue if I do it alone. Bill and Pauline's territory is up here; better if they were ordained sub-conditione and incardinated around here. I'd rather not use one of my terraced houses. Their home chapels are each too tiny. Otherwise, perhaps, something in Eslaforde or all the way down to Bristol. We can do the ordinations today at a push, or tomorrow, or Monday."

"Is she a heretic?" I asked, looking at the front of the book.

"Who?"

"Arianwen. The author."

"Her name means Silver Fair and Breast. She is a bishop in Eglwys Geltaidd Mynydd Trawsnewidiad, if I can say it properly, but it is apostolically sound even if she is rather Gnostic and Druidic. She's also ordained with the Holy Order of Sophia with Miriam Magdala, which claims to link to Jesus's own bloodline. I don't give that credibility."

"No. Nor me. Holy Grail stuff is utter rubbish. This one attracts some females into communities."

"You are looking beautiful today, Linda."

"Aw, thanks. What other books did you get?"

"Some fictional ones: Story of the Eye and an oddity with three stories: My Mother, Madame Edwarda, The Dead Man. Both books are by Georges Bataille. Madame Edwarda is all about a prostitute who calls herself God. As for Bataille, the brothels of Paris were his true 'churches'. So we have sadism, torture, orgies, sex and death, squalor as spirituality. The profane is sacred."

"And that's just among wandering bishops," I joked. "I've never actually read Story of the Eye although I've heard about it."

"Bataille is right. I'll make time to read those. Why are you so radiant today? Listen: places," said Christine. "Any ideas of venues? You're local."

"For ordaining?"

"A standard Mass and Ordinations. Meanwhile, it's my birthday and I do rather fancy something nice. Where is Jenny, by the way?"

"Boozing, no doubt. If she's not with Barman again, she's getting pissed."

"Where is... Kathleen, isn't it?"

"Probably with her new girlfriend."

"Hmm. By the way, have you anything more 'you' for my birthday?"

"What do you mean?" Christine was starting to excite me in some deeper places.

She didn't answer me, this time but said, "Listen. Have you some ideas? Venues. Come on."

I said of the United Presbyterian and Congregationalist church.

Yes, she'd already looked there, but it was not available from Georgie Smith at short notice. It would have been perfect if a little run down. She said, "I told her over the phone about our intended use, so perhaps if I'd said a theatre group they might have let us have it."

"She lets the Serninsea Vestal Virgins meet there. Perhaps I shouldn't have mentioned..."

"Georgie thinks it's a women's prayer group whereas she thinks the likes of me are barmy clergy going up our own candles."

"They're virtually naked!"

"She's never looked at them in their uniforms. They wear computer covers. I know all about them. Some of these women link with the Holy Order of Sophia with Miriam Magdala but they are not a Church and do not seek out Apostolic Succession. They are spawned from Western extreme Buddhism."

"I take it that above the casino is obviously not available."

"Not to us. This place is remarkably short of venues."

"Not the car showroom."

"Definitely not! Come on, Linda. You and me: we are a team." Christine put out her hand and touched my blouse with her forefinger on my right breast.

"Christine!"

"What?"

"What are you doing?"

"Just thinking there is some time to spare. Linda, take me to your bed for my birthday. I want to slip in, do the deed, slip out quietly. No one need know."

"Are you talking about the ordinations or about me?"

"There's the rub."

As I pulled her out of the room, Leon wasn't sat in the lounge but stood nearby, and as we passed him he gave Christine a bottle.

She broke free, went into the bathroom, grabbed a large towel and folded it coming in my bedroom. With both of us on my bed, removing clothes, she opened the bottle.

"What's that?" I asked, as she dropped the towel down.

"For dry skin," she replied. She was pouring it on her right hand.

Both naked, I was turned over on to my front, instructed to face away on my knees on the towel and lower my back. I said, "Oh my God."

"Precisely. You have it right."

One hand was under me, on to my breasts, gathered and pressed together in one movement. The other was doing gooey anal speleology. "Christine, please - please."

"It is my birthday, and your present to me is your arse and all that goes before it."

"Oh, Caro... You... shoudn't."

"I should and I will. This arsehole is amazing. If I go slowly here, you won't get any splits you got at the car showroom, but I am going in. You've wanted this from me all the time you've known me. Yes?"

"Yes. Christine."

I was getting incredible deep sensations, her left arm on my stomach now and pushing it up and releasing it in a rhythm. Pumping my stomach and he wrist action in my anus caused me to pee involuntarily in spurts.

My orgasm hit hard. "The divine descends into your deepest body! From the channel of your waste comes.... Beauty!"

As for the 'waste' part, I said, "I am so sorry." I wanted to weep.

"Listen. No. Praise God, Linda."

"Of course I praise God but..."

"I will go and wash and you stay there. Turn around to sit on the towel."

She headed for the bathroom and soon returned all cleaned up and poured gooey liquid over my right hand, and, on the bed, got on her knees herself. I wondered what would happen as I looked at her highest spherical hole.

I found that two fingers became three. She (unlike me) pulled her buttock cheeks open, and my sliding in and out meant more and more could go in. My eyes were bulging at the sight, my hand disappearing as she called out in responsive agony. This put an image in my mind I would never forget.

She said, "For your birthday girl: move your fingers about, turn your arm."

My hand was being pressed by this warm, wet, cushioning, as I moved my fingers and twisted around. I rubbed her clitoris with the index finger of my free hand.

She was clearly in transition towards orgasm. She said, "My God, my God, you are the Pure One."

Thus she shuddered, and did this with my invisible hand feeling contractions and retractions in her pressing warmth and wetness.

When it was time, my hand came out like a plop from a clean cave. She turned, grabbed me, pulled me in and pressed me to her. We lay together on our sides breasts to breasts for a good ten minutes, she looking deep into my eyes.

She said, "You invited me into your body, and I invited you into mine. Remember that God put the most beautiful front door you have next to the door where the bins go out. And that is the paradox," she said, "and something you've known ever since Keith widened the passageway. We are so fortunate. Linda, my love: do you know of a beautiful doorway beyond which a ceremony can take place?"

"Well... there is one place not used most afternoons." I ran my hand through her hair.

"Where would that be?" She moved my upper left breast with her right hand and looked at me directly. She kissed me on the lips and moved her head back again.

"The... parish church?"

"Ah," said Christine. She kissed me on the mouth again. When she withdrew, she said, "But how would that work?"

"We slip in quietly, lock the doors, switch the recording microphones off, do the deed, slip out quietly. No one need know."

"Slip in and slip out. When?"

"Sunday's tomorrow. Monday? Monday afternoon? He won't suspect me being near the church on Monday. He'll probably go out visiting. My day off is Monday; his is Wednesday."

"My fellow bishops are in London tomorrow, where they can meet many in Independent Sacramental Ministry. We will see you Monday, 3 pm?"

"I will have to see that the coast is clear. I'm sorry we can't be more open about it - but - tell you what - it allows me the quiet satisfaction of getting one back on Colin Cromer."

"Lovely Linda. I should still ask you about Jeremy Symes' old church. Wouldn't that be safer for you?"

"I don't have the keys. Colin may have a set, but I'd then have to ask him. Oh my God, Christine. You in my bed. I have only dreamed of this moment. Can we do the ceremony efficiently?"

"Oh yes. Half an hour - in and out. In and out, Linda."

"Then I'd like the satisfaction of in and out of my church. I want you again and again and again, lovely, sweet Christine."

The deal was struck and we kissed, and both of us went to the bathroom together. I sat to pee and smiled at her, and sorted out by cleaning what ceased to be my embarrassment. She smiled, and sat on the loo after me. We both washed our hands together, side by side.

Soon Leon came out of the larger lounge, and they left in her car. We'd communicate through encrypted texts.

The LAE Bishops Ordain (Monday 9th September)

I told Jenny I was going out with some pastoral visiting. I was wearing my white cassock.

"It's your day off."

"Sometimes, like when people are dying, the day you take off is not the usual one."

"I can come to a nursing home and keep the folks entertained."

"Sure, but it is sheltered housing I'm interested in."

With Jenny shaken off, my SUV went down to Titansea, where Christine's helicopter came out of the sky and landed. I took Bishop Luis Mariano Callas, Bishop Geoffrey Paul Virgo, Bishop Arianwen Bron and Bishop Christine Vine into my SUV.

We then went north, into Jim Wilson's most northerly territory, where we arrived at Bishop William Masters' house. He was with Bishop Pauline Junor. So they all had a conversation about what would happen and how. I was asked if I would take photographs throughout the ceremony.

Bishop Geoff had a further idea for me. "But why not also use my legitimate office for me to remove doubt about these Anglican orders of yours."

"I don't know about that," I said.

"Remember what I said about Old Catholic Bishop Arnold Mathew Harris?"

"I rejected this in Bristol."

"We could bond with this, like we never did back at school."

"Go on Linda," said Bishop Christine. I adored her.

"Ah," I said. "Now you are all talking. I like this idea of a religious version of our bonding." Also, I was just fed up with Colin Cromer's restraints. I could, with this, quietly rebel.

Arianwen Bron had a soft Welsh accent but she only said pleasantries. Other than her fake coloured red hair, she had an air of sophistication, wearing elaborate robes in light blue and white, whilst the rest were in cassocks of purple (and me in white).

While at Bill's, Geoff produced on his tablet the liturgy for ordaining a priest of another fealty for me to see. He then said that although the corporate Church followed the Seven Councils and the main creeds, in fact there was no test on any individual. Ordination itself was an act on the person, and that's how it could extend to me. Then Geoff prepared Bill and Pauline for incardination - membership - that while the Church they were joining eschews a doctrinal demand it is unswerving on a number of points: "First is a commitment to the teachings of Christ, however one understands the term 'Christ'; second, we guarantee for all our ministers freedom of intellectual development in their ministries; and third, we maintain apostolic succession and the validity of sacraments."

We all agreed terms for our situations, but Luis said I would not prostrate because I remained within my own "ecclesiastical fellowship."

Geoff said, "I made an educated guess that in this generally liberal Wytham Diocese you would be fairly liberal yourself. What is your view of ordination, roughly speaking, Linda?"

"There's the social anthropology of ritual as a doorway, and as a gift of Christian give and take that involves a change in life and a binding into the community in space."

"Fascinating stance," said Luis.

"Very liberal, my love," said Christine to me.

"And your grounds of theology?" asked Geoff.

"I think all the secular narratives are how things more or less operate. So religion is a means to some sort of overview. Our peculiarity is where Christ is like an art movement that has our attachment, and we do it by working through traditions and details and extracting various meanings and commitments as a way to frame one's self and direction."

"Blimey," said Christine. "I didn't know you were that far gone. I'm going to have to take you in hand."

"I'd appreciate that," I said, like a dependent child.

Geoff reminded me that they operated an open table Eucharist - that any one can partake. "So you can take communion from us."

Then I had a thought, as they mentioned not ordaining minor orders this time. "Christine. What about Peter Marshall? He is a bit Pagan and Buddhist: would he be interested in any of these minor orders? What do you think? Or is he too involved elsewhere?"

Luis pointed out that minor orders are usually carried out as a learning and training process within the Church itself towards becoming a deacon and priest. However, there was nothing to stop them recognising involvements elsewhere.

Christine suggested that I ask Peter if he would be interested. I phoned him. It turned out that he was and suggested that Kathleen and Winnie would be as well. Adam gave him permission to leave work for the purpose and to have an observant eye on proceedings.

All this extra activity led me to ask the bishops if we could complete within an hour. "We ought to try to get out by 4 pm. School traffic will have gone, people are not yet going home from work; Colin will still be visiting. He usually continues to just before work-leaving time."

"An hour. No music, no processions: Christine can still censor, if it is quick to burn." said Geoff.

So I drove us down to near my parish church, and I held my keys.

Arianwen said to me that not only was she ordained into the Holy Order of Sophia with Miriam Magdala, but that with her west Welsh and southern French ancestry she was one of the descendents of Jesus and Mary. Her Eucharistic acts were therefore direct.

I parked near the church so that we could use the back entrance. Walking along the street were Peter holding Kathryn's hand and Kathleen holding Winnie's hand. Ah.

I gestured to them to go around the streets to the back of the church, and, carrying so much ecclesiastical clobber, we too went towards the gate to the graveyard and walk up where the vicarage had a restricted view over trees and a wall. No one was at the one upstairs window that had an angled overview. We arrived at the vestry external door, being shielded there, and I unlocked it to go in.

"No one say a thing or go beyond the vestry until I have walked to the box and switched off the cameras and microphones."

I unlocked the internal door. I went through and moving along the side of the church approached this box near a window. Inside it was labelled 'Communications'. There were some six unidentified switches in a down position and I put them all up. My new colleagues could now come in and did; I locked the external vestry external door from the inside. The internal vestry door was left unlocked.

I said we could not put any lights on because they would attract attention, so it was slightly gloomy for us.

Peter, Kathleen and Winnie were offered a simple alb and rope each from the church's own hanging collection, and then we acquired the 'holy handbag' (little used).

Bishops Geoff, Luis and Bill and Peter robed up, crammed in the vestry. Kathleen and Winnie undressed and dressed in the church. I was the one who did no more than add a stole. Kathryn was the congregation!

Peter assured everyone that he and the others had looked up the Liberal Apostolic Ecclesia on its website and he approved of its liberality.

I made sure the wine and discs were available using the parish Eucharist set. On Geoff's instruction I also placed on the altar table a small stone, a bowl of water and a candle to stay unlit until used. Christine lit the candles at either end.

The bishops grouped themselves up behind the altar table, and the rest were on near pews. Kathryn took the camera for the 'proof' that these events happened; I wasn't sure about this, because, as well as potentially distracting from the service, we were breaking a few Anglican institutional rules and I'd prefer if events went unrecorded.

Christine then said, "Kathryn. Keep the focus on us and what we do; avoid general pictures."

I said, "Switch the flash off. You'll have to hold the camera steady."

So the service began. An Entrance Song was read out, and the Confiteor (removing the candidates of sins) followed, before Christine did her first (only a little bit) censuring. Then we had the Kyries, the Gloria, and only then came the Opening Prayer - this late positioning a legacy of the Anglican 1662 Prayer Book. Then followed the Liturgy of the Word, and this meant Isaiah 61: 1-8, Psalm 40: 1 done as a response, Hebrews 5: 1-10 and then the Alleluia Acclamation, with incense again up to the Gospel of John 13: 1-15 and a brief homily to the candidates. After this came a Litany to the Trinity.

The bishops came from behind the altar table to stand in front of it. First the Doorkeepers were ordained by the bishops into the LAE, reminded of its basis - follow Christ, develop intellectually, promote the Church; then I was ordained as a priest, sub-conditione; and then came the bishops. Geoff declared that their orders being secure, they did not need ordaining again. (There seemed to be a change of mind here - maybe when they robed?)

Bill and Pauline stood and each affirmed the summary of each ministry intention (pastoral to the agricultural area) read out by Geoff and then Luis. They then prostrated themselves in front of the altar table and the bishops. This intended to show that they had given up all other loyalties, although they had been loyal only to themselves. From that position each agreed to continue to preach the Gospel, to uphold the deposit of faith, be good shepherds, build unity, attend Councils, contribute to the new Confraternity with wisdom, and call upon God to work through them. Their incardination took place. Each bishop stood to receive from the Reverend Doorkeeper Peter: a book of the New Testament, a ring, a mitre, and a staff.

We had a Statement of Faith - not one of the Creeds - and after a censuring we arrived at the Liberal Apostolic Ecclesia Eucharist, led by Bishop Geoff. It felt so very different from orthodoxy:

"We praise and bless this universe our home, and its spirit of life. And in this our island setting are the mythical four winds: with the blessing of Uriel of the dark and fertile earth, blowing past Saint Columba of Scotland, we have the cold wind from the north; With the blessing of Raphael in his golden cloak, blowing past Saint George of England, we have the dry wind from the east; with the blessing of Michael of the red flame, blowing past Saint David of Wales, we have the hot wind from the south; and with the blessing of Gabriel of the blue water, blowing past Saint Patrick of Ireland, we have the wet wind from the west. And east is for air, south is for fire, west is for water, and north is for earth.

On he went about the seasons and the wind direction, even:

"Plato said that earth is dark, thick and quiet. For Aristotle the earth is cold, female and dry. The north person, the earth person, is practical and material, productive and rooted and builds her nest as a place to return."

This meant raising a stone.

Later we had: "Plato said that air is dark, thin and of motion. For Aristotle the air is cold, male and moist."

This was about rationality. Hands with opened fingers were gestured.

"Plato said fire is bright, thick and of motion. For Aristotle the fire is warm, male and dry."

This was about energy and a candle was lit.

"Plato said water is dark, thick and of motion. For Aristotle the water is cold, female and moist."

This was about feeling and fingers were dipped in water.

I was most interested in the notion of the 'mystic space' as an introduction to the feeding and drinking ritual. Bishop Luis said these words:

"Here we are gathered

Around the food and drink of life:

Bread, the staple diet, representing all nourishment

And therefore becoming the body;

Pure water, representing all life flows

And therefore becoming blood;

Sustenance to live and have our being.

We come to this Eucharistic celebration

In a spirit of love and charity towards our neighbours,

Intending to live a new life, by following ethical precepts and holy ways.

So let us draw near with faith, and examine our conditions, for our thanksgiving."

We moved to an interfaith basis of comfortable words. I liked these, read by Bishop Arianwen:

"Jesus said, Come unto me all that travail and are heavy laden, and I will refresh them. Gandhi had this insight: "A nation that is capable of limitless sacrifice is capable of rising to limitless heights. The purer the sacrifice the quicker the progress. [Attenborough, R. (1982), The Words of Gandhi, 13]. Buddha told us to: Go forth on your journey, for the profit of many, out of compassion for the world, for the welfare, the profit, the bliss of devas and humankind. (Vinaya, 1.21)"

After what seemed to me to be a fairly humanistic Sursum Corda, and an environmentalist with communal Preface, the Sanctus led by Arianwen said:

"Holy is this community, for there is no heaven beyond earth, but it must be here, in and amongst us, waiting for us to release its potential."

After the Prayer of Humble Access came a most strange (to me) Prayer of Consecration, led by Geoff.

"O Ultimate hear us,

For this ritual of bread and pure juice

Is the most natural, with the produce of the earth

And has caused no suffering to any living creature.

Jesus of Nazareth, when he prepared passover,

Knowing that time was short, on a night that he was betrayed,

Took bread, and when he had given thanks broke it

*And shared it among his company of supporters;
And then he took wine, and when he had given thanks, drank it
And shared it among the same company of supporters.
He said to them, "Do this often to remember me."
And they did.
And it symbolised that he, even he, could be put to death by the State.
And his followers do re-live who he was for them,
Water that became wine, [Raise the wine]
And which is in all that refreshes and transforms;
And we re-live what this made bread can be for us: [Hold some bread]
Bread and wine
Upon the plentiful earth:
A bountiful produce -
The food of life;
The life-force running through all that lives,
As in the running rivers and growing crops,
The ever continuous round of life and death,
And the demand for the ethical and moral life."*

I preferred this to the liturgy we Anglicans stated. If clumsy, this was fresher and ours was sterile. Also fresh was saying, three times:

"We come now, all of us, committed to a renewed direction."

And so we took Communion, and we had a Dismissal by Geoff to:

"Go out into the world and live, committed to a renewed direction."

That was it. It took under an hour and I felt that we had all bonded. We rapidly cleared away, and most of us got out of the additional clerical garb.

In my stoleless white cassock I asked people to wait outside at the back. I went forward to the box and put the switches to the down position. I returned to lock up and was satisfied nothing was left different. The censing smell would lessen.

I saw no one looking from on high at the vicarage.

I insisted that photographs had to stay anonymous regarding the venue; the Wickenby twins' uncle was to hear nothing at all about the event.

The Funeral (Tuesday 10th September)

I had an early message from Colin Cromer waiting on my phone and by email.

Do not come to Morning Prayer today. Await further instructions. If you attend the funeral at Serninsea Marshes [Jim Wilson's most southerly church, location of the vicarage] please sit alone or with whichever friend comes with you, for example Christine Vine or Diana de Groot. I would appreciate no communication from you or anyone with you. The Reverend Colin Cromer, Vicar of Serninsea.

Christine indeed did call at my house, parking her car, and she was wearing a simple black cassock, also my choice of dress. (The Bristol bishops with Arianwen Bron had arrived in Norwich, visiting Julian's hideaway and other ecclesiastical delights.) Christine also read the message from Colin Cromer.

She said, "Nah. It won't be about yesterday's ordinations and Eucharist. We were all discreet. Thank you ever so much. Kiss kiss?"

We kissed with our lips.

"But why should Colin Cromer be so sensitive about me, or Diana and me, about Ken Osis?"

Christine said, "It's a difficult day, perhaps."

I signed for a parcel that was delivered. Christine was being nosy, as were Kathleen and Jenny. Inside were three hundred or so mainly nude photographs of me. They were from the collection of Ken Osis. He'd taken almost all pictures sat on the floor plus some from a group event or two. In those days the studio did not do 'British Magazine', 'European Magazine' etc., but the website showed that it had changed policy, and my nude variety became known as 'Classic Nude'. The studio website didn't show nude examples, but whilst its vast majority of models to hire were eighteen to twenty-two year olds it had added a 'Speciality Mature' category where the oldest was forty. Anyway, Ken's photos were sharp and in focus. Some pictures of me were fairly revealing, partly because I didn't care. I recalled they were all done with a 50 mm Single Lens Reflex camera and no complicated lenses.

Christine said. "The photos Colin Cromer received were Barman's doing."

"I thought so," I said. "He was always undermining me. I suppose he is now, again, now that I have backed your side of things. Maybe that's why Colin is sensitive; he's at it again."

I took Jenny and Christine and picked up Diana on the way, who was grumpy. Arriving at the funeral, we said nothing to anyone else - on my instruction. The funeral (followed by burial) was being taken by the diocesan bishop, the Right Reverend Derek Imperial, with a sermon by the suffragan bishop, the Right Reverend John Terence Barman. This was our equivalent of full military honours.

Meanwhile, they'd learnt something about funerals in recent times, to make them more biographical in the sermon (that which had happened) and less remote or supernatural (what was supposed to happen).

The Baptist clergyman friend of Ken Osis, the Reverend Benajah Abernathy, with a big circular collar around his black shirt, gave an unscripted reflection. "This man struggled. He struggled with his family, his life, and his beliefs. So often I would be adding support to his bendy backbone. At the end there was some Unitarian interference, because he wanted to impress such a woman. A licentious woman, I said to him, and not to be drawn in by her charms, but he said, 'I must investigate, Ben.' He was even a little confused as to her first name. At least he rejected her erroneous beliefs. This final relationship failure followed his fleeting attachment to a woman who was evangelical all right but turned out to be cruelly unavailable. His quests for emotional connection always failed. In the end, he went the wrong family way and gave up. If either or both of these women are here today, may they ask themselves about the sin that has clouded them and darkened our true friend and fellow struggler. May the Lord resurrect his troubled soul and bring him to glory."

Diana, alongside, said to me, "I feel sick."

John Barman started the sermon proper after the Trinity declaration with the statement, "I have written this sermon in conjunction with the diocesan bishop here, and indeed my absent colleague Bishop Julian of Screddington has agreed with this pastoral statement."

Further along this speech, he said:

"This was a man who was good at the role given to him: a confessor of other established clergy and those clergy in training. Yet it turned out - although it wasn't evident - that he was, himself, a very much uncertain person who needed and used his own confessor with increasing frequency in later times. Perhaps we should all repent. We thought he was good for the role because he treated each person individually, was a conduit for clergy concerns, and he really could keep a secret. He wrote nothing down about their confessions in these A4 writing books he kept as diaries, although we lack the later books..."

Obviously Barman didn't lack them. The missing books included all the period Ken Osis was a confessor.

"He did lack friends, but we note how he valued the friendship of an evangelical Baptist man, a close friendship indeed. We have heard from him here today."

And later he also read out:

"Deaths in his family weighed heavily on him, perhaps too heavily. His unfulfilled desire for an intimate relationship was a life-disappointment for him. He lost active contact with his existing friends by becoming a clergyman far from his place of upbringing, and this role was a barrier to finding new friends, and he gained only a few friends among colleagues. Latterly Ken contemplated more liberal views to try and bond in a new potential relationship with a Unitarian naturist and even this failed, as will surely be outlined in the missing books."

The Reverend Abernathy nodded. Diana gave me a long look. Yes, again, this meant us.

"We really do need to pick up on colleagues who are at some emotional drift when the evidence is painfully evident: but of course it was not painfully evident when so much is held privately. This means we need to be more proactively sensitive and supportive: the pastoral radar must pick up weaker signals."

I noticed Connie Wilson. She gave me one of her looks suggesting that Diana and I were guilty, even though the Reverend Abernathy had included her as 'cruelly unavailable' in his reflection. She was a sexual monster.

After the funeral service Diana said to me, "He was a lost bastard. I'm sorry for that Baptist clergyman. By the way, do you believe all that sermon?"

"No. He's lying. He's got those books; he was speaking from their content. We are in them."

Looking about and rather lost, I gathered that some people would go to the graveside. Colin steered away from me, so I thought it better if we four left. Jenny wanted to stay. She would get a lift back with John Barman, she said.

Christine had decided she would not be welcome by the graveside, like me.

Bishop Derek was already by the graveside, so I was anyway unable to say hello. As I left with Diana and Christine, the Baptist clergyman spoke to my clerical collar, saying, "The Lord in his mighty justice takes away those who were good and yet slipped just a little. I am told that you knew him."

I looked at this man and was really angry, and said, loudly, "You do talk some bollocks," and walked off, forcing my two compatriots to come after me.

Diana said to me, "That was uncalled for."

After I dropped off Diana, Christine said she wanted to go with me to the woods and lake out at Carr Fen. I thought this was for contemplation, but soon learnt of her actual desire. She removed my black cassock and her own; my arse fell into some boggy ground. In these woods, with only a wide tree and another to block the view into open land, she started seducing me and seriously so with her fingers and tongue. This was dangerous stuff among the trees. I reckoned that this passion for me was a reaction to the funeral.

When she caused me to orgasm, and spill much liquid down my legs, she called out, "God bless this natural woman!"

I hung on to her for some minutes, "Christine! My gosh." (I was trying to be respectful - I hated the common revision.)

"My gosh?' Don't you dare secularise it. It is 'my God' and nothing else." (She was quite right.)

"Sorry."

"Thank God and thank you, my love, for all you have done. Listen. We are going to keep a watch on you, Linda. Storm clouds are gathering but you may even avoid the rain."

There were too many people around for us to jump into the lake, but the lake would not have removed all the mud on our bodies. Some had got on to our cassocks, but we put them on.

Kathleen and Winnie watched as Christine and I put our cassocks into the washing machine. We then ran upstairs to the bathroom to share a shower. I enjoyed our clean up, but it was matter of fact. We continued to be naked, Christine showing some existing injuries on her drying body. Leon arrived after she rang him, with mufti for her to wear.

She dressed in front of him and me and looked at me closely before leaving. "You are a wonderful, sexual, servicing and sacrificing woman. Contact me, contact Adam, without delay, if there are immediate difficulties but otherwise take the roads offered."

Leon drove Christine to her helicopter for a trip to Norfolk. Her car stayed outside.

I stayed naked into the evening. Kathleen and Winnie did not join in.

Jenny stank of alcohol when she came in, and went straight to her bedroom. If she had been with John Barman, she was saying nothing. When I looked outside before bed, Christine's car had gone.

Chapter 18 Bolingbroke's Moment

Narrator: Linda Bolingbroke Calls the Shots (Wednesday 11th September)

I was in the church, and I was prostrate on the floor and naked, and in came Colin Cromer from his visits, and he started poking at me with a pole once used by sidespeople.

Adam was prodding me. "Linda. Look at the screen. The CCTV picture. It's your Bishop of Bolingbroke at the front door, with a shoulder bag." The bell went and went again and again.

The fastest way to get to the front door was to put my cassock on over my head downstairs. So I did.

I opened the door. "Ber-bishop, what..."

He walked straight in. "Tell the wanker to piss off will you? I know he's up there. I think your lounge will do. Sit on the sofa." He sat on a chair.

Adam's feet became visible on the staircase, and in fact Kathleen was upstairs with Winnie but did not come down. From Adam's pause and turn I took it that he told them to stay upstairs.

The bishop said, as Adam approached the lounge, "On your merry way, Magellan. I'm here to rescue this woman's ministry, and the last person we need here is you. So goodbye. Leave this house: you are no longer welcome."

"I need to be dressed and get my shoes on first."

"Don't leave me Adam," I said.

"No, I'd better go," he said. "But you're in our thoughts."

"Her thoughts will soon equal my instructions. Get dressed and clear off. Get your food and a shit at your own place, like you should."

Some minutes later Adam went out of the house via the front door, but Jenny came downstairs. She asked what was going on.

The bishop answered, "You'll be pleased to know that I am about to rescue this stupid woman's ministry. And I'd appreciate it if you would go in a different room and shut any door, Jenny."

She went into the kitchen and shut its door, and the bishop rose and shut the lounge door. He sat on the sofa next to me and removed a tablet from his bag to view it.

He said, "On this tablet is a video file and rather a long one it is. Over an hour. Clicking here you can see that from a high angle we have some peculiar people present in a church. Here is the peculiar Christine Vine, a self-styled bishop, swinging some incense that is the property of the parish - as is the censer. Some of these outfits worn are ours, but not the most elaborate ones. We seem to be playing a game of bishops and clergy."

My stomach hit my feet. My mouth was dry. I uttered, "How did... how did these.. I thought I'd avoided every sensor and switched everything off."

"Put them all off and they come on again and cause an alarm to go off in the vicarage."

"When was this arrangement done?"

"Sound and vision are recorded immediately at the vicarage computer and there is a feed, if wanted, to the main television."

"We didn't put any lights on, so not to attract attention."

"Yes. Our cameras do very low light and, well, a September afternoon is bright enough. Anyway, at this point in the video I notice that you are being ordained. Funnily enough, I thought we had ordained you at Petertide, but perhaps you thought not."

"Oh dear."

"Oh dear indeed. So I have viewed - and I did so before the funeral - various other people being allegedly ordained as this, that and the other, and also a something parodying a Eucharist with quite a Pagan aspect to it."

"Oh shit."

"Oh shit indeed."

"I'm feeling sick. My guts."

"But not as sick as Colin Cromer felt. He watched it live. Perhaps you thought he was out visiting the great unwashed, but actually he was watching a nice bit of telly when the CCTV gave its alarm and he hit the zapper for the live relay. It is such a clever system, now. Having endured some of this private viewing he, well, contacted me. So I have a question. What do you think you were doing, according to his particular perspective?"

"We did... what you saw."

"No no. I know you like interpretation."

"What you said."

"No! From his perspective! Come on."

"I don't know. My guts, honestly, Bishop John."

"You have violated his altar table. You have polluted it. This is a sacred space - it is special - and it ought to be held in reverence. But your holy clowns came along and violated it. He cannot go there, cannot until I go, or the Bishop of Scredington, or Derek Imperial, or even all three of us, to perform a ceremony ourselves to clean this sacred space from your filth."

"It is not..."

"It is filth, and you have destroyed that man."

"Sorry. I need the loo. I do."

I ran off and shook as I lost control in the downstairs loo.

Returning, after spending ages wiping my arse, the bishop still had his laptop open.

"Before you so rudely interrupted me, I was saying that you have destroyed that man. He has been in this post for over thirty-six years, and some shallow curate comes along and wrecks the place. This is his life's work, the very place where he invests his being, and you, some upstart full of arrogance, barely out of being a deacon, come along and spread ecclesiastical manure all over his most treasured sacred space."

"Ugh."

"So the upshot is you are not going in that church again, not at all. He does not wish to see you. Tragically, he had to clap eyes on you at that funeral. He was already warning you over your obvious visit to the misnamed Serninsea Vestal Virgins, when you unleashed against him a mouthful of foul language, and now you may as well have defecated not under your stairs but in his church."

I got up and went out of the lounge and into the understairs toilet again, the door left open, and threw up.

I heard him say, "Vomited this time. Amounts to the same thing in the parish church."

When I was out of the toilet, Kathleen was leaning against the wall next to the lounge door with her finger pointed upwards against her mouth. I only gestured at Jenny to shut the kitchen door, leaving Kathleen hiding and listening.

"Quite right; this is nothing to do with Jenny." He then said to me, as I sat down, "You've got sick on your cassock. Take it off."

"What?" I couldn't see any vomit on my cassock.

"Take it off."

So I stood and removed it over my head. I turned to him, naked, and he looked up at me. He told me to sit down.

"I need a towel to sit on." I went and got one from the kitchen (with Jenny wide-eyed), seeing Kathleen only on the way back.

He said, "Sit on it then. Look, I'm being pragmatic here. First of all, your ministry at Serninsea is finished. I think we know that. And it has been clear that you have been in the last chance saloon for a while now. Enough is enough: you've tossed over all the drinks. Think of how generous Bishop Derek has been to you. Imagine, given how highly he regards your attention to theological detail, just how disappointed he would be if he saw these video recordings."

"No! Please don't show him. Please."

"I probably have no choice, but he is distracted by this Report on the Managerial Efficiency of the Wytham Diocese coming up. As it happens I do have - thanks to his generosity - a lot of autonomy in running things around here. It affects you. So a number of things follow."

"I submit to you?"

"We will arrange that. Secondly, do not distract the diocesan by having some investigation come out by your lover Magellan. That has to stop."

"Yes. Yes it does. But how can I stop him?"

"Well, you can tell him either he does stop it or your career is ruined. No salary, no house. But, by the way, tell him in town. He is no longer going to come into this curate's house. You'd be advised to end your relationship with him. There are many people interested in you. There was Ken Osis, but he is dead now, thanks to you, and then there is Rabbi Maurice Neptune, but the person who will really need your care and attention is Jenny World. Keep Magellan away from her as well; he has already taken advantage of her."

"Yes, of course. Do you want me to go back to Stephen McPhail? I will. I will do what you want."

"No no. We are not mentoring you any more. We don't need that. Your next appointment will be your initiation, and it will be with me. I will initiate you into the The Worshipful Company of Serninsea Theatrical Players, the group here under the Confraternity Vanguard. You will indeed submit to me, and you will stay submitted to me."

"Yes. You're very kind to still consider me." (I was shaking.)

"I suppose to keep you on the payroll you will have to move to Inglemire with Caffenmere - my parish indeed - and Jenny World will be the Priest-in-Charge and you shall be her perpetual curate. I think she is able to take on the parish. It's not too demanding, after all. This leaves me with having to tell Colin Cromer about my compassion towards you. He won't be very happy. Colin is unrecoverable. You will of course treat the altar tables of your next curacy with due Anglican reverence. Jenny World will see to that. And of course this means you have no more to do with Christine Vine - not a thing."

"I love her."

"My goodness me. You sleep with Magellan and you love Vine. Vine? She is a heretic and is trying to bring down legitimate ecclesiastical authority, all because of her ego. Look, I help this whole town function. I liaise and promote Titansea businesses; I get planning decisions approved that make places like Sutton more beautified; I promote the present economy and the archaeology of the economy: thousands of years of craft skills and so what if I had one object created? You and she tried to split me from our great benefactor, Sir Sanjay Bunker, going so far as entering the notorious car showroom and getting an SUV to show for it. Anyway, all that is water under your crotch of a bridge."

"The other car - I gave it away."

"I heard it had vanished. Who got it?"

"Only a neighbour, who was having trouble with their car."

"Not the one who reported you then, recently."

"No one reported me recently. I'm feeling ill."

"Let me help you; let's look to the future and be positive. Your coming submissions to me in private and in public are to be nothing but life-changing. I know you don't really have any choice but I want you to state now that you agree."

"I..."

"Hold on! So, here we go with the necessaries: Magellan's report is stopped; he no longer sets foot in this house. You wait for instructions from Connie Wilson. You will do exactly what she says, and Connie and Jim will prepare you for me at our chosen venue, perhaps out of town, and then I will initiate you. And sometime afterwards we'll move you down to my parish where Jenny can be in charge of you. You might need to directly oversee her welfare, of course. We can then expand our Vanguard here, as you and Jenny initiate many men and lesbians. Pity we lost Ken, so I'll have to do more. We can also get on with other plans, like expanding into South Wales for sure. Seeing as you like to invade female sexual parts, I might get you to work over that Rhiannon Fleetwood and get her fully on board. Now say you agree."

"I agree. Yes."

"You see. I am the model of compassion and rationality. Why are you pulling a face?"

"Because I am desperate to go to the toilet again and I haven't a lot more time to stop it. I don't have the full means to hang on."

"More sick?"

"No, my guts. They are churning."

"Ugh. I'm not like Sanjay Bunker so I'd better go. Well... Can I hear someone?"

"My stomach or Jenny in the kitchen." (I knew enough that Kathleen was creeping upstairs, but not as quietly as she might have done.)

"You get to the shithouse again and I'll let myself out. Connie will be in touch. Kiss the bishop's ring on my hand."

I kissed his ring. "Can I go?"

"God bless!"

I was spraying the pan when the front door finally closed, the toilet door nearly shut. I think Barman had looked into the front room, suspecting someone was in there.

With him gone, Jenny was now behind the toilet door, in the hallway. She said, through it, "Connie Wilson and Jim Wilson will harm you, Linda. I'm really worried."

"Let them. I deserve it. I deserve everything that is coming. Tell Adam to stop his report and to leave me alone. He must not do his report and not send it to the media. He must not do it."

After emptying my insides, I found my old plastic hairbrush, and ran its spikes vigorously through my hair. The game was up for me. I would submit.

Narrator: Adam Discussing Linda (Later Wednesday 11th September)

Peter, Kathleen and Winnie, Diana, Ann and Labhaoise, joined me at my place. Kathleen and Winnie had brought over bags of my items from the curate's house. Christine would come along in person for our meeting, because it mattered. She had been doing house calls among her tenants, and indeed she'd talk to Ann and Labhaoise about their latest renovated properties to buy.

Diana was furious with Christine when she arrived, saying that her meddling had caused Linda more grief.

Christine said, "We need to press on Linda the need to leave, to cut her links, to get out."

Kathleen told us what she had overheard: I was indeed banned from the house; Linda would get instructions from Connie Wilson so that Barman would initiate Linda at an undisclosed location, even out of town; Linda was not to return to the parish church at all; I had to stop doing my report against Barman for the media.

I said, "The ordinations have had the opposite effect." I shared a text message from Linda, who told me to stay away from the curate's house, stop the report and not to reply.

So I said to the gathered, "We need a date and time and a place for Linda's initiation to protect her from their punishment. Any idea, hint, on these?"

Kathleen said, "We'll have to keep watch, keep listening."

Jenny arrived, Peter letting her in.

Christine asked, "What are you doing here, Jenny?"

"Kathleen and Winnie were never going out to the town cafe."

"We might have," Winnie said.

"For pork pies," Jenny said. "Look. I could tell you Adam to stop the report you are doing. You know all that. I am telling you instead that I don't like Connie and Jim Wilson. They are sadists. I've contacted Liz Huett and said I am very worried for Linda. She's told me that Linda won't get harmed: it will be like Ken Osis and I shouldn't worry. He was strung up on a double A frame, shown a load of instruments and capitulated. I think Liz is wrong. I think they are going to hurt her, I really do. She has very sensitive skin: it is smooth because she has a biological legacy, let's say, and if they damage it she will suffer, including mentally. They have to be stopped.

That's why I am here."

"Thanks for coming Jenny," I said. I asked if Liz Huett knew that Linda would be all right, or had assumed it.

Jenny did not know. She was considering informing Sarah Deimos, their suffragan, who was starting to detect something wasn't quite right in her locality of that diocese.

"No," I said. "If you do that then the alarm will go off with a similar effect to my report being too early. It's why I haven't interviewed Sarah Deimos on her suspicions."

"Bigger all that; we must act," said Diana. "We could go to Linda's house and move her to a safe place."

Kathleen said, "She won't accept it. We'd end up doing the kidnapping."

Ann said, "You are still going ahead with the report. That's not in question."

I said, "We can tell them I'm not, but still do it."

Labhaoise said, "So long as we can get Linda safe."

"But that's the point," said Jenny. "I will try and tell Terry Barman to leave Linda alone, if she submits."

I asked Jenny if she could contact him and get a reaction. She went into the street to ring him.

Kathleen wondered if Linda might respond positively to an intervention from Christine as she was infatuated with her. Diana looked again with eyes of thunder at Christine. Christine said she did not realise Linda had reacted like this to her.

"Liar," said Diana. "You offer her goodies and she cannot resist."

"Yes we had sex, including en plein air," confirmed Christine.

Peter said, "I have to ask if anyone tipped off Barman. She went in around the walls so as not to trigger the cameras; she then switched off those CCTV cameras and microphones, but instead they set off an alarm and started recording."

"I didn't," said Christine. "In any case, I'd made love to her on the altar at Wheaton church - for the Confraternity Vanguard at that time - and there were no cameras in there."

Diana said, "You really are the worst, Christine Vine. You have exploited every vulnerability of that woman. She will think she is loved by someone, when you used her."

"Listen, she has nagged me and I've told her constantly that she could not afford me. So I gave way, that she could give me a birthday present. Perhaps you want the same Diana."

Diana stood up and faced her. "What I want is to give you a fist in your face," said Diana. "Or a kick in the crotch."

"Either would cost you a lot of money," Christine said.

I said, "Sit down, Diana. Christine, please." I told them that this was getting us nowhere.

While we waited for Jenny to return, I gave them other news - obviously Ann, Labhaoise and Kathleen knew this already - that George Wickenby was giving up as an investigator, and he was in negotiation to sell his business to me. This meant not just buying his premises, I told them, but also buying the information in his archive. A lot of this archive would be about his client John Barman, and about the Confraternity-obeying groups. Bizarrely John Barman could become my client, except he wouldn't, of course.

And then Jenny came back in. "Terry told me that they need to be sure that Linda will obey in the long term, and she had been extraordinarily resistant. But he will advise Connie and Jim to keep it moderately persuasive, so long as it is decisive." Jenny continued, "He could just tell them to lay off, but they must be telling him to make an example of Linda. They'll want to break her, to make her compliant. Jim Wilson wants to try out real blood-spilling biblical theology," Jenny said.

"Oh, come on," said Diana. "Surely not. It's all myth stuff."

"No, it is possible," said Christine. "The difference between him and me is that when I am sacrificial I take it whereas he dishes it out - he preaches discipline for others. It's just that I have more opportunities to take it and he has very few opportunities with consent to give it."

Diana asked, "Why?"

"Because he has a Puritan-style evangelical motivation and I am Catholic in my breadth of service."

"My God," said Diana. "You're all mad."

The upshot was just to keep monitoring movements and be ready to respond.

Narrator: Linda Days of Waiting (Thursday to Saturday 14th September)

I was back staying in bed, yet again. A further message to Adam on Thursday was again both to make sure he stayed away from me and to stop his report. Diana came in and told me to eat, but I was refusing food. She went on about me leaving with her to visit relatives (by marriage) in the Netherlands. I told her to leave the house and not return. So she did, after staring me out.

Kathleen I just about tolerated. She had her own room after all, and Winnie was her distraction.

Jenny stayed clear of me. I shouted out at her, outside my bedroom door, "Nicodemite cunt!" After all, Jenny was part of the pressure I'd been put under. I realised I would have to get back with her, but it wasn't going to be easy.

I just had glasses of water through Thursday from the kitchen brought by Kathleen. My hair was a mess. The West Indian food aromas drifting upstairs were tempting. Kathleen with Winnie asked me if I'd join them eating, but I didn't take up the offer.

Of course I was completely inconsistent. Come Friday, I did end up having a bite of theirs to eat, and it was delicious. When done, Kathleen and Winnie promptly took me upstairs and dumped me in a bath, not that I was smelling (because I don't). They scrubbed me rather vigorously, and made my hair decent.

Later that Friday, I rang Adam in person to press home the point that he cannot go through with his intended exposure.

"Don't worry. I'm distracted," he told me. "There is George's business to absorb."

"What?"

"He is retiring and I am negotiating a price."

"Bishop Barman is his client."

"And he will become mine, if he wants my business."

"I expect Wickenby is watching me."

"If he is it will be his final job. I shall tell him to stop."

"Anyway, you are not listening to me."

"I am. I'm not touching the report. And if Barman becomes my client, I am compromised."

"Why don't you listen to me? I've got nowhere to go. What shall I end up doing? Going to Wales and doing a farm shop?"

"They are trying to frighten you."

"No, Adam, I have done something very wrong - very very wrong. Why did I do it? Christine: it is Christine's fault. I hate her. I've upset Colin Cromer so deeply, and I am guilty. I deserve everything coming to me."

Some time on, I heard the front door open. I assumed it was Adam, so just floated downstairs naked to confront him with then Kathleen looking from behind down the stairs.

It was Keith, coming indoors. Keith? "What do you want?"

"I still have a door key. Do you want it?"

"Yes, though I'm not sure I'll be here for much longer."

Kathleen descended and disappeared into the large lounge.

"Why not? Might you move out?"

"We did ordinations and a Eucharist in the parish church, except they were independent bishops and used their liturgy. Don't you know?"

"On Colin Cromer's altar table? Why did you do that? It's the worst thing you could have done."

"To bond the group. Give it sacred force, you know. I was off my head. Too much Christine. I've been frustrated. Do you want to fuck me?"

"SMS told me to come up here and spend time talking to George Wickenby to secure our data."

"From Harwich?"

"I'm up from Felixstowe but it's because Wickenby is selling up to your lover."

"What lover? Adam is no longer my lover."

"Oh?"

"Do you want a fuck, Keith? For God's sake do you want to fuck me?"

"I left some papers behind, and I think some pen drives in drawers. Anyway, shall we sit down in the sitting room?"

"Why don't you want to fuck me?"

"Are you feeling all right? I had a sixth sense things were not right."

"I'm a nasty, horrible, person and they are going to punish me."
